The option proposal was sponsored by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.), former secretary of Health, Education & Welfare. It had the support of Senate Democratic leaders and was endorsed by Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.) as an acceptable alternative to the hospital insurance bill he has co-sponsored.

The bill sent to the Senate floor also lacked a feature of the House bill which had been strongly endorsed by the AFL-CIO—a provision to count tips as wages for social security purposes, including taxes paid by workers and employers and for computation of benefits. Employers had protested paying their share of the added taxes and the committee deleted the entire provision.

Also knocked out of the House bill was an extension of social secu-

Auto Workers Reject Offer From Big 3

Chicago—The Auto Workers Executive Board has rejected the contract proposals of the Big Three automobile companies as "unacceptable" and set a meeting for Aug. 26 to review the status of negotiations and "if necessary, to act upon requests for strike authorization."

The board action came after meetings of the General Motors, Ford and Chrysler councils of the UAW each voted unanimously to reject the auto firms' offer and requested the board for authorization to strike the companies. The councils represent 550,000 auto workers of the three firms.

3 New Boards Ordered in Rail Disputes

Three executive orders creating emergency boards to weigh disputes under the Railway Labor Act have been issued by Pres. Johnson.

His action, involving bargaining that got under way in 1963, came as leaders of shopcraft unions and negotiators for the railroads met in Chicago to bargain on the basis of recommendations of an earlier Presidential Emergency Board on a job security dispute that originated in 1962.

The current disputes all involve non-operating unions.

In one, improved fringe benefits—holidays, vacations and health and welfare provisions—are being sought by the Machinists, Boiler Makers, Sheet Metal Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Railway Carmen, Firemen & Oilers, Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes, Railroad Telegraphers, Signalmen and Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

The IAM, Boiler Makers, Sheet Metal Workers, IBEW, Carmen and Firemen & Oilers have a separate case involving wage increases alone.

The third dispute started as a wage and job security case brought by the Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes, ORT, Signalmen and Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

However, the Signalmen pulled out so far as wages were concerned and reached a separate settlement in May of 10 cents an hour for skilled workers—about 80 percent of the total—and 6 cents for unskilled. The dispute meantime has continued with job security as an issue for all of the unions and wages at stake for all but the Signalmen.

CERTIFICATE of appreciation was presented by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. to Edward E. Goshen (right), a veteran of more than three decades of union activity, upon his retirement as administrator of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training. Presenting the award is Sec.-Treas. David S. Turner of the Sheet Metal Workers, chairman of the Metal Trades Dept. Apprenticeship Committee. Goshen was succeeded as administrator by Hugh C. Murphy, a member of the Bricklayers, who has been with the bureau since 1946.

Goldwater 'No Joke,' Coast Labor Warned

San Francisco—Some 1,700 delegates to the California AFL-CIO's fifth convention here began hammering out an economic and legislative platform for the challenging months ahead.

Even before the delegates had a chance to cut into the rough lumber of policy statements and program resolutions, they heard speaker after speaker attack the threat to organized labor posed by the Republican presidential candidacy of Arizona Sen. Barry Goldwater.

Goldwater is no joke, Gov. Edmund G. Brown warned.

"He wiped the smiles off our faces in a hurry with his San Francisco acceptance speech—one of the most dangerous statements ever made by an American, let alone a candidate for the highest office in the government of our people," Brown declared.

The Republican ticket "would balance our country on the brink of a social, economic, and military disaster," Retail Clerks Pres. James A. Suffridge, representing AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, asserted.

Nothing is as important as the outcome of the coming election, COPE National Dir. Al Barkan emphasized.

"Drop everything else for the next 12 weeks—go all-out," he urged. "The election can very well turn on how California votes."

Brown called on labor to do all it can to return Pres. Johnson to the White House, to defeat a state ballot proposition that would wipe out the state's fair housing laws, and to work to elect progressive Democrats—"and a few progressive Republicans"—to the legislature and Congress.

Johnson himself asked the help of the unionists in a telegram and a special filmed message to the convention.

"The great society in which we have conquered ignorance, violence, poverty, and disease can be ours if we work for it; I want to work with you," he said.

In starting the job of roughing out its economic platform, the State AFL-CIO called for bold policies to provide 4 million new jobs and raise millions of Americans from poverty.

It underscored California's need for economic growth to offset its above average unemployment rate. It warned that the state's heavy involvement in space and defense efforts made it "a potent contender for the nation's leading depressed area" in the event of cutbacks or shifts in federal expenditures in these fields.

The convention urged "comprehensive planning," industrial diversification and, most of all, diversion of federal defense reductions to meeting neglected social needs.

New Mexico Delegates Hit Apportionment Curb

Albuquerque, N.M.—Opposition to efforts in Congress to stall application of Supreme Court reapportionment decisions was expressed by the New Mexico AFL-CIO convention here in a resolution that demanded public hearings on all proposals to mitigate the effects of the high court's rulings.

The national AFL-CIO also has protested failure to hold hearings on Senate resolutions calling for delays of as long as four years in requiring the states to reform lopsided legislative districting. The state body resolutions also threw New Mexico labor's support behind the national AFL-CIO's endorsement of the Supreme Court decisions.

COPE Parley Held

The State AFL-CIO convention was held in conjunction with that of the State Committee for Political Education.

Gov. Jack Campbell (D), a candidate for re-election who was voted support, reminded the COPE parley that the Democratic state platform pledged opposition to so-called "right-to-work" proposals and supported repeal of Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act which permits states to enact such laws. He repeated his own pledge of opposition to compulsory open shop legislation.

Rep. Joseph M. Montoya, Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate seat held by Edwin L. Mechem (R), praised the records of the 88th Congress and of Pres. Johnson as "the greatest in years in terms of legislative accomplishments." E. S. "Johnny" Walker, Democratic congressional candidate, pledged if elected to support the King-Anderson bill and to work for repeal of T-H Sec. 14b.

The state convention called for investigation of the tax exempt status of the New Mexico Cattle Growers Association because of its political activity in support of the compulsory open shop. The organization for several years has been a leading force in support of so-called "right-to-work" legislation and this year participated in at least one key meeting to organize backing for the proposal.

Support of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by Montoya, Rep. Thomas G. Morris (D) and Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D) was commended, while Mechem's votes against cloture and against the bill itself were condemned.

A legislative program was topped by a call for authority for the office of the state labor commissioner to set occupational health and safety standards with statutory effect. Also demanded was repeal of sales taxes on foods, drugs and medical services.

BSEIU Board Supports Johnson

The executive board of the 315,000-member Building Service Employes unanimously favored Pres. Johnson as the next President and vowed to do everything in their power to elect him, Pres. David Sullivan announced after polling the board.

"We in the BSEIU join with the AFL-CIO in planning an extensive campaign to defeat the Republican presidential nominee," he said.

By Unanimous Votes:

Auto Union Councils Reject Big 3 Offer

said that the Aug. 26 meeting would receive reports on strike votes currently in process as well as the status of negotiations and determine the necessary action at that time.

The UAW does not want to strike, the board stressed, but the "selfish, narrow policy [of the companies] must yield to reason and equity" or else a strike will be inescapable. The statement termed the companies' proposals "unfair, inadequate, unrealistic, inequitable and therefore unacceptable."

It added:

"Never have so few with so much offered so little to so many."

Present contracts between the UAW and the companies expire Aug. 31. Bargaining for new agreements started in July with detailed and documented presentation of the union's case for higher wages in light of record-shattering auto industry profits, improved working conditions and a revision of pension policies to provide for earlier retirement at a higher income level.

The Big Three proposals had been roundly scored as inadequate by leaders of the three councils shortly after the companies had issued them.

Leonard Woodcock, UAW vice president and head of the union's GM Dept. termed the proposals "miserably inadequate." Ken Bannon, head of the union's Ford Dept., and Douglas Fraser of the Chrysler Dept. also called them inadequate and "regrettable."

The industry wage and fringe benefit proposals, while not identical, were similar enough to be regarded as a joint offer. The industry offer represented an estimated 30 cents an hour over three years, well under the union's proposals for recognition of the huge profits and sharp productivity gains in the industry.

Woodcock had termed the industry's pension and retirement program a "gesture" to improve the current systems but falling short of what the UAW deems necessary.

Lacking in the firm's proposals were steps to close the present gap between blue collar and white collar wages and working conditions and proposals to meet the problems of working conditions, especially relief time.

The company proposals would continue the annual 2.5 percent annual productivity wage increase and cost of living adjustments, provide an extra holiday, improve the vacation schedule, increase monthly pensions for those retiring in the future, and provide an earlier retirement program and pay the full cost of insurance and welfare programs.

The union has asked for earlier retirement and larger pensions to encourage workers to retire at an earlier age and open up more jobs. On wages the union has set as a minimum target the 4.9 percent increase in productivity in the auto industry to replace the 2.5 annual improvement factor.

A key union demand is an increase from the present 24 minutes of relief time for assembly workers. The companies did not make an offer in this area.

Waterbury Firemen, Police Go AFL-CIO

Waterbury, Conn.—Two AFL-CIO unions were chosen by Waterbury police and firemen in the first secret ballot vote under a new Connecticut state law permitting municipalities to bargain collectively with employe representatives.

The Fire Fighters were chosen by 82 percent of 255 eligible members of the fire department, and the State, County & Municipal Employes by 78 percent of the city's 250 policemen, Pres. John J. Driscoll of the State AFL-CIO reported.

Bookbinders Step Up Kingsport Strike Aid

New York—The Bookbinders, meeting here in their 33d convention, voted to reaffirm support for 1,300 Kingsport Press strikers and to intensify the "Do Not Patronize" campaign against the Kingsport, Tenn., publisher of textbooks and encyclopaedias whose union employes have been on the picket line since Mar. 11, 1963.

In other actions the convention approved the expansion of a union apprentice training program; adopted a constitutional change to add the words "without regard to race, creed, color or national origin" to the union's general laws; and voted full support for AFL-CIO legislative goals and the COPE register-and-vote campaign.

Members of three Bookbinders' units here—Locals 25, 43 and 119—were hosts at a week-long welcoming program which included tours of the city and the World's Fair; entertainment at Jones Beach and the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts; a banquet and reception at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, where convention sessions were held; and a visit to the New York School of Printing, where apprentice training programs are conducted by the city school system for graphic arts unions.

The 256 delegates from 80 locals in the U.S. and Canada chose Toronto as the 1966 convention site. Also they voted to oppose a change in the copyright laws permitting the importation of more books produced abroad, and approved a proposal to encourage the use in schools of factual material on the origin and progress of organized labor.

The resolution on the Kingsport Press strike was introduced by four delegates from Kingsport Local 82—Earl Derrick, Everett Light, Carroll Stark and Hugh Reece. Approved unanimously, it related that the strike was called by five unions because management refused all proposals for a fair contract, and will continue "until justice is obtained."

The Allied Kingsport Press Unions have urged that no products of the struck plant be purchased until reasonable contract terms have been negotiated. Kingsport Press products, produced by strikebreakers, include the World Book and the Child Craft series; Encyclopaedia Britannica, Jr., and Great Books of the Western World, the Book of Knowledge Encyclopaedia and the Grolier Council Encyclopaedia, they said.

Led New York Drive:

Cogen New Chief Of Teachers Union

Chicago—Charles Cogen, who led the successful campaign for collective bargaining rights for New York teachers, was elected president of the American Federation of Teachers at its convention here.

Cogen defeated Charles O. Smith, Jr., of Gary, Ind., by a vote of 1,023 to 993 to succeed Carl Megel of Chicago, who stepped down as AFT president to become the union's legislative director in Washington.

The election came at the 48th AFT convention which heard a report from Megel that a goal set by the union 12 years ago of a 100,000 membership has been achieved. The current over-100,000 figure will continue to grow when the AFT organizing drive is resumed at the beginning of the school year next month, he predicted.

He told the delegates that the AFT is steadily gaining ground in collective bargaining elections. The "box score," he said, shows the AFT representing 62,502 teachers, against 7,881 for the National Education Association, which he termed the "company union."

In his final presidential report, Megel cited "spectacular victories" in Detroit and Cleveland, plus Yonkers, N. Y.; Superior, Wis.; Olympia College, Wash.; Plainview, N. Y.; and Madrid, Spain.

"Our losses included Milwaukee, Wis.; New Rochelle, N. Y., and Bremerton, Wash. Yet these losses invariably saw AFT minority locals increase their voting strength at the polls," he observed.

"We welcome both the wins and the losses because this means that 22 school districts in the nation have granted a basic demand of the American Federation of Teachers: that teachers be given the right to vote in a secret ballot election in order to choose a sole collective bargaining agent for all teachers."

Action on more than 45 resolutions was scheduled after election of officers. The delegates approved a constitutional amendment raising the per capita tax from 67 cents to 75 cents a month.

Prof. Philip M. Hauser, chairman of the Dept. of Sociology, University of Chicago, sharply criticized the Chicago Board of Education and boards in other cities for not taking action to wipe out de facto segregation in public schools.

These boards did not create de facto segregation, Hauser said, "but from now on they must bear the responsibility for its continuation . . . if they do not adopt policies and insist upon their implementation to integrate schooling at all points where it may reasonably and effectively be achieved."

Pres. William A. Lee, of the Chicago AFL-CIO, pledged the central body's support to the AFT collective bargaining campaign.

Other speakers included school and community officials, Exec. Vice Pres. Stanley L. Johnson of the Illinois State AFL-CIO; Ellis Baker, editor of the Newspaper Guild's publication, the Guild Reporter, and Joseph M. Rourke, assistant director, AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

LETTER CARRIERS parade down Miami's Biscayne Blvd. during their union's 75th anniversary convention. Bands, floats and marching units from all parts of the nation were in the three-hour evening parade.

Pay Hike, Bargaining Gains Hailed At Convention of Letter Carriers

Miami Beach, Fla.—The 75th anniversary convention of the Letter Carriers opened on a festive note, with a record attendance of more than 3,000 delegates, a colorful three-hour parade through downtown Miami—and a newly signed pay raise bill to celebrate.

Also a cause for celebration, NALC Pres. Jerome J. Keating reported, was continuing progress made under collective bargaining. The new national agreement with the Post Office Dept., Keating said, contains "major improvements" over the first contract and includes procedures for resolving deadlocked local-level negotiations.

Keating said the union's expanded collective bargaining and servicing program, including two-day training sessions attended by 9,000 members during the past two years, has been a drain on the union's finances. Delegates voted quick and unanimous approval of his recommendation for a $3-a-year increase in per capita tax—from $10 to $13.

After an opening session addressed by congressmen and senators who had led the successful campaign for a pay raise, delegates joined by several thousand local letter carriers and auxiliary members took part in a gala night parade, marching to the tunes of Letter Carrier bands from as far away as Seattle, Wash.

Floats and a special contingent of marchers in letter carrier uniforms of 18 nations bore out the convention's international theme of "peace and brotherhood." Among the fraternal delegates from other nations were a uniformed delegation of letter carriers from the newly independent African nation of Mali.

Letter From President

Postmaster Gen. John A. Gronouski brought to the convention a letter from Pres. Johnson praising the union's contribution to "the growing vitality of employe-management relations in the federal establishment."

Johnson said the pay bill, passed with the help of "untiring efforts" by the union's membership, "not only provides your members with better wages, but also enables the government to attract to public service men of the highest capabilities."

Early speakers included Sen. Olin D. Johnston (D-S. C.), chairman of the Senate Post Office & Civil Service Committee, and Rep. James H. Morrison (D-La.), sponsor of the pay bill in the House.

Others who addressed the convention during its first days included Representatives Albert Johnson (R-Pa.), George P. Miller (D-Calif.), Arnold Olsen (D-Mont.), Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and George M. Wallhauser (R-N. J.).

Among the prominent fraternal delegates from abroad were Carl Stenger of Germany, president of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Intl., trade secretariat associated with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and Gen. Sec. Ron Smith, of the British Postal Workers.

Keating, in his opening address, termed the work of the PTTI "very important to us" and stressed the fraternal ties uniting postal workers throughout the free world.

In his formal report he said the union must fight to reverse the "constant curtailments of postal service that have taken place over the last 15 or 20 years."

The emphasis, he charged, has been shifted from "the necessity of good mail service to the American people" to "the necessity of saving money."

He called on the convention to make the union's priority goal in the next two years the restoration of public service.

Transport Service Union Elects George Sabattie

Chicago—George Sabattie, southeast regional director, was elected president of the Transport Service Employes at the union's 14th convention here.

He defeated Eugene E. Frazier, UTSE president since the death of the union's founder, Willard S. Townsend, in 1957. The delegates also elected three vice presidents—J. P. Covington, John W. Jennings and Glenroy Atkinson.

A series of resolutions adopted by the convention call for full compliance with the Civil Rights Act, support of the President's anti-poverty program and enactment of a federal minimum wage of $2 an hour and state wage floors of $1.50 an hour.

Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver levelled a blistering attack against Sen. Barry Goldwater and urged the union to support Pres. Johnson in the Nov. 3 election.

Weaver, who began his union career in the UTSE, urged the delegates to make sure that every member is registered to vote and goes to the polls on election day.

"The old enemy—insecurity, poverty and injustice—is still with us," Weaver said. "The name, perhaps, is different, but it is the same kind of opposition you have always faced.

"Today, it has captured the Republican Party of this country. It did so in a campaign of fear, naked power and intolerance to opposing opinions such as this country has not seen since the days of the Know-Nothings over a century ago.

"And today this once powerful party, whose first outstanding leader was the Great Emancipator himself is now synonymous in the minds of many people with rabble rousing, racism and reaction. It has deteriorated from the party of the Great Emancipator to the party of 'the great defoliator.'"

Weaver said labor and the nation face a bitter fight against an enemy "who would obliterate every gain working people have made toward decency, justice and a better life."

Frazier devoted most of his report to the convention to an appeal for political action and education.

Other speakers included Exec. Vice Pres. Stanley L. Johnson, Illinois State AFL-CIO; Pres. William A. Lee, Chicago AFL-CIO; Walter G. Davis, assistant director, AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Edward Haines, assistant AFL-CIO regional director; Philip M. Weightman, assistant director, COPE; and Edwin C. Berry, executive director, Chicago Urban League.

Nine in New York Pass Plumber Test

New York—Plumbers Local 2 announced that nine men, including four Negroes and a native of Puerto Rico, have passed tests for admittance to the union and are qualified to become members, subject to a vote of the membership.

Pres. Jack Cohen cited passage of the tests as evidence that Local 2 is open to qualified journeymen regardless of race or nationality.

The union was involved in a dispute last spring over the hiring of nonmembers by a contractor at the $25 million Bronx Terminal Market project.

Job Security Program Proposed to Signalmen

Montreal—"We are working in an age of phenomenal progress in our craft, in the railroad industry, and in science and technology as a whole," Pres. Jesse Clark of the Railroad Signalmen told 500 delegates and guests at the union's 36th convention here.

Clark maintained that labor can and must learn to cope with the problems of automation and benefit from the vast technological advancements. One of the first tasks, he said, should be to "stabilize employment and guarantee jobs."

He also urged efforts to stop force reductions and the slaughter of jobs, improve retirement conditions and benefits, establish a shorter workweek, eliminate moonlighting and overtime, and promote the use of the railroads.

One of the grave problems facing railroad workers stems from an apparent attempt of owners to divert traffic to other forms of transportation, he declared.

He pointed to antiquated and dilapidated equipment in passenger train service and disregard for on-time performance, asserting that "hundreds of passenger trains have been taken out of service and schedules revised in an apparent deliberate effort to discourage passenger travel."

"The railroads are considered our first line of defense in case of war or emergency," Clark declared as he called on labor and management to "cooperate in providing the best, safest, and most efficient service possible."

Joseph H. Hays, general counsel for the Association of Western Railroads, urged support for the carriers' program to furnish, in cooperation with the public, more and better grade crossing protection.

H. W. Habermeyer, chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board, summarized the 1963 amendments to the Railroad Retirement and Unemployment Acts and reviewed the present financial condition of the system.

Pres. Johnson, in a telegram to Clark, praised the Signalmen for contributing to the prosperity of both Canada and the United States through efforts to better the lot of workers.

The convention authorized the brotherhood's executive council to take any necessary action to conclude an agreement on demands of the non-operating rail unions for job stabilization, improved health and welfare benefits, and other fringe benefits.

Pres. Johnson has just ordered creation of emergency boards in disputes arising out of the May 31, 1963 notices. The 11 non-operating organizations involved have refused to accept arbitration because of drastic carrier counter proposals.

The Signalmen represent about 15,000 skilled employes responsible for construction, installation, repair and maintenance of signal and communications equipment. The union, founded in 1901, holds agreements with practically every railroad in the U.S. and Canada.

Can Companies, Union Extend Pact

Current two-year contracts scheduled to expire Sept. 30 have been extended for five months by the Steelworkers and the American Can Co., with 15,500 employes, and the Continental Can Co., with 14,000 workers.

USWA Pres. David J. McDonald said the employers agreed that any direct money improvements that might be negotiated would be retroactive to Oct. 1.

Full Employment Seen Essential By Nations of Western Europe

In no country of Western Europe can a government stay in power unless there is full employment, Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO European economic representative, said in a radio interview.

"In other words," he said, "full employment has become what might be called a 'political imperative.' This means that when unemployment threatens, when there appears to be a slack in the economy, those governments are prepared and have the political power to take the necessary steps to assure that there will be full employment.

"They have more flexible powers in the fiscal field—I refer to both taxation and public expenditures. In most of these countries the public sector—that part of the economy which is either owned, operated or in some way subject to government control—tends to be larger than in the United States, and this gives the governments a handle to deal with the economy that we don't have.

"So, I would say that there is a drive—both a political and an economic drive—to full employment that is somewhat lacking in the U.S. We have different problems to face here, but the net effect is that all the countries of Western Europe have had full employment during recent years and I don't see any real threat to it at the present."

If the U.S. government had the flexible fiscal powers he spoke of, Seidman said, "they could be used as a balance wheel for the economy." He also suggested "we can learn something" from the economic planning of Europeans by examining their methods "and seeing if we can't apply some of them in our own way here in the U.S."

Seidman was interviewed on Labor News Conference, aired over the Mutual Broadcasting System's radio network, by Joseph Gambatese, associate editor of Nation's Business, and Hobart Rowen, economic correspondent for Newsweek magazine.

No Utopia

While Western Europe has full employment, he said, it also has problems and poverty.

One problem at present is rising prices—"maybe inflation is too strong a word"—which has been going on for two or three years and which has been kept down to a "tolerable" level only with difficulty.

A second is inability to carry through on the economic integration they had in mind when the European Common Market was formed, Seidman said. The movement toward European economic integration has been "slowed down," he said, by the action of Pres. De Gaulle of France in vetoing Great Britain's application for membership in the Common Market.

The poverty that exists in Europe despite full employment, he said, tends to be relative.

Seidman discounted the advantages sometimes attributed to European industry because of lower wage scales and modern post-war automated machinery and upheld this country's ability to compete in world markets.

"I was quite surprised to hear Europeans asking of us exactly the same questions we had been asking with regard to Europeans," he said.

"They also are concerned with the possible impact of imports on employment in European countries. They also are concerned with the possible impact of automation. These seem to be problems which, insofar as they exist, affect all industrialized countries to a greater or lesser degree."

The U.S. has been "faring very well" in world competition, he maintained, and our excess of exports over imports has been growing in recent years partly because prices were rising in Europe while ours were stable.

The American worker has the advantage in wages and living conditions even when the fringe benefits that loom large abroad are considered, he said, "but [also] our productivity level is much higher than that of any other country . . . so our unit wage costs tend to be lower."

Seidman was cautiously hopeful that the improved competitive position of the U.S. will improve our opportunities when the "Kennedy round" of tariff negotiations opens next fall in Geneva. He warned, however, that the Europeans will be "very sharp bargainers, because they have certain fears as to the possibility of the U.S. gaining more . . . than they can gain from their perhaps weaker competitive position."

Seidman Moves Office to Geneva

The headquarters of Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO European representative, have been moved from Paris to 1 rue Gevray, Geneva.

Seidman has been organized labor's economic representative in Europe for the past two years, with special emphasis on observing programs and techniques that might help the United States share in the full employment that has characterized the European economy.

'Dramatic' Growth Cited To Fire Fighters Union

San Diego, Calif.—A record-breaking growth in membership to an all-time high of 115,370 men of the fire fighting forces throughout the United States and Canada was reported to the 27th convention of the Fire Fighters.

Citing the progress as "dramatic, almost breath-taking," Pres. William D. Buck noted that in the eight years since 1956 the union's membership has risen by "about 50 percent" from a level of 80,000.

Some part of this "spectacular" gain may be due to "the larger number of men being appointed to fire deparments" as a result of the union's campaign for shorter hours, he said. But, he added, "a substantial portion of our new membership was gained as more and more firefighters" decided voluntarily to join the union, which represents about 90 percent of its eligible membership.

Over 500 delegates are attending the biennial convention session representing some 1,100 local unions in Canada, 49 states of the U.S., the Panama Canal Zone and Puerto Rico.

In his report Buck cited a "growing dispartity between police and fire wages" as a major threat to the standards of fire fighters. Noting that an earlier trend towards consolidation of fire and police departments, which the union had vigorously opposed, now seems "temporarily held in check", he added:

"However, a new, possibly backdoor approach to consolidation has been seized upon by foes of the fire service to drive a wedge between the two services and to make the police job more attractive financially as well as in terms of shorter hours on the job. . . .We will be forced in the immediate future to expend considerable time, energy and resources if we are to block this latest device."

The report called for expansion of the union research department, the appointment of fulltime field representatives to assist the locals, and the study of possibilities of constructing a union headquarters building in Washington.

It noted improvements in the union's magazine, and declared satisfaction with increased emphasis on internal education and public relations work to acquaint the members and the community with the problems faced by the union.

U.S. Support Urged:

ILO in 'Good Shape,' Faupl Tells House

The United States has "every reason to do everything possible" to support the Intl. Labor Organization because it offers "an unmatched opportunity to preserve and extend the principles of liberty, human dignity and social justice," according to Rudy Faupl, U.S. worker delegate to the ILO.

"The aims and principles of the ILO are those which we in the U.S. and throughout the free world espouse and cherish," he said in a report to an Ad Hoc subcommittee of the House Labor Committee presented for him by Bert Seidman, AFL-CIO European economic representative.

"The ILO stands for liberty, human dignity and social justice in every part of the world," the statement said.

"Therefore we, as Americans, have every reason to give our sympathetic understanding and enthusiastic support to the ILO. We in the labor movement have always given wholehearted support to the ILO. The American trade union movement looks to Congress to help strengthen and enhance the role of our nation in the ILO."

Preliminary to detailing activities of the 1964 ILO conference, Faupl told the subcommittee that "the ILO is in good shape" from the viewpoint of free trade union and democratic forces of the world —"in short, in the light of the way we as Americans view world conditions and problems." Moreover, he added, its condition is "very satisfactory" in the relative sense as well as in terms of absolute accomplishment.

Constructive Session

The recent conference, he said, was "calm, peaceful and constructive" despite fears of the contrary generated by the "Communist-incited walkout" of African delegations from the 1963 conference. The fact that it was "more business-like and less political" than any in recent years was due in part, he said, to the absence of a South African delegation which contributed to a "calmer consideration" of the apartheid question and to the "judicious way" African delegations accepted rulings and votes they had opposed.

"This conference showed that the ILO is on a firmer footing than could have been anticipated a year ago," said Faupl, a member of the Machinists. "I can also say with assurance that the western traditions of freedom and democracy and the forces which are espousing them are faring better in the ILO than probably in any other inter-governmental organization. . . .

"The forces of freedom are stronger in the ILO than in these other organizations precisely because the ILO is not just another inter-governmental organization. It is because it is a tripartite organization in which the representatives of free worker and employer organizations, in the countries where they exist, play an equal role with their governments."

Faupl touched on the work of the Intl. Center for Advanced Vocational & Technical Training the ILO has set up at Turin, with the support and cooperation of the Italian government, to give advanced training in major skills and experience in modern industrial establishments to trainees from developing countries who can serve as instructors at home. The project is financed outside the ILO's regular budget, and Faupl expressed the hope that some way will be found for the U.S. to contribute to it as other governments have.

He thanked members of the subcommittee for their interest in the ILO and stated that "the prestige and influence of the U.S. in the ILO is enhanced by the presence in our delegation of leading members of Congress."

Santiestevan Fills IUD Staff Post

Information services of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. are being revamped "to improve communications with our affiliated organizations, the rest of organized labor and the community," Exec. Dir. Jack Conway announced in naming Henry Santiestevan acting director of the IUD Public Relations Dept.

Santiestevan is assistant director of public relations for the Auto Workers and will be on loan from that union, Conway said, while exploring ways of carrying out the reorganization. He is a former president of the Los Angeles Newspaper Guild.

Interest Rates Too High:

Monetary Policies Termed Wasteful

A six-point program "to check and reverse" the monetary policies of the Federal Reserve Board and bring them into line with national economic objectives is urged in a new study by the Conference on Economic Progress.

The study, titled "The Toll of Rising Interest Rates—The One Great Waste in the Federal Budget," points out that the "immensely wasteful" high interest costs could go a long way toward financing the "costs of a war to the finish against poverty in the United States."

The CEP is a non-profit, non-political organization engaged in economic research and education. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and three federation vice presidents—Walter P. Reuther, Al J. Hayes and O. A. Knight—are on its national committee.

The six-point program calls on Congress to have the Federal Reserve Board assure an annual rate of expansion in the money supply roughly in accord with the economic growth goal set out in the President's Economic Report, concentrate monetary regulation in the board rather than sharing the functions with members from private banks, and require the Economic Report to deal in full with monetary problems and policies.

The study called also for reduction of FRB terms from 14 to 4 years and for the term of the chairman to coincide with that of the President, the use of legislative and presidential action toward more selective monetary controls and greater public education on monetary policies.

"The prime example of waste and inequity in public affairs is tight money and rising interest rates, the policy of the 'independent' Federal Reserve System which commenced in earnest in 1952 and still persists," the study, conducted by Leon H. Keyserling for the CEP, declares.

The FRB policy, the study continues, "has imposed scores of billions of dollars of rising interest costs upon private and public borrowers for no useful purposes, thus rendering them less able to serve essential purposes. This policy has been fraught with injustice."

For the 11-year period 1953-63 inclusive, the study says, rising interest rates imposed an excess interest cost of $50.1 billion on the federal government, state and local governments and private borrowers. If the prevalent monetary policy continues for the next seven years, the study adds, the total of excess interest costs for that period will total $88.7 billion.

"We have gone far astray when we combine the monumental waste of rising interest payments with the plea that the money is not available to do what we can least afford to neglect," the CEP study concludes.

RESTING WEARY FEET are these unionists who picketed the Playboy Club in Detroit from Dec. 27 to Aug. 13, when the Hotel & Restaurant Workers and Playboy Club Intl. got together on an agreement at Cincinnati. The pact permits clubs in each city to negotiate wages and hours based on the prevailing practice.

Output Up, Costs Down, Unions Tell Packers

Chicago—The meat industry's 90,000 production workers are processing an increased output of pounds per hour at a reduced cost, union negotiators reported as talks on new contracts opened with major meat packers.

The Meat Cutters and the Packinghouse Workers presented identical proposals for new master agreements calling for a substantial wage increase, protection against sudden plant closings, reduction in the present workweek, double time for overtime, and improvements in vacations, pensions, hospitalization and other benefits.

Representatives of the two unions met jointly with Armour & Co. officials but separately with spokesmen for Swift & Co. Others involved in contract talks include Wilson & Co., John Morrell & Co., Hygrade Food Products Corp., Hormel & Co., Cudahy Packing Co., and Oscar Mayer & Co.

At opening meetings, union spokesmen presented data showing production per manhour has been increasing consistently over the years in meatpacking, with the result that the wage cost per pound of red meat has declined significantly. This has been true, the unions said, though wage rates have continued to rise in response to union requests.

In 1961, the average work output was 79.4 pounds per hour and the average wage cost 3.39 cents per pound. In 1964 the figures were 97.6 pounds per hour at 2.94 cents a pound.

Average hourly earnings as of last April were $2.88 an hour for an average 42-hour week, according to the Packinghouse union, which reported sales of $2.4 billion for Swift, $1.8 billion for Armour and $700 million for Wilson.

TWUA Urges Mills to Share Price Windfall

Asbury Park, N. J.—The Textile Workers Union of America has called on employers in the industry to share their windfall profits from labor-supported "one-price cotton" legislation with workers and consumers.

Although raw cotton prices dropped 20 percent as a result of the legislation, textile prices have shown little change and wages continue to lag 74 cents a week behind the average for all manufacturing industries, the TWUA executive council declared.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock said the intent of the bill was to stimulate sales with the anticipation that "consumers would benefit from lower prices and workers would enjoy higher wages, fringes and increased employment opportunities."

Congress did not enact the legislation "solely for the purpose of boosting mill owners' profits," Pollock declared.

The TWUA warned that it will oppose any future extension of the cotton pricing legislation unless the textile industry begins "traveling the road to the 20th Century."

Pattern Set In Canadian Meat Firms

Toronto, Ont. — The Packinghouse Workers and the Big Three of Canada's meat industry have reached agreement on a new 20-month contract raising wages, improving medical protection, partially equalizing rates on a nationwide basis and increasing the spread between job classifications.

The pact covers more than 11,000 employes of Canada Packers, Swift Canadian Co. and Burns & Co. in every province except Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. If past practice holds, the settlement will constitute a pattern for agreements covering another 4,000 employes of independent packers.

Across-the-board wage increases total 11 cents an hour in two stages. The present 3.5-cent differential between classifications is boosted to 4 cents, giving employes additional raises up to 12 cents. Job rates will be equalized within each company. The major impact will be felt in the six Swift plants, where rates for the same job had varied between $1,985 in Prairie communities to $2.03 in Vancouver.

The employers agreed to assume the full cost of the medical-surgical plan, instead of the 55 percent under the old agreement, and to pay the full cost of a new catastrophic medical plan covering chronic illnesses and major surgery.

The union failed to win its demand for time and a half for Saturday work and double time for Sunday, but gained a premium of 75 cents an hour for regular work on those days. Double time will be paid after 13 hours in a work day instead of 14 hours, as under the former contract.

Eligibility for three-week vacations was cut from 12 to 10 years, and the employers agreed to pay the full cost of work clothing instead of half. The agreements expire in April 1966.

Labor Film Composer Knows Help of Union

The composer of the music for the AFL-CIO documentary film, "When the Day's Work is Done," knows first-hand the theme—community service rendered by members of organized labor.

During the 1955 flood in the Delaware Valley area the composer, Wilford Holcombe, and his family had to flee as high water invaded his home, destroying many of his household possessions and causing extensive damage.

When Holcombe's union, the Musicians, learned of his troubles, it sent a check to cover much of the damage.

Holcombe lives in Trenton, N. J., and belongs to AFM locals in New York, Trenton and Philadelphia. During a long musical career he studied at the University of Pennsylvania and the Julliard School of Music, New York. He has been an arranger for Tommy Dorsey and Fred Waring.

Assisting him on the film's music was George Burt, also an AFM member who belongs to locals in Northampton, Mass.; San Francisco and Trenton. Burt is professor of music at Smith College in Northampton.

Eight members of the union played the music for the soundtrack, with Holcombe and Burt conducting.

The half-hour film will be premiered on over 100 stations during the Labor Day weekend. It chronicles the accomplishments of union members in community public service.

Garroway Narrator

Dave Garroway, the narrator, questions AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, about the federation's role in community betterment.

Camera crews filmed union members using their leisure time to improve their communities. Garroway sums this up in the film, saying:

"Shorter hours! A chance for all of us to do something about the place where we live . . . as well as the place where we work. A chance to think of family . . . of simple pleasures . . . of the community.

"When the Day's Work is Done" shows that union members do think of their communities, and build better communities by giving blood, by building rehabilitation centers, by helping refugees to settle in this country, and by giving of their time and talents in a variety of other public service projects."

Hoffa Given 5-Year Term In Fraud Case

Chicago—Teamsters Pres. James R. Hoffa faced a total of 13 years in prison after a federal judge here sentenced him to a five-year term for defrauding the union's Central States pension fund of millions of dollars. Hoffa had previously been sentenced to an eight-year term on jury-tampering charges in a Chattanooga, Tenn., trial.

Hoffa's attorneys said the Chicago conviction would be appealed. The Chattanooga case is currently in the appeals machinery.

U.S. Judge Richard A. Austin sentenced Hoffa after overruling defense motions to set aside the conviction and order a new trial. Hoffa was sentenced to five-year terms on each of four counts and fined $10,000, but the judge ordered the terms to run concurrently. Hoffa's six co-defendants received sentences and fines of varying length and amount.

Hoffa is one of 16 trustees of the $280 million Central States pension fund covering more than 200,000 Teamsters members in 20 states. A jury of four women and eight men had convicted him and the other defendants of conspiring to borrow about $25 million from the fund "by means of false and fraudulent pretences" and diverting more than $1 million of the funds to themselves.

An End and a Beginning

THE SIGNING of the Anti-Poverty bill is a truly historic moment in American history. It confirms that as a matter of national policy, the government will create programs and budget funds to bring a decent standard of living to the 20 percent of Americans who live in poverty.

The measure enacted by Congress bears the full force and imprint of Pres. Johnson, who has carried out his pledge to lead the nation in an "unconditional war, here and now, on poverty."

The President's forthrightness and courage has forced millions of more affluent Americans to face up to the fact that poverty does exist in the nation. He challenged the country to put an end to this ugly blight.

Labor responded to this challenge quickly and enthusiastically, "enlisting" in the President's army to war on poverty. It has strongly supported the President's legislation at every step of the way, for the labor movement has long been dedicated to the proposition that poverty in the midst of America's plenty cannot continue.

The measure signed by the President is both an end and a beginning. It gives the force of national policy and recognition to the simple fact that needless poverty cannot be tolerated in modern society. In this it has achieved an exceedingly important objective.

In the implementation of the war on poverty it is only a beginning. The program is limited although its scope is wide. There must be a continuing development and expansion of the many facets of the anti-poverty campaign and the addition of new programs and approaches—the most vital an increase in the minimum wage and expansion of its coverage.

The battle against poverty is joined in this historic legislation. Now it must be fought through to victory.

IT IS INCREDIBLE but nonetheless true that Congress is seriously considering suspending the constitutional right of Americans to equal representation in state legislatures, where for too long rural minorities have been able to outvote urban and suburban majorities.

Yet unless there is an outpouring of public protest there is a very real possibility that Congress will, in effect, set aside the Supreme Court's one man, one vote mandate for election of legislators.

The immediate impact would be to halt the healthy trend towards fair reapportionment which has progressed under the impetus of court rulings. Some of the proposals now before Congress would even turn the clock back and restore minority rule in states which have already redistricted. The long-run significance is that if Congress overrules the court in this instance it will have created a dangerous precedent for suspension of constitutional guarantees.

The senators who have blocked a hasty, unconsidered vote until after the Democratic convention have given the people an opportunity to make their voices heard. They must wire and write their senators to vote against any legislation which would suspend or nullify court enforcement of fair reapportionment.

There is little time; there is great urgency.

To 'Manage' the News:

Right-Wing Control of Press Held Aim of Goldwater Forces

ONE OF THE real shocks of the Republican convention in San Francisco was the bitter views of Goldwater supporters on the American press or, at least, on many of the news and television commentators.

The shouts, the curses and the raised fists that marked their demonstration against the reporters covering the convention were indicative of what the press can expect in the United States should the Goldwater forces ever come into power.

The signs are nothing less than a "managed" press, managed strictly in accordance with Goldwater thinking and the prejudices of his followers.

Several things have happened since the San Francisco convention that trace the pattern of what could happen.

The first was a call by the president of the National Federation of Young Republicans for a "10-year program for a take-over of the press by Young Republicans."

The idea behind this is that 100 or so Young Republicans—all ardent Goldwaterites—should infiltrate American newspapers and television stations as reporters in order to propagandize the "conservative" point of view.

The second was adoption of a resolution by the far-right Christian Crusade calling for a "purge" of the American press. "Be it resolved," their resolution read, "that those attending this Christian Crusade convention call upon newspaper publishers in their area to purge their papers of those responsible for grossly misleading their readers on issues which are vital to the survival of the United States."

IN EFFECT the resolution represented support for the charges that the press has been misrepresenting Goldwater. It is one of the few times in American history that a group of Americans has openly sought to control the American press in their own interests.

The kind of "reporters" with which the Federation of Young Republicans would like to infiltrate American papers was illustrated only a few days ago when the Young Republican Club of the District of Columbia named a Birchite as editor-in-chief of its club newspaper.

Thirty-one-year-old George H. Miller, Jr., admitted that he had joined the Birchites two years ago and lamented that he was not "as active" as he should be. Four members of the club's board of directors objected to the appointment of a Birchite, but they were overruled.

What is ironic about all this is the fact that the great majority of the American press is Republican-oriented, almost invariably supports Republican candidates, and generally opposes labor, liberalism, the New Deal, the Fair Deal and any other kind of "deal" that hurts the financial interests of their conservative owners.

What is even more ironic is that Goldwater, himself, has contributed immensely to the "misrepresentation" that he proclaims has been his lot, either by denying himself to the press, as he is now doing, or by using half-digested phrases that take weeks of explanation to get even partly straightened out.

FOR SOME WEEKS now the Goldwater leadership has been careful to shield him from reporters. His public utterances have been held to formal speeches and letters in which he explains what he meant in his speeches.

As an example, take the Goldwater explanation of what he really meant by his deliberate use of the word "extremism" in the cause of liberty—a word that brought rejoicing to the far right extremists, consternation to Republican moderates, and deep uneasiness for the rest of the country.

It now turns out that "extremism" merely means "whole-hearted," leading the Washington Post to observe:

"It is all right for the Senator to rewrite his own speeches, after more mature reflection, but he really cannot ask us to rewrite the dictionary. . . ."

The Goldwater forces have given the country fair warning as to the way they look upon the American press and how it should be used. Their warning should not be dismissed lightly. (PAI).

Morgan Says:

Goldwater So Strong for Peace His Belligerence Scares People

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

PERHAPS IT WAS too much to hope that the viciously irresponsible and politically bloodthirsty charges of "war party" and "peace party" could be avoided in this 1964 presidential campaign. Like a thorn they are already imbedded in it. As partisan passions rise before the looming November deadline the thorn, far from being drawn out, will be driven deeper and the flesh of controversy will become further inflamed.

Morgan

It may be useful, however, to try to contain the feverish infection now while heads are a little cooler, prejudices a little less furious. Neither Republicans nor Democrats are committed to war as a national policy and both are committed to peace as a national objective. The issue of war or peace is a matter of legitimate and overriding concern to everybody, but the way to approach it is not through a wholesale indictment of a party and its leaders. The way to approach it is by careful examination of their policies and their capacities to execute them.

Unhappily both the Democratic Administration and the Republican opposition have already obscured this approach with the underbrush of confusion and exaggeration. If anything needs to be defoliated it is these thickets of obfuscation. Unfortunately, Sen. Goldwater seems less inclined at the moment to participate in this clearing exercise than Pres. Johnson.

This may be due in part to the inevitable contrasts between their positions. As the incumbent, Lyndon Johnson automatically adopts the posture of defending his regime. As the head of the opposition trying to unseat him, the senator from Arizona must attack. That is his role and it is inescapable. But if the manner of his offensive so far is any measure of the way he would respond to the life-or-death conflicts that beset the presidency, reasonable citizens are entitled to express anxiety if not alarm.

At the GOP harmony meeting in the chocolate-bar capital of Hershey, Pa., Goldwater reacted strongly to the persistent Democratic charge that his impulsive, "trigger-happy" personality would not safely fit in the White House in an age of nuclear peril. Suggestions that his election would "somehow lead to war," he branded as the "supreme political lie."

His sensitivity is understandable but he keeps pulling the rug of reassurance from under people wanting to believe him. At that same GOP conclave, for example, he dulled the point of his own protest by alleging that the talents for blundering into war belonged to the Democrats. "We don't claim that the Democrats are a war party," he said. Then he proceeded to blame their "stumbling leadership" for our involvement in two world wars and the conflict in Korea.

Unquestionably Sen. Goldwater is committed to peace but he manages to articulate these commitments with such belligerence sometimes that people at home and abroad are frightened.

In his farewell address, Gen. Eisenhower warned against a powerful alliance which could develop between defense industries and the military brass with their mutual interest in multibillion dollar defense budgets.

Yet Sen. Goldwater repeatedly advocates a stronger voice for the military in national councils and wider authority and discretion for at least some high field commanders in the employment of tactical nuclear weapons.

PART OF the senator's difficulty with his image in the explosive field of nuclear policy may stem from the fact he is a major general in the Air Force Reserve. The Air Force sometimes soars off into the wild blue yonder of its own interpretation of proper defense policy.

Some of its spokesmen, including the senator, have made it sound as if the country would be left naked and defenseless by phasing out bombers in the missile age. There is, as Washington Post Military Specialist John G. Norris wrote, a "good case for a new strategic bomber" but surely a blanket indictment of the rest of our defense system is not the most responsible way to put that case.

In New Hampshire last winter Goldwater charged our long-range missiles were "undependable." Defense Sec. McNamara denied the charge as irresponsible and damaging to national security. Later the senator hedged, but not much. Still later he charged we would soon lose 90 percent of our "deliverable nuclear capability," again deploring the demise of the bomber. The Pentagon denied this, too, though not so lucidly as it might.

There are differences over what is "adequate" nuclear strength. But a troubling question arises here: Can major aggression be long deterred if the Republican candidate for President seems to insist on regarding nuclear weapons themselves the deterrence in their unexploded state, as so many hand grenades?

Washington Reports:

Increasing Support Predicted For New Anti-Poverty Drive

THE ANTI-POVERTY program approved by Congress and just signed by the President will become increasingly bipartisan and enlarged once its benefits have become obvious, Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr., (D-N. J.), declared in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, now heard on 700 radio stations.

"I think it is good that Pres. Johnson has taken the leadership and asked us across party lines to back this kind of program to end poverty," Rep. James G. Fulton (R-Pa.) asserted on the same program.

Fulton said he preferred to refer to the anti-poverty program by its legislative title—the Economic Opportunity Act—because "it is a chance for everybody [who needs assistance] to get ahead. There isn't the opportunity these days for Horatio Algers, but this affluent, successful country can really meet poverty headon."

Thompson conceded that the appropriation for the program in the first year is "a drop in the bucket," adding that "for a nation which spends $40 to $60 billion a year on armament, $900 million for the poor isn't much." Nevertheless he said, it represents "a constructive start."

He said the program will help the Civil Rights Act attain success, particularly among youth aged 16 to 21 who would have the opportunity to join the Youth Conservation Corps or the work-study or community programs.

FULTON predicted that the Youth Conservation Corps would help "build up our park systems, our forest reserves, etc., and also build up our youth. It will provide physical activity in the out-of-doors (for the city boy and others) and also give them a chance to get job training."

Thompson rejected the accusation that "most people who are poor are just lazy, that anyone who wants to get a job today can find one."

The "War on Poverty" program, he said, is planned to help "the disadvantaged, those who are functionally illiterate, who can't read instructions well enough to hold a job, and who are on relief rolls, not because they want to be, but because they have to be."

He said the program will more than pay its way as people are taken off the relief rolls and begin to pay taxes.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

ATLANTIC CITY—Attorney Gen. Kennedy waited until he appeared before the Democratic Platform Committee before publicly revealing the Justice Dept.'s opposition to congressional action designed to upset, delay or frustrate the Supreme Court's key decisions in state reapportionment cases. A small band of Senate liberals—not the Administration forces—has forestalled an immediate vote on Sen. Dirksen's anti-court "rider," and the senators had to do it by a mild filibuster.

The Republican Party at San Francisco frankly pledged itself to a constitutional amendment designed to override the court. The court has said that both houses of state legislatures must be chosen from districts of approximately equal population—in effect, that the doctrine of one man, one vote applies to state senates as well as to the lower houses of state legislatures. The GOP-sponsored amendment would allow one house to be apportioned on factors "other than population"—in short, to restore the power of residents of sparsely settled areas to get, and to keep, greater legislative control in the states than voters in heavily-populated areas.

The Democratic convention meeting here will do less than it should if it does not repudiate this doctrine. Indeed, if the convention fails to repudiate it, a vacuum will be left in which mischievous proposals like the Dirksen "rider" and the even more drastic House-passed Tuck bill—to destroy federal court jurisdiction in state reapportionment cases—can flourish.

The Supreme Court's decisions in state malapportionment cases were based squarely on the constitutional guarantee to all persons of the "equal protection of the laws." The GOP-proposed amendment would say that voting rights are not a right to which city and suburban residents are entitled to "equal protection."

BACK IN 1937, when Pres. Roosevelt proposed to increase the membership of the Supreme Court to get it out of the "horse-and-buggy" days, Republicans, most Southern Democrats and some Western Democrats branded it a "packing" scheme—a device that would destroy the independence of the federal judiciary. Today Republicans and most Southern Democrats are making the attack on an independent judiciary. The Tuck bill—an almost unprecedented attempt of legislative interference—was supported in the House by 122 Republicans and 96 Democrats most of them Southern Democrats. The bill is so revolutionary that it will admittedly be rejected by the Senate. Yet only 35 House Republicans and 140 Democrats voted against it.

The Republican constitutional amendment, which Dirksen himself filed in the Senate, is superficially less objectionable in form. But its effect would be almost the same as the Tuck bill's.

The Supreme Court did not move in reapportionment cases until sheer abuse of power by dominant groups in the state legislatures made the issue a critical one.

THE DIRKSEN "RIDER," which is now the immediate issue, is repugnant on special grounds. The Illinois senator acknowledges that he cannot get through in this session a constitutional amendment proposal by the required two-thirds vote of each house. His "rider" is frankly offered to buy time.

In its first version, it would have suspended the effect of reapportionment decisions by the federal courts for as long as four years. Next it was revamped to suspend them for at least 16 months and to give states "reasonable opportunity" to conform to court-redistricting decisions. The Democratic leader, Sen. Mansfield, agreed to co-sponsor this.

What this means is that, if Dirksen could get his proposed amendment through Congress next year, the same state legislatures already branded as improperly made up could vote on the issue of ratification. They could help validate themselves in the process of overriding the high court declaration of constitutional principles. And the necessary three-fourths of the legislatures might do just that.

The Democratic convention should be able to offer on this issue "a choice, not an echo."

THE ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY ACT, official title of the new anti-poverty program, will have wide bipartisan support once it has proven it can successfully aid the nation's disadvantaged, Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.), left, and Rep. James G. Fulton (R-Pa.) asserted on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Goldwater Platform Threatens Recent Consumer Protections

By Sidney Margolius

THE 1964 Republican platform contains a strong attack on recent advances in consumer protection. The Goldwater policy program specifically threatens the consumer-defense efforts of a number of federal agencies and programs, but especially the Food & Drug Administration's new rules governing labeling and advertising of drugs under the 1962 Kefauver-Harris Drug Act.

Whatever protection your family has gained from the new drug law in the form of a modest reduction in prices, greater reliability and more informative advertising and labeling, would be wiped out by the Republican promise to put an end "to power-grabbing regulatory actions, such as the reach of the Federal Trade Commission for injunctive powers and ceaseless pressing of the White House, the Food & Drug Administration and the Federal Trade Commission to dominate consumer decisions in the market place."

The Goldwater attack on consumer programs also threatens a new plan for consumer education for limited-income families now being developed by Mrs. Esther Peterson, Pres. Johnson's consumer advisor, and a committee of government, consumer, labor, co-op and business representatives.

The program promises to be helpful to responsible businessmen as well as to low-income consumers, since a family that knows how to handle money and avoid the more flagrant gouges is able to buy more. Several officials of national business organizations are serving on the committee.

The attack on the FDA is especially alarming, since its work involves the reliability and safety of the medicines you buy for your family. The Kefauver drug amendments got a special going-over in the Republican Platform Committee's closed-door discussions, Drug Trade News reports.

The new law has been described by FDA Commissioner George F. Larrick as "the most comprehensive modernization of the national drug laws in a generation." The late Sen. Kefauver's exposure of the exaggerated price tags on many vital medicines, plus the harmful effects of such incompletely tested drugs as thalidomide and triparanol, had led to the new rules despite early congressional opposition.

The new regulations require that drug manufacturers must give more and clearer information on labels on both prescription medicines and household drugs sold over the counter. Labels on prescription medicines must state the generic or common name of a drug as well as the brand name. The same drug sold under its generic name often costs only half the price as under brand names, and in some cases, as little as one-tenth. The same sharp difference in price occurs in the purchase of household remedies.

Moreover, doctors and pharmacists no longer need be concerned about the quality of non-brand name drugs, if there ever was genuine reason for such fear.

AT THE SAME TIME, under the pressure of criticism of the prices they had been charging for medicines they control through patents, leading drug manufacturers have been slowly reducing these charges. The cuts had been especially noticeable on such important drugs as tetracycline, a frequently prescribed antibiotic. When the labor and co-op press 10 years ago first called public attention to the unwarranted high prices of these drugs, they generally cost 50 cents a pill or capsule. Now the retail price of the brand-name versions more usually is 30-40 cents

The FTC also has been helpful in trimming the cost of vital medicines. Recently the FTC directed Charles Pfizer & Co., one of the largest manufacturers, to stop fixing the price of tetracycline. The result was a 20 percent cut in the wholesale cost. The FTC charged that Pfizer's patent control of tetracycline was based on misrepresentation, and the company was ordered to license any other drug company that wants to manufacture the drug and is willing to pay Pfizer royalties.

The regulations governing effectiveness of new drugs also have been improved. Prior to the Kefauver-Harris amendments, the FDA lacked authority to prevent the marketing of new drugs which may have been safe solely on the grounds that they had not been shown to be effective. Now, proof of effectiveness as well as safety must be supplied.

Despite the Goldwater platform attack on the FDA, the new regulations have demonstrated their benefits to American families and to doctors. This is shown by the number of letters drug manufacturers have sent to doctors in recent months advising them of previously undisclosed contra-indications and side-effects of some new drugs, plus the fact that some existing drugs recently have been withdrawn from the market, such as Parnate, Orabilex and others.

Captive Customers:

Doctor-Drug Link Probed by Senate

A SENATE ANTI-TRUST subcommittee has exposed a neat racket being practiced by a small but growing number of doctors throughout the country.

The doctors purchase stock in pharmacies and drug redistributing companies, and when they write out prescriptions for their patients they have a captive—and relatively helpless—clientele.

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.), chairman of the subcommittee which has been conducting the hearings, says this is "unfair trade practice and restraint of trade."

"These companies, in which doctors own stock, buy generically (by drug) and then relabel or repackage under the company trade name," Hart pointed out at the hearings. "In some cases a common drug also may be manufactured and sold under the company trade name."

A spokesman for the American Medical Association said, at the hearings, that his group "recognized that there is nothing intrinsically immoral or improper in a physician owning a drugstore" providing he follows certain AMA guidelines.

For example, he should not steer a patient to his own drugstore.

The AMA has a much stronger position on drug houses, he declared, stating: "It is unethical for a physician to own stock in a pharmaceutical company which he can control or does control while actively engaged in the practice of medicine."

WHAT THE HEARINGS DISCLOSED, however, is that the AMA is doing little, if anything, to stop the practice.

Witness after witness appeared before the subcommittee to testify that the trend is on the upswing, even if still relatively small. The Washington representative for the National Association of Retail Druggists estimated that there are about 2,200 MD-owned pharmacies—about double the number there were in 1961.

There are specific areas of the country where even small numbers of such operations have an impact on the industry and, of course, on the patients.

A. G. Brain, Jr., president of Brain, Kay, McQuarrie, Inc., of Salt Lake City, Utah, told the subcommittee that two years after his firm was organized a competitive firm was formed which sold stock to some 250 doctors.

"The stock was sold to the doctors with the general understanding" Brain said, "that the doctor would prescribe the pharmaceutical products distributed by the company."

According to Brain, it paid big dividends. Some $2,000 worth of stock in the firm, purchased five years ago, now has a market value of $44,000 plus dividends.

One argument offered in defense of this practice is that when doctors have a financial interest in a drug firm they will be in a better position to make sure that the drugs are pure.

This was contested by Joe H. Arnett, secretary of the Texas State Board of Pharmacy. He placed in the record a letter he wrote to Don Anderson, assistant executive secretary of the Texas Medical Association. It read in part:

"Some companies like Merit (a firm in Houston, Tex., owned by 300 doctors) have been formed by selling stock to practitioners. One such is Pharmafac Co. of Austin, Tex. Some of our pharmacists have refused to handle Pharmafac products because they state they do not feel that the medication is of the same high quality as the major manufacturers produce and they know that a number of products have not been stable."

Republican Senate Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen has charged that the hearing is not appropriate and that it is delving into the ethical conduct of a very small number of doctors.

To this Hart replied:

"This could be labeled preventative medicine and if, indeed, this is a minor factor, it is increasing in number and degree. Perhaps these hearings may enable the states to act in timely fashion and we will not have a major problem."

BLS Survey Shows:

Incentive Pay Plans Continue to Decline

The number of U.S. production workers who are paid under incentive plans averaged 26 percent in a two-year period ending in June 1963, the Labor Dept. has reported.

This was a decline of nearly 4 percent in the last five years, according to Bertram Gottlieb, industrial engineer for the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, who said it reflects not only continuing union opposition to incentive plans but also the growing know-how of union representatives in processing grievances based on such plans.

The Labor Dept. report, based on a study by the Bureau of Labor Statistics for the period between July 1961 and June 1963, showed that pay based on time was given to virtually all nonsupervisory office workers and nearly four-fifths of plant workers in the U.S. Paid on an incentive basis were 26 percent of production workers, 20 percent of all plant workers.

Gottlieb pointed to a similar study, reported in Monthly Labor Review for May 1960, which found that 27 percent of manufacturing workers were under incentive systems for the period ending May 1958.

The new figure, the engineer said, represents an over-all decline of nearly 4 percent in five years at a rate of eight-tenths of 1 percent a year.

Estimates 'Overstatements'

The BLS estimates actually are overstatements, Gottlieb asserted, because they exclude factories with 100 or less production workers in major metropolitan areas, and factories with 50 or less workers in smaller areas. If these smaller shops had been included in the survey, he suggested, the proportion of factory workers paid on an incentive basis probably would be about 24 percent.

The declining percentage of incentive-covered workers was predicted in 1960 in a collective bargaining report prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, which stated:

"Incentive systems are a minority practice, even though thousands of management consulting firms actively 'sell' incentive plans and have distributed a steady flood of literature on the 'need' for wage incentives and their 'proper' administration. . . .

"The proportion of workers on incentive systems is gradually decreasing, due to a combination of reasons."

Diminishing Trend Clear

On the basis of the latest figures, the diminishing trend is clear, Gottlieb noted, in spite of the vested interest of many consulting firms and employed industrial engineers. He cited these reasons for the continuing decline:

- Continual union opposition and improved union staff handling of abuses.
- Contract clauses protecting workers against abuses and providing for earnings guarantees.
- Increased automation of industry to the point that many workers cannot control their rate of output.
- Growing recognition by managements that incentive systems do not invariably yield lower unit labor costs.

Even in cases where production has increased, he declared, the cost of administering incentive systems frequently is greater than the gains due to production increases.

The BLS study of wage payment plans for the period ending June 1963 showed that 79 percent of all plant workers were paid on time rates—either a single rate or a rate range; and 20 percent were paid by incentive methods—under a piece rate, a production bonus or commissions.

For manufacturing workers, the report showed 73 percent were paid time rates and 26 percent under an incentive policy.

Among office workers, 60 percent were paid according to a range of salary rates, 4 percent a single rate and 35 percent under no formal rate policy.

The BLS survey covered 212 metropolitan areas of the country with 3.2 million office workers and 10.7 million plant workers.

Wage-Hour Law Improvements Held Key to Victory Over Poverty

Pres. Johnson's war on poverty, to be meaningful, must include an attack on low wages and long hours through improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act, the AFL-CIO has asserted.

The need for revisions to help the act meet present-day problems is pinpointed in an Economic Trends & Outlook feature in the current issue of the AFL-CIO monthly magazine, the American Federationist. It was prepared by the Dept. of Research.

"Passage of the Fair Labor Standards Act [in the 1930s] was aimed at maintaining worker purchasing power and curbing the vicious downward spiral of wage cuts which bred unemployment," the article recalls.

"In the 25 years since passage of the act, it has proved to be an important stabilizing factor in maintaining the purchasing power of those workers covered by the act. To maintain this safeguard, the gap between average wages and the minimum wage must now be narrowed.

"The act placed a floor under wages. This floor has needed periodic adjustment to reflect changing economic conditions and increased living costs. Such improvements were made in 1949, 1955 and 1961. Today, the act again needs to be adjusted upward to reflect current conditions."

Proposals Spelled Out

Specifically the article, "The Wage-Hour Law—a Lift Out of Poverty," calls for amendment of the act to extend coverage to millions of workers now unprotected; an increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour from the present $1.25; doubletime for overtime instead of the present time and one-half, and a gradual reduction in the workweek from 40 to 35 hours.

The act now covers only 29 million out of the nation's 44 million wage and salary workers other than the self-employed, government employes, executives, professionals and outside salesmen, the AFL-CIO points out. Some 15 million are excluded because of speical exemptions or narrow interpretations of "interstate commerce," it adds.

Among them are 3.3 million retail trade workers, more than 4 million service employes—particularly in hotels, laundries and hospitals—about 2.5 million domestics, 2 million farm workers, employes of small logging operations, some processors of farm products, cotton ginners and theatrical workers.

For each uncovered category the article quotes average hourly earnings reported in a June 1963 Labor Dept. wage survey, analyzes the impact on costs of increasing the minimum to $1.25 an hour, and in most cases estimates the number of new jobs that would be created by limiting hours to 40 per week.

Among 1.5 million non-supervisory employes in restaurants and other food-service enterprises, for instance, average hourly pay was $1.14. In the South, it was but 80 cents compared with $1.58 in the West. Nearly 25 percent, or 300,000 workers, were paid less than 75 cents. More than 1 million of those surveyed receive no tips. Nearly one-fifth are guaranteed a minimum of $1.15 under state laws, showing that the industry is "plainly able to adjust to a legal minimum wage level."

"The impact on the total wage bill of bringing workers up to the present $1.25 minimum wage would be nearly 25 percent," the article says. "However, since labor costs are only 22 percent of total sales, the maximum impact would amount to only 5 percent of the sales dollar or a little more than many existing state sales taxes."

One-third of all restaurant employes now work 48 hours or more each week, the Federationist notes, adding that elimination of "excessive hours" would provide as many as 30,000 new fulltime job opportunities.

Experience Cited

The article cites Labor Dept. studies of the results of past increases in the minimum wage to show their minor effect—if any—on prices and employment.

"At present," it adds, "extension of FLSA coverage to millions of low-wage workers and an increase in the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour may possibly justify small price increases for a few items. With productivity rising rapidly, however, such price increases need not be great. The overall impact on the general price level would be minimal at the most—a tiny price to pay for vast improvements in the living conditions of many poor families."

A $2 hourly minimum would do no more than lift a low-paid worker "just above the poverty line," the magazine says, while the $1.25 minimum is "so inadequate that some cities have been forced to subsidize sweatshop employers" by making workers receiving $1.25 eligible for supplementary relief benefits.

MDTA Yields Jobs To Retrained Women

Nearly 70 percent of the 11,000 women who completed training under the Manpower Development & Training Act of 1962 had obtained jobs by the end of last year, the Labor Dept. reported.

Most of the trainees were placed in jobs related to their training, the department said in a manpower evaluation report titled "Occupational Training of Women" under MDTA.

The women who were trained for nursing, nurse's aide, stenography and other occupations in the professional, semiprofessional, technical and service fields had a relatively high employment rate—72 to 73 percent.

Of those trained for clerical and sales occupations, slightly over two-thirds found jobs. The employment rate was lowest, the study showed, among women trained for semiskilled jobs, but even in this group nearly two-thirds of the trainees found work by the end of 1963.

Other conclusions of the report, released by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz:

- Half the trainees had been unemployed for six months or more.
- Two of every five trainees were the chief support of their family, and more than a third supported dependents.
- Nearly a third of the graduates were non-white, and nearly a fifth were teenagers. About a third had less than a high school education.

The report said MDTA training is aiding thousands of women to qualify for jobs enabling them to support themselves and their families. Other thousands are helped to get work and earnings needed to supplement the family income.

160,000 Cleared for Training

Approximately 166,000 men and women had been approved for training in regular MDTA courses or on-the-job training projects by mid-June 1964, and nearly 40,000 others were served by experimental and demonstration projects, according to the report.

The study is based on the first 27,000 women trainees in vocational school and other courses, representing 39 percent of the 69,000 enrolled in such courses for whom data were received when the report was prepared.

Wirtz said the training provided to date "represents only a beginning in meeting the total training needs of the nation's unemployed."

Average Pact Duration Rises To 2.5 Years

The average duration of labor-management agreements has increased from 2.3 years to 2.5 years in the past three years, the Bureau of National Affairs has announced on the basis of a study of basic patterns in 400 representative contracts.

The median contract term for all industries and for manufacturing industries showed the same increase, the BNA said, while the median for non-manufacturing industries rose from 2.4 years in 1960-61 to 2.7 years in the current survey.

The most generally found term was three years, the survey disclosed, and was spelled out in 47 percent of the contracts studied compared to 39 percent three years ago. Only 8 percent had durations of one year, compared with 13 percent in 1960-61, while agreements with two-year lifetimes dropped from 43 percent to 40 percent. Four percent of the contracts surveyed ran for more than three years as against 5 percent in the previous study.

The study disclosed that the one-year contract no longer predominates in any industry but is found most often in paper and utilities. Contracts for two years accounted for 43 percent of the manufacturing pacts and 34 precent in non-manufacturing.

Senate Liberal Bloc Stalls Effort To Curb 1 Man, 1 Vote Decision

posed "rider" to the foreign aid bill—is a so-called "compromise" proposal which would bar court-ordered reapportionment of state legislatures before 1966, except in "highly unusual circumstances."

Its chief sponsor, Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), says this will give time for Congress and the existing state legislatures to act on a proposed constitutional amendment which would allow one house of a legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.), who agreed to cosponsor the rider in return for modification of a more drastic Dirksen proposal, said he hopes legislatures would use the extra time to devise an adequate reapportionment plan without the pressure of a court order.

'Revolutionary' Step

The Senate proposal, like the Tuck bill, was denounced by the AFL-CIO, as a "revolutionary" interference with the courts and an attempt to "dilute" the democratic process.

A bloc of Senate liberals prevented precipitous approval of the court-curbing rider through a modified filibuster, which allowed the Senate to take up other legislation but barred an immediate vote on the Dirksen-Mansfield rider. This forced congressional leaders to drop their already-slim hope of a final adjournment of Congess before the Democratic convention.

A group of big city mayors, from areas traditionally under-represented in state legislatures, joined the fight against the court-curb proposals, and grass-roots suburban organizations which have fought for fairer apportionment scheduled emergency meetings and rallies.

The Tuck bill was passed in the House by a coalition of 122 Republicans and 96 Democrats. Opposed were 140 Democrats and 35 Republicans.

The final vote was a surprising drop from the 242-148 rollcall by which the House agreed to take up the measure.

Committee Bypassed

In an almost unprecedented move, the Tuck bill was sent to the floor by the Rules Committee even though it had not been acted on by the Judiciary Committee. Rules Committee Chairman Smith in effect forced the House leadership to take up the bill by letting it be known that he would not call a meeting of his committee to clear pending major Administration bills until he was assured that the Tuck bill would be acted on.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Emanuel Celler (D-N. Y.) accused the Rules Committee of usurping power and acting out of anger at the Supreme Court.

Rep. John V. Lindsay (R-N. Y.) warned the House that if Congress continues on the path of curbing court jurisdiction, "we may end up by wiping out the Bill of Rights."

In other areas of congressional action, there was less controversy as:

- Both houses of Congress approved and sent to the White House a $1 billion housing bill which would continue the basic programs of urban renewal and low-rent housing and establish two new programs. One would set up a $50 million loan fund—at 3 percent interest for 20 years—for rehabilitation of privately-owned slum dwellings. The other new feature is a rent subsidy for five months, up to a total of $500, to help families displaced by slum clearance move into more expensive quarters. Businesses would receive a lump-sum payment of $1,500 upon displacement.
- The House passed, 343-7, a labor-supported bill to register and regulate crew leaders who contract for migrant farm workers. It makes minor amendments in the bill already passed by the Senate.
- Legislation expanding the Hill-Burton hospital construction program and authorizing $1.4 billion over the next five years was signed by Pres. Johnson with the comment: "We are casting our vote for the medical profession's effectiveness—regardless of how that profession casts its own votes in our elections."
- The House voted unanimously to urge action by the United Nations to inforce a charter provision which would deprive 15 nations, including the Soviet Union, of their General Assembly votes unless they began paying off accumulated debts to the UN.
- House-Senate conferees cleared a wilderness preservation bill setting aside 9.5 million acres of land in a wilderness system. The compromise bill, culminating an effort of many years by conservation groups with labor support, requires congressional approval for future additions of land to the system.
- The House approved, on a largely party-line vote, a conference bill levying a 15 percent tax on foreign stocks, retroactive to July 19, 1963. It is intended to reduce the outflow of American dollars to other nations.

Court Curb Plan Hit by Kennedy

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy and his chief deputy, Nicholas Katzenbach, made it clear that the Administration opposes congressional efforts to curb the jurisdiction of federal courts over reapportionment of legislatures.

"We are very strongly against" such steps, Kennedy told the Democratic Platform Committee.

During the House debate, Rep. Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N. J.), said he had asked Katzenbach about reports that the Justice Dept. was behind the Dirksen "compromise" amendment. Thompson quoted Katzenbach as replying "unequivocally that he does not support it."

At Legislative Conference:

Election Year Stakes Stressed to Barbers

Barbers Pres. Joseph N. DePaola urged delegates to his union's 30-state eastern legislative conference to sharpen their political skills at both the state and national level. There is "too much at stake" in this election year, he warned, for any segment of the labor movement to "sit back."

DePaola served notice that the nation's organized barbers will not be part of any "white backlash" movement and called on locals in both the North and South to comply fully with the Civil Rights Act.

"We can live with this law and we will," he stressed. "We don't have any serious problems and we don't expect to."

Earlier the more than 100 delegates representing union barbers from Mississippi to Minnesota heard AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany define the 1964 election choice as between "progress" and "reaction."

"The choice isn't hard to make," Meany declared. He urged a redoubled effort to increase the percentage of union members who register and vote.

Meany stressed labor's long-standing concern with legislation, from the early campaigns for free public schools, through the crusades for workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance, to the issues of today.

"Labor has a record of putting laws on the statute books that we can be proud of," Meany declared.

The two-day conference served as a clearinghouse for delegates to compare notes in area workshops on state and local legislation affecting barbers and allied trades.

At a report session, delegates were enthusiastic in their comments on the program.

"I came here believing my state was well ahead in legislation," one delegate commented. "I found out that we're behind in several ways and we have some catching up to do."

As part of the program linking state and national legislative problems, delegates were briefed by Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies; Esther Murray, eastern director of COPE's Women's Activities Div., and Markley Roberts, assistant to AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

DePaola told the delegates before they left that they carried a heavy responsibility and obligation in the weeks before the November election.

Speaking of the Republican presidential nominee, DePaola said:

"There isn't anything that Goldwater has ever done for labor since he's been in Congress."

Meat Cutters Challenge Goldwater on Braceros

The Meat Cutters, in a letter to Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), have challenged the Republican presidential nominee to explain how as a self-styled conservative, he can justify the importation of farm labor through federal government programs.

The union has fought against continuation of the program of importing farm laborers—braceros—from Mexico. The program is due to expire Dec. 31. Goldwater, in comments on Aug. 3, called it "government meddling" to allow this expiration and asked for a return to the bracero system.

Union Pres. Thomas J. Lloyd and Sec.-Treas. Patrick E. Gorman told Goldwater they cannot understand "how your conscience as a conservative and your strong views against economic activities by the federal government permit you to support" this program.

Importing braceros, they said, "interferes with the [domestic] agricultural labor market" and "prevents the laws of supply and demand from working." It prevents the market economy from operating, they declared, and "runs counter to the free enterprise system."

Goldwater's comments make it appear, the letter continued, that he is "willing to support government interference in the economy as long as it benefits corporate-type agriculture or industrial corporations."

Congressional leaders said, when they renewed the bracero program last year for 1964 only, that it would be allowed to die. Thereafter, said Lloyd and Gorman, the "less than 1 percent of the nation's growers who use the program will have to depend on the free market."

Stevenson Retires As Carpenters' VP

John R. Stevenson, 77, first general vice president of the Carpenters, has retired after 57 years of service as an elected union officer.

A member of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters & Joiners in his native Scotland, where he became apprenticed to the trade, he came to this country early in the century and joined Chicago Local 80 of the Carpenters in 1907. He was soon elected a trustee, then vice president, and served as president from 1916 to 1941 except for a brief period in the 1920s when he was recording secretary.

He also was business agent of the Chicago District Council from 1927 to 1937 and was president until 1941, when he became second general vice president of the international. He moved up to the first vice presidency in 1952. He will live in Chicago.

Democrats Urged to Back Labor Goals

Meany Hits Republican Platform, Praises Kennedy-Johnson Record

the AFL-CIO president told the platform committee.

"Military strength, maximum strength at all levels, is indispensable" until the Communist powers agree to a genuinely verifiable disarmament program, he said, and "the economic strength of the free world is equally vital."

America must continue to make progress toward abundance and social justice internally "because it is right" and because that is how we retain "the material strength and moral leadership essential to the defeat of the totalitarian enemy," he declared.

To the Democratic platform writers, Meany spelled out details he had also offered to the Republican convention.

- The Civil Rights Act of 1964 is a "historic step" and a law "far stronger" than it would otherwise have been because it was the product of bipartisan congressional leadership. But "it is a beginning, not an end," he said.

Fund Request Backed

Pres. Johnson has made it clear that he wants it enforced "patiently but firmly," with "adequate staffs and adequate appropriations," and the AFL-CIO "heartily supports" this position and his request for the necessary funds.

- The problems of heavy unemployment and of poverty for one-fifth of the nation "have at last been brought home" to our people, but both problems remain "almost untouched despite the longest uninterrupted peacetime boom in at least a generation."

The "deep concern" shown by both the late Pres. Kennedy and by Pres. Johnson, he told the Democrats, has produced "general realization" of the plight of the "less fortunate" but the fact remains that our economic boom has been "lopsided."

- "Fortunately for the cause of peace," the military rebuilding urged four years ago by the AFL-CIO is resulting in "more flexible" armed forces that can deal with "brush-fire outbreaks" and "defend the frontiers of freedom" without "inviting the obliteration of mankind" through "nuclear holocaust." But the maintenance of this strength is still "indispensable."

'Real Achievements'

The "tangible gains" under the Kennedy-Johnson Administration in the legislative field—area redevelopment, expanded educational aid, wage-hour law improvement, manpower training, tax reduction and the anti-poverty bill—are "real achievements," Meany said.

The AFL-CIO "is proud to have played a part in their enactment" and there is not the "slightest doubt" that such measures were "the decisive factor in the remarkable record of economic growth and sustained general prosperity since 1961," he acknowledged.

Yet the unemployment problem remains "fundamental," he emphasized, with a joblessness rate of 5 percent or near it for seven years, with "prosperity for the 80 percent who make up the affluent society, hard times for the rest."

The Democratic Party has "unfinished business" to which it must turn its "most serious attention even while celebrating the record of the last four years," he warned—the "intolerable" fact of "chronic unemployment, and therefore chronic poverty, in the midst of abundance."

He urged before the Democratic platform writers, as he had to their Republican counterparts six weeks earlier, what labor feels must be done:

There must be "full implementation of the Employment Act of 1946," through which Congress itself "established the responsibility of the federal government for the economic health of the nation," Meany said, and it is a "first step."

He called for a "massive investment in America," a "broad, systematic program of public investment," to "put idle men and dormant skills to work," to "use our plants and equipment to the full," to "put the whole nation back to work and build a better society as well."

"Can we afford not to do it?" he asked. "Once more I say that weakness within our own boundaries—the weakness of unemployment, of poverty, of inadequate opportunities—will inevitably weaken the security of freedom, here and everywhere."

The Platform Committee had been entrusted with the duty of writing the Democratic Party's "charter for a better world," he reminded the members, and once again he said of labor's suggestions, "we hope you will respond favorably to them."

The AFL-CIO believes "party platforms are important" and sees no merit in the argument that such traditional statements are "too long," Meany said in his opening remarks.

Asks Specific Planks

"They may be overloaded with self-praise or partisan criticism" and in these areas "perhaps platforms could be shorter," but there should be "no cuts when you come to the issues," he said in expressing a hope for a Democratic platform that is "clear and specific."

"We think all of the views" urged by the AFL-CIO "are important," he said, and cited specific examples:

- Revisions in the wage-hour law to cover low-paid workers now exempt, to institute a statutory 35-hour week and penalty double time for overtime work.
- Repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act's Sec. 14b, which "surrenders to the states jurisdiction as to the union shop," gives rise to the "iniquity" of so-called "right-to-work" laws and represents "federal abdication in one phase of labor-management relations."
- A social security hospital insurance plan for the aged, additional federal aid to education, "much more" in federal housing and urban renewal programs.

Meany repeated to the Democratic committee the AFL-CIO's basic position in international affairs he had stated to the Republicans—a conviction that even when much is said about the "changing nature" of the Communist world there is one absolute: "The U.S. and the other democracies stand for freedom" and "every Communist state stands for the destruction of freedom."

"We welcomed the limited ban on nuclear tests, the even more limited agreement on fissionable materials," he reminded the committee, and would welcome "broader" agreements in such fields and in the field of "multilateral disarmament" with the "necessary safeguards."

Strength Held Decisive

"But we insist that progress toward these goals can only be achieved from a position of strength," he said. "We believe that the growing strength of the U.S. was decisive in the first small steps toward disarmament that have been taken in the last several years."

"We are not deceived" by such steps nor by "overtures" from Moscow, Bucharest or Budapest suggesting that wider trade relations with Communist states might produce "substantial profits for American business," he said. "I understand that this is the position of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce" but "it is not the position of the AFL-CIO."

American labor was "bitterly opposed to doing business as usual with Hitler" a generation ago, he emphasized, and "bitterly opposed to doing business as usual with Stalin" half a generation ago.

"Today we are equally bitterly opposed to doing business as usual with Stalin's de-Stalinized successors," he said.

Wirtz Asks Democrats To Back Sec. 14b Repeal

Outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act's "right-to-work" clause, Sec. 14b, was urged on the Democratic Platform Committee by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

The phrase "right-to-work" is itself "deceptive," and none of the 20 state laws approved under Sec. 14b "gives anyone a right to work," Wirtz told the platform writers. "What they do—and what they are designed to do—is to weaken unions." The "right" label "has been used to camouflage" this issue, he said.

Seventeen years of "state experimentation" in the area of anti-union shop laws have shown that proposals of such laws become "bitterly divisive political issues," the secretary continued. "Where they have been adopted, the only result has been weaker, and therefore less responsible, unions."

Wirtz also defended the National Labor Relations Board against "unsupported" charges (in the Republican National Convention platform) of "misinterpretation" of basic labor law. The law has "never been administered with more complete fidelity," he said, and the recent "baseless" charges "should be ignored."

"We must drive on toward our national goal of full and fair employment," he said, specifying that the wage-hour law should be amended to protect more workers and lift the overtime rate, that the unemployment compensation laws get a "complete overhaul" to restore the "equities," and that the Walsh-Healey Act be "overhauled and modernized to counteract those forces which seek to repeal it by judicial action."

Democratic Delegates In Battle-Ready Mood

has been kept in low gear pending the convention.

The Platform Committee hearings nevertheless had already foreshadowed major lines of the Democratic response to the Republican nomination of Goldwater and the arrangement of a party platform tailored to the Arizona senator's personal voting record.

The full panopoly of the Kennedy-Johnson Cabinet went before the Democratic Platform Committee to challenge GOP attacks on the Administration's conduct of foreign and domestic affairs.

Rusk Testifies

Sec. of State Dean Rusk and Sec. of Defense Robert S. McNamara set forth the foreign policy and military doctrines of the Administration.

Rusk warned against "reckless deeds or words" that could reduce the world to "a cinder pile" and mocked the Goldwater charge that the Administration has a "no-win policy" in conflicts with the Communist world. "A cinder pile" from a nuclear holocaust "is not freedom," he said.

McNamara, described as an independent Republican when he was named to the Defense Dept. by the late Pres. Kennedy, was acid in his rejection of Goldwater charges that U.S. nuclear strength is being dissipated.

He spelled out substantial increase in the number of nuclear missiles and said that the average tactical nuclear weapon available now to free world forces in Europe has a power "five times" that of the atom bomb that destroyed Hiroshima in World War II.

Referring to Goldwater's advocacy of "a little more leeway" to military field commanders in deciding when to use nuclear weapons, the secretary declared that the "awesome responsibility to unleash such force" could properly rest "only on the highest elected official—the President of the United States."

Disarmament Dir. William C. Foster, also a Republican, deplored the recently adopted GOP platform for its refusal to endorse the nuclear test-ban agreement and disarmament negotiations initiated under former Pres. Eisenhower and supported by a majority of Republicans in Congress. U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Adlai E. Stevenson, twice the Democratic presidential nominee, spoke of the UN's peace-keeping activities and promised that the "financial boycotts" of the Soviet bloc in refusing to pay assessments for such activities would be "defeated."

The economic goals of the Administration were presented in terms of a continued rise in business activtity and a continued reduction in unemployment.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz called for extension and expansion of manpower training and retraining programs, a wide expansion in educational aid and other measures. He urged a platform declaration for flat repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act's "right-to-work" section.

Treasury Sec. Douglas Dillon said that the U.S. since 1960 had prospered "because we have rejected extremes" in budget and fiscal policies and suggested that another tax cut—slashing of excise levies—would be forthcoming in 1965.

Civil Rights Backed

Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy was the leading Administration spokesman in the field of civil rights, and the platform committee was expected to reject a temporizing suggested rights plank offered by a southern group and call for full enforcement of the act and for patience among the people to give time for the law's application.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany presented labor's recommendations to the Democratic platform writers as he had presented them, six weeks earlier, to the Republican platform committee at the GOP's San Francisco convention.

More than 200 witnesses representing various organizations and interests appeared before the committee and its panels.

Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. emphasized the issues of labor law and civil rights and Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers spelled out the impact of automation in slashing jobs in the steel industry and the need for coordinated policies to ease the effects and stimulate re-employment of displaced workers.

10-Year Pattern Broken:

Labor Dept. Experts Find Job Progress Encouraging

By Robert B. Cooney

The employment situation gained strength for the eighth straight month in July, with the recent lower jobless rates apparently breaking a 10-year uptrend in unemployment, the Labor Dept., has reported.

The detailed job report for July showed "better-than-seasonal strength in all industry divisions except government," the department said. As a result, non-farm employment fell by 200,000, instead of the usual June-to-July drop of 350,000, to a total of 59 million.

Earlier, the Labor Dept.'s summary job report showed a drop in the key seasonally adjusted jobless rate from 5.3 percent in June to 4.9 percent in July—the first time in 53 months and only the second time in nearly seven years it had fallen below 5 percent.

Backing up the report of a stronger job picture was a report of the Federal Reserve Board which said the nation's industrial output spurted ahead in July by a full point to 132.7 percent of its 1957-59 average. Gains occurred across the board.

GOP Charge Refuted

Labor Dept. technicians also knocked down a Republican charge that Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz was "playing politics" with the job statistics to make the employment picture appear better than it actually was.

Rep. Thomas B. Curtis (R-Mo.), acknowledged GOP spokesman in Congress on economics, leveled the charge. He said the labor force should have shown a June-to-July increase to reflect population growth. This would have resulted in higher jobless totals and the jobless rate holding at 5.3 percent.

Radio Broadcasts Set for Labor Day

"Labor 1964," a special Labor Day broadcast, will be presented by the AFL-CIO over the major radio networks Sept. 7.

The schedule:

National Broadcasting Co., 10:45 p.m. EDT.

American Broadcasting Co., 7:30 p.m. EDT.

Mutual Broadcasting System, 9:15 p.m. EDT.

Timing of the Columbia Broadcasting System presentation will be announced later.

The Labor Dept. reported a drop of 400,000 in the labor force—"about the expected seasonal drop"—to 79.0 million. For the first seven months of 1964, the report said, the labor force has grown by an average of nearly 1.4 million compared to the same period of 1963, about 250,000 more than had been forecast by long-term projections.

Robert Stein, Labor Dept. manpower expert, said Rep. Curtis was "in error" in thinking the labor force should increase seasonally in July. Curtis said the pattern of the past decade was for a rise, excepting 1960, 1961 and 1962. But, the Labor Dept. explained, it revises its statistics and relies on the latest years in determining seasonal factors.

A decline of 430,000 was recorded in the labor force in July when a drop of some 300,000 had been expected. The difference was not viewed as significant and Stein explained that school teachers and other state and local public employes apparently dropped out of the labor force.

The July report showed state and local payrolls down by 360,000 over the month, reflecting the shutdown of schools.

But all other areas showed improvement. Contract construction rose by 127,000, an extra-seasonal gain, to a record high of 3.5 million. The report said trade, services, transportation and finance gained some 120,000 jobs in all.

The manufacturing sector fell by 70 000, a little less than expected, to 17.3 million. Primary metals continued strong, the report noted, since the expected drop did not occur. Auto plant shutdowns for model changeovers and cutbacks in aircraft and shipbuilding caused a job loss of 30,000 in transportation equipment.

Factory employment, after adjustment for seasonal influences, has increased one-quarter million since January, the report noted.

Viewing the trend so far in 1964, the Labor Dept. had this to say:

"Over-the-year gains in total employment have been larger than at any time since 1959, when the economy was recovering from a deep recession. . . . Thus far in 1964, employment has averaged 1.6 million above 1963 levels, scoring more impressive gains as the year progressed. For the spring and summer months, the year-to-year increases averaged 1.75 million."

And, with respect to unemployment, "recent improvements appear to have broken a 10-year uptrend in unemployment. Prior to 1964, the unemployment rate in each of the last three periods of business recovery had leveled off at a higher point than where it started before the recession began. This was the case in the 1955-57, 1959-60 and 1962-64 recovery periods until the unemployment rate began moving irregularly downward earlier this year."

William H. Davis Dies, War Labor Board Chief

Southwest Harbor, Me.—William H. Davis, whose half-century as the impartial middleman in labor-management disputes included chairmanship of the National War Labor Board, died here at the age of 84.

A native of Bangor, Me., he was graduated in 1901 from the former Washington (D. C.) University School of Law, and while he was primarily a patent attorney, he devoted most of his life to industrial disputes. He was named NWLB chairman by the late Pres. Roosevelt in 1942 and served until March 1945, when it was dissolved on his recommendation. Former Pres. Truman then appointed him director of the Office of Economic Stabilization.

"When the Day's Work Is Done" is a new half-hour documentary dealing with the way in which trade union members participate in community action programs and make constructive use of their leisure time.

Narrated by Dave Garroway, the film features AFL-CIO President George Meany and Vice President Joseph A. Beirne.

PAY RAISE bill for 1.7 million government employes was signed into law in an open air ceremony at the White House Rose Garden before an audience including officials of government and postal employe unions and congressional leaders. Here Pres. Johnson presents a pen used in signing the bill to AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

Federal Employes Get Retroactive Pay Hike

An average 5 percent pay raise for 1.7 million federal employes, retroactive to early July, was signed into law by Pres. Johnson at a White House Rose Garden ceremony attended by leaders of AFL-CIO unions and congressional sponsors of the legislation.

The measure, designed to make federal pay scales "comparable" with private industry rates, also contains substantial increases for top-ranking government executives, Cabinet members, the federal judiciary, members of Congress and their legislative aides. The congressional and top-bracket legislative pay hike, however, does not take effect until the convening of the 89th Congress next January.

Johnson, who had urged higher executive pay to prevent an exodus of top-level people from government, said the bill will enable the nation "to reward and retain excellence in our federal service." He termed it "near the top of the list in importance" in the legislation passed this year. It carries a $556.8 million price tag.

Postal employes received increases averaging 5.6 percent. For employes paid under the Classification Act—the basic white collar, technical and professional category—increases will average 4.3 percent within a range of 3 to 22 percent.

The biggest hike—$10,000 a year—goes to the Cabinet members whose pay has been raised to $35,000. Congressional salaries, the chief point of controversy during consideration of the bill, will advance $7,500 in January, to $30,000. A bill which would have raised congressional salaries by $10,000, effective immediately, was defeated in the House last March. The legislation was then revived in committee, with the smaller, deferred increase.

Urged Bigger Raises

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was a member of the Randall Commission which had strongly recommended a substantial increase in executive salaries and the federation testified in favor of larger increases than the legislation provided.

For rank-and-file government employes, long accustomed to waiting several years between pay raises, the legislation marked a major step towards carrying out the "comparability" principle written into the 1962 salary reform law. The 1962 legislation, which provided a two-step pay raise, directed the executive branch to make annual surveys of the relationship between salary levels in government and in private industry as a basis for congressional action.

The raises, dating back to the first full pay period in July, go to annually-paid federal employes. Hourly-paid workers have their wage scales pegged to prevailing area wages in their trade.

Senate Drive Builds to Save Hospital Care

rity to doctors—a proposal opposed by the American Medical Association but supported by a number of its state affiliates.

Pres. Johnson told newsmen the Administration will "do everything we can" to get the social security hospital care program enacted.

If the Senate tacks a medicare provision onto the House bill, it would then have to be thrashed out in conference with the House.

The House Ways & Means Committee has held repeated hearings on health care for the aged legislation, but has never reported out a bill. The social security bill sent to the Senate was taken up by the House under a no-amendment rule, which prevented any effort to incorporate the King-Anderson provisions.

The time pressure was eased somewhat when congressional leaders abandoned plans for permanent adjournment before the Democratic convention. With the deadline lifted, supporters had more time for maneuver; opponents had less opportunity to stall action.

Democrats Rally for Drive To Elect LBJ-Humphrey

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION erupted into cheers as Pres. Johnson presented his vice presidential choice, Minnesota's Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, to the delegates.

Convention United On Policies, Rights

By Willard Shelton

Atlantic City—Brimming with confidence, pleased with its platform and civil rights decisions, the Democratic National Convention sent a ticket headed by Pres. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey into the upcoming election campaign.

The themes were set here—an affirmation of the foreign and economic policies of the four-year Kennedy-Johnson Administration and a stinging counter-attack on the Republican nominee, Sen. Goldwater, and the GOP platform tailored to the candidate's personal record.

The President and Humphrey scheduled a weekend at the Chief Executive's Texas ranch to discuss it details of campaign plans. But it was the details—not the emphasis—that were to be settled.

Remaining for the delegates, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, were the formal speeches of Humphrey and the President accepting their nominations, plus a massive boardwalk birthday party for Johnson, who reached his 56th anniversary on Aug. 27.

The President had already assumed leadership of the party—nominated for the nation's highest office for a full term in his own right—and he broke precedent to appear before the delegates immediately after the event to announce that Humphrey was his personal choice as running-mate.

Humphrey was the delegates' clear choice, too—supported by a ground-swell across the country that had built into what amounted to a party majority consensus.

The convention here moved by acclamation in its four nights of sessions, preceded by intensive daytime labor on platform, rules and credentials. It managed, despite the self-evident fact that it would nominate the President and that it reached its decisions by ratifying reports rather than by rollcalls, to maintain an atmosphere of vitality.

For this, the delegates probably could thank the Republicans. The Convention Bars Bias In Party

Atlantic City—The major civil rights action of the Democratic convention here came in the credentials committee report—not the platform—and it was a decisive one.

In presenting its recommendations on the contest between conflicting delegations from Mississippi, the credentials committee posed, and the convention approved these future standards:

- Hereafter all Democratic state parties, including those controlled by Dixiecrat-oriented or quasi-Republican state leaders, are placed on notice that their delegations will never be seated again if all voters, regardless of race, creed or color, have not had the chance "to participate fully" in party affairs and elections.
- A watchdog committee will be named by the Democratic national convention chairman "to aid the state Democratic parties" in meeting these conditions and to report its "efforts and findings" to the national committee, the 1968 convention and its credentials and rules committees.

With this single declaration the convention closed a civil rights struggle that began in 1948 when the Mississippi delegation and half the Alabama delegation bolted the floor in protest of a strong rights declaration, and has plagued conventions with variations ever since.

This was the true triumph of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party—the "irregular" delegation sent here by tens of thousands of Negro residents and sympathetic whites to protest the seating of the "official" delegates chosen in "official" elections and conventions

Meany Hails Democratic Planks:

'20th Century' Platform Offers 'Stark Contrast' to Republicans

Atlantic City—The Democratic National Convention adopted a platform slashing hard at the Republican nominee, Sen. Goldwater, on the issues of war, peace and the nuclear "trigger" and pledging an expanded fight on poverty and social injustice.

The convention rejected Republican "states' rights" attacks on Kennedy-Johnson social programs and bluntly "condemned" the forces of political "extremism"—a step Goldwater forces had refused in floor contests during the GOP convention in San Francisco.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a statement here called the Democratic platform "sound, liberal and progressive—a positive program of action for 20th Century America."

In "stark contrast" to the GOP platform, Meany said, the Democratic declaration incorporated "many of the major proposals" the federation had presented both conventions.

The federation president said, "I am confident that the AFL-CIO General Board, when it meets Sept. 1, to compare our proposals with the platform of both parties, will find this platform measures up to the needs of our time, especially in the fields of labor legislation, domestic economy, foreign policy and civil rights."

The Democrats "condemned" extremism "whether from the right or left, including the extreme tactics of such organizations as the Communist Party, the Ku Klux Klan and the John Birch Society."

"The federal government exists not to subordinate the states but to support them," the platform stated, but pointed out that "each level of government has a first responsibility to protect the basic freedoms of the people."

"No government at any level," it continued, "can properly complain of violation of its powers if it fails to meet its responsibilities."

Declaring that "lawless disregard of the rights of others is wrong—whether used to deny equal rights or to obtain equal rights," the platform called for "full observance" of the Civil Rights Act by every citizen and pledged "fair, effective enforcement if there is any default."

It set forth specific pledges of vigorous federal activity in a broad range of labor and social fields including repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act's Sec. 14b (the "right-to-work" clause), massive increases in aid to education, improvements in the minimum wage and unemployment compensation laws, the anti-poverty program, manpower training program, and the social security system including hospital care for the aged.

Higher Wage Floor Due for 3.6 Million

New wage minimums for 3.6 million workers become effective Sept. 3 when the third phase of the 1961 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act goes into force.

Their wage floor, now $1 an hour, will rise to $1.15. In addition, premium pay of time and a half will start after 42 hours a week instead of the present 44 hours for those who are covered by the overtime provision.

The 1961 amendments made the 3.6 million eligible for wage-hour act protection for the first time, but on a graduated basis. The first year they benefited only by the $1 an hour wage minimum. Last year those eligible for hours protection got the 44 hour week, with overtime thereafter.

On Sept. 3 next year they will achieve parity with other covered workers who are now protected by a minimum wage of $1.25 an hour and, where eligible, by time and a half after 40 hours a week.

There is no change in minimum rates or length of workweek for workers covered by the act before

POSTAL CLERKS CONVENTION gave a hero's welcome to Rep. James H. Morrison (D-La.), sponsor of the pay raise bill passed by Congress, as he arrived to address the opening session.

'Full Citizenship' Asked:

Postal Clerks Seek Hatch Act Revisions

Miami Beach—Delegates to the Postal Clerks convention here demanded greater political freedom for federal employes and called for major revisions in the 25-year-old Hatch Act, which bars government workers from active participation in partisan politics.

Postal workers should be free in off-duty hours to exercise full citizenship rights, including support of candidates for office, the union maintained.

Tackling a heavy convention workload, the record 1,200 delegates approved resolutions which:

- Proposed a joint labor-management committee on automation within the postal service to explore how some of the benefits of mechanization could be passed along to employes in better pay and improved working conditions. The resolution asked also for specific protection against downgrading of jobs and loss of pay as a result of automation.
- Gave their top officers their first pay boost in six years as "a reflection of the federation's increasing size and importance as the exclusive bargaining agent for the nation's quarter of a million postal clerks." The president's salary was hiked $9,500 to $27,500 and other resident national officers were raised by up to one-third to a new level of $20,000.
- Sharply criticized curtailed mail services which have been carried "to rock-bottom extremes . . . without regard to realities or consequences." Delegates urged a congressional investigation of "bad service and labor practices" involving irregular schedules

Overtime Pay Asked

Pres. E. C. Hallbeck said the union's principal legislative objective in the next Congress should be a law requiring payment of overtime after 40 hours for all substitute clerks.

At present one out of every five postal clerks has "substitute" as opposed to "regular" status, which permits the Post Office to work them up to 50, 60 and even 70 hours a week. Union leaders have said this is a primary cause of inefficient mail processing.

Still ahead of the convention, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, was action on a per capita increase recommended by the union's executive board and election of officers.

Delegates gave a cheering, standing ovation to Rep. James A. Morrison (D-La.), sponsor of the recently-enacted pay raise bill.

Free Riders Hit

Morrison told the convention that thousands of unorganized federal employes who will benefit from the pay raise "have ridden piggyback on your organized strength and leadership."

He predicted a strong move in the next Congress to improve fringe benefits for federal workers, including a higher government contribution to the costs of health benefits and insurance programs.

Smallpox Program Urged for Workers

U.S. Surgeon General Luther L. Terry has recommended to health officers that workers at seaports, airports and other points of entry for travelers, and those who meet and treat the sick be vaccinated against smallpox every year, or at least once every three years.

Dr. Terry said he hopes health officers will cooperate in a voluntary vaccination program for port workers, airline and shipping employes, taxi, bus and ambulance drivers, policemen, porters, hotel and laundry workers, physicians, nurses and hospital employes who meet travelers.

The jet plane, he said, has "brought smallpox to our doorsteps" and the program for employe groups would "go a long way toward preventing or containing" an outbreak.

Coast Labor Maps All-Out Fight To Preserve Fair Housing Laws

San Francisco—California labor has called for a "thunderous" defeat of a real estate industry proposal on the Nov. 3 ballot aimed at wiping out the state's fair housing laws.

In a high point of its week-long biennial review of such program and policies, the State AFL-CIO convention pledged a vigorous campaign to defeat the measure.

As a result, the proposition was given a place alongside GOP Presidential Nominee Barry Goldwater and a so-called anti-featherbedding proposition as labor's chief targets in the upcoming election campaign.

Labeled Proposition 14, the real estate industry proposal would override existing state laws against racial or religious discrimination in the sale or rental of housing. It would also write into the state constitution a permanent prohibition of anti-bias legislation.

The convention charged the proposition was a grab for "special privilege for the real estate lobby"—a group which it said had on several occasions backed so-called "right-to-work" and other anti-union propositions.

Beyond overriding existing anti-bias laws, the real estate industry proposition would "tie the hands" of state and local governments in dealing with human relations problems in housing, the convention declared.

Looking beyond the election to the 1965 session of the legislature, the delegates projected a broad program of legislation to the many special problems that have erupted in the state's king-size economy.

The convention urged above all a rate of economic growth that would provide enough jobs to reduce California's above average unemployment rate, take account of a continuing sharp rise in its labor force, and offset technological displacement of its present work force.

It called for "comprehensive planning" and industrial diversification, coupled with the channeling of savings from defense reductions into meeting urgent social needs. It called for a job training program geared to the needs of the state in seeking to build a better balanced economy.

The State AFL-CIO statement warned that California could not look to defense industries, which now account for a third of its factory employes, for the growth that will provide the jobs the state's labor force will need in years ahead.

Other policy proposals urged:

- Unemployment pay equal to two-thirds of average weekly wages, with a corresponding boost in taxable pay levels and repeal of "merit rating."
- Immediate action to insure the solvency of the worker-financed unemployment disability insurance (sick pay) fund by boosting the taxable wage ceiling.
- State curbs on the use of anti-labor injunctions and repeal of the mislabeled "Jurisdictional Strike Act," which the convention charged was being used to impede legitimate union activities.
- A $2 an hour minimum wage, double time for overtime, and a 35-hour workweek without reduction in take home pay.
- A new charter of rights for agricultural labor, based on the premise that the responsibility for attracting and maintaining an adequate and stable labor supply rests on the employer, and not the government through supplies of "bracero" labor.
- A revision of workmen's compensation that would provide administrative help for the injured worker in claiming his rights under the law and for revamped rehabilitation provisions.
- Positive programs of ethnic integration among affiliated unions and strong support for the Civil Rights Law.

Incumbent Exec. Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts turned back a challenge for the principal executive post from Pres. Charles W. Walker, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 11, Los Angeles. Pitts was returned to office by a vote of 489,636 to 78,844.

Joint Printing Course Aids 3 Moroccans

New York—Three members of the Moroccan Labor Union (UMT) have completed three months of special training in the printing trades through the combined efforts of Typographical Local 6, the New York Times, the New York School of Printing and the Barnes Printing Co. here.

The project was sponsored by the Commission for Intl. Development. Improvements in basic skills learned in Morocco were gained during the training period by Sellam Bouzid, 25, a pressman; Mohamed Mimmy, 30, a hand-type compositor, and Mustapha Thami, 24, a Linotype operator.

The three speak only French and Arabic. The language problem was solved when Pres. Bert Powers of Local 6 found members who spoke one or both languages.

Texas Labor Votes Expanded Drive On Education, Organization, Equality

Brownsville, Tex.—Delegates to the Texas AFL-CIO's eighth annual convention—defying an anonymous bomb threat and attacks by right-wing lower Rio Grande Valley newspapers—voted overwhelming approval of a 7-cent increase in per capita payments and a stepped-up program of "agitation, education and organization."

The convention also created a new department in the state central body—a Dept. of Equal Opportunity & Fair Employment—to deal with all matters of civil and economic rights and press for state legislation in both fields.

"COPE Nickel"

The per capita hike made permanent a temporary dedicated "Texas COPE nickel" approved at last year's convention. The increase is effective Jan. 1, 1965. Total per capita payment after that date will be 20 cents.

The bomb threat came as the convention opened and only minutes after delegates listened in on an amplified telephone conversation between Pres. Johnson, U.S. Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.) and State AFL-CIO Pres. H. S. (Hank) Brown.

Informed of the bomb scare by the Brownsville chief of police and asked if they wished to vacate the hall for a police search, delegates chose to ignore the threat.

Brown said the additional funds voted by the delegates would make possible a general expansion of Texas AFL-CIO activity, including:

- Purchase of a permanent headquarters building in Austin.
- Production and airing of a regularly-scheduled "Voice of Texas Labor" television series for the general public and members of organized labor.
- Additional personnel for a more effective program of legislative representation during sessions of the Texas legislature.
- More money and more personnel for "operation bootstrap"—a Texas AFL-CIO "know your rights" operation among non-organized Texans of Latin American and Negro ancestry, both victims of Texas' anti-labor laws and its lack of fair labor standards legislation.
- Continued support of the Texas Democratic Coalition—Texas labor-inspired political grouping of union members, Negroes, Latin Americans and independent liberals.
- An increase in labor education activities.
- Intensification of Texas COPE activity, which Brown said will get underway at once in a "get-out-the-vote" drive aimed at carrying the Democratic ticket in Texas "from the courthouse to the White House."

Pres. Johnson told delegates that "in Texas and in the nation, you and I have seen more progress made by more people than at any time in our history." He said the key to this "progress" was "our unity."

The President condemned "those who specialize in fear and hate; who would divide the people."

Yarborough Praised

He specifically endorsed the reelection of Yarborough, declaring that "when there was an issue for the people" both he and the late Pres. Kennedy could count on the senator—"the man who is on your platform now."

In an historic "first", one session of the convention was held in Matamoras, Mexico, Brownsville's "across-the Rio" sister city. In this session, the Texans and representatives of the Mexican Confederation of Labor (CTM) approved joint organizing efforts along both sides of the international boundary.

In Brief to Supreme Court:

Darlington Closing Illegal, Labor Says

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to rule that an employer does not have an "absolute right" to go out of business in order to avoid dealing with a union or as retaliation against workers who voted for union representation.

That's what the Darlington Manufacturing Co. did just before Christmas in 1956, throwing some 500 workers in the South Carolina mill town out of work. The abandonment of the plant carried out threats made just before a National Labor Relations Board election won by the Textile Workers Union of America.

The plant closing was ordered by Roger Milliken, who wore two hats—as president of the Darlington company and as head of the vast Deering-Milliken textile chain, which operates mills throughout the South.

The NLRB found the company guilty of unfair labor practices and ordered that the discharged Darlington workers be given back pay for the period they have been out of work and offered jobs at other Deering-Milliken mills.

The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the NLRB action by a 3-2 vote, declaring it has no right "to command an employer to stay in business indefinitely, or to assess him for damages for permanently going out of business."

In a "friend of the court" brief, AFL-CIO attorneys charged that the circuit court decision "emasculates the language and policy" of the National Labor Relations Act.

Absurdity Seen

It would be absurd, the federation said, to hold that a threat to close a plant if the union won is a violation of the law, but that the actual closing is not.

"The closing, or subcontracting, or transfer of an operation to another location, as a reprisal against employes for union activity, does not differ in substance from the naked discharge of employes for engaging in union activity," the AFL-CIO said.

The AFL-CIO brief asked the court to go beyond the remedies ordered by the NLRB and direct Deering-Milliken to reestablish a mill in Darlington.

"When an employer engages in a shutdown in violation of the (National Labor Relations) Act," the AFL-CIO said, "he can properly be ordered to resume operations, just as employes who engage in a forbidden strike can be ordered to resume work."

TWU Settles Airline Strike In Single Day

A strike of less than 24 hours ended when the Transport Workers Union and Pan American World Airways worked out a settlement with the aid of the National Mediation Board.

Details of the peace pact were not made public pending action by the 12,000 affected mechanics, ground crew members, stewards and stewardesses to ratify it.

Employes who had been laid off when the strike closed down the airline's worldwide operations were summoned back to work shortly after the language of the contract was agreed upon. Additional planes were made available to take care of any backlog of passengers.

The union originally sought a 15 percent wage increase, a 37.5-hour week and improved fringe benefits. The mechanics and ground crews were particularly interested in improved vacations. The stewards and stewardesses want rest periods of definite duration between flights.

The walkout had been delayed for 24 hours while TWU Vice Presidents James Horst and William Brogan met with company officials and NMB representatives in what proved a vain effort to reach agreement.

Union Presses Offensive Against Barber-Colman

The Sheet Metal Workers have "stepped up the offensive" in their long strike against the Barber-Colman Co. of Rockford, Ill.

The firm's production and maintenance workers, members of Local 573, walked out June 5 when negotiations for the first union contract in the company's 63-year history broke down.

The union announced a series of moves to increase the effectiveness of the strike:

- Pres. Edward F. Carlough appealed personally to more than 10,000 local and national union contractors asking them to stop purchasing or using Barber-Colman air conditioning components until the strike ends. The company also makes textile machinery, machine tools and other products.
- At a conference in San Francisco with representatives of Gov. Pat Brown (D) of California, union spokesmen were assured that state agencies would seek to remove Barber-Colman products from specified purchase lists until the walkout is settled. The union intends to seek similar action in other states.
- Union members picketed the Harris County Sports Commission in Houston, Tex., to protest use of Barber-Colman equipment on the county stadium under construction—the country's first enclosed and air conditioned baseball-fooball stadium.
- Informational picketing of Barber-Colman distributors throughout the nation is under way.
- The union advised the Teachers and the National Education Association the "possible impact" of the strike on "new schools which are depending on Barber-Colman equipment for completion" prior to opening.

The strike has the strong backing of organized labor. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called it "a classic example of a trade union's fight for survival against a reactionary corporation." The AFL-CIO Executive Council in a resolution of support termed it "a battle to prevent a major corporation from starving its employes into submission."

WINNERS OF the annual apprenticeship contest of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, held at Purdue University, are congratulated by Pres. Peter T. Schoemann. Left to right: Martin J. Ward, assistant secretary-treasurer; Sec.-Treas. William C. O'Neill; John W. Miller, Lynnwood, Wash., Local 669, sprinkler fitter winner; Donald J. Komraus, Detroit Local 636, first-place pipe fitter; William F. Whittom, St. Louis Local 35, winning plumber; Schoemann, and John J. McCartin, assistant president.

Auto Union Votes Strike Authority, Sets Sept. 9 Deadline at Chrysler

Detroit—Seventy-four thousand Auto Workers will strike the Chrysler Corp. Sept. 9 unless an agreement is reached at the bargaining table before then, the UAW executive board announced here.

Chrysler workers who, along with other union members at the Big Three auto companies, voted near-unanimous strike authorization, will remain on the job beyond the Aug. 31 contract expiration date to give negotiators extra time at the bargaining table.

During the period before the strike deadline, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther declared, "we will make every good faith effort to reach an agreement. We will bargain day and night if necessary."

Reuther told a midnight news conference that the UAW board had voted to strike, if necessary, in view of the "unrealistic and inequitable" offers of the auto companies.

He termed the U.S. auto industry "the most profitable industry in the world." The UAW's goal, Reuther said, is "a settlement that will reflect the equity of the workers, consumers, stockholders and the whole nation."

Reuther announced he would ask day-to-day extension of the General Motors and Ford contracts and request the 450,000 UAW members at those companies to remain on the job while the union concentrates its bargaining efforts on Chrysler. After a settlement is reached, he added, the UAW negotiators would "then move to Ford and then to GM."

Chrysler, while the smallest of the Big Three auto companies, is the seventh largest firm in America, Reuther noted.

He said the UAW helped Chrysler during 1961, when the company had financial problems. "Our contract helped get the corporation back on its feet," he stressed. "That contribution was tremendous."

The UAWs' message to Chrysler, Reuther said is "now that you are shoulder-high in that nice green clover, we expect you to reply in kind."

During the first six months of this year, the UAW president told newsmen, Chrysler's after-tax profit totaled $141.4 million, a "phenomenal and fantastic" 26 percent return on investment. During the same period, he added, the company set aside $11.4 million for bonuses for executives.

The auto industry is in a boom period of prosperity and the UAW board, in an earlier statement, had declared:

"The Big Three are enjoying Cadillac profits, their stockholders are enjoying Continental dividends and their executives are enjoying Imperial salaries and bonuses. Yet the Big Three have offered their workers an economic package with all the attractiveness of a stripped-down version of last year's compact."

Strike authorization votes at the Big Three plants, still going on as the AFL-CIO News went to press, were running better than 95 percent to arm the UAW executive board with the power to call a strike.

The auto industry to date has made only a single offer, a package estimated to be worth 30-35 cents an hour over a three-year period, with only minor differences in the proposals made by the three companies.

The company proposal would continue the 2.5 percent annual productivity wage increase and the cost-of-living adjustments, provide an extra holiday, make some improvements in vacations and future pensions, and pay the full cost of insurance and welfare programs.

The UAW has set a wage target of a 4.9 percent annual productivity increase, has asked larger pensions coupled with earlier retirement, and increased relief time for assembly-line workers.

Reuther reported "no progress" in any of the negotiations on issues involving working conditions. He termed this issue "a matter of the highest priority" to the union.

The UAW board said the accumulated profits of the auto makers represent "a national economic menace" by choking off potential purchasing power.

"We shall make no demand that will require any price increase and we shall continue to urge the auto industry to reduce the prices of cars to the American public," the union affirmed.

New Wage Floors Due For 3.6 Million Sept. 3

Those affected by this year's step in the upgrading of the minimum wage include an estimated 2.2 million in retail trade and service work; 1 million in construction; 100,000 seamen; 93,000 in suburban and interurban transit; 86,000 gasoline service station employes; 33,000 in fish processing; some 30,000 telephone workers, and about 100,000 employes of firms where other workers were previously covered and whose annual sales total $1 million or more.

At its last convention the AFL-CIO strongly urged extension of wage-hour coverage to "all workers in industries engaged in or affected by interstate commerce" with a wage floor of $2 an hour and a 35-hour workweek.

In testimony last March before a House Labor subcommittee on FLSA coverage, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller specifically urged extension of protection to 2.7 million workers in 11 occupational groups—647,000 in retail trade, 424,000 in restaurants; 274,000 in hotels; 173,000 in laundries; 500,000 hospital employes; 55,000 in theaters; 200,000 in miscellaneous services; 200,000 in non-profit institutions; 87,000 in small logging operations; 90,000 in the processing of farm products and 34,000 in cotton ginning.

He also called for repeal of the overtime exemption for about 2 million workers in three categories—1.3 million in transportation, including local transit employes; the 100,000 seamen, 86,000 gas station employes and 33,000 fish processors.

Ebony Article Tells Story of Kenya Institute

A five-page feature article in the current issue of Ebony magazine, with four pages devoted to photographs, tells a detailed story of the Institute of Tailoring & Cutting set up in Nairobi, Kenya, by Mrs. Maida Springer of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

The school, aided by a $10,000 grant from the Ladies' Garment Workers Philadelphia Joint Board, has "progressed far beyond the expectations of even its most ardent supporters" in increasing skilled workers for the country's clothing industry, the article says.

The magazine quotes Anselmi Karumba, director of the institute and general secretary of the Tailors & Textile Workers Union, as saying:

"There is no substitute for craftsmanship, education and skill, and all are synonymous with Kenya's improved standard of living."

Among the photographs is one of Mrs. Springer admiring a dress made at the institute. Others show the students and their instructors at work on clothing for both men and women in different stages of its fabrication.

The institute is so popular that it has a waiting list of 100 prospective students. It offers a six-hour daytime course and one of three hours in the evening, with the latter divided into two sections. Courses last six months. Tuition ranges from $20 to $30 and is kept low by sales of finished products. The faculty of six teachers is composed of union members.

3-Year Pact Ends 325 Day Typos' Strike

San Francisco—A 325-day strike of 400 commercial printshop employes ended here when members of the Typographical Union voted 300-36 for a new three-year contract.

The contract calls for the rehiring of all strikers, dismissal of 350 replacements, wage hikes totaling $11 a week, two weeks of advance notice by employers of new equipment or procedures, and binding arbitration of disputes over installation of such equipment by a neutral party to be named by Mayor John F. Shelley, who helped work out the settlement.

14 Shops Struck

The strike started last September against 14 commercial print shops bargaining as the Graphic Arts Employers Association. Settlement terms were approved by ITU Local 21 and Mailers' Local 18.

The ITU local said the key point in the settlement was this: "In the matter of work jurisdiction, work shall be resumed based on the status quo ante that prevailed before the strike." In the event of a dispute after the employer has given advance notice, "any grievance raised by any union affected" by the new procedures or new work assignments shall be submitted for final and binding decision, it was agreed.

New work practices also were blamed by the ITU for a work stoppage at three Toronto newspapers. The stoppage began July 9 at the Globe & Mail, and spread to the Daily Star and the Telegram, over new terms in a contract that expired in 1962.

The parties agreed on an $11 wage package in 1963 but disagreed on job security and the use of computer tape.

Engraver-Lithographer Merger Pact Ratified

New York—Members of the Photo Engravers and the Lithographers have given overwhelming approval to the constitution for the merged Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union clearing the way for the official birth of the new union on Labor Day, Sept. 7.

The merger of the two graphic arts unions—the first in nearly 50 years—was approved by members of the two unions in a referendum that was completed last January. A special constitutional convention of the ALA and the IPEU held in May unanimously approved a draft constitution and sent it to a final referendum.

The results showed the Lithographers voting for the constitution 18,518 for to 3,260 against; the Photo Engravers voted 9,043 to 3,528 for the document.

Kenneth J. Brown, ALA president, will be president of the new LPIU; William J. Hall, president of the Photo Engravers will be executive vice president.

The new organization will become an AFL-CIO affiliate. The Photo Engravers union is a federation affiliate; the ALA is unaffiliated.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the merger convention in May that uniting "two proud and strong crafts into a single organization" is a measure of the "statesmanship of your leaders and the wisdom of your rank and file."

Officers of the new LPIU will be installed on Labor Day at a ceremony in the Lithographers headquarters building in New York.

Postal Drivers Boost Dues, Add 2nd Post

Miami Beach—Delegates representing the men who drive and maintain mail trucks voted to strengthen their union by boosting the per capita payment, setting a floor under local dues, and adding a second full-time officer to represent the Post Office Motor Vehicle Employes in Washington.

Everett G. Gibson was re-elected president and Chester W. Parrish of Miami, who had served as treasurer, was elected to the new full-time post of secretary-treasurer. He will assume his post in January.

The per capita was raised 25 cents to $1.25 a month and dues were set at a minimum of $2 a month.

A unique feature of the convention was an all-day training seminar for delegates on collective bargaining and grievance handling. It was conducted by Otto Pragan, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, and John McCart, operations director of the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council. Gibson described the training program as "outstanding" and "enormously successful."

The executive board, trimmed from nine to six members, includes in addition to the two full-time officers, Vice Presidents Carl V. Fleissner of Chicago, Paul E. Jameson of St. Louis and Joseph E. Lauderdale of Fresno, Calif., and Administrative Field Officer Leon S. Hawkins of Detroit, all re-elected.

Minneapolis was picked as the site for the next convention in 1966.

Dept. of Education Urged:

Teachers Criticize Goldwater's Views

Chicago—Criticism of Senators Barry Goldwater and Everett M. Dirksen (R.-Ill.) was voiced by the American Federation of Teachers as 1,400 delegates wound up the union's 48th annual convention.

In a series of resolutions the AFT parley supported:

- A federal Dept. of Education, separating the present Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.
- Creation of a Cabinet level Dept. of Urban Affairs.
- The Supreme Court decision barring official prayers in public schools.
- Continued government aid to schools in impacted areas where federal installations have been withdrawn.

Telegrams were sent to Pres. Johnson and members of both houses of Congress urging that no installations be closed without provisions for continued support of schools. The AFT said some school districts could lose as much as $2 million a year if a Navy yard were closed or a defense plant moved.

The delegates also backed the position of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., which is campaigning to keep the naval shipyards open.

The resolution opposing the views of the GOP presidential nominee said that Goldwater's "concept of the responsibility of the federal government would make it impossible to achieve the needed expansion of education resources and the implementation of equality in educational opportunity in America . . . two of the primary goals" of the union.

Extremists Hit

The delegates voted to oppose Goldwater's "acceptance of support from extremist groups which are in conflict with the traditional guarantees of human dignity guaranteed in the Constitution."

Target of another resolution was Dirksen's rider to the foreign aid bill which would delay the effect of the Supreme Court decision equalizing voter representation in state legislatures. The convention directed the AFT executive council "to sponsor a militant campaign of opposition to the Dirksen rider and support the democratization of the state legislatures."

Other measures adopted dealt with organizing classroom teachers, improving education in the U.S., protecting teachers from physical attack and bettering salaries and working conditions for teachers.

Addressing the annual convention banquet, Michael Harrington, author of "The Other America: Poverty in the United States," termed the newly enacted anti-poverty program "a national commitment to the abolition of poverty," but said it is just a beginning.

Teachers' Locals Truly 'Far Flung'

Chicago—A lot of curiosity was aroused when retiring Pres. Carl J. Megel reported to the Teachers convention that collective bargaining elections had been won in, among other places, Madrid, Spain.

There's no mystery about it, though. It's just that Local 1470, Overseas Federation of Teachers, won an election held under the late Pres. Kennedy's executive order among teachers in Madrid schools for U.S. Air Force dependents. The Local polled 70 percent of the vote, with 28 percent for the Madrid Educational Association.

Frank Raftery Elected President of Painters

Minneapolis—S. Frank Raftery was elected president of the Painters at the union convention here—unanimous choice of the 1,200 delegates to succeed his father, Lawrence M. Raftery.

The elder Raftery, president of the union since 1952 and its secretary-treasurer for 10 years before that, was named president-emeritus, effective next March. He is an AFL-CIO vice president. The new president has been serving as a general representative for the Painters.

The Union claimed to be the first AFL-CIO affiliate to endorse the Johnson-Humphrey ticket in the presidential election, acting the morning after their nomination by the Democratic National Convention in Atlantic City. It was the first political endorsement in the Painters' history and was made possible by constitutional amendments adopted earlier in the convention permitting political action and the establishment of a political education fund.

The amendments followed a cheering demonstration for a proposal by Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. for endorsement of Pres. Johnson.

Gritta warned the delegates that this is one election year in which no segment of organized labor can afford to sit on the sidelines. He said the objectives of Johnson and organized labor are identical, and that Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Republican nominee, "is 100 percent wrong" for labor.

The 1,200 delegates, representing 200,000 members in 1,200 locals in the United States and 8,000 Canadian members, were greeted by more than 200 resolutions.

'Program for Progress':

Virginia AFL-CIO Votes Political Fund

Norfolk, Va.—The Virginia AFL-CIO became the eighth southern state labor body to create a political education fund when delegates to the 9th annual convention here voted approval of a 15-point "Program for Progress" that included an annual assessment of $1.50 per member for the next five years.

The fund—about $97,000 a year based on present membership—was earmarked to help elect friendly members of the legislature and a friendly governor by 1969 through poll tax and registration drives, education campaigns among union members, and get-out-the-vote drives; for public relations, for legislative action campaigns, and to keep union members informed on political and legislative situations that might affect them.

The program was presented to the meeting by the top officers and was adopted by a vote of 690 to 42, with 16 abstentions. As an amendment to the constitution of the state labor body, it required a two-thirds vote.

Similar programs involving special funds have been adopted over the past few years by state AFL-CIO organizations in Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, South Carolina, Arkansas and Florida.

Program Listed

The "Program for Progress" calls for elimination of the poll tax and liberalization of registration laws; higher workmen's compensation and unemployment compensation benefits; an improved public school system with higher salaries and greater job security for teachers; modification of the so-called "right-to-work" law and enactment of legislation giving workers in intrastate commerce the legal right to organize and bargain; a state minimum wage of $1.25 an hour; civil service protection for all state, county and municipal employes; a ban on the recruiting and importing of professional strikebreakers, and the promotion of industrial development.

A report of the convention Civil Rights Committee, which was adopted, called for the end of segregated union halls in the state and complete equality of opportunity regardless of race in jobs and training.

The convention maintained a "golden silence" on the contest between Sen. Harry F. Byrd (D), Richard A. May (R) and a number of independents for the seat held by Byrd. Delegates from congressional districts recommended the following candidates:

Candidates Backed

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler warned the delegates that unless Virginia's so-called "right-to-work" law is repealed, "you won't be able to keep up with the national economy."

Also needed if the country is to create a broader prosperity, he said, is the 35-hour week to make new opportunities available to workers whose jobs are wiped out by automation.

Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) predicted that the voters will cast their ballots for Pres. Johnson once the "emotional debris" is cleared away. He declared Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.), the GOP candidate, "wants the same kind of do-nothing job" former Pres. Eisenhower had.

New FEC Strike Aid Voted by Signalmen

Montreal, Que.—Major collective bargaining and legislative decisions were made at the Railroad Signalmen's convention here, but the delegates gave special attention to the needs of their striking union brothers on the Florida East Coast Railway.

A $2-per-quarter per capita boost will be earmarked in part to replenish the fund used to pay strike benefits. And delegates dug into their pockets for a $3,000 contribution to a special "hardship fund," in addition to strike benefits, for families of FEC strikers who have been on the picket line since Jan. 23, 1963. A special collection was also taken for the wives of FEC strikers, in recognition of the sacrifices they have made and the support they have given to their husbands.

Then the delegates, aware of the cost of outfitting growing youngsters for a new school year, voted a special $75 grant for each school-age child in each striking family to cover "back-to-school" expenses.

On a broader scale, the convention reiterated the union's demands for job stabilization, vacation-holiday improvements and other fringe benefits, authorizing a strike call if necessary. A presidential emergency board was recently set up to consider deadlocked negotiations on these issues between U.S. railroads and 11 non-operating unions.

Delegates also called for improvements in the Railroad Retirement and Railway Labor Acts and a program of health care for the aged under the social security and railroad retirement systems.

Pres. Jesse Clark and the entire team of national officers won re-election to new three-year terms, and the convention added a new elective post of Canadian grand lodge representative to the executive council.

Delegates rejected proposals to extend the period between conventions from three to four years and to elect officers by referendum.

AFL-CIO Endorses Women Voter Week

Organized labor is well aware that the influence of America's women would be far greater if they voted in the same proportion as men, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in endorsing Pres. Johnson's proclamation of Women Voters Week beginning Sept. 13.

"I urge all AFL-CIO organizations to give full cooperation to the special efforts that will be made during that week to register the greatest possible number of women," he said. "We can and should help make the drive an outstanding success."

TEEN-AGED sons and daughters of delegates to the Letter Carriers convention at Miami Beach organized a convention of their own—for five days of serious discussion of youth problems, mixed with social activities. Here a NALCTEEN speaks from the floor on a resolution.

Fire Fighters Reject Bid to Permit Strikes

San Diego, Calif.—Delegates to the Fire Fighters 26th convention rejected by a nearly unanimous vote a proposal that would permit locals to take strike action. Pres. William D. Buck warned the convention that the union voluntarily surrendered the right to strike when it was chartered by the AFL in 1918 and any change in policy "would quickly see us legislated out of existence."

Buck, a former captain in the St. Louis, Mo., fire department, won re-election for the presidency which he has held since 1957. He defeated John C. Kabachus, the union's secretary-treasurer.

Albert Albertoni, captain in the Oakland, Calif., fire department, was elected secretary-treasurer, winning by a three-vote margin over Jack Waller of Spokane, Wash. Four new vice presidents were elected: Harry Williams, Portland, Ore.; Harold Hawkins, Minneapolis; Cornelius Shea, Chicago and Walter Lambert, Spokane.

Indianapolis was voted as the site for the 1966 convention.

Delegates voted to raise the salaries of the president and secretary-treasurer from their present levels of $15,000 and $14,000 respectively, to $20,000 and $18,000 over a two-year period.

Parading behind a piece of fire apparatus, most of the 500 delegates went to St. Joseph's Cathedral following an afternoon recess to attend a memorial mass offered by the Rev. Frank Foster of San Antonio, Tex., chaplain of the IAFF, and himself a former fire fighter. The service was a tribute to Vice Pres. S. P. Stevens of Portland, Ore., who lost his life last month in a vain attempt to rescue his wife from their blazing home, and other deceased members of the union.

AFL-CIO Scholar Wins Fulbright Study Grant

Durham, N. C.—Mary Blakely, AFL-CIO scholarship winner in 1960 who was graduated with highest honors from Duke University this year, has been given a Fulbright grant to study at the University of Renne, France, during the coming academic year.

Miss Blakely is specializing in French language, culture and civilization. She had already received a Woodrow Wilson fellowship for graduate studies in French at Columbia University.

Letter Carriers Rap Postal Service Cuts

Miami Beach, Fla.—Mail deliveries to residential areas would be more frequent than once a day if the nation's letter carriers had their way.

The union's 75th anniversary convention sharply criticized cutbacks in postal service, called on Congress to recognize that the Post Office is a "service agency" and urged appropriation of funds adequate to "provide the best possible mail service to the people of the United States."

More than 3,000 delegates unanimously re-elected the NALC's team of national officers headed by Pres. Jerome J. Keating. Serving with him for another two-year term will be Vice Pres. James H. Rademacher, Sec.-Treas. J. Stanly Lewis, and Charles N. Coyle, assistant secretary-treasurer.

The convention hailed the progress of collective bargaining in the postal service but urged that local negotiations be held "on the clock," without loss of pay. Delegates also recommended that national contracts be submitted to a representative body of the union for ratification before being signed by NALC negotiators.

The convention also enlisted the nation's letter carriers in a "Mailmen's March" on behalf of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation, Oct. 9-10. The fund solicitation will be keyed to the 80th birthday anniversary of the late First Lady on Oct. 11.

The resolution endorsing the project was adopted unanimously by standing vote at a convention session addressed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.).

In other convention actions, delegates:

- Approved a resolution calling for mandatory arbitration procedures in postal service labor-management disputes. The resolution said this is necessary because postal employes are barred from striking.
- Rejected, by a 467-358 vote, a resolution calling for discontinuance of Post Office regional offices.
- Asked improved retired benefits for persons already on the civil service pension rolls as well as for employes who retire in the future.
- Termed recently-enacted pay raises "helpful" but urged a continuing campaign to "catch up" with comparable jobs in private industry.

Just to demonstrate that postal employes are their own best customers, the special post office set up to handle convention mail did a booming business. Sales of stamps averaged $500 a day as delegates mailed home everything from postcards to coconuts.

Pension Fund Group Names RCIA Officer

Oak Grove, Wis. — Sec.-Treas. William H. Lewis of Retail Clerks Local 240, Bellingham, Wash., has been named director of the National Foundation of Health, Welfare & Pension Plans, formed recently to serve as a non-profit educational organization for labor-management welfare and pension plans.

Letter Carriers' Teens Hold Own Convention

Miami Beach—Newsmen covering the Letter Carriers convention here found themselves with a second convention to report.

Teen-aged sons and daughters of N.A.L.C. delegates formed an organization they named NALCTEEN and held their own five-day convention at a nearby hotel.

On the serious side of the agenda, the 250 teenagers who participated actively in the convention heard and questioned an assistant postmaster general, leaders of Catholic, Jewish and Protestant groups who spoke on youth problems, a local juvenile court judge and other public officials.

They voted overwhelmingly for Pres. Johnson in a political straw poll, passed a resolution urging a juvenile jury system to try youthful traffic offenders and, after considerable debate, went on record opposing teen-age marriages.

The youngsters also had their own marching unit in the convention parade, held a poolside party and went on a moonlight cruise.

A Fateful Period

IN THE 58 DAYS between Labor Day 1964 and Election Day 1964 the nation will be faced with a fateful choice involving the well-being and the security of all Americans.

In July and again this month America's homes have been invaded by television, radio and newspapers carrying the story of the national political conventions. This is but a first installment in a series of political events that will be climaxed on Nov. 3 with the election of a President.

The choice before the American people this year will be unlike those of recent political history, for one party—the Republican—has veered sharply to the right and is directly and strongly challenging the basic programs evolved in the past three decades.

Because this choice will be so fateful it is critically important that there be the widest possible involvement of all citizens, that the choice be made by a truly representative electorate.

It is most especially a time for strenuous political action by trade union members vitally concerned with the welfare of the nation and the peace of the world as well as protecting and expanding their economic and social gains.

As perhaps never before in modern political campaigns it is imperative that the issues and the candidates be closely examined and analyzed so that the votes on Nov. 3 will be informed choices, not ballots built out of emotionalism, prejudice and bias.

ORGANIZED LABOR is increasingly more involved in political education and political action in programs designed to elect to public office candidates who will place human rights and the welfare of all Americans at the top of the list, who will fashion the programs to provide the economic security and the social progress that is the American potential.

The preliminary to all political education and action, however, is eligible voters—men and women who can step into a polling booth and pull a lever or mark a ballot—registered voters.

On this Labor Day, the immediate and overriding objective of the trade union movement is registering the unregistered. The decision that will be made this Election Day is too vital, too crucial to be made by anything less than a great majority.

On Labor Day 1964, and against the background of the presidential elections, it is perhaps proper to recall the words of Samuel Gompers spoken nearly 50 years ago:

The working people, he said, "will never stop in their efforts to obtain a better life for themselves, for their wives, for their children and for all humanity. The object is to obtain complete social justice."

A Single Vote Can Be Decisive, As Many a Candidate Knows

RUNNING for the state legislature, a candidate in Connecticut won his primary contest by exactly one vote, 609-608. Six weeks later, in the general election, the same candidate again won by just one vote, 4,164-4,163.

That's just one instance of how important one vote can be. Here are some others:

In 1962, 42 contests for senator, congressman and governor were won by less than 52 percent of the total vote.

In Minnesota, 1.3 million citizens voted in the gubernatorial race. The winner was liberal Karl Rolvaag. He defeated an ultra-conservative opponent . . . by only 91 votes.

In Minnesota, too, progressive Alec Olson got 50.1 percent of the vote to win a seat in the House of Representatives.

In Ohio, Bob Secrest was elected to the House over right-wing incumbent Tom Moorehead with 51.1 percent of the vote.

In Pennsylvania, Rep. George Rhodes, a liberal, retained his House seat with 51.3 percent, and Joseph S. Clark was returned to the Senate by the same margin.

In Connecticut, Abraham Ribicoff entered the Senate on the strength of 51.3 percent of the total vote.

In Alabama, moderate Sen. Lister Hill beat off the challenge of an extreme right-winger with 50.8 percent of the vote.

In North Dakota, George McGovern defeated a reactionary incumbent for the Senate. His winning percentage: 50.1.

In Indiana, Birch Bayh took the Senate seat of three-termer Homer Capehart, an ultra-conservative, with 50.3 percent of the vote.

In Vermont, Philip Hoff became the first Democratic governor in 108 years with 50.1 percent of the vote.

In Massachusetts, 50.1 percent was also Endicott Peabody's winning margin for governor.

In 1960, John F. Kennedy won the presidency over Richard Nixon by only 112,000 votes, less than one vote per precinct nationwide.

THE WINNERS mentioned all share two things in common: they won contests in which every vote counted, and their victories were important to the welfare of working people.

The governors have provided enlightened leadership in their states. The senators and representatives have supported liberal programs in Congress.

These are but a few examples. In many other cases, pro-labor candidates won by razor-thin margins. If a few of their supporters had sat out the election on the false grounds that "my vote doesn't count," the results would have been different, sadly so.

One vote counts! Register and vote.

A report by the President's Commission on Registration & Voting Participation makes these comparisons:

- In Denmark 85.5 percent of the eligible voters turned out in 1960.
- In Italy, voter turnout has topped 92 percent in each of the last four national elections.
- In West Germany participation in federal elections has ranged from 78.5 to 87.8 percent during the last 15 years.
- In Canada participation in the last three general elections has approximated 80 percent.
- In Finland, Norway, and Sweden participation has been significantly greater than in the United States.
- In the United States, 63.8 percent of the voters turned out in the Presidential election of 1960; in the "off-year" national elections of 1962; the turnout was only 48.9 percent!

Morgan Says:

Johnson Strategy Seems Geared To Total Victory in November

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is exerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.—As soon as the Goldwater conservatives emerged from the tense but never-in-doubt Cow Palace exhibition at San Francisco with the trophy of the Republican presidential nomination clutched to their proudly expanding chests, Pres. Johnson decided on a broad strategy for the election campaign which contained three main points.

Morgan

The first was to project a stable image of his leadership, rising, as much as possible, above the battle, tending to affairs of state more than to state fairs with their raucous political rallies, and as much as time, his talents and the opportunities allowed, enacting the role he most wants to establish as "President of all the people."

The second, as one White House source put it, was to hang the albatross of extremism and extremists' kooky views around Barry Goldwater's neck and, if possible, keep the burden there.

The third and related objective was to dramatize the contrast between prudence and steadiness and broad vision hopefully radiating from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue and the inexperienced, trigger-happy impulsiveness that allegedly would displace that reassuring aura if the senator from Arizona were to win in November.

Sen. John Orlando Pastore of Rhode Island, five-foot-five though he is, must somehow have managed to look over the President's shoulder at the battle plans because the old-fashioned oratorical fire of his keynote speech at the opening of the Democratic convention scorched the Republican earth in precisely the areas over which his party's commander-in-chief plans to thrust his major attacks.

The pint-sized Pastore fairly blistered, you might even say defoliated, with flame-throwing scorn the changing positions of Goldwater which require such constant interpretations of his meaning. But a President, the Rhode Islander cried pointedly, has to be understood the first time. In a nuclear age, wherein two hydrogen bombs pack more destructive force than all the explosives used in World War II put together, the world cannot wait until Saturday to learn what a U.S. President meant on Monday.

The keynoter, chairman of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy, acknowledged explicitly Republican support in passage of the Civil Rights Act and by implication vital GOP assistance in getting the Senate to ratify the nuclear test ban treaty.

But he might well have extended his graciousness to include a vote of thanks to GOP Gov. Scranton of Pennsylvania for providing some of the most telling points of his speech.

AT SAN FRANCISCO Scranton forces tried but failed spectacularly to get the Goldwater-dominated Platform Committee to include an explicit denunciation of extremists and a clear reaffirmation of the traditional American posture of civilian supremacy over the military with emphasis on presidential control over nuclear weapons as opposed to the Goldwater approach of allowing at least the NATO commander latitude in the firing of tactical "nukes."

Not only did Pastore and the Democratic platform embrace these points, the senator went on to raise a passionate cry of "shame, shame" for the characterization of Dwight D. Eisenhower as a conscious agent of Communism by the father of the John Birch Society, Robert Welsh.

As for Lyndon Johnson's own image, Pastore stood on elocutionary tiptoe and sketched the President in Paul Bunyan dimensions that by comparison would make even an average healthy Texan look like a Singer midget with anemia. "For 32 years," the senator intoned, "LBJ has been at the heart of Democratic inspiration (big 'D') in the most dynamic generation of America and mankind."

By the cold calculations that have to be made of campaign approaches, there is much here that has a plausible base. The terribly tempting projection that Democratic strategists hardly dare to think about is this: If Johnson continued to hold onto a commanding lead in the polls after the Republican convention had indicted the Democrats for almost every imaginable sin, what will his advantage be increased to after the Kennedy-Johnson Administration side of the story is fully circulated?

The answer could be a November landslide that would make Franklin Roosevelt's 1936 triumph over Gov. Alf Landon of Kansas look like a contested photo finish at the Kentucky Derby.

That is the pot of gold at the end of the political rainbow which Lyndon Johnson dreams of and is working his shrewd politican's head off for, but the sobering corrective thought at this juncture must be that he is already so high by the count of the professional-pulse takers that realistically he has no place to go but down. The towering question is: How far down?

Washington Reports:

Equal Pay Law Seen Opening New Opportunities for Women

ASSISTANT SEC. OF LABOR Esther Peterson said she expects employers to comply without difficulty with the equal pay for women law. Interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations, she noted that many employers complied even before the law went into effect.

"Many persons have written me and said, 'Look, Mrs. Peterson, I have had a raise,' " she reported. "Most employers want to comply. It is now a national principle that there should be a rate for the job."

She said many employers "are overwhelmed by the prospect of having to analyze and re-evaluate jobs," but, in the long run, "we expect that many new opportunities will be open for women."

Mrs. Peterson said that previous experience under the War Labor Board, when women took jobs in war plants during World War II, through civil service operations in the U.S. government, and under state equal pay laws have helped in putting the new federal law into operation.

She noted that the law forbids cutting the wages of men if women in the plant or office are doing the same job for less. The law also provides that merit increases and seniority shall not be effected.

She predicted that about 8 million of the 24 million women now working would be affected by the act.

AT PRESENT, she said, millions of women are in so-called women's jobs, as stenographers, secretaries, teachers, nurses, and in the service occupations.

"At the same time, many are moving into other areas, including administrative positions, the professions and into operation of automated equipment, computers and the like," Mrs. Peterson said. "Women seem to be particularly clever in this work."

State laws will continue to take care of intrastate occupations, with the federal law operating in interstate business, she said.

"Any woman who believes she has been denied equal pay for the same job should inform the local Wage & Hour administrator, or write the Wage & Hour Division in Washington," she asserted. "The administration of the law, as well as inspection of the situation, is in this part of the Dept. of Labor."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

ATLANTIC CITY—This has been Pres. Johnson's Democratic convention, bearing the stamp of his style in honorable compromises of issues once incapable of compromise, showing his familiar style preferences in the phrases and the terse, short paragraphs of the platform. More significantly, it was a convention that clarified what the Republicans managed to achieve when they insisted on candidates and a platform offering "a choice, not an echo."

The gulf between the two party platforms, the great disparity between what the candidates affirm as the urgent need of modern America could hardly be spelled out more clearly.

Take labor. The Republicans complain about government interference with the bargaining process, view with alarm the alleged concentrated power of unions and mutter about applying the anti-trust laws. The Democrats speak of strengthening "the industrial democracy of free, private collective bargaining and the security of American trade unions."

Take the issue of whose finger should control the nuclear "trigger." Sen. Goldwater has repeatedly urged that "field commanders" be given some "leeway" to unloose nuclear explosions, although recently he has explained this down as meaning merely "mortar-sized" things with no more force than some "conventional" weapons and suggested that "tactical" nuclear weapons should themselves be thought of as "conventional." The Democratic platform says, bluntly, that the finger on the trigger must remain that of our highest elected official, the commander-in-chief, the President.

Take the issue of political "extremism." Republican delegates booed Gov. Rockefeller of New York when he supported a proposed platform amendment denouncing John Birch Society infiltration of his party. (The tape-recording of that Rockefeller speech is a collectors' item, fascinating for the governor's soft-spoken, private but audible comments—"Yeah," "That's true, too"—as he waited for the shrieking audience to let him continue.) The Democrats bluntly denounce and renounce extremists and their tactics and name the Communist Party, the Ku Klux Klan and the John Birch Society.

In the Republican platform the only use of the word "extremism" occurs in regard to what the GOP chose to label "federal extremism," declaring that Democratic tax, fiscal and social programs are "thoughtless" and "improvident" and an encroachment on states' rights. It promises to limit "expanding centralized power."

The Democratic platform acknowledges an inter-related connection between local, state and federal governments but it says that when government at any level "fails to meet its responsibilities" for the freedom and welfare of the people it cannot "properly complain of violation of its powers" when government at another level moves to fill the vacuum.

THESE ARE other specifics on the gulf between the 1964 Republicans, candidate and platform, and the Lyndon Johnson Democratic approach:

- The GOP wants to aid education primarily by the return of "tax resources" to the states. The Democratic platform calls for massive federal aid to education at all levels.
- The GOP views with alarm what it calls "ceaseless pressure" from the White House and government agencies "to dominate consumer decisions in the market place." The Democratic platform endorses broader government protection of consumers from misleading, confusing or dangerous commercial practices.
- To the GOP, a plan for a tremendous regional electrical power intertie, involving both public and privately generated energy, is a menace, and it speaks stutteringly of "maximum beneficial uses of public lands." Democrats endorse the intertie concept—a future certainty—and specifically endorse wilderness preservation and an urgent increase in national recreational, park and forest areas.

This convention has ratified Mr. Johnson's leadership, which builds on what Democratic administrations since Franklin D. Roosevelt's first term have contributed to the uplifting of American society.

EQUAL PAY for women law should benefit the economy because it will result in many increases in the pay of women workers, Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson declared on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People. Harry W. Flannery did the interviewing.

How to Buy:

Increase in the Cost of Living Calls for Careful Fall Shopping

By Sidney Margolius

WATCH YOUR MONEY. You are going to be hit by a rise in the cost of living this fall. September in any case is one of the most difficult months for wage-earning families, and a time for cautious shopping. Children need back-to-school clothing; homes need repairs and preparation for winter; meat prices are high.

The only widespread sales and buying opportunities are china and housewares sales; clearances of fall piece goods and fabrics; the clearances of this year's car models; and special prices on batteries, mufflers and other pre-winter car needs offered by some garages and dealers. Stores also may run "anniversary sales," offering specials in various departments.

While prospects are poor for meat eaters, they are good for car shoppers. The auto industry still has a record inventory of 1964 models to clear before the 1965 cars arrive at dealer showrooms late in September. By August, trade reports indicated that some 1.25 million new 1964 cars were still on hand. Manufacturers and dealers will be trimming prices to unload them.

Here are tips on shopping for values this month:

Home repairs, materials: Lumber in general has been selling at low prices this year, with plywood at actual distress levels. Asphalt roofing is another bargain product; heating equipment prices also have been reduced.

Readers have asked about aluminum siding. Some high-pressure selling and misleading statements have been observed in the sale of this product. In some instances, homeowners have been fooled by what seem to be low quotations based on lineal feet, not the traditional square feet.

The Akron, O., Better Business Bureau points out that it has been customary in the home-improvement industry to quote prices on the basis of a "square." This is 10 feet by 10 feet, or 100 square feet. It takes 150 lineal feet of material, or 50 percent more, to equal one "square." The bureau thinks home-improvement sellers should quote on the basis of square feet, not lineal feet.

Children's clothing: The quality and construction of children's knit tee shirts and polo shirts often is a source of complaint. One problem is that they sometimes shrink in length and stretch in width. Government home economists suggest examining tee shirts to see if they have firm, even knitting. A blend of cotton with synthetic fiber such as the acrylic type (Orlon, Acrilan, etc.) or polyester (Dacron, Kodel, etc.) does have greater dimensional stability and wear resistance, and is more soil resistant and quicker drying than all cotton. This year such blends usually cost only 25-50 cents more than all-cotton tee shirts.

In boys' school slacks, you can get good wear at a moderate price by buying a blend of polyester fiber and rayon or cotton. For maximum wear, crease resistance and launderability, the blend should have a higher proportion of polyester than of rayon; for example, 65 percent polyester, 35 rayon.

Next in quality is a blend of rayon and Acrilan, often sold in approximately a 50-50 blend. Lowest in cost, but also in durability and crease resistance, are slacks primarily of rayon with a percentage of nylon. These inexpensive slacks may be satisfactory if not used for day-to-day wear. But make sure the blend has at least 15 percent nylon.

An increasing number of young boys' slacks are available with so-called "grow cuffs" or "add a cuff", often at little more cost. This construction permits you to lengthen slacks simply by snipping two threads.

Food buying calendar: Pork and lamb are high; beef prices are rising too. Buy of the month is turkeys, broilers and other poultry. Turkey supplies increase seasonally in September and are expected to be heavier than usual. Supplies of broilers have been heavy all year, with prices low. Fall also is the season for increased supplies of stewing chickens or fowl.

September is a month to rely on locally-grown fresh vegetables and fruits, often less than half the price than when not in season. But the September canned goods sales at supermarkets, clearing out this year's pack in preparation for the new pack, also give you a money-saving opportunity to stock up.

New Study Finds:

Challenge of Poverty Offers Opportunity

"THE AMOUNT of American money spent for the rehabilitation of Europe after World War II was many times the billion dollars a year provided in Pres. Johnson's 1964-1965 budget for his 'war on poverty.' Surely this country can afford a more comprehensive effort to salvage the lives of millions of Americans now trapped in poverty."

That is the view expressed by Maxwell Stewart in The Poor Among Us—Challenge and Opportunity, a new Public Affairs Pamphlet.

Stewart describes the extent of poverty in our country today and the problems of the estimated 35 to 50 million Americans who are "inadequately nourished, poorly housed, and maimed in body or spirit." He outlines programs the Administration is initiating and suggests that many other measures are imperative if future generations are to escape the self-propagating "culture of poverty."

Who are the poor? Stewart describes them as "too old, too young, or too uneducated to earn a living; they live in a depressed area or belong to a vanishing occupational group; their skin is not the same color as their neighbors'; or they are recent immigrants. Many of them live in the South."

There are others too—those "who cannot earn a living because of defects in ambition, personality, or character, the most tragic of the poor—the alcoholics, the narcotics addicts, and the petty criminals.

"But the essential point is that, for all of its wealth and the vaunted efficiency of its economic system, the United States is failing to meet the basic human needs of from one-fifth to one-fourth of its population," he adds. "This vast sector of America desperately needs better education, health services, housing, and above all, jobs and economic security."

In addition to reviewing the Johnson Administration's program, with its understandable emphasis on youth training and work-study programs and expansion of area redevelopment programs, Stewart stresses improving general education and vocational education geared to the jobs available in industry.

Other basic recommendations are expansion and extension of social security to include hundreds of thousands of irregularly employed and migratory workers who do not now qualify; adequate medical care for the entire population; extension of coverage under minimum wage laws and more attention to the needs of irregularly employed workers, such as farmers and construction workers; and more public works programs.

Stewart pleads for long-range, balanced planning for economic growth, by such agencies as the Council of Economic Advisers or the Office of Economic Opportunity.

The Poor Among Us—Challenge and Opportunity is available for 25 cents from the Public Affairs Committee, 381 Park Ave South, New York 10016.

From Soup to Nonsense:

She's One of the Crowd Now, She Picks Locks for a Hobby

By Jane Goodsell

AT LAST I'VE FOUND a hobby! I've needed one for a long time because people are always asking me what my hobby is. Perfect strangers (people who sit next to me on buses, and lab technicians who make conversation while they jab my arm for blood) open conversations by asking, "What's your hobby?"

Not having a hobby made me feel like a social failure. Oh, don't think I didn't try to find one! I attempted tennis. (Too tiring.) Fishing. (A bore.) Skiing. (Too scary.) And needlepoint. (What do you do with it when it's finished?) I tried collecting things. But I didn't really want a lot of useless stamps or foreign coins or antique pillboxes. I couldn't keep my mind on bridge. Birdwatching involved such early rising. And gardening isn't my idea of a hobby. Is bed-making a hobby?

Still, one does need a hobby, and at last I've found mine.

My daughter Ann arrived home from college and departed a week later for a summer job in New York. A large suitcase, which she had sent from school, arrived 10 days after she left. The suitcase was locked. Ann had taken the key with her. What to do?

I couldn't wait to write to Ann to send the key because her hair dryer was in the suitcase, and I needed it because she'd taken mine. Sighing heavily, I resigned myself to lugging the suitcase to a locksmith, and immediately un-resigned myself. I couldn't pick it up. No wonder it had cost $17.75 in express charges!

Half-heartedly, I tried to unlock it with several unidentified keys which we keep for such emergencies. That must be why we keep them. Why else? None of them worked. Then I tried poking at the lock with scissors, an ice pick, a screwdriver and a bobby pin. Hopeless.

FINALLY, I tried tweezers. They didn't work either, but it didn't seem hopeless. Not quite. It seemed as though it must might . . . just maybe . . . on the next try . . . or the next . . . if I kept working at it. . . .

And suddenly it did! The lock gave a little click and sprung open!

Well, talk about exhilaration! In that instant, I knew the triumph a fisherman feels when he catches his first steelhead. I knew how a golfer feels making his first birdie, how a painter feels when he captures the essence of light on canvas.

At last I had discovered where my talents lay, and I experienced a sense of fulfillment, the satisfying pride of achievement.

Lock-picking may not be everybody's idea of a hobby, but I'm crazy about it.

"Well, I guess I didn't play him right."

ANTI-POVERTY bill was a happy occasion for Pres. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The legislation was initiated by the Johnson Administration and strongly supported by labor.

Pamphlet Focuses On Shorter Hours

As part of its continuing campaign for reduction in working hours, the AFL-CIO has produced a new pamphlet titled "Shorter Hours: To Create Jobs."

Based on material appearing in the AFL-CIO American Federationist, augmented with updated tables and additional material, the 20-page, two-color, illustrated pamphlet is aimed at a solution to the continuing problem of chronic, high-level unemployment.

Single copies of the pamphlet, Publication No. 135, are available free. Up to 100 copies the publication is priced at 20 cents each; orders for more than 100 copies are at the rate of $15 per hundred. The pamphlet can be ordered from the Pamphlet Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Unions Urged To Help Cut Holiday Toll

It is "practically imperative" that organized labor "extend every effort possible to curtail the appalling tragedies that safety experts regularly and accurately predict" for Labor Day weekends, Pres. O. A. Knight of the Oil Workers has told union organizations participating in the Labor Day Safety Campaign.

Knight is chairman of the Steering Committee for the 1964 drive to make labor's own holiday safer than it is usually. The campaign is being staged for the sixth year by the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Safety & Occupational Health and the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council.

In a letter to labor groups which have requested the campaign promotion kit and booklet, Knight pointed out that many of those expected to be killed or injured over summer's last holiday weekend will be union members and their families.

"Please conscientiously. . . . do your best to solicit the necessary help from your membership to make the campaign effective in your area," he urged.

"This does require time and effort, but I am sure the results and the potential benefits can be adequately rewarding. Organized labor should never be satisfied until the expected disastrous statistics are cut in half or reduced to the utopia of zero."

Unions which meet minimum standards in participating in the campaign are eligible to apply for a Recognition Certificate from the NSC Labor Dept.

7 Named to Board In Rail Dispute

Pres. Johnson has named a seven-member emergency board to conduct hearings under the Railway Labor Act into three disputes involving the nation's railroads and all or some of the 11 non-operating rail unions.

The board will sit in Chicago beginning Sept. 2.

Former Mayor Richardson Dilworth of Philadelphia was appointed chairman. Other members are Paul D. Hanlon, Portland, Ore., lawyer; Pres. John W. McConnell of the University of New Hampshire; Robert J. Ables, Washington attorney; Lewis M. Gill, Philadelphia arbitrator; H. Raymond Cluster, Baltimore attorney, and Prof. Frank J. Dugan of Georgetown University, Washington.

Highlights of '64 Democratic Platform

On this page the AFL-CIO reproduces excerpts of key portions of the platform adopted by the Democratic National Convention in Atlantic City. The subject headings are those used by the AFL-CIO in its presentation to the Democratic platform committee and do not appear in the platform.

Labor and Management

● The industrial democracy of free, private collective bargaining and the security of American trade unions must be strengthened by repealing Section 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act. The present inequitable restrictions on the right to organize and to strike and picket peaceably must also be eliminated.

Civil Rights

● The Civil Rights Act of 1964 deserves and requires full observance by every American and fair, effective enforcement if there is any default.

Resting upon a national consensus expressed by the overwhelming support of both parties, this new law impairs the rights of no American; it affirms the rights of all Americans. Its purpose is not to divide, but to end division; not to curtail the opportunities of any, but to increase opportunities for all; not to punish, but to promote further our commitment to freedom, the pursuit of justice, and a deeper respect for human dignity.

● We reaffirm our belief that lawless disregard for the rights of others is wrong—whether used to deny equal rights or to obtain equal rights.

We cannot and will not tolerate lawlessness. We can and will seek to eliminate its economic and social causes.

● True democracy of opportunity will not be served by establishing quotas based on the same false distinctions we seek to erase, nor can the effects of prejudice be neutralized by the expedient of preferential practices.

Economic Issues and Jobs

● It is the national purpose, and our commitment, to continue the expansion of the American economy toward its potential, without a recession, with continued stability, and with an extension of the benefits of this growth and prosperity to those who have not fully shared in them.

This will require continuation of flexible and innovative fiscal, monetary, and debt management policies, recognizing the importance of low interest rates.

We will seek further tax reduction—and in the process we need to remove inequities in our present tax laws. In particular we should carefully review all our excise taxes and eliminate those that are obsolete. Consideration should be given to the development of fiscal policies which would provide revenue sources to hard-pressed state and local governments to assist them with their responsibilities.

● We pledge to continue a frugal government, getting a dollar's value for a dollar spent, and a government worthy of the citizen's confidence. Our goal is a balanced budget in a balanced economy.

● Radical changes in technology and automation contribute to increased productivity and a higher standard of living. They must not penalize the few while benefiting the many. We maintain that any man or woman displaced by a machine or by technological change should have the opportunity, without penalty, to another job. Our common responsibility is to see that this right is fulfilled.

● Full employment is an end in itself and must be insisted upon as a priority objective. It is the national purpose, and our commitment, that every man or woman who is willing and able to work is entitled to a job and to a fair wage for doing it.

● The coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act must be extended to all workers employed in industries affecting interstate commerce, and the minimum wage level and coverage increased to assure those at the bottom of the economic scale a fairer share in the benefits of an ever-rising standard of American living.

● Overtime payment requirements must be increased to assure maximum employment consistent with business efficiency. The matter of the length of work periods should be given continuing consideration.

● The unemployment insurance program must be basically revised to meet the needs of the unemployed and of the economy, and to assure that this program meets the standards the nation's experience dictates.

● Agricultural and migratory workers must be given legal protection and economic encouragement.

● We must develop fully our most precious resource —our manpower. Training and retraining programs must be expanded. A broad-gauge manpower program must be developed which will not only satisfy the needs of the economy but will also give work its maximum meaning in the pattern of human life.

● We will stimulate as well as protect small business, the seed-bed of free enterprise and a major source of employment in our economy.

● The anti-trust laws must be vigorously enforced.

● Our population, which is growing rapidly and becoming increasingly mobile, and our expanding economy are placing greater demands upon our transportation system than ever before. We must have fast, safe, and economic modes of transportation. Each mode should be encouraged to develop in accordance with its maximum utility, available at the lowest cost under the principles of fair competition. A strong and efficient American flag merchant marine is essential to peacetime commerce and defense emergencies.

● Continue the quickened pace of comprehensive development of river basins in every section of the country, employing multipurpose projects, such as flood control, irrigation and reclamation, power generation, navigation, municipal water supply, fish and wildlife enhancement and recreation, where appropriate to realize the fullest possible benefits.

● Provide the people of this nation a balanced outdoor recreation program to add to their health and well-being, including the addition of improved management of national parks, forests, lakeshores, seashores and recreation areas.

● Continue the attack we have launched on the polluted air that envelopes our cities and on eliminating the pollution of our rivers and streams.

● Continue to promote the development of new and improved methods of generating electric power, such as the recent important gains in the field of atomic energy and the Passamaquoddy tidal power.

● Preserve the TVA which has played such an instrumental role in the revitalization of the area it serves and which has been the inspiration for regional development programs throughout the world.

Social and Public Needs

● Carry the war on poverty forward as a total war against the causes of human want.

● Move forward with programs to restore those areas, such as Appalachia, which the nation's progress has by-passed.

● The goal of our housing program must be a decent home for every American family.

● Special effort must be made in our cities to provide wholesome living for our young people. We must press the fight against narcotics, and through the war against poverty, increase educational and employment opportunities, turning juvenile delinquents into good citizens and tax-users into tax payers.

● We will continue to aid broad community and regional development, urban renewal, mass transit, open space and other programs for our metropolitan areas. We will offer such aid without impairing local administration through unnecessary federal interference.

● Because our cities and suburbs are so important to the welfare of all our people, we believe a department devoted to urban affairs should be added to the President's cabinet.

● Regardless of family financial status education should be open to every boy or girl in America up to the highest level which he or she is able to master.

● The demands on the already inadequate sources of state and local revenues place a serious limitation on education. New methods of financial aid must be explored, including the channeling of federally collected revenues to all levels of education, and, to the extent permitted by the Constitution, to all schools. Only in this way can our educational programs achieve excellence throughout the nation, a goal that must be achieved without interfering with local control and direction of education.

● In order to insure that all students who can meet the requirements for college entrance can continue their education, we propose an expanded program of public scholarships, guaranteed loans, and work-study grants.

● We shall develop the potential of the armed forces for training young men who might otherwise be rejected for military service because their work skills are underdeveloped.

● In order to protect the hard earned dollars of American consumers, as well as promote their basic consumer rights, we will make full use of existing authority, and continue to promote efforts on behalf of consumers by industry, voluntary organizations, and state and local governments. Where protection is essential, we will enact legislation to protect the safety of consumers and to provide them with essential information. We will continue to insist that our drugs and medicines are safe and effective, that our food and cosmetics are free from harm, that merchandise is labeled and packaged honestly, and that the true cost of credit is disclosed.

● The immigration laws must be revised to permit families to be reunited, to welcome the persecuted and oppressed, and to eliminate the discriminatory provisions which base admission upon national origins.

● To achieve the goals of higher incomes to the farm and ranch, particularly the family-sized farm, lower prices for the consumer, and lower costs to the government, we will continue to carry forward this three dimensional program: Commodity programs to strengthen the farm income structure and reach the goal of parity of income in every aspect of American agriculture; consumer programs, including expansion of the food stamp program and the school lunch and other surplus food programs, and acceleration of research into new industrial uses of farm products; community programs and agricultural cooperatives to assure rural America decent housing, economic security, and full partnership in the building of the great society.

● We will support legislation to carry forward the progress already made toward full equality of opportunity for women as well as men.

● We will strive to eliminate discrimination against older Americans, especially in their employment.

● Help the physically handicapped and mentally disadvantaged develop to the full limit of their capabilities.

● We will encourage further support for the arts, giving people a better chance to use increased leisure and recognizing that the achievements of art are an index of the greatness of a civilization.

Social Security and Health

● We will continue to fight until we have succeeded in including hospital care for older Americans in the social security program and have insured adequate assistance to those elderly people suffering from mental illness and mental retardation.

● We will go forward with research into the causes and cures of diseases, accidents, mental illness and mental retardation.

● We will further expand our health facilities, especially medical schools, hospitals, and laboratories.

● First rate hospitals and medical care must be provided veterans with service-connected injuries and disabilities and their compensation rates must insure an adequate standard of living. The National Service Life Insurance program should be reopened for those who have lost their insurance coverage, and an equitable and just pension system must help meet the need of those disabled veterans and their survivors who require financial assistance.

● The social security program, initiated and developed under the national leadership of the Democratic Party and in the face of ceaseless partisan opposition, contributes greatly to the strength of the nation. We must insure that those who have contributed to the system shall share in the steady increase in our standard of living by adjusting benefit levels.

● Enhance the security of older Americans by encouraging private retirement and welfare programs, offering opportunities like those provided for the young under the Economic Opportunities Act of 1964, and expanding decent housing which older citizens can afford.

Government Administration

● The government's business is the people's business. Information about public affairs must continue to be freely available to the congress and to the public.

● Every person who participates in the government must be held to a standard of ethics which permits no compromise with the principles of absolute honestly and the maintenance of undivided loyalty to the public interest.

● The Congress of the United States should revise its rules and procedures to assure majority rule after reasonable debate and to guarantee that major legislative proposals of the President can be brought to a vote after reasonable consideration in committee.

● We support home rule for the District of Columbia. The seat of our government shall be a workshop for democracy, a pilot-plant for freedom, and a place of incomparable beauty. We also support a constitutional amendment giving the District voting representation in Congress and pending such action, the enactment of legislation providing for a non-voting delegate from the District of Columbia to the House of Representatives.

● The Democratic Party holds to the belief that government in the United States—local, state, and federal—was created in order to serve the people. Each level of government has appropriate powers and each has specific responsibilities. The first responsibility of government at every level is to protect the basic freedoms of the people. No government at any level can properly complain of violation of its powers, if it fails to meet its responsibilities.

All of us are Americans. All of us are free men. Ultimately, there can be no effective restraint on the powers of government at any level save as Americans exercising their duties as citizens insist upon and maintain the free democratic processes of our system.

Meany Hails Party Planks:

Democratic Platform Seen 'Stark Contrast' to GOP

In an unprecedented statement based on the Employment Act of 1946, the platform declared that every man or woman "willing and able to work is entitled to a job and to a fair wage for doing it," and that "full employment is an end in itself and must be insisted on as a priority objective."

In another unprecedented statement on automation, it declared that "radical" technological changes "must not penalize the few while benefitting the many" and that any person "displaced" by such changes "should have the opportunity, without penalty, to another job."

The platform statements on foreign policy and national defense took as their keynote the need of national leadership of "consummate understanding and experience" warning that "cities could become smouldering ruins and farms parched wasteland" through "one rash act, one thoughtless decision, one unchecked reaction."

It was an echo of "hip-shooting" intimations leveled against Goldwater in the foreign policy field by Republican opponents before the GOP convention nominated him.

Responsibility Stressed

"The most powerful nation on earth" must exercise that power "with the utmost responsibility," the platform said in its section on building peace, and directly challenged Goldwater's record on two issues.

"Already the air we and our children breathe is freer of nuclear contamination" because of the limited test-ban treaty, it said, and the treaty has been accepted "by over 100 nations." Goldwater voted against ratification in the Senate.

"Control of the use of nuclear weapons must remain solely with the highest elected official in the country—the President of the United States," the platform insisted. The Arizona senator has urged an uncertain degree of "leeway" for field commanders to initiate use of the nuclear weapons.

Rejecting Republican charges involving defense policy, the Democratic platform emphasized that the late Pres. Kennedy and Johnson, then vice president, "shattered" the Soviet offensive in Cuba in 1962 and that once again, in the recent Gulf of Tonkin air strike, U.S. "power exercised with restraint" turned back aggression.

Our combat-ready divisions have been increased from 11 to 16, the convention said, our long-range missiles have been increased "from fewer than 100 to more than 1,000," and our "balanced, versatile" defense forces can now meet "guerrilla subversion" as well as "nuclear confrontation."

Tensions Eased

Reaffirming U.S. commitments to its alliances, the platform drew a quotation from Kennedy's 1961 inaugural speech—"never negotiating from fear but never fearing to negotiate"—to declare that "we are approaching the point" where "effective" inspection agreements "can begin to lift the crushing burden of armaments" and that "fully enforceable measures" could end "the era of nuclear terror."

In the field of labor-management relations, the platform approved here reiterated the 1960 convention's call for repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act's "right-to-work" Sec. 14b—a call not yet reflected in congressional action—and added a pledge to eliminate existing "inequitable restrictions" on organizational strikes and peaceful picketing, declaring that the "industrial democracy of free, private collective bargaining and the security of American trade unions must be strengthened."

The Civil Rights Act was termed a reflection of "a national consensus expressed by the overwhelming support of both parties," impairing the rights of no American and affirming the rights of all.

Total Effort Pledged

The attack on discrimination, the convention said, involves "not only people's right to be free but also their ability to use their freedom." It pledged a "total" effort against the "causes of human want," including an expansion of the recently-enacted Youth Opportunities Act and of the social security system for retired workers; assistance to the physically handicapped, and adoption of such programs as the Appalachia plan for economically "by-passed" areas.

Specifically in the social security field, the party statement pledged unremitting efforts to add hospital-care benefits and a program under which retired workers "shall share" in rising living standards by upward adjustment of benefit levels. (A hospital-care amendment to a social security bill is now pending in the Senate, where a vote is expected on the floor when Congress reconvenes.)

Reciting achievements of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration in the domestic economy field, the platform emphasized the current "42 months of unbroken economic expansion," with jobs, wages, profits, industrial production and the economic growth rate all sharply increased.

The impact of automation nevertheless imposes a "common responsibility" to see that displaced workers do not pay the penalty, it stated. Declaring "the national purpose and our commitment" to full employment policies, it listed these goals:

- Expansion of minimum wage coverage to "all workers in industries affecting interstate commerce" and an increase in the statutory wage floor (now $1.25 an hour at maximum).

Progress Made

A Kennedy-backed minimum wage law, raising both the wages and coverage, was among the Administration's first major legislative achievements in 1961. Expansion of the program proposed in the 1964 platform would add more than 20 million workers now unprotected, including millions of farm workers.

The platform said overtime pay should be increased to an unspecified degree "to assure maximum employment consistent with business efficiency" and that "continuing consideration" should be given to a shorter statutory work week. The AFL-CIO has urged a $2 minimum wage, a 35-hour week and double-time penalty pay for overtime.

- Basic revision of the unemployment insurance program "to meet the needs of the unemployed and of the economy." Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the platform committee that the whole state-federal jobless benefit system needs an "upgrading."

The AFL-CIO has repeatedly pointed out that the state law system of exemptions, disqualifications and benefit minimums and maximums has resulted in jobless-insurance recovery far below the one-half of lost wages aimed at when the system was established in 1938. The Democratic platform approved here said the program must meet "the standards the nation's experience dictates."

- "Legal protection and economic encouragement" to farm workers including migratory workers. At present farm workers are exempted from the protection of collective bargaining guarantees, jobless compensation and wage-hour standards.
- Extension of manpower training and retraining programs to meet the needs of individual workers for meaningful jobs and the requirement of the economy for expanded skills.

The platform framed major programs in the areas of education, housing, natural resources and consumer protection.

Citing in its preamble the major educational-aid bills passed in 1963, it called for further legislation opening the doors of schooling "to every boy and girl up to the highest level he or she is able to master regardless of family financial status."

It urged an expanded program of scholarships, guaranteed loans and work-study grants for college students and greater federal financial aid to the states for educational purposes at "all levels."

More Homes Needed

The housing bill of 1961 was described by the convention as the "most comprehensive" in history, but the platform pointed out that in the remaining years of this century "urban populations will double, the area of city land will double," and "homes, highways and facilities" will be needed "equal to all those built since this country was first settled."

A Dept. of Urban Affairs is needed for the President's Cabinet, the platform declared, to help metropolitan communities plan and finance the housing, renewal, transit and recreational facilities demanded. A Kennedy-backed bill to create such a department failed to get congressional approval.

Hailing the conservation programs enacted this year by Congress, the platform urged still further action to protect the nation's natural resources including water, wildlife and forests. It pledged preservation of the Tennessee Valley Authority (which Sen. Goldwater has sometimes proposed to "sell") and development of nuclear and tidal generating facilities.

The careful fiscal policies of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration should be continued, the platform said.

CANDIDATE at large for the Illinois House as a Democrat is Adlai Stevenson III, 33, son of the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

REACTIONARIES AND EXTREMISTS have seized control of the Republican Party, Sen. John O. Pastore (R.I.), charged in his keynote speech to the Democratic National Convention. Pastore's slashing attack on the GOP was frequently halted by enthusiastic cheers.

Credential Fight Brings Ban on Discrimination

from which most Negroes were barred.

Challenges in the credentials committee to the delegates named by both Mississippi and Alabama Democratic state parties had previously produced a stretching of convention rules to demand from each such delegate a personal pledge of "loyalty" to the convention's eventual nominees.

The committee thus took judicial notice, in effect, that Alabama's Gov. George Wallace and Mississippi's Gov. Paul Johnson had notoriously laid plans to arrange the Nov. 3 election machinery so as practically to guarantee that the two-state electoral college vote would go to either Sen. Goldwater, the Republican nominee, or some Democrat other than Pres. Johnson.

Wallace in an inflammatory appearance before the platform committee had threatened a third party "beginning Nov. 3" unless the convention repudiated the Civil Rights Act and the Democratic social legislation of 32 years. Louisiana's Gov. John J. McKeithen had tried to promote a stalk-out by other southern state delegates if Alabama and Mississippi "regulars" should be denied seats.

These threats melted into vapidness as Freedom Party witnesses at an hour-long public hearing before the credentials committee told of conspiracies, murders, burnings and terror used in Mississippi to prevent registration of Negro residents as Democratic voters.

The Freedom Party had no legal case at all—but their moral case was so powerful, as unfolded by their counsel, Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., that the Mississippi "regular" organization was exposed as appearing with unclean hands.

Women members of the credentials committee wept as one Freedom Party witness told how, after she had insisted on registration, she and her family were kicked from their farm-tenant plantation house, she and four other Negro women were arrested by state police, and she herself was beaten on a jail-cell cot with billy clubs wielded by male Negro prisoners—on white police orders.

The upshot was isolation of the Wallace-Paul Johnson forces:

- Two leaders of the Freedom Party, Aaron Henry and Rev. Edward King, were seated as special delegates at large—a tremendous tribute to the moral force of the Freedom Party cause.
- Mississippi "regular" delegates were added to those from Alabama as owing the convention a personal loyalty pledge before being seated (most of them bolted instead).
- The credentials committee proposed, and the convention approved, the tight anti-discrimination rule for future elections and party operations within Democratic state parties and set up the watchdog committee to enforce it.
- Southern delegates in the credentials committee and on the convention floor either accepted or actually supported this disposition of the Mississippi contest. It was the best solution southern delegations could hope for, said Tom Harper, Arkansas chairman.

'Turning Point' Seen

Neither the Freedom Party nor the "regulars" officially accepted the report, but Credentials Committee Chairman David L. Lawrence, former governor of Pennsylvania, apparently spoke the sense of the convention when he called it a "turning point" in Democratic party history.

When Wallace before the platform committee claimed that national Democratic principles, unless radically reversed, would meet revolt all over his "part of the country," a South Carolina member, Yancey A. McLeod, forced amendment of the statement to confine it to Alabama alone.

Said Jack Pittman of the "regular" Mississippi delegates, "we didn't leave the National Democratic Party. It left us. We're going home."

Freeman Sees Presidential Choice 'Clear'

Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers told delegates to a five-state conference of his union that Pres. Johnson's performance as a national leader "has left nothing to be desired."

By contrast, he said, Republican Candidate Barry Goldwater has been consistently "against everything the IBEW has stood for since its inception."

Freeman, addressing 250 local IBEW leaders from Kentucky, Maryland, Ohio, Virginia, West Virginia and the District of Columbia, said: "The chips are down in this presidential election. We have to make a choice."

Johnson, he told the delegates, "has moved with determination and effective leadership to keep a sorely stricken nation on the forward path after the tragic events of last November."

LBJ-Humphrey Drive Keyed to Record

Convention Opens Counter-Attack Against Goldwater—GOP Policies

keynote speech of Sen. John O. Pastore of Rhode Island made it clear that the Democratic Party gladly accepted the GOP challenge to the nation's leadership in the Kennedy-Johnson years and the Republican all-out assault on social reforms that Democrats believe have transformed the nation in the past 32 years—for the better.

The convention had its somber notes. The delegates were deeply conscious that four years earlier another Democratic convention had started the vibrant John F. Kennedy on his way to the White House. There was a time and a place at this convention for mourning Kennedy's loss—and a film of great emotional thrust recalled his thousand days as the nation's leader.

Pastore set the theme when he recalled that Kennedy himself had selected Johnson four years ago. The "vision" of the late President, the Rhode Island senator said, "lives on in the character, the capability and the courage of the teammate of his choice."

Even while the delegates were meeting, there was hard, brisk work done in the ballroom and other anterooms of the huge convention hall as national committee officials met with key leaders of state Democratic parties to plan the coordination of the upcoming local and national campaigns.

National Committee Chairman John W. Bailey and Johnson's personal representative on the committee, Cliff Carter, worked day after day with "workshop" groups of state leaders and candidates—discussing the President's own schedule of campaign trips, the use to be made of Humphrey's concededly enormous campaign energies, the raising of funds and division of duties and function.

For the Democrats, the campaign clearly would become a hard-fought one—a total response to the Goldwater-GOP assault.

The delegates themselves approved by acclamation a platform shorter than that of the 1960 convention—but unusually explicit for declarations of party programs, and especially so in contrast to the vague platform adopted by the Republican convention six weeks earlier.

The Democratic platform was praised by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "sound, liberal and progressive—a positive program of action for 20th Century America."

The proposals of the AFL-CIO itself and the platforms of the two parties will be compared by the federation's General Board, which meets in Washington Sept. 1 at the call of the Executive Council to make an endorsement for the campaign, Meany said.

The convention delegates, also by acclamation, accepted a report from its credentials committee that had the effect of isolating Mississippi and Alabama bitter-enders suspected of planning to rig their state election machinery to aid Goldwater next November after using their claimed credentials here to assail the party's national policies of the past and program for the future.

The delegates coldly ignored a slashing public attack on Democratic national policy by Alabama's Gov. George Wallace, although in speeches and in the platform they used language temperately, allowing moderate southern party leaders to feel they had been treated with consideration.

The southern moderates, in turn, treated Wallace with equal coldness. They raised no objection to the unprecedented tribute to the Mississippi Freedom Party's moral case against the state's "regulars," which saw two Freedom spokesmen seated as special delegates at large. They raised no objection when Mississippi and Alabama delegates, refusing to sign a loyalty pledge to support the convention's nominees, were firmly ushered out of their delegations' assigned locations in the hall.

There was no monolithic devotion here to any particular dogma or doctrine on the way the country should be run—no insistence that every delegate had to cross every "t" and dot every "i" in exactly the same way.

There was, instead, a respect for honest differences of opinion that lie in the mainstream of American political attitudes and an effort to declare the party's future program in language acceptable in the party consensus.

The result was a party nominating convention from which delegates could move with eagerness into the campaign, confident the basic principles stated and restated here would win the endorsement of the nation next Nov. 3.

BUSLOADS OF SENIOR CITIZENS, many representing groups of retired union members, came to the Democratic Convention in Atlantic City for a boardwalk demonstration in support of Pres. Johnson's program for health care for the elderly through social security.

7 of 8 Elections Won In Three-County Drive

Greensboro, N. C.—Rank-and-file assistance has been a big help in an organizing campaign in this three-county area which has won seven out of eight representation elections for AFL-CIO unions.

That's an 88 percent average for the coordinated campaign that started with a meeting here less than 18 months ago, staff representatives have reported to Dir. John Livingston of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

More help will be sought from union members in this area where an estimated 100 plants remain unprotected by collective bargaining contracts, said Livingston. Since the start of the coordinated campaign, a steady flow of tips and leads have come from the "grass roots," he reported.

Two dozen union leaders were present when Assistant Dir. George Craig of the Dept. of Organizing held an exploratory meeting here last year. They welcomed the drive and promised support.

Involved in the campaign in the Greensboro—High Point—Siler City area were Cary Haigler, assistant AFL-CIO regional director, from Charlotte, N. C.; federation staff members George B. Kiser, A. E. Brown and Elijah Jackson; and organizers for the Upholsterers; Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union; Papermakers & Paperworkers, and several other unions with members here.

Help in the campaign was volunteered by workers at several plants including UPP members at the Englander Mattress Co. in High Point, Painters at the Marietta Paint Co., Tobacco Workers in Greensboro, and from the Greensboro AFL-CIO.

Results of elections to date are as follows:

At Englander Mattress: Upholsterers 22, against 16.

Carolina Springs, High Point: Upholsterers 114, against 102.

Southern Paper Tube Co., Greensboro: Papermakers & Paperworkers 36, against 10.

Griffin Bakery, Greensboro: American Bakery & Confectionery Workers 18, against 23, challenged 19.

Guilford Dairy Co., Greensboro: RWDSU 33, against 23.

Metco Products, Greensboro: UIU 39, against 16.

National Spring Co., High Point: UIU 50, against 27.

First contracts have been negotiated at Englander, Carolina Springs, Southern Paper, and Guilford Dairy. Negotiations are still in process at Metco and Selig, the unions have reported.

CHECK FOR $100,000 to help promote AFL-CIO voter registration drives was presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany by Sec.-Treas. James B. Carey of the Industrial Union Dept. Fight Over Health Care Faces Senate on Return

The Senate will plunge immediately into a battle over a social security program of hospital insurance for the elderly when Congress reconvenes Aug. 31 after a convention-week recess.

On the Senate floor will be a House-passed bill raising social security cash benefits 5 percent. An administration-backed effort will be made to amend the bill to include a hospital insurance plan, either through the original King-Anderson bill or one of several alternative proposals which have been made to enable retired workers to receive health insurance benefits without a means test.

To take up the social security bill, the Senate leadership has set aside temporarily the foreign aid bill which has become embroiled in a bitter fight over reapportionment of state legislatures.

A modified filibuster by a group of liberal senators prevented action on Republican-initiated efforts to tack a "rider" to the foreign aid bill preventing the federal courts from carrying out the Supreme Court's ruling that both houses of a state legislature must be apportioned on the basis of population—the "one man, one vote" principle.

Dirksen Seeks Vote

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) has said that he is prepared to file a cloture petition to cut off debate in order to force his court-curbing amendment to a vote.

Also before the Senate is the more drastic House-passed bill which would strip federal courts of all jurisdiction over legislative districts.

Both the House and the Senate have yet to act on the Appalachia redevelopment program, a major weapon in Pres. Johnson's war on poverty.

It has been cleared by the House Rules Committee, thus enabling the Democratic leadership to call it up for a vote at any time. It also is on the Senate calendar, in the event the Administration chooses to take it up first there.

1st-Half Hikes Average 3.2% In Major Pacts

An average increase of 3.2 percent of straight-time hourly earnings will go to about 1.5 million workers because of major collective bargaining settlements during the first six months of this year, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Only 50,000 workers are employed under contracts where no increase is scheduled during the first contract year, the department said in a report prepared by its Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Approximately 550,000 of the workers involved are in manufacturing plants which agreed to average wage hikes of 3.6 percent. These settlements were mainly in the women's apparel industries, where some 120,000 employes won their first general wage increases in three years.

About 1 million of those affected by the settlements, the BLS said, were in nonmanufacturing industries, where union-negotiated increases averaged 3.2 percent.

Most of the settlements changed supplemental benefits along with wage rate increases, the report said. Where increases were won, they ranged from about 3 cents an hour to 19 cents or more and from 1 to more than 6 percent.

Johnson-Humphrey Ticket Held Vital to Labor, Nation

Voluntary Compliance the Goal:

Labor Drive Backs Civil Rights Law

Union leaders from all sections of the nation launched a drive in support of the spirit and letter of the Civil Rights Act and planned broad-based community efforts to achieve voluntary compliance with all its provisions.

"We can't let hate groups stand in our way," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told 300 delegates from international unions and state and local central bodies.

Meany, who presided at the all-day conference called by the Executive Council, said the AFL-CIO won't "wait until next year," when the fair employment section of the law takes effect, to fight for equality of opportunity in hiring, training and promotion.

Labor's Role Hailed

Labor's key role in support of civil rights was hailed by two conference speakers—LeRoy Collins, former governor of Florida who is director of the Community Relations Service established under the new law, and Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Meany stressed in response that the AFL-CIO doesn't consider its job done with the passage of the Civil Rights Act. The law, he said, "must be implemented and it must be implemented at the local level."

He gave this outline of the AFL-CIO's grass roots program:

- "We are going to ask that

Rights Bill Foe Loses In Michigan

Voters in Michigan's 16th Congressional District ousted the only northern Democrat in the country who voted against the House civil rights bill, seven-term veteran Rep. John Lesinski, in the state's Sept. 1 primary elections.

Lesinski was defeated by another incumbent Democrat, Rep. John D. Dingell, in a contest throwing the two against each other by a congressional redistricting plan adopted after federal courts ordered more equal representation of population.

The race was considered a major early test of the potency of the so-called "white backlash" reaction to civil rights pressures.

Dingell voted for the rights bill

PRES. LYNDON B. JOHNSON thanks the AFL-CIO General Board in the famed East Room of the White House after Pres. George Meany informed him of the board's endorsement of the ticket of Johnson and Vice Presidential Nominee Hubert H. Humphrey.

In Social Security Bill:

Hospital Care Plan Approved by Senate

By David L. Perlman

Supporters of social security hospital care scored their first big breakthrough as the Senate voted 49-44 approval of a plan strongly backed by the Administration and labor.

It was the third Senate vote on the issue in four years, with each ballot reflecting growing support. In 1960, a hospital care amendment to a social security bill was defeated, 51-44. Two years later, the margin of defeat narrowed to 52-48. The successful third try came on a package proposal introduced by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.), which included both higher cash benefits and the principal features of the long-pending King-Anderson bill.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told newsmen he was "delighted" with the Senate victory. On the eve of the vote he had wired each senator reiterating labor's long-standing support for "much-needed hospital care under social security for the nation's elderly" and declaring: "America needs this legislation."

The biggest hurdle for the bill is still ahead—in the House of Representatives. The House had originally passed a straight 5 percent increase in cash benefits, accompanied by higher social security tax rates. The measure had been brought to the House floor under a no-amendment rule, which precluded any attempt to incorporate a hospital care provision.

Under ordinary procedures, it

Board Vote Unanimous In Support

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO called on its 13.5 million members to give their "most wholehearted support" to Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, declaring that their election is "a matter of the most vital concern to the labor movement."

The call for the all-out drive to elect the Johnson-Humphrey ticket climaxed a statement unanimously adopted by the AFL-CIO General Board endorsing and giving strong support to the Democratic candidates in the 1964 election. (Key excerpts on Page 5.)

Johnson, meeting with the 166-member board in the East Room of the White House an hour later, said he would carry the endorsement "proudly during this campaign. I will remember it fondly in January as we begin four more exciting years of progress."

The board statement analyzed in detail the platforms of the Democratic and Republican parties in terms of AFL-CIO proposals to their national conventions and the records and views of the candidates for President and Vice President and concluded:

"The choice is obvious, both as to the platform and the candidates.

'Therefore, it is the considered

Unemployment Rate Rises to 5.1%, Teen-age Joblessness Remains High

A failure of teen-age unemployment to drop on a seasonal basis moved the unemployment rate from 4.9 to 5.1 percent in August although the total number of jobless dropped to 3.6 million, the Labor Dept. reported.

The "strength in adult employment" was maintained in August, the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics said in releasing summary job figures for the month.

The unemployment rate has averaged 5.1 percent since May, the lowest four-month period since early 1960.

The jobless rate for all adult men in August was 3.7 percent and for married men 2.6 percent, unchanged from the May levels—the lowest in these categories since 1957. The unemployment rate for women, at 5.1 percent, was below that of a year ago. The rate for teen-agers moved from 13 to 15 percent in August, returning to the June level.

Total employment dropped 300,000 to 72.1 million last month, reflecting mainly seasonal cutbacks in agriculture, where employment fell 400,000 from the July level. Non-farm employment at 66.7 million was basically unchanged over the month.

In July the jobless rate reached 4.9 percent, a four and one-half year low. The Labor Dept. warned at the time that the rate might "snap back" after dropping from 5.3 percent in June. Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz had termed the July movement "encouraging" but noted that even then 3,813,000 people were out of work, "an awful lot of people to be left out of the record high prosperity."

Since August 1963 total employment has expanded a little more than 1.5 million compared to a January-to-August 1964 increase of 1,350,000 in the labor force. The over-the-year gain in jobs for adults, said the Labor Dept., "exceeded their numbers added to the labor

12,000 Win 3-Year Gains At Armour

Chicago—A new three-year contract has been agreed to by Armour & Co. and the Packinghouse Workers and Meat Cutters. The two unions represent approximately 12,000 employes in 29 plants.

A joint company-union statement estimated average benefits of about 34 cents an hour to employes over the 36-month period, with almost 15 cents going into effect during the first contract year.

The new agreement provides that:

- Wages will be increased six cents an hour during each of the three years.
- Pensions will be increased as

Garment Unions Reach Judy Bond Agreement

An agreement ending a dispute between the Ladies' Garment Workers and the United Garment Workers over bargaining rights at a "runaway" plant in the South was announced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany after a meeting of the federation's Executive Board.

Meany said the agreement was negotiated by a subcommittee composed of AFL-CIO Vice Presidents George M. Harrison, Paul L. Phillips and Paul Hall. It resolves a dispute between the two unions involving Brewton Fashions, Ltd., maker of Judy Bond clothing for women.

Under the agreement, UGW will cancel the charter of its Local 422 in Brewton, Ala., as of Sept. 7; transfer Local 422 members to the ILGWU; and relinquish to the ILGWU its rights in the collective bargaining agreement covering the Brewton workers.

The dispute arose after the ILGWU struck the Judy Bond firm in 1962, charging that Judy Bond, after 28 years of contractual relations with the ILGWU in New York City, "ran away" from the union and its employes during contract negotiations.

The firm adopted a new corporate name in Alabama, the ILGWU charged, resumed operations there and signed a contract with the UGW in spite of the fact that the ILGWU had struck Judy Bond and was conducting a nationwide "don't patronize" campaign.

The ILGWU asked the Executive Council for permission to "raid" the UGW, claiming justification for the raid under the "disputes" section of the AFL-CIO constitution. The council voted to grant permission.

Subcommittee Named

Later the ILGWU brought further charges against the UGW and the Executive Council appointed the subcommittee which negotiated a settlement in meetings with ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky and UGW Pres. Joseph P. McCurdy.

Harrison is chief executive of the Railway Clerks. Phillips heads the Papermakers & Paperworkers. Hall is president of the Seafarers.

The ILGWU's dispute with Judy Bond has been waged since December, 1961, when the employer broke away from the employer's association, and set up a new plant in Alabama, leaving long-term employes jobless. Since then the firm has been ordered by the dress industry arbiter to pay damages of $108,762 to the union and its employes for breach of contract.

of Dec. 1 at the rate of 75 cents per year of service per month. That will bring the new rate to $3.25 per year of service per month. Additional pension improvements include full vesting for employes with 15 years of service at age 40 or more.

- A major medical insurance program will help employes and their families withstand the heavy financial burdens of protracted illness, and substantial improvements are made in health and accident programs.
- Life insurance for employes will be increased and a program for aid to wives and children of workers who die before retirement will be placed in operation.
- A cost-of-living protection clause in the old agreement will be retained and the previous living cost increases of the old pact, amounting to nine cents an hour, will be incorporated in the basic wage rate.

Workers at new meat packing plants in San Angelo and Lubbock, Tex., were designated for special improvements. Employes at the Houston, Tex., meat packing plant and at various Armour processing houses will be covered by the national agreement.

It was agreed that, where the work content of a job is changed for technological or other reasons, but the end product of the job is kept the same, the existing wage rate for the job will be maintained.

Precise language covering all new sections of the contract is being drafted for incorporation into the formal agreement. The new pact is subject to ratification by affected members of the two unions.

Canadian Labor College Graduates 77 Students

Montreal, Que.—The Labor College of Canada graduated 77 students on completion of the second term of its second year of operation.

Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labour Congress impressed on the graduates, who included 19 students from 10 English-speaking countries in Asia, Africa and the Caribbean, the necessity of using their new knowledge for the betterment of humanity. Forty-nine of the graduates attended the English classes and 28 the French.

New Peak at 108.3:

Price Index Rises Seasonally, Food Costs Lead July Increase

The Consumer Price Index, pushed by higher food costs, rose three-tenths of 1 percent in July to a new peak of 108.3. This brought the price of a market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period to $10.83.

Although the June to July rise was the largest monthly increase in a year, it was in line with the seasonal pattern of the past decade. Last year, the index jumped five-tenths of 1 percent in July. Over the 12-month period, the cost-of-living has risen a total of 1.1 percent.

In the month-to-month change, the biggest factor was a 2.4 percent increase in meat prices, although this was one of the few items in the market basket which cost less than a year ago. Over the past 12 months, above-average price rises were recorded for transportation, medical care and recreation.

In a companion report, the Labor Dept. said that both the take-home pay and buying power of factory production workers dropped slightly from the record highs of June.

Take-home pay—after deductions for social security and federal income taxes—averaged $92.18 for a factory worker with three dependents, 42 cents a week less than in June. For the worker with no dependents, the average take home pay dropped 40 cents to $84.80.

Workweek Reduced

A slight seasonal reduction in the workweek pushed take-home pay down, the report indicated.

Purchasing power of weekly take-home pay, based on the dollar's buying power during the 1957-59 period, dropped 62 cents for the factory worker with three dependents from June to July. The decline was 65 cents for the worker without dependents.

The drop in buying power reflected both the decline in take-home pay and the increase in living costs.

Over the past year, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said, take-home pay has risen about 6 percent and buying power is up nearly 5 percent. The increases reflect a combination of higher hourly earnings, a slightly longer workweek and the reduction in federal income taxes.

The Labor Dept. dropped publication of its "old" price index, which used a slightly different market basket to measure price changes. Because some cost-of-living escalator contracts are still geared to the old index, the department was unable this month to report accurately the number of workers who will receive pay adjustments.

In the detailed breakdown of price changes, the July index showed a 1.7 percent rise in fruit and vegetable prices which are 3 percent above the July 1963 level.

There was no measurable change in housing costs, with slight declines in fuel and furnishings expenses balancing out increased costs of home ownership.

Apparel prices declined two-tenths of 1 percent, largely because of seasonal markdowns on summer wear.

While medical care expenses advanced only two-tenths of 1 percent in July, this category stood 1.9 percent above its year-ago level.

NLRB Rules Out Fine Over Suit

A union cannot impose fines on members because they have filed unfair labor practice charges against the union before exhausting all internal union rights, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Cease-and-desist orders were issued by the board against Operating Engineers Local 138, Long Island, N. Y., in a case brought by Charles S. Skura and Local 925 of the same union at Tampa, Fla., on a charge by Wallace J. Martin.

In both cases the AFL-CIO filed "friend of the court" briefs and argued orally in support of the union's position.

Meany Endorses Union Label Week

Purchase of union goods and services identified by the union label, shop card, store card or service button, is an assurance "that what we buy was turned out under fair wages and working conditions" and "is up to union standards of quality," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared in giving his formal endorsement to Union Label Week, Sept. 7-13.

AFL-CIO Sec. Treas. William F. Schnitzler also emphasized the guarantee of quality inherent in the union label and added that for union members, "shopping for the union label is a common-sense duty, an elementary exercise in union solidarity."

Court Upsets Wirtz On L-G Report Order

A North Carolina federal District Court judge has ruled that Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz was in error when he ordered an attorney, who made three speeches to employe groups in 1960 and 1961, to file annual reports under the Landrum-Griffin Act listing all receipts from his labor law practice for the years involved.

U.S. District Judge Eugene A. Gordon ruled in Greensboro, N. C., that Congress did not intend to require full disclosure in such cases. He issued a judgment in favor of R. D. Douglas, Jr., who had filed 30-day reports on Wirtz's demand but refused to file the annual reports called for in the law.

Wirtz contended that a "proper interpretation" of two sections of the Labor-Management Reporting & Disclosure Act requires that, when a person engages in labor consulting work, a full annual disclosure of receipts and disbursements is required with regard to all labor law practice of such a consultant.

The court wrote that "it is not reasonable to believe that the mere reporting of fees and expenditures from other clients, where there were no reportable activities performed for such clients, would serve any real purpose."

These were the facts detailed in the court's opinion:

Douglas did not initially file reports within 30 days after making speeches to three employe groups. When Wirtz notified him to do so, the lawyer filed reports listing his arrangement with his client and giving only his receipts and disbursements connected with the three speeches.

Wirtz then demanded annual reports covering all of Douglas's labor law practice for the years involved and Douglas refused. Each side filed suit for a judgment.

Mayor of Akron Hails Work of Auxiliaries

The ladies who make up the AFL-CIO Auxiliaries in Akron, O., have done such an outstanding job that Mayor Edward Erickson has written Pres. George Meany to tell him about it.

Getting down to first things first, Erickson wrote that the Auxiliaries "were most active in my initial campaign for mayor in 1961 and, I am certain, made an important contribution to the narrow margin of my victory."

"Since that time," he continued, "they have made an equally important contribution to a local income tax campaign and to tax issues for the support of other local governmental institutions.

"All in all, we in Akron can be extremely grateful for the contribution that our city has received from this fine organization."

Sparking the activity in Akron is Mrs. Beatrice Warwood, president of the National Auxiliaries and member of a Rubber Workers local auxiliary. The city has about 15 auxiliary units associated with locals principally of the URW, Carpenters, Steelworkers and Letter Carriers.

The local Council of Auxiliaries has worked actively in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Council's COPE activities, with major emphasis on registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns. It also sponsored a Conference on Democracy that set up a continuing committee to work in the area of civil rights and sent out a large quantity of civil rights literature.

Mrs. Warwood is a member of the Akron Fair Housing Commission and serves on its legislative subcommittee. Other members serve on citizens' committees in several fields.

force so that their unemployment levels were reduced."

Last month long-term unemployment of 15 weeks or longer was down slightly at 800,000 but there was no significant improvement among those unemployed six months or longer.

While the number of jobless in August 1964 was 200,000 below the August 1963 figure, all the improvement was among persons seeking full-time jobs. The number looking for part-time jobs was practically unchanged at 600,000.

In Supreme Court Brief:

Justice Dept. Backs Musicians on Voting

The Justice Dept. has joined with the AFL-CIO and the Musicians in asking the Supreme Court to reject an interpretation of the Landrum-Griffin Act which would prevent convention delegates from casting the full vote of the local members they represent.

U.S. Solicitor Gen. Archibald Cox said the rollcall method of voting used by the Musicians and many other unions is "markedly more democratic" than that prescribed in lower court decisions invalidating a dues increase voted by the 1963 Musicians convention.

The challenged decisions held that the Landrum-Griffin requirement that dues increases be approved by "majority vote of the delegates" meant that each delegate is entitled to only one vote, whether he represents a local of 50 or 10,000 members. The appellate court split 2-1 on the issue, Judge Thurgood Marshall dissenting.

In its "friend of the court brief," the Justice Dept. said the lower court's rigid interpretation runs directly counter to the declared legislative intent of the law, to further union democracy.

Cox pointed out that "the statute says only by whom the votes must be cast (delegates to a convention) and the proposition of the votes needed for passage (a majority of the votes cast by the delegates voting); it says nothing of the number of votes each delegate may be allowed to cast."

The solicitor general dismissed as "fanciful" the argument that a union might adopt some "arbitrary" system of weighted voting not based on membership.

"The provisions of union constitutions governing delegate voting strength are open covenants openly arrived at," Cox told the Supreme Court. "The jealousy with which each local guards its representation makes it extremely unlikely that votes would ever be weighted on any basis other than membership."

In fact, he said, "there has been no history of abuse in the weighting of delegate votes and thus no reason for Congress to have limited union autonomy in that respect or to anticipate that the power will be abused."

An earlier friend of the court brief submitted by the AFL-CIO also asked the Supreme Court to give a "common sense" reading to the Landrum-Griffin Act language.

If the lower court decision were permitted to stand, the AFL-CIO said, it would "wreak havoc upon established union procedures without promoting any known congressional purpose."

The federation pointed out that the alternative to a system of weighted voting for many unions would be an impractically large convention. If the Musicians wanted to provide fair representation to all locals through an increase in the number of delegates, a convention of 14,000 delegates would have to be held.

Likewise, under the union's constitutional limitation on the number of delegates a local may send to a convention, delegates representing only 27 percent of the membership could control a convention in the absence of a membership-weighted voting system, the AFL-CIO emphasized.

The Musicians re-enacted the contested $6-a-year dues increase at the union's 1964 convention—by overwhelming voice vote majority. The union, however, is pressing its appeal to the Supreme Court because of the principle involved and the potential impact of lower-court decisions on other unions.

Rail Shop Workers Free to Strike Sept. 6

Chicago—Members of six railroad shopcraft unions will be free to strike at midnight Sept. 6, Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes Dept. warned here.

The unions, representing 150,000 workers who seek protection against layoffs and job eliminations, still hope for a negotiated settlement but the rails drastically changed a set of proposals made Aug. 7 by a Presidential emergency board to settle the dispute over job slaughter due to automation.

The language of the board's recommendations, said Fox, was "concise, just and fair," and the unions proposed contract language embodying those recommendations. But management proposals were a "complete distortion" of the board's language, he said.

The board recommended that the parties agree on a 90-day advance notice of contemplated job eliminations, whereas management changed this to 15 days, he declared.

Negotiations were stymied when the unions offered, and management refused, to negotiate on the basis of the board's language and not the railroads' counter-proposals.

Member Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., came here for the National Mediation Board but Fox said mediation had been "officially terminated" earlier under the Railway Labor Act and that the unions are free to set a strike date "if we so desire" 30 days after the emergency board made its report.

The six unions are the Machinists, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers, Railway Carmen, and the Firemen & Oilers. They also are involved in disputes with rail management over wages and work rules, as are other non-operating unions, and three other emergency boards are hearing testimony here in the disputes.

Sherman Heads Labor Law Unit

Louis Sherman of Washington, general counsel of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, was named chairman of the Labor Relations Law Section of the American Bar Association at its recent convention in New York.

Sherman was a member of the panel that advised the Senate Labor Committee on revisions of the Taft-Hartley Act in 1959 and has been an adjunct professor at Georgetown Law School. Marion B. Plant of San Francisco was named vice chairman of the section and Prof. Frank J. Dugan of Georgetown Law School was elected secretary.

Auto Industry Negotiations Stepped Up

Detroit—Negotiations on new and improved contracts for 550,000 members of the Auto Workers moved into high gear as UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther took personal charge of union efforts to reach a settlement by Sept. 9.

Reuther stepped into bargaining sessions at Chrysler Corp., General Motors and Ford shortly after the UAW executive board voted to reject almost identical Big 3 offers made Aug. 17, and to authorize a strike against Chrysler unless a more acceptable offer is made.

UAW contracts with the three auto firms had an Aug. 31 expiration date but the union asked for extensions to Sept. 9. Chrysler agreed to extend the contract term to 10 a. m. on that date, with midnight the deadline at the other firms. The union said it may ask further extensions on a day-to-day basis at Ford and General Motors.

At Chrysler, the union agreed to drop 12 of its proposals, mainly on non-economic matters, to get the talks "off dead center." Reuther went on the air here to warn that unless the Chrysler offer is improved before the new contract deadline, a strike cannot be avoided.

Workers in Big 3 plants have voted by overwhelming margins to authorize a walkout. Forty Chrysler locals representing 74,173 UAW members voted for a strike by a margin of 94.3 percent.

Reuther said the union does not want a strike and will do everything possible to avoid one but that UAW members are determined to share in the vast profits of the industry, the largest in its history.

Guild Pact Guarantees Jobs for Three Years

Vancouver, B. C.—All permanent adult staff members employed by Pacific Press, publishers of the Vancouver Province, are guaranteed jobs for the life of a new three-year contract signed with the Vancouver Newspaper Guild.

The agreement provides that there will be no layoffs, for economy reasons, as a result of new automated processes or in case of sale or discontinuance of the paper. The contract also raised the wages of 575 Guild members by 10.41 percent over three years.

NLRB Awards Backpay After Sale of Factory

An employer who sold his Newark, N.J., plant but went through the motions of negotiating a renewal contract without notifying the plant union of the sale has been directed by the National Labor Relations Board to give up to 7 months' backpay to the 80 workers he laid off.

The board overruled a trial examiner in holding, 5-0, that the Royal Plating & Polishing Co., Inc., should be subject to the backpay order for unlawful refusal to bargain. The firm had failed to inform Metal Polishers Local 44 about its decision to sell its plant in an urban renewal area to the Newark Housing Authority, waiting more than a month after the sale had been consummated.

NLRB Trial Examiner Joseph I. Nachman had ruled that company Pres. Joseph Barile's failure to inform the union during negotiations of his intention to close the plant had reduced the bargaining, and the agreement which was reached, to "no more than an exercise in frivolity."

Nachman held, however, that a backpay order would be "punitive." He recommended that the firm rehire the workers if it opens again.

The NLRB ruled that the workers were entitled to backpay, holding that if Barile had consulted with the union, plans might have been worked out for severance pay.

Noting that the firm had an agreement with the Housing Authority to continue using the plant on a month-to-month basis but ceased operations after the workers went on a half-day strike in May 1963, four members ordered payment of backpay from the time each worker lost his job to the date he secured equivalent employment with another employer up to Dec. 4, 1963.

Howard Jenkins, Jr., the newest NLRB member, said he would cut off backpay as of Sept. 1, 1963, when all company operations ceased. Member Boyd Leedom agreed with the majority that the employer broke the law when he failed to bargain on the effects of closing down operations but rejected the finding that he should have bargained over the sale decision itself.

Meany Pledges President Aid in Wage-Hour Drive

A pledge to help the Administration extend and strengthen further the wage-hour law was sent to Pres. Johnson by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on the eve of the effective date of a group of improvements rising from the law enacted in 1961.

"The minimum wage of nearly 1 million workers, previously not covered, will be raised to $1.15 an hour and their workweek cut to 42 hours," he said in a telegram. "This is symbolic of the many accomplishments of the Administration of Pres. Kennedy and Pres. Johnson. On behalf of the AFL-CIO, I want to extend our thanks."

Meany hailed Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), his running mate, for "running on a platform that is not satisfied with the minimum wage law" even with the 1961 improvements, which has brought gains each Labor Day across a four-year period.

"You—and we—want a better law," he declared. "Of course a comprehensive minimum wage law is a sound vehicle for attacking poverty. We in the AFL-CIO are determined to assist you in extending the coverage of this law to all American citizens engaged in interstate commerce and to making the federal minimum wage match the realities of life.

"With our thanks, therefore, goes our pledge to fight with you for a decent standard of life for Americans, in all walks of life, everywhere in our country."

AFL-CIO Endorses Johnson-Humphrey

GENERAL BOARD of the AFL-CIO hears Pres. George Meany analyze the party platforms in relation to AFL-CIO proposals to both conventions before acting to endorse the Democratic slate of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson for President and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) for Vice President.

'Most Wholehearted Support' Urged on 13.5 Million Members

judgment of the General Board of the AFL-CIO that the election of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey is a matter of the most vital concern to the labor movement, to all the people of the United States and to the cause of peace and freedom throughout the world.

"We endorse their candidacy.

"We urge every union member to give these candidates their most wholehearted support."

In 'Best Interests'

The General Board acted on the recommendation of the Executive Council, which said "it is in the best interests of the 13.5 million members of the AFL-CIO to take a forthright stand in the coming election" and specifically to endorse Johnson and Humphrey.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, at a press conference, after the endorsement action, said there was absolutely no disagreement, that the board "enthusiastically endorsed" the Democratic candidates. On the basis of the platform analysis and the record, Meany said he was confident that union members would follow the recommendations of the board.

Noting that Sen. Barry M. Goldwater, the GOP presidential candidate, voted "wrong" on 53 broadly-ranging issues selected by the AFL-CIO, Meany said he has not once voted with the labor position, "not even by mistake."

The federation president told reporters that the AFL-CIO will spend $1 million on registration drives this year compared to $650,000 four years ago, with the drives concentrated in marginal congressional districts.

On the endorsement, Meany said he had presented the President with a copy of the board statement, the Executive Council resolution and the comparison of the party platforms—the documented basis on which the endorsement was made.

In its analysis of the candidates for the presidency, the board cited Goldwater's voting record and asserted that "a Goldwater victory would mean a radical change of direction in national policy."

"More ominous," said the board, "is the senator's outlook on world affairs, for its results would be measured in terms of human survival." Goldwater's approach to world problems "would heighten the risk of an atomic holocaust," it said. On domestic matters, the courses he advocates "are an invitation to depression and economic disaster."

As to Goldwater the man, the board commented that he is "basically an impulsive man" not versed in "historical background," seemingly "unaware of human needs and wholly unresponsive to the subtleties of international relations upon which the survival of mankind depend."

The board cited Johnson as having been a loyal and diligent Vice President serving with Pres. Kennedy and praised his "unsurpassed vigor" in fulfilling the Kennedy program after the assassination thrust on him the duties of President. It added:

"The legislative achievements of Pres. Johnson's nearly 10 months in office are the greatest since the first Roosevelt Administration. The unflagging concern of Lyndon Johnson for the poor and the deprived has in all truth aroused the conscience of all Americans."

On the vice presidential candidate the board said:

"The Republican candidate, William E. Miller, has served without distinction in the House of Representatives since 1951" and his voting record "is one of consistent opposition to social progress on virtually every front." At best, Miller, "has been a wheelhorse of the least enlightened wing of the Republican Party," and there is nothing in his record "to suggest that he is equipped" to be Vice President, "much less to assume the presidency itself."

"The Democratic candidate, Hubert Humphrey, has been a vigorous and articulate spokesman for human rights and human progress," and as majority whip in the Senate played "a major role in the legislative victories of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations."

Humphrey is "best qualified" to assume the duties of the presidency if necessary, the board added, recalling "that awful day last Nov. 22."

On the platform the board made these points:

Labor Legislation—"The Republican platform promises nothing to American labor except an attempt to hobble unions with an even more restrictive legislation and to stack the cards against unions in application of existing laws."

The Domestic Economy—"The Republican proposals would do absolutely nothing to solve the problem of unemployment or to improve the conditions of work and life of the American people."

Civil Rights and Equal Opportunity—"The choice is obvious" for the Democratic platform, which is "unequivocal" on the civil rights issue and specifically denounces extremism and advocates of extremism, positions rejected by the GOP convention.

Foreign Policy and National Defense—"We feel most strongly that the hand on the atomic trigger must only be that of the President of the United States. A foreign policy and national defense geared to any other concept must be flatly rejected by the American people."

No Accident

Pres. Johnson, in extending his thanks and appreciation for the endorsement, told the board members that the nation's current prosperity is "not an accident . . . It is the result of tested policies. It is the result of the hard work and cooperation of business and labor." He added:

"We are on the edge of an abundance which can tower over all the gains of the past. I predict, if we continue on our course, the growth of the next four years will be the greatest in all our history."

Neither pressure nor protest, danger or difficulty, the President said, "will move us one inch from the historic principles which have brought us to today's heights."

"Nor will we neglect the sick, the aged—those who have not shared in our abundance," he added. "Medical care for the old, increased minimum wages, the war on poverty are part of a program with a single goal: to give every American a place of dignity in our national life."

Centennial Convention Opened by Plasterers

Philadelphia—In a telephoned message to the 100th anniversary convention of the Plasterers, Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson pledged continued support of labor's collective bargaining rights.

He assailed by inference Sen. Barry Goldwater's efforts in behalf of "right-to-work" legislation.

"The right of the working man to be recognized and to bargain collectively must not and will not be compromised as long as I sit in the White House," Johnson told the 800 delegates in his telephoned message.

"Our challenge is not to turn back or look back, but to go ahead to the work that will make this a better and finer land for all of us. This is no time to tinker and tamper with undoing the gains we have made together."

A few minutes later the delegates cheered the urging of B. A. Gritta, president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., "to go back into your home communities and go to work to ensure the re-election of Pres. Johnson."

Devoting his address to attacks on Goldwater's voting record, Gritta branded it "wrong 100 percent of the time—against collective bargaining, against minimum wages, against unemployment compensation, against farm labor, against the war on poverty."

The convention was officially opened in a unique ceremony at Independence Hall telecast over a closed circuit to the convention delegates at a downtown hotel.

Standing at the side of the famed Liberty Bell, City Council Pres. Paul D'Ortona welcomed the association's 40th convention and presented Pres. Edward J. Leonard with a resolution citing the association as "a true brotherhood embracing all colors, all races, all creeds."

Plans for a national pension plan were disclosed in an address by Pres. Robert Maidt of the Contracting, Lathing & Plasterers Intl. Association. A joint committee of union and management representatives has been named to formulate details.

Continuing sessions of the convention were scheduled to consider proposals for a national apprenticeship system and provisions for mobility of employment without loss of hospitalization, seniority and other benefits.

Board Approves Program To Back Endorsement

The AFL-CIO General Board approved a four-point program designed to "insure the fullest possible effectiveness" of the AFL-CIO endorsement of Democratic Candidates Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey.

The program was presented to the board by Pres. George Meany in his capacity as chairman of the Committee on Political Education and by Alexander E. Barkan, director of COPE. The program:

"1—That every national and international union itself and through its local unions undertake a campaign to insure that all members and their families are registered to vote; and, in addition, that each national and international union participate fully in the AFL-CIO 1964 Registration Drive.

"2—That the analysis of the party platforms, party performance and candidates' voting records submitted to this meeting of the General Board be given the widest possible circulation among union members and the American people as a whole.

"3—That a more intensive effort than ever before be made to collect $1 voluntary contributions from union members for the support of COPE-endorsed candidates for Congress and state office.

"4—That all union members be urged to make additional voluntary contributions to promote the election of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket."

Hutcheson Hails Record, Backs Johnson

Maurice A. Hutcheson, president of the Carpenters and a life-long Republican, has announced his endorsement of Pres. Johnson in the 1964 election, terming the President's record "magnificent."

In a letter to the White House, Hutcheson said, "for the first time in my life I am endorsing a Democratic candidate for President . . . and I have never made an endorsement with more enthusiasm or greater conviction."

"Your record as chief executive," he wrote, "can only be described as magnificent."

The Carpenters' president, who is also a vice president of the AFL-CIO, cited Johnson's anti-poverty program, Administration programs for aiding the unemployed, the elderly and the under-educated, and his determination to blunt Communist aggression in Southeast Asia.

He cited the civil rights bill, the mass transit bill and "all the other pieces of progressive legislation" as testimony to the President's capacity for translating deeds into words.

"For all these reasons," said Hutcheson, "I deem it a high privilege not only to endorse you . . . but also to assure you of all the support I can muster."

Fire Fighters to Seek Unorganized 10 Percent

San Diego, Calif.—Continued organizing activity to preserve the momentum of recent membership gains was placed high on the agenda of the Fire Fighters as the union ended its 27th convention here.

With membership up to a total of 115,000, highest in the union's history, Pres. William D. Buck pledged continued activity to enroll remaining unorganized fire fighters throughout the United States and Canada. Union sources estimated only 10 percent of eligibles have not yet joined the organization.

The convention hailed a decision of the Senate Finance Committee to keep fire fighters out of the social security system. The members generally receive more liberal pension and disability payments through local retirement plans.

The union vowed to maintain its strong position in support of parity for pay rates of policemen and fire fighters. There has been concern in recent months over a tendency of some cities to raise policemen's pay higher than the fire fighters.

Buck, a former fire department captain in St. Louis, won re-election by a 272-217 majority over Sec-Treas. John C. Kabachus of Boston. Albert Albertoni, Oakland, Calif., was elected secretary-treasurer to fill the vacancy by a vote of 246-243 over Jack Waller, Spokane, Wash.

Four new vice presidents were elected: Harry Williams of Portland, Ore.; Harland Lippolt of Madison, Wis.; Cornelius Shea of Chicago; Walter Lambert of Spokane, Wash. Elected a trustee was Lloyd Bell of Hamilton, Ont., who defeated incumbent Walter Child of Scarborough, Ont. The newly elected officers will take over their posts on Sept. 21.

Why Labor Backs Johnson-Humphrey

The following is excerpted from the statement adopted by the AFL-CIO General Board on Sept. 1, 1964, in Washington.

The Platforms

LABOR LEGISLATION

The Republican platform is virtually silent on labor-management relations. Its only substantive references are: (1) a thinly veiled threat to put unions under the anti-trust laws, as if people could be equated with commodities, and (2) an attack upon the National Labor Relations Board.

The Democratic platform, in sharp contrast, promises substantive improvement in labor-management legislation. It calls for repeal of Sec. 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act which permits the so-called "right-to-work" laws which outlaw union security agreements. In addition, the Democratic platform pledges removal of inequities in federal laws which hamper organization of workers and unfairly penalize unions for legitimate strikes and legitimate picketing.

AFL-CIO Analysis: Clearly the Republican platform promises nothing to the American labor movement except an attempt to hobble unions with even more restrictive legislation and to stack the cards against unions in the application of existing laws. On the other hand, the Democratic platform promises to improve the existing framework of federal legislation and to provide long-needed relief to unions in the legitimate conduct of their affairs.

THE DOMESTIC ECONOMY

The Republican platform demonstrates absolutely no concern for the No. 1 domestic economic problem of our time—unemployment. The AFL-CIO suggested a long list of specific proposals to meet this problem. Our suggestions were ignored—in fact, in some instances, the Republican platform specifically calls for the exact opposite. For example, the Republican platform opposes higher premium pay for overtime and endorses more teen-age employment at less than the federal minimum wage. We can only view this as an invitation to return to the days of the exploitation of child labor.

The list of proposals which would improve the economy, improve our social security system, improve our educational system and, in general, provide an economic road-map for Twentieth Century America—which we suggested to both parties—received absolutely no support in the Republican platform.

The Democratic platform, in sharp contrast, clearly recognizes the importance of solving the problem of unemployment and achieving full employment in America as a matter of the highest priority. The Democratic platform commits its candidate to a program of steady economic advancement; to the goal of putting all Americans, who want and can fill a job, back to work; and to meet the problem of automation by insuring that no worker be unfairly penalized by being denied a job because of this new technology.

The platform proposes a higher minimum wage, extension of coverage to all workers in interstate commerce, higher premium pay for overtime and continued study of the length of the work period.

In addition, this platform takes sound and progressive positions on housing, hospital insurance for the aged, social security improvements, improved unemployment compensation standards and many other necessary domestic economic policies.

AFL-CIO Analysis: In this area, the issue is most sharply drawn. The Republican proposals would do absolutely nothing to solve the problem of unemployment or to improve the conditions of work and life of the American people. The Democratic platform faces squarely up to the problem of unemployment and recognizes the responsibility and duty of the federal government to provide for the general welfare.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND EQUAL OPPORTUNITY

The Republican platform promises full implementation and faithful execution of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. However, an effort to strengthen this section of the platform by writing in a commitment that the Civil Rights Act of 1964 would be "enforced" was rejected by the Republican convention despite the fact that Republicans in both Houses, with the conspicuous exception of the Republican candidate for President, voted for the bill by a 4-to-1 margin.

In addition, the Republican platform ignores the clear fact that to achieve equal opportunity in America there must be full opportunity—a fact the AFL-CIO has repeatedly called to the attention of the American people.

The Republican convention overwhelmingly rejected proposals from its moderate leaders that the platform clearly spell out opposition to extremists of both the far right and the far left.

The Democratic platform is unequivocal on the civil rights issue. It pledges enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and deplores lawlessness of any sort whether for or against the achievement of full civil rights.

It fully recognizes the necessity of providing full opportunity so that equal opportunity will be more than a phrase in our political vocabulary.

In addition, the Democratic Party has specifically rejected extremism and the advocates of extremism—the Communist Party, the Ku Klux Klan and the John Birch Society.

AFL-CIO Analysis: The AFL-CIO was a long and strong advocate of the civil rights legislation which has just been passed. We believe in its fair and vigorous enforcement. As we noted earlier, we want the kind of society in which full and equal opportunity for all Americans will be a matter of accomplished fact—and we mean to achieve exactly that.

In addition, the AFL-CIO has no use for the extremists or for their tactics. We feel that in this case, as in the case of the domestic economic issues discussed earlier, the choice is obvious.

FOREIGN POLICY AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

The platforms of both parties are committed to the continuation of America's role as the leader of the free world and to continued and forthright opposition to communism. With this, the AFL-CIO is in hearty accord.

The differences between the parties in this area are not in their goals but in the methods of achieving these goals.

The Democratic platform commits the party to a continuation of the strong yet peacefully motivated policies of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations. These policies have demonstrated to the entire world that we mean to protect the forces of freedom everywhere without impulsive action or aggressive intent.

The Republican platform, on the other hand, has already alarmed our allies without frightening our enemies. It places its major reliance on America's atomic superiority without recognizing, as the AFL-CIO repeatedly pointed out, that we must have a flexible military capability for brush-fire wars that can not be fought with an atomic bomb.

The Democratic Administration in the last four years has built this kind of military flexibility, prepared to respond to any challenge from any quarter. It has thus won the confidence of our allies and the understanding, in the ranks of our enemies, that we mean business.

In the trying times in which we live, atomic superiority is a necessity. But this awesome weapon can only be entrusted to the President of the United States.

The Democratic platform specifically reaffirms this fact; the Republican platform does not—and its candidate would spread this responsibility among military field commanders.

AFL-CIO Analysis: We feel most strongly that the hand on the atomic trigger must only be that of the President of the United States. A foreign policy and a national defense policy geared to any other concept must be flatly rejected by the American people.

The Candidates for President

The Republican candidate, Barry M. Goldwater, has been a member of the U.S. Senate for 12 years. During that time he has cast 53 votes on legislation considered by the AFL-CIO to be of primary importance to the nation. In every case—whether the issue involved world affairs, such as the atomic test-ban treaty, or social justice such as the civil rights bill, or economic progress, such as the wage-hour law—he voted wrong.

A Goldwater victory would mean a radical change of direction in national policy. Even more ominous is the senator's outlook on world affairs, for its results would be measured in terms of human survival. He would jettison the consistent and primarily bi-partisan policies of the last generation, and in their stead would embark upon a new and independent course, which in our view is fraught with the gravest risks.

There is no argument here as to who is the more resolutely opposed to communism. The issue is not purpose but methods. We believe Sen. Goldwater's approach, if applied, would heighten the risk of an atomic holocaust.

In the same way, Sen. Goldwater has blithely—and thoughtlessly—advocated, at one time or another, putting social security on a voluntary basis which would, of course, kill it; selling TVA to private utilities, and letting the poor fend for themselves because, in his view, their own shortcomings are the reason for their poverty. The course he advocates, the prescription he offers, are an invitation to depression and economic disaster.

Above all, it is our considered judgment that Sen. Goldwater is basically an impulsive man, not given to deep thought or careful consideration, unversed in the historical background against which every national leader must function, seemingly unaware of basic human needs and wholly unresponsive to the subtleties of international relations upon which the survival of mankind depend.

The Democratic candidate, Lyndon B. Johnson, has been President of the U.S. for nearly 10 months, was Vice President for the preceding three years, was a senator for two six-year terms—serving for six years as majority leader—and for 11 years sat in the House of Representatives. Since 1937, therefore, he has been recorded on virtually every piece of legislation brought before the Congress, and has had an active role in much of it.

Four years ago, when Lyndon Johnson was the nominee for Vice President, we frankly acknowledged that we had not agreed with him in all particulars over the years. As a matter of record, during the years Pres. Johnson and Sen. Goldwater both served in the Senate (1953-1960), Pres. Johnson voted right 28 times and wrong 7 times, while Sen. Goldwater was wrong on every vote he cast.

But, in 1960, we added: "On balance he (Johnson) has a liberal record; and what is more important, it has become more liberal with the years."

These were prophetic words.

As Vice President, he loyally, diligently and effectively served Pres. John F. Kennedy. In both foreign and domestic affairs, he was a strong right hand to the President.

When tragedy thrust upon him the duties of President, he undertook with unsurpassed vigor the task of fulfilling the program launched by John Kennedy. The legislative achievements of Pres. Johnson's nearly 10 months in office are the greatest since the first Roosevelt Administration. The unflagging concern of Lyndon Johnson for the poor and the deprived has in all truth aroused the conscience of all Americans.

The Candidates for Vice Presidents

The Republican candidate, William E. Miller, has served without distinction in the House of Representatives since 1951, and has also been national chairman of the Republican Party. His voting record, while not quite as absolute as that of his running-mate, is one of consistent opposition to social progress on virtually every front.

To put it in the kindliest way, Congressman Miller has been a wheelhorse of the least enlightened wing of the Republican Party. There is nothing in his record to suggest that he is equipped to be the nation's No. 2 officer—much less to assume the Presidency itself.

The Democratic candidate, Hubert H. Humphrey, has been a U.S. senator since 1949, and from his entry on the national scene has been a vigorous and articulate spokesman for human rights and human progress.

Sen. Humphrey has, through skill and hard work, won the respect of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and of citizens in all parts of the country. As majority whip, he played a major role in the legislative victories of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations.

America today needs to choose a Vice President who could, if called upon, ably assume the duties of the Presidency as did Pres. Johnson on that awful day last Nov. 22.

There is no doubt, as Pres. Johnson himself pointed out, that Hubert Humphrey is best qualified to meet that test.

This, then, is the picture as we see it.

The choice is obvious, both as to the platforms and the candidates.

Therefore, it is the considered judgment of the General Board of the AFL-CIO that the election of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey is a matter of the most vital concern to the labor movement, to all the people of the U.S. and to the cause of peace and freedom throughout the world.

We endorse their candidacy.

We urge every union member to give these candidates their most wholehearted support.

A NATIONWIDE DRIVE in support of the Civil Rights Act was launched by the AFL-CIO at a national conference in Washington with plans designed to achieve voluntary compliance with the law's provisions. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, addressing the conference, said, "We can't let hate groups stand in our way," and that the law "must be implemented" on the local level.

AFL-CIO CONFERENCE on civil rights also heard from LeRoy Collins, director of the Community Relations Service established under the new law, (seated left) and Roy Wilkins (speaking), executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Both stressed the need for widespread dissemination of information on what the law actually says.

Labor Board Split on Employer 'Free Speech'

The National Labor Relations Board split 2-1 on the extent of an employer's 'free speech' right to arouse fear of job loss in pre-election campaign propaganda circulated among its employes.

Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Member Howard Jenkins, Jr., reversed a regional director's recommendation for a second election at the Sturgis, Mich., plant of the Freeman Mfg. Co.

They held that the company letters warning of an "inevitable cutback" in jobs if the workers voted for the Machinists could be evaluated by employes as partisan electioneering and were "within the permissible limits of campaign propaganda."

Member Gerald A. Brown, dissenting, said the board "again is departing" from a "well-founded principle" by legitimizing the employer's conduct because the union also reached the employes with its campaign material.

"The fact that a party has an opportunity to respond is material only in determining whether a misrepresentation warrants setting an election aside," Brown wrote. "Misstatements of fact possibly can be met by the supplying of correct information, but an emotional reaction of fear is not responsive to denials or explanations and cannot be dissipated by factual replies."

Brown also dissented earlier this year in another case involving fear of job loss—Shure Bros, Inc.

The IAM got 86 votes in an NLRB election held at the Freeman plant last Mar. 11, but 89 voted against the union and 3 ballots were challenged. The IAM objected to employer letters and the regional director upheld the objection.

The regional director concluded that a company letter last Mar. 9 was the culmination of a series of letters and handbills instilling "a clear fear in the employes that their future welfare would not truly be served" by voting for the union and that this was a threat which "interfered with the free choice" of the employes.

McCulloch and Jenkins disagreed. Judging the letters and the union's replies, they said the employer's statements "set forth its economic and competitive position in the industry" in a non-coercive manner. They overruled the union's objection and certified the election results.

Data on Careers Offered College Girls

The Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept. has just published "Job Horizons for College Women in the 1960s," intended to give college girls information on the careers open to them and to assist counselors in high schools and colleges.

The publication details the educational preparation required, the aptitudes sought, the employment outlook and the earnings prospects in 32 occupations. It may be obtained at 30 cents a copy from the Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402.

New Jersey Blue Shield Law Killed

A real blow for "freedom of medicine" in New Jersey was struck when the State Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a law giving the State Medical Society virtual veto power over medical insurance plans, according to Dr. Kenneth McCaffree, president of the Group Health Association of America.

The effect of the law was to keep out competition against the society-approved Blue Shield plan.

"The impact will be felt throughout the nation," he declared in commenting on "another major victory in the fight against medical monopoly."

"It is ironic indeed that the American Medical Association and many of its affiliated organizations, while constantly proclaiming their belief in freedom of choice for the patient, continue to support practices and statutes whose only effect is to limit freedom of choice for the patient on the vital matter of how he will finance his medical care needs."

The outlawed statute set up a requirement that any medical insurance plan had to have the support of 51 percent of the physicians in each county in order to qualify for a license to operate in the state. GHAA filed a friend of the court brief in the court case.

McCaffree voiced the hope that the application of Group Health Insurance, Inc., to operate in New Jersey will be given quick approval. GHI is a non-profit medical care insurance plan which does not provide direct service benefits through group practice, and is not a GHAA member. It initiated the court action when denied the right to compete with the Medical-Surgical Plan of New Jersey, the Blue Shield affiliate.

June Layoff Rate Drops to 9-Year Low

The factory layoff rate for June dropped to the lowest level for any month since February 1955—12 per 1,000—while the hiring rate rose from 39 per 1,000 to 49, slightly more than the usual advance over the May figures, the Dept. of Labor reported.

Unusually large declines in layoff rates for the electrical and transportation equipment industries highlighted the month's improvement, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. BLS said the quit rate moved down at the same time from 15 per 1,000 to 14, close to the average maintained for about two years.

Voluntary Compliance the Goal:

Labor Drive Backs Civil Rights Law

each international union make available . . . a competent staff person on whom we can call . . . to help the local central bodies develop a program in their community."

- "We are going to ask that each international union assign a national officer to be responsible for developing a fair employment practice program. . . . This would include preparation of non-discrimination clauses to be negotiated with employers and education for our own people—for our business agents, shop committeemen, local union presidents—to the importance of seeing to it that these clauses are included in our contracts in the future."
- "We are going to ask that each central body set up a committee on human rights or civil rights."
- "We are going to try to help workers who do not belong to unions . . . to prepare complaints when faced with discriminatory practices. This could have a bearing on our organizing efforts . . . if we can show these non-union workers who are victims of discrimination that . . . the trade union movement has an interest in their welfare."
- "We are going to call area conferences, similar to this."

Union Problem, Too

Meany told the delegates that the trade union movement, reflecting a cross-section of the nation, must face up to the problem of prejudice and discrimination within its own ranks.

He noted that labor's early support of equal rights and school desegregation had for a time slowed union organizing in the South.

"That, too, has changed," Meany declared. "The white workers realize that when they were told to vote against unionization because of the AFL-CIO attitude on race . . . that the real reason . . . was to keep their conditions down, to keep their wages down."

Active in the White Citizen Councils, he pointed out, are the people who pressed for so-called "right-to-work" laws and who have tried to lure northern industry with the promise of cheap labor.

Both Collins and Wilkins stressed that "reverse discrimination," giving Negroes or other minority groups preference in employment or seniority, is specifically banned by the Civil Rights Act.

"A quota arrangement based upon race would be as arbitrary and discriminatory against one race as against another," Collins declared.

He called on the labor movement to help white workers understand that "freedom and opportunity for one depend on their enjoyment by all."

Identity of Aims Cited

Wilkins, who also is chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, with which the AFL-CIO is affiliated, cited the "identity of our basic aims." It has brought labor support for civil rights programs, he said, and Negro support for labor's fight against "right-to-work" laws.

He warned that the election campaign "has accentuated distortions" about the civil rights law, and urged union leaders to equip themselves adequately to answer false charges.

"You're going to have to face the distortion that comes with Goldwaterism," Wilkins declared.

Labor has already begun the double task of educating its own members on what the civil rights law does and does not provide and of building "bridges" of understanding with Negro, Spanish-speaking and other minority groups, delegates reported. Progress reports came from union leaders in the South and border regions, as well as the North.

COPE Dir. Al Barkan and Roy Reuther, director of the AFL-CIO's voter registration program, said an alliance of labor and minority groups has been the key factor in a series of recent election victories—in primaries in Missouri and Tennessee as well as in the "right-to-work" referendum election in Oklahoma.

Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, unveiled a new series of pamphlets and leaflets on the Civil Rights Act—and took orders for hundreds of thousands of copies from delegates to the conference.

A leaflet headed "Civil Rights: Facts vs. Fiction," and a 22-page pocket-sized question-and-answer booklet, "Equal Rights for All," are the main mass-distribution items prepared for the AFL-CIO civil rights drive.

Also available are copies of the civil rights statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its meeting last month, a "Films on Civil Rights" catalogue from the federation's Dept. of Education, and an "AFL-CIO Manual on Civil Rights" used at the conference.

9 Brazilians Take Special AIFLD Course

Graduation exercises were held by the American Institute for Free Labor Development at its Washington, D. C., school for a special class of nine trade unionists from Brazil.

The nine finished an intensive six-week course in labor statistics and economic research. Subject matter included collective bargaining, computation of an accurate cost-of-living index and effective use of manpower.

The graduation program included talks by Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who presented diplomas; Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver, and Brazilian Ambassador Juracy Magalhaes.

The AIFLD has stepped up its trade union programs in Brazil, Executive Dir. Serafino Romualdi reported. The institute assigned Dir. William C. Doherty, Jr., of its Social Projects Dept. to travel in Brazil with a special mission to discuss rural and urban labor programs with union leaders, he said.

The AIFLD also has sponsored a "John F. Kennedy Memorial Housing Project" for workers in Sao Paulo, financed by a 20-year loan from the welfare and pension funds of AFL-CIO unions.

C. J. McMillan Dies, Retired IBEW Leader

Louisville, Ky.—C. J. McMillan, a long-time leader in the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, died here at the age of 74.

McMillan, a close associate of IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman, served on the union's executive council from 1953 until his retirement in 1961. He had been an international representative since 1937 and an IBEW member since 1915.

Highlights of Civil Rights Conference

Following are excerpts from the principal addresses to the AFL-CIO civil rights conference in Washington —by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, LeRoy Collins, director of the new Community Relations Service established by the Civil Rights Act, and Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People:

George Meany

EVEN BEFORE the Civil Rights law was enacted, we made some progress and we have made considerable progress since then. There is an indication that people who were opposed to civil rights are now ready to accept it. But there is also an indication that there are certain die-hards who are going to carry on this senseless effort to deny human rights to certain segments of our population.

We can expect that with the passage of time we will have further improvements through enforcement of the law. And we expect the authorities, whose job it is to enforce this law, to do just that.

About 6 or 7 months ago, the AFL-CIO launched a pilot project in a number of cities. We sent representatives of our Civil Rights Dept. into these cities to get our central bodies to initiate and participate in local activities at the grass roots level to bring about an elimination of discrimination.

This project has been successful. We now want to expand this activity to bring about peaceful compliance with the law. There will always be, I suppose, a certain number of people who see some advantage to themselves in creating discord. Hate groups—groups with an ax to grind, a selfish ax to grind. Well, we can't let these people stand in our way. This Civil Rights Law must be implemented and it must be implemented at the local level.

IN THE MEANTIME, we are going to continue our fight for a better life for all Americans. The problem of the high percentage of Negroes unemployed will never be fully solved until there are jobs for all, until we have full employment.

We cannot escape the fact that we still have a problem in our own ranks. In the final analysis, the American trade union movement is made up of citizens from every part of this country, every area, citizens with different backgrounds, different religious faiths.

But don't get me wrong, I am not discouraged about this fact; it is something we have got to meet and face up to. In 1955 and 1956, at the office of the AFL-CIO here in Washington, we got more than 10,000 letters from unions and individuals, mostly in the Southern part of the country, who objected very strongly to our position in support of the historic decision of the United States Supreme Court to desegregation of educational facilities. We answered every one of those letters and in every answer, we set forth the philosophy of the AFL-CIO, the American labor movement, the philosophy of equality, of opportunity and of equal rights for all. We also pointed out in these letters that the people who made up the so-called White Citizens Councils in various areas of the South, were the very same people who were associated in drives to foist "right-to-work" laws on the trade union movement.

And I can tell you that this message that we sent to our people in the South opened up the eyes of a great many. We went through a long period following that historic Supreme Court decision during which our organizing efforts in the South were stymied and thwarted to a great degree. However, as time went on, that too has changed. The white workers realized when they were told that they had to vote against unionization because of the AFL-CIO attitude on race and on school desegregation that this was not the real reason. That the real reason these people wanted to keep them out of unions was to keep their conditions down, to keep their wages down.

The AFL-CIO has been consistent in its support of the very simple theory of equality, the very simple theory that discrimination is wrong by every standard that we can measure. It is not good for the country and it is not good for those who do not suffer from discrimination. Even the white workers' economic situation has worsened because of this discrimination.

AS WE GO into this new period, where we now have a law on the statute books, the AFL-CIO is going to play its part. We are not going to wait for the full implementation of the law. As you know, the FEP section does not go into effect until next year. But we are not going to wait until next year. We are going to try to do what we can at the community level, the state level, the local level, to bring about compliance, to make Fair Employment Practices an actual fact without waiting for enforcement by law.

This will be a much better country when we eliminate discrimination. It will be a much better country socially, spiritually and economically. We have had this experience, we know we are right, and we intend to push forward, in cooperation with all groups who believe as we do.

We are not going to be deterred or turned aside by those who preach a doctrine of fear or hate, a doctrine that indicates that something terrible is going to happen if we give Negroes equal rights and equal opportunities to jobs and promotions and everything else.

All of our experience indicates that this type of progress will contribute to the welfare of all of the people of this nation, not the Negroes alone.

Roy Wilkins

I RECALL THE SUPPORT that organized labor gave to the Civil Rights bill which was finally enacted this year. This support goes back many years. It goes back to your legislative agents here in Washington, the men who gave skilled day-by-day service, and who brought their utmost in diplomacy and skill to bear. The teamwork that union labor helped to create with its knowledge, its skill, its know-how, its drive and its refusal to be defeated served the civil rights struggle very well.

The election campaign has accentuated the distortions that have followed in the discussion and passage and after this bill has been signed. You're familiar with a great many of them. The John Birch Society in its bulletin predicted that this bill would create a police state, that it would require an army to enforce it. Then there were some of the other distortions you're more familiar with as trade unionists, that this bill would take away the seniority of union members, would take away their jobs and give Negroes their jobs and would result in preferential treatment. All of this was talk.

I call your attention to the section of the bill itself. I suggest that one of the helpful ways of carrying on this campaign, as Pres. Meany has said, is to become familiar with the actual bill. You'll find in Section 703, Paragraph J, "Nothing contained in this title shall be interpreted to require any employer or employment agency, labor organization or joint labor management committee, subject to this title, to grant preferential treatment to any individual or to any group because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin."

In other words, preferential treatment is out the window in the Act itself. And so, in going back home you need not be afraid of the distortion that this legislation will take away our rights and give them to members of a minority group. Then there are other distortions—that the Negro is going too fast, the federal government is helping the Negro too much, and if we don't watch out the country will be taken away from us. Well, this is a little ridiculous, I assure you that the statistics will show that the Negro as a group is the lowest man on the totem pole in this country and, as Gov. Collins has so well said, it's largely because of his color.

A taxi driver said to me in New York, "You know, I came to this country from the old country, and I couldn't speak the language, and I know they cheated me on my job, and they cheated me on the change when they made change, because I didn't know the money. I had to learn everything from the ground up." And he said, "But I made my way, and now I'm making a good living as a taxi driver. I'm feeding my kids, and I'm sending my two kids to college and, I want to ask you something, Mister: Why can't the colored people do that?"

I didn't have time for a lecture in sociology to him there, so I said, "Well, you know one thing that helped you out was the fact that you had white skin, and after you learned the language and you learned how not to be cheated, nobody stopped you. You could go as far as you could go with the ability you had because there were no artificial barriers, but, a Negro who learns the language and learns not to be cheated and tries to get ahead gets stopped by his skin."

THE AFL-CIO DRIVE is right in the mainstream of American thought in your idea of working on the local level, of working with other organizations, of educating your own membership because you have it to do —don't worry, I know—I have to educate mine, and I know you have to educate yours. This is not easy to sell. And if you give it tepid endorsement, you're going to have tepid results. You're not going to have the kind of results that make for a vigorous American.

You have one other obstacle. You're going to have the distortion that comes with Goldwaterism.

What does Goldwaterism mean? Well, he says he's not opposed to the ambitions of Negroes, and he's not a racist. He's not prejudiced. He just believes in leaving these matters to the states. That's a little bit like the Roman emperors saying they were not opposed to the Christians. They'll just leave them to the gladiators or to the lions. And Mr. Goldwater saying that he's not prejudiced, he's for the Negroes but he's going to leave them to the likes of say, Governor Wallace in Alabama.

You had in 1935 a Wagner Act, and people told you then that it gave labor a preference; it made labor dominant; it made corporations prostrate and it would ruin the country. That's what they told you in 1935. And there are some among management who have dedicated their entire lives in all the years since 1935 to a repeal of the Wagner Act, and when it couldn't be repealed, they tried to trim it here and trim it there and pull down labor here and pull down labor there, restrict its expansion here. I say to you that it's the same thing you will meet with the Civil Rights Act; the same untruths are there.

It does not give a preference to anyone; it will not destroy this country; and it must not be repealed. It must be expanded. It must become a part of our nation and our heritage and when it becomes a part of it, it will safeguard the right of all segments of the American economy, all the people in this country, white and black, North and South, labor and management, rich and poor because it is of, as Gov. Collins said, the stuff of which America is made.

LeRoy Collins

THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT of 1964 is now operational, and for those who labored long and effectively to obtain its enactment there is ample cause to be proud. The new law is being respected and obeyed generally over the land, although strong resistance continues by many people in many places. Another milestone in law reform for the freedom of man has been reached and passed, and I salute all of organized labor for its most important part in the struggle.

Your efforts on the whole civil rights front have been symbolized as well as strengthened by the work of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, so ably headed by Don Slaiman.

There are more than 9 million American Negroes living in the South. There are also more than 9 million American Negroes living in the regions of the nation outside the South.

For generations they have been locked out of full participation in the benefits of our American culture and locked into a society where they and their children have suffered the blight of denial of what other Americans have had: the full opportunity for progress based upon individual merit. No other people whose ancestors came to our shores from foreign lands have been so deprived.

But not all our American problems, of course, are centered in disadvantages flowing from racial differences. There are in total numbers, for example, more illiterate white people in this country than illiterate Negroes, more unskilled whites than unskilled Negroes, more white people suffering the ravages of poverty than Negroes.

THE NEGRO has special problems because he is disadvantaged, and he often is disadvantaged because he is a Negro. As a nation we must correct this, for it is wrong.

But this does not mean that any American has reason to feel that the security of his own job is jeopardized because a person of a different racial or ethnic background needs a job. In fact, to take a job from a white person just to make a job for a Negro would be a wrong, itself, and discrimination also forbidden under the new Civil Rights law. The imposition of a quota arrangement based upon race would be as arbitrary and discriminatory against one race as against another.

Many white Americans—notably those who belong to ethnic groups which have themselves experienced discrimination—see the Negro's struggle for improvement as a threat to their economic security. We must help them to see that their fears are groundless, that their national government has expressly guarded against the futile exercise of broadening opportunity for one group at the expense of another.

We must build a national conscience so strong and expanding, and a national economy so strong and expanding, that there are equal opportunities—opportunities of all kinds—for all our people—based upon their individual merit and nothing else.

We cannot longer temporize or falter, for equal rights for all citizens is the stuff of America's greatness. A government cannot be by the people unless it is by all the people. It cannot be for the people unless it is for all the people.

We have a Supreme Court which has recognized this. We have a Congress which has now spelled it out in law and a President who is committed in thought, word and deed to see that the nation follows this course. We have strength in our leadership. As a people, as a rank and file people, we must now provide the fellowship.

Labor's Choice

"IT IS OUR deep conviction," said the AFL-CIO General Board in its statement endorsing Democratic candidates Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey for President and Vice President, "that the election of 1964 is the most critical this country has faced since 1932."

In 1932 the nation was in a state of near collapse as the depression drained the country's strength and spread fear and desperation among a shocked and stricken people.

The trade union movement had lost its World War I strength. Its membership rolls were shrinking, riddled by the 15 million or more jobless. Whatever measure of security it had gained for its members at the bargaining table was washed away in the engulfing economic storm.

Unions worked for the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt, but there was no overall, concerted labor campaign, no carefully planned register-and-vote drive directed by a Committee on Political Education.

Throughout the Thirties and into the World War II years labor became more deeply involved in the national political process, supplementing its long-time legislative activities with political education on vital issues in election campaigns and contributions to candidates.

THE PASSAGE of the Taft-Hartley Act after a decade of progressive legislation focused with great intensity the fact that legislation, just as much as a depression, could wash away gains won on the picket line and around the collective bargaining table.

Labor organized politically to answer the attack and to protect itself from further assaults. And when the AFL and CIO merged in 1955 the constitution for the new labor center declared as one of its objects and principles:

"While preserving the independence of the labor movement from political control, to encourage workers to register and vote, to exercise their full rights and responsibilities of citizenship and to perform their rightful part in the political life of the local, state and national communities."

In 1964 the AFL-CIO is playing that role. Elsewhere in this issue of the AFL-CIO News is spelled out the why of the Johnson-Humphrey endorsement. It is set out in terms not only of the interests of America's organized workers but in terms of the nation and the world. For organized labor is part of the fabric of American society and trade union movements the free world over lead the fight for peace and freedom.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY has this year fallen into the hands of those who are determined to give the country a "choice" that essentially narrows down to a "choice" between further progress along the lines on which the nation has moved since 1932 or a return to the period when depressions brought a mighty nation almost to its knees.

The "choice" is between policies dedicated to protecting the forces of freedom everywhere, to seeking peace without impulsive action or aggressive intent to those of a Republican candidate who would gamble with the survival of mankind in a nuclear conflict.

Labor has made its "choice." It will dedicate all of its efforts between now and Nov. 3 to the election of Lyndon Johnson and Hubert Humphrey. Their election is the single most important contribution every American worker can make to his own and the nation's well-being.

Church Groups Speak:

Leaders of Religion Concerned By Automation's Job Problems

A COMMON CONCERN for economic and social problems arising out of automation, along with a deep commitment to equality of opportunity, is reflected in the Labor Day statements of leading Protestant, Jewish and Catholic groups.

The Labor Day message of the National Council of Churches, which will be read in thousands of Protestant and Eastern Orthodox churches on Labor Sunday, Sept. 6, notes that "job security" has become "the chief concern of many workers."

It urges labor and the churches to redouble "their united efforts to secure social changes that will enable us to make the most humane use of our technological powers."

The church council stressed that "what seem to be scare words to many not directly concerned—such as 'featherbedding,' double pay for overtime, shorter workweek—ought also to be viewed from the perspective of the bitter fear that one's skill, and hence one's means of livelihood, may soon be obsolete."

Persistent high-level unemployment and the demand for new skills has fallen heaviest on older workers and youngsters lacking adequate education and training, the Labor Sunday message notes.

It singles out as "a problem within a problem" the fact that "the severe handicaps faced by white persons in these categories" are compounded in the case of Negroes. It warns that "tragic denials of social justice" lead to "despair which harms our entire society."

The churches and labor unions, the Protestant statement declares, "hold in common a deep concern for people; we share the concept of brotherhood; and we strive to value people above things."

THE STATEMENT of Msgr. George G. Higgins, on behalf of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, says the "real challenge" of this Labor Day "is to move full speed ahead with the war on poverty and unemployment."

Msgr. Higgins notes that "despite the fact that we are currently enjoying a remarkably high level of economic prosperity in this country, millions of able-bodied Americans are unemployed, through no fault of their own, and millions more are the victims of the most degrading kind of poverty—all the more degrading because it so often goes unnoticed in a land of bounteous plenty."

These problems, the Catholic spokesman notes, are so complex they can be solved only "by cooperative action on the part of government and the private sectors of our economy, including management and organized labor."

The war on poverty, he asserts, "calls for the combined efforts of all men of good will, regardless of their political affiliation."

Calling for "special attention to the problem of racial injustice," he states:

"No greater mistake could be made than to think that this problem, the sheer magnitude and tragedy of which we have yet fully to grasp as a nation, was taken care of once and for all by the enactment of the Civil Rights Act. . . . In the long run, the act could prove to have been a curse, rather than a blessing, if the hopes and expectations which it has aroused among our Negro fellow citizens are frustrated, not so much by the uncompromising opposition of those who opposed its enactment in the first place as by the careless apathy and indifference of those who favored its adoption."

THE SYNAGOGUE COUNCIL of America, speaking for the majority of America's Jews, sees Labor Day as epitomizing a society "without poverty, drudgery and exploitation."

Rabbi Uri Miller, president of the council which includes representatives of all branches of Judaism, points to the fact that "20 percent of our citizens are not sharing in the prosperity of our era." He adds:

"The threat of automation, with its attendant unemployment, menaces our society. The danger of unemployed youth turning to crime gives added urgency to the problem. We must concern ourselves for we bear part of the responsibility and guilt."

He urged support of Pres. Johnson's anti-poverty program by "every citizen . . . to the fullest extent of his resources."

But the President's program, Rabbi Miller maintains, "is but a beginning." Poverty, he says, will only be abolished "when the problem receives the dedicated and committed service of all our public and private resources."

America's moral and economic leadership, he declares, depends on maintenance of a "high standard of economic justice."

Morgan Says:

Marxist Cell Plan Adapted To Aid Goldwater Nomination

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

AM I DREAMING or wasn't there a time, not too terribly long ago, when a politician's contacts with the public were relatively direct and simple?

The office-holder—or office-seeker—would get up at the Fourth of July picnic and orate to the sweltering crowd, the ladies trying to air-condition themselves with wig-wagging palm leaf fans. The orator may even have written his own speech. At least he had it committed to memory. If you wrote a congressman he wrote you back and likely as not enclosed a batch of free seeds from the Dept. of Agriculture.

Morgan

He solicited your vote and you gave it to him or you didn't but on election day his organization was sufficiently on the ball to call you up and see that you had a ride to the polls and back.

But this simple approach went out with sleeve-holders. Life is more complicated today, and so is politics. A member of Congress serves on committees dealing with vastly technical matters ranging from desalinizing sea water to landing a man on the moon. He can't keep up with his correspondence and he is driven at times to use a mechanical gadget to sign his name on "personal" letters. He probably has a television shirt, a television tie and a stable of ghost writers to furnish him with eloquent speech material to use when he wears them and enters your living room on the TV.

A diabolical contraption has been perfected whereby everything he has to say is printed on a revolving scroll affixed just above or below or to one side of the camera eye so that the speaker does not appear to be reading his script, even though he is.

In the exciting, currently best-selling novel entitled "Convention" a key turn in the plot comes when a lady delegate from Texas discovers that the highlights of her personal history have been memorized by the electronic brain of a computer and filed on an IBM card.

But only the other day a newspaper dispatch reported that Sen. Goldwater's field marshal for Texas, Peter O'Donnell, was already busy computerizing the habits and inclinations of voters in the Lone Star State.

Perhaps the most arresting intensification of new approaches to political organization comes from Goldwater's most prominent and very alive ghost writer, Stephen C. Shadegg, who has just written a book called "How to Win an Election." An advertising and public relations man, Shadegg helped Arizona's venerable senior senator, Carl Hayden, a Democrat, win reelection in 1950.

HE IS CREDITED with masterminding Goldwater's surprise Republican victory in his first try for the Senate in 1952 and managed his successful 1958 campaign too. Once a Democrat, Shadegg is now a registered Republican. He served as western states chairman of the Goldwater for President Committee, and has just been awarded the same region in the campaign.

His book reveals some of the strategy by which the Arizona senator, with a minority of popular strength, was able to capture the Republican presidential nomination. And it projects, presumably, techniques by which the Goldwater machine hopes to win in November.

With refreshing if not breathtaking candor Shadegg describes the organization of secret cells to infiltrate and fatally weaken the enemy camp.

"Mao Tse-tung, the Communist revolutionary general," he notes, "has written a valuable book on the tactics of infiltration. In it he says: 'Give me just two or three men in a village and I will take the village.' In the Goldwater campaigns of 1952 and 1958 and in all other campaigns where I have served as a consultant I have followed the advice of Mao Tse-tung. . . .

"For easy identification we called our operation the 'Cell Group', because the title suggests precisely what we hoped to create—enthusiastic, knowledgeable Goldwater supporters who would not be labeled or identified as members of any special organization. . . .

". . . (They) became a secret weapon possessing strength, mobility and real impact. They were able to infiltrate centers of opposition support, keep us informed of opposition tactics, disseminate information, enlist other supporters and to do all these things completely unnoticed by the opposition."

Presumably the Johnson campaign managers have been warned but the marvelously revealing if somewhat ironic gambit here is Stephen Shadegg's unhesitating embrace of the infiltration tactics of that Oriental past master of Marxism, Mao Tse-tung, in order that the private enterprise system of a free and open society may be preserved—by cell groups.

Washington Reports:

Rights Leader Blames Rioting On Incitement 'Provocateurs'

CIVIL RIGHTS activities at this time should be channeled into making the new Civil Rights Act work and into "register and vote" activities, Roy Wilkins, chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 radio stations.

Wilkins, who also heads the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, blamed recent riots in Harlem, Rochester, Chicago, New Jersey and Philadelphia on "provocateurs," who go into a Negro community and incite disturbances which include "unforgiveable looting and thievery."

"We in the rights movement don't want the movement labeled with hooliganism, with throwing bricks through windows, with stealing refrigerators, with looting stores," Wilkins declared. "The civil rights movement is more important than this sort of thing."

The chairman of the Leadership Conference said it was obvious that the demonstrations were not spontaneous. There are conditions that need correction and these are irritants, he said, but hooliganism doesn't ease them.

"Something will have to be done about Negro housing, about wider opportunities in employment, about better schools for children, about better job training," he asserted. "Whether the hoodlums act or not, these have to be looked after."

WILKINS URGED Negro youngsters to stay in school at least through high school and, if qualified, to get college loans. He called for wider understanding of on-the-job training and other means of teaching job skills.

He advised persons in an all-white neighborhood who find that a Negro family is to move next door "not to panic and run out. . . . If you find that the Negro family is the same kind as the families already there, with the same kind of income, the same kind of standards and likely to maintain those standards, then you ought to stand pat."

"You won't lose your investment," he said. "The chances are you will get a new, good neighbor. But if you run, you lose, you don't get your money back, the Negro has to pay out more money than otherwise, and the real estate dealer is the only one who profits."

by Willard Shelton

THE "CARPETBAGGER" ISSUE raised against Robert F. Kennedy as Democratic nominee for the Senate in New York is a perfectly natural one, politically, and backers of incumbent Republican Sen. Kenneth Keating will naturally make the most of it. Since we already have another state where the same issue has been raised—California, where Pierre Salinger is seeking election to a full six-year term after his appointment to fill a vacancy—it should be pointed out, however, that the legal issue is scarcely in doubt.

The "carpetbagger" charge against Kennedy is that he is not a "resident" of New York—that he has resided in Virginia and maintained his voting residence in Massachusetts, a common enough kind of practice among those who work for the federal government—and that he therefore should run for the Senate, if a Senate seat is what he wishes, in Virginia or Massachusetts, but not New York.

But legally this argument has no weight whatever. The U.S. Constitution provides, very simply, that to be a member of the Senate a person must be 30 years of age, nine years a U.S. citizen, and an "inhabitant" of the state at the time of election. It provides, also, that the Senate is the judge of the "qualifications" of its own members.

Various states have constitutional clauses or laws imposing what appear to be restrictions on these provisions, but the restrictions have been given no weight under either state court decisions or Senate practice.

SEN. KUCHEL OF CALIFORNIA, the GOP whip, filed a memorandum on state court decisions on this question on Aug. 5, the day Salinger was sworn in.

In 1918 a man named Peterson sought Senate election in Minnesota. The state constitution prohibits from "public office" any person convicted of a felony. And Peterson, after filing for nomination, was convicted of a felony. The Minnesota Supreme Court said the state constitution could not be applied against Peterson's Senate candidacy—that a state "is without authority to enlarge or modify" the qualifications named in the federal Constitution.

In 1948, a Wyoming court rejected an attempt to disqualify a governor from the U.S. Senate—despite a state constitutional provision that a governor was not eligible to "any other office . . . during the term for which he was elected" for governor. The Wyoming court's reasoning was identical with that of Minnesota's Supreme Court.

In 1948, again, a state judge ran for the Senate—despite a state constitutional provision barring judges from seeking any other office except "judicial" office. The state Supreme Court held that the state constitution could not override the provisions of the U.S. Constitution.

And there are other cases—such as that involving the late Sen. Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin. McCarthy, when still a state judge, tried first for the Senate in 1944; the state courts said he could run despite a Wisconsin constitutional clause identical with Oklahoma's. California's Supreme Court this year upheld Salinger's right to run, and then his right to be appointed, despite the fact he isn't an "elector," technically, as required by state law.

THE "CARPETBAGGER" ISSUE, then, is strictly political. If Keating, the New York incumbent, can persuade enough voters that Kennedy hasn't been close enough to the state to represent New Yorkers adequately, the decision will be final. If George Murphy, the Republican California candidate, can hit Salinger with the issue, then he will win. But if Salinger or Kennedy wins a majority, the Senate will certainly honor his election certificate. Or both of the certificates, if that's the way it turns out.

In California, factually, Murphy and his campaign managers are not touching the alleged "carpetbagger" issue at all. It was tried, briefly, in the Democratic primary and it backfired.

In California practically everyone is a "carpetbagger"—a resident of relatively recent vintage who entered the state during the great westward migration of the war and postwar years.

"REGISTER AND VOTE"—This was the advice Roy Wilkins, chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights (right), gave to Negroes as he was interviewed on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People. He was interviewed in his New York office by Harry W. Flannery, AFL-CIO radio coordinator.

Meany on Labor Day:

A Duty for All Americans—Register, Vote

By George Meany

EVERY FOUR YEARS, Labor Day has even more than its usual significance for union members.

In those years—and this, of course, is one of them—the American people make the great decision that determines the policies of the federal government, and to a considerable degree the nature of American society for the four years ahead.

This is a decision in which every citizen can and should participate.

In particular, it is a decision in which every union member has a duty to participate.

So my first word to you on Labor Day, 1964, is register; and my second one, aimed at November 3, is vote.

These are the essentials. Unless these essentials are carried out, the clearest understanding of the issues is only an academic exercise.

However, it is difficult to imagine how anyone who does understand the issues now facing the nation can neglect to register and vote. For the issues in this election are extremely grave for the labor movement, for the nation and for the world.

THIS ELECTION, to a greater degree than any since before World War II, will decide what kind of country you and I, and our children and grandchildren, are going to live in.

This is one of the rare pivotal elections in American history—comparable, perhaps, to 1800, when Thomas Jefferson won for people against property; to 1828, when Andrew Jackson won for the many against the favored few; to 1860, when Abraham Lincoln won for human liberty and federal government; to 1932, when Franklin Roosevelt won for the right of the people to use their government as an instrument of progress.

For the first time, a major political party is asking the American people to reverse, not one, but all of these historic decisions.

That is the one great issue in 1964.

As we weigh this issue, let us start by looking at where we are. And the place to begin, in union terms, is with jobs and job conditions.

Take a quick, thoughtless look and you will say that everything is fine. Wages are high, prices are stable, people are prosperous. These are prosperous times—boom times. But it is a lopsided boom.

The trouble is, about a fifth of all the people in the country don't belong to this way of life. Their wages are low; their job prospects are uncertain; they haven't got a present or a future.

What is worse, a good many of the youngsters in this group, especially, have no hope of breaking out of it. They are condemned before they start—condemned to poor schools, to inferior status, because of poverty, race or both.

They aren't the only sufferers. There are industrial workers whose jobs are now done by machines and craftsmen whose crafts, they are told, belong to the past. Too old for the new age, too old for the new technology—too old to work and too young to die.

So at least one factor in the decision that will be made two short months from now will involve the treatment of workers, and those who want to work.

THIS LOPSIDED BOOM of recent years has put things out of perspective. Most of the employed—union or non-union—along with stockholders, storekeepers and all the rest have never had it so good. But a fifth of the people have been flat broke.

This is just not good enough. We can't stand 80 percent prosperity in the country any more than we can stand 90 percent democracy.

But to reach 100 percent prosperity, the federal government must play a much larger role than ever before. Private enterprise—worthy though it is—just can't meet the needs on its own.

According to official U.S. Government statistics, private profit-making business in the United States—and that covers the whole range, from the auto industry to the insurance companies to the supermarkets—employed fewer full-time people in 1963 than it did 10 years ago.

Just think of that. More people than ever before; more goods produced than ever before—and fewer full-time jobs.

You can come up with all kinds of charts and projections about automation, but it seems to me that this one simple fact tells it all.

Fewer full-time jobs in private industry in 1963 than there were 10 years ago.

Move it around. Look at it from one angle or another. There is no way to make it look good.

So, as we look toward November we have to consider where the jobs are coming from.

We in the AFL-CIO believe they should—and must—come from a massive federal investment in America—an investment in education, in health, in all kinds of needed public facilities.

We need schools. We need hospitals. We need housing, mass transit, parks, pure water—the list is endless.

By meeting the needs of the people in all these areas, we will also provide jobs.

But some, who think first of all in budgets, claim we can't afford it. They are like those who said we couldn't afford the 1964 tax cut. A good investment is bound to pay dividends. The kind of investment I have described will not impoverish but enrich our country.

Will we go on in the spirit of the Employment Act of 1946, fulfilling that compact between the people and their government to provide jobs for all? Or will we assume as a national policy that the jobless are lazy and the poor are shiftless?

This is the economic issue facing the American people. There is no question about that.

And there are other issues.

THERE IS A DEEP ISSUE of conscience. The people of this nation will decide which is the stronger force—their sense of justice, their knowledge of what is right, or prejudice and the false fears that feed on prejudice. I have no doubts on this score, but the choice must be clear and overwhelming.

Then there is the grave issue of foreign policy—of the kind of role the United States will play in the world. The people will decide whether the generally bipartisan policies of the last 20 years—American leadership based on strength, but exercised with patience—should be discarded.

These broad, basic issues, and all they entail, are of the most crucial concern to all citizens, and to union members even more than others.

This year must mark a new high in labor citizenship—climaxed by a record turnout at the polls. The times—and the issues—demand no less.

So, on Labor Day 1964, American labor's message to all Americans is simple:

Please register and please vote.

You owe it to America.

Schnitzler on Labor Day:

Equal Rights, Opportunity and Hope for All

By William F. Schnitzler

ON THIS LABOR DAY, as on all others, there are many matters of grave concern to American workers, both as union members and as citizens of the nation that is the trustee for the survival of freedom on earth.

But there is one matter I would like to stress—one whose importance, by any measurement, is second to none. And that is the legislative achievement, finally, of equal rights for all Americans—equal rights and equal opportunity—in every aspect of their lives.

Two months ago the Civil Rights Act of 1964 became the law of the land. It was entirely proper to hail it, then, as a great historic achievement, and to praise the legislators who brought about its adoption.

All this is still true; the history written by the 88th Congress will long be remembered. But this is not a time for self-congratulation or reminiscence; this is a time for action.

We in the AFL-CIO are rightly proud of our own role in the long, often-discouraging struggle for meaningful civil rights legislation. We were among the pioneers in that struggle; and especially among the pioneers seeking a law that directly affected equal opportunity on the job and in union membership.

But the victory we helped to win is only a beginning. Now it is the obligation of every union, and every union member, to make the law a reality.

SOME MAY ASK, why must we assume responsibility for rights which are now guaranteed by federal law? Why can't we leave it to the government?

There are several answers, each of them persuasive in itself.

First—and I do not list these in order of importance, for every one of them is important—is the image of this American society in the eyes of the world. Let us not forget that the overwhelming majority of the world's people are non-white. And let us not forget that they are just as intent upon attaining a free, open, democratic society—a full opportunity society—as we are, here in the United States. If these hundreds of millions of people are to have confidence in democracy, as exemplified by the United States, we must prove that we have that kind of society here on our own shores.

Second, the full achievement of equal rights is essential to the full utilization of our national resources here in the United States. If we deny 10 percent of our people—or, at best, a substantial proportion of that 10 percent—the chance to fulfill their potential as productive members of the community, we weaken ourselves as a nation. To the extent that they are unproductive, or are dependent upon the rest of us, our economy is weaker, and therefore the whole nation is weaker.

These first two answers might be described as selfish, in the sense that they are addressed, basically, to the white majority in the United States; and addressed in terms of that majority's self-interest. Yet in the truest sense, there is no racial self-interest in an open society; what is good for one is good for all. That will be a pragmatic truth in America for as long as our way of life survives. Even so, the case goes beyond pragmatism.

Third, we are driving for full and prompt implementation of the civil rights law, in factories and stores, in schools and polling places, in restaurants and on golf courses, because it is right—morally and spiritually right.

We know it is right; for the principles now embodied into law have been the principles of the labor movement, just as thoroughly as they have been the principles of the United States.

The country we love was based on the proposition that all men are created equal. The labor movement grew from the proposition that all men are brothers. What kind of catechism can separate these two ideas?

And what can separate them from the spiritual heritage we all share, no matter what our faith? "All men are brothers." This we learned, all of us, from the beginning. And it is true.

Therefore let us all re-dedicate ourselves, on labor's own day, to the swift realization of what should always have been true in this land of freedom—equal rights, equal opportunity and equal hope for all.

Text of ICFTU Greetings:

Crucial Issues Face Free World Labor

Labor Day message from the officers of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions:

THE WORKERS of the free world, banded together in the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, send their fraternal greetings to all the workers in North America on the occasion of Labor Day. This year, it comes at a time when the peoples of the United States and Canada face crucial issues in whose decision the labor movement will have a weighty share.

In the United States, the outcome of the presidential elections will have far-reaching effects not only upon the social policies of the nation but also on the world scene. The international free trade union movement will watch with greatest concern and attention the coming contest to know if the far-seeing policy of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy will be pursued after the coming election.

The free trade unions all over the world welcome the anti-poverty crusade in the United States in which the trade union movement—always the champion of the poor and the oppressed—is playing such a considerable role.

The ICFTU is also conscious of the great tasks which face organized labor in the United States and Canada in their fight for full employment and in their active striving to achieve concrete results for the workers in a society undergoing the revolution of automation. In this fight, the international free trade union movement wishes them rapid success.

No message on Labor Day this year can be complete without acknowledging the major share of the American trade union movement in the great forward surge of civil rights, by gaining the avowed recognition by the nation and the law that all citizens are equal and by obtaining the legal banning of discrimination. The full application of this principle throughout the world is the aim of the free trade unon movement. By their energetic action against oppression and discrimination in their own country, the American unions have shown themselves to be in the vanguard of progress.

The ICFTU welcomes the initiative taken by the Canadian trade union movement to spur the government to tackle equitably the burning problem of the two cultures by holding a constitutional conference. The program put forward by the Canadian Labor Congress to ensure equality of opportunity to all Canadians without regard for regional, language or cultural differences shows the road to the solution of this problem by applying social justice.

The free trade union movement of the whole world, confident of their support in the past and the future, is proud on Labor Day to show its solidarity with the workers of North America.

Pres. Jodoin's Message:

Automation Posing Challenge to Canada

Following are excerpts from the Labor Day statement of Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labour Congress.

IT HAS BEEN ASSUMED that every able-bodied person should contribute his or her share of "labor", in one form or another, to the welfare of society. We now seem to be entering an era in which this contribution from every individual may no longer be required. If this proves to be so, then mankind, and most particularly we in the more highly industrialized countries, will be faced with adjustments of the most sweeping nature.

During the past three or four years we have experienced changes which have been identified by many oustanding authorities as the first stage of this great social revolution.

The reduction in overall unemployment which has taken place during the past year is to be welcomed by all; but beneath the lower total figures are some characteristics that provide cause for deep concern.

There has been a tendency toward longer periods of unemployment among many of those who are finding difficulty in getting jobs. In other words, the "hard core" of unemployed is becoming harder. The figures show a particularly sharp impact of unemployment on young people and those lacking in skills.

AUTOMATION IS already with us and is increasing at an amazing speed. It will inevitably grow at a much faster pace in the future and the effects of various forms of automation will be felt sharply in areas of employment that have so far been relatively untouched.

This is a great challenge facing our economy and facing all of us as Canadians. It is a challenge of which we in the organized labor movement have become extremely conscious, and there is a great awareness of the possible effects among many other groups in our society.

Organized labor is not opposed to automation. We are convinced that the new knowledge and skill which man is acquiring at such a staggering speed can be used for the good and welfare of all mankind. We feel, very strongly, that such advances can only take on real meaning when they are translated into human benefits. These benefits are not going to come automatically.

This is the challenge and opportunity that confront us, not only as trade unionists but as Canadians. It is a challenge which is going to call for the best contribution from every section of society.

Building Trades Dept. Says:

Gains of Past Year Put Focus On Objectives Still to Be Won

The following is excerpted from the Labor Day message of Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

SOMETIMES people complain that labor is never satisfied. No one in his right mind should be. The human grasp always falls far short of human desire and capability. But on this Labor Day, before attempting to blueprint new goals, we have the right and the duty to look back on the achievements of the past year and to acknowledge that it has been a period of solid progress.

America has faced up to a series of international crises with calm courage and firm purpose and the result has been not only the maintenance of temporary peace but encouraging signs that we are on the road to enduring peace.

Our country has experienced a strong upsurge of industrial prosperity and economic expansion. Construction and production have broken all previous records in 1964. Best of all, unemployment this summer dipped under 5 percent for the first time since 1960. Here, too, there is reason for hope of much more substantial gains in the year ahead.

In the legislative field, a number of important victories were scored. First, we won our fight for sharp reduction of federal income taxes. This increased take-home pay for all wage-earners, built up a new reservoir of mass purchasing power and helped give industry the lift it so badly needed.

Two other great legislative objectives were achieved. I refer to the Civil Rights Act and the Anti-Poverty Act. Both ranked high on labor's list. The benefits will not come overnight, but some day they will and our whole nation will be better off.

In the special field of the Building Trades, we won a 10-year fight for moderation of the Davis-Bacon Act. From now on, all bona fide fringe benefits will be included in the determination of the prevailing wage on federal and federally assisted construction projects. This will open up many thousands of new jobs for union craftsmen, whose employers will now be able to bid on equal terms with non-union contractors.

Enactment of construction programs for mass transportation facilities, expanded university and medical facilities, vital public works and for the national defense will help to keep many of our people busily employed in the coming year.

We acknowledge these gains and we are grateful for them. But they represent only a start on the unfinished business of our nation. There is still a desperate shortage of elementary and high schools for American children and we will urge the next Congress to make a vast program of federal aid to school construction its first order of business.

The federal minimum wage of $1.25 an hour is unrealistic. It should be raised promptly to $2.00.

Hospitalization insurance for the aged under social security is a long overdue reform. We will have a fight on our hands to make it a reality.

THESE ARE only a few of our major goals, designed to strengthen America, to reinforce economic prosperity and to provide jobs for all in the years ahead.

To achieve success, every union member must do his part. In this national election year, that part can be stated in three words. Register and vote. Make certain that the adult members of your family and your friends do the same. It's as simple as that.

This year the importance of a full vote is so apparent that it is difficult to see how any responsible citizen can fail to respond.

On the one hand we have the Republican presidential candidate, Barry Goldwater, who has a 100 percent anti-labor record. He is an avowed enemy of the trade union movement.

On the other hand, we have Pres. Johnson who has gone down the line with labor and labor's program, a man who is proud to be called friendly to labor.

Gompers taught us the only infallible political strategy—to reward our friends and to defeat our enemies. If all of us follow that sound advice, we will have a great deal more to be thankful for next Labor Day.

Industrial Union Dept. Says:

Jobs, Education, Freedom for All Called Goals on Labor's Holiday

Jack Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., released the following Labor Day statement:

LABOR DAY is a proud day for all free Americans, especially for members of organized labor.

It is the day on which we in the labor movement look back across the vast distance we have come and note the great progress we have made. And it is the day on which we look forward to the goal we always keep before us—the achievement of a better life for everyone, everywhere.

Thus, Labor Day marks for us a contemplative point in the ceaseless flow of time. It is appropriate that it marks, also, a point in the change of seasons from the heat-filled days of summer to the cooling, color-touched days of autumn.

Already in some parts of our broad land the leaves are turning. The long, hot summer is ending—now what of the autumn?

In this election year of 1964, Labor Day marks more than a change of seasons—it marks the beginning of the political campaigns.

Soon, as the red, orange and yellow hues of autumn splash through our forests, the voices of the campaigners will be heard throughout the land.

What will they be saying?

Will they be staining the natural beauty of our land with bigotry and extremism, seeking to whip-lash hate into a political strategy and fear into an election victory?

Or will they speak to us with an honesty that matches the natural dignity of a proud, free people, seeking to inspire a great society?

As free Americans, we will listen to the dialogue and sum up our conclusions in the uncompromising columns of fact and reality.

It is a fact that anyone who raises his voice in praise of extremism stains our great democracy.

It is a fact that anyone who would wipe out or weaken our social security system demeans our senior citizens.

It is a fact that anyone who supports a destructive "right-to-work" measure intends to wreck organized labor.

It is realistic to be fearful of placing an unsteady finger on the trigger of nuclear weapons.

It is realistic to understand that to diminish the United Nations is to increase the danger of World War III.

As Americans, it is realistic to resolve to achieve full employment, full education and full freedom for every citizen.

It is realistic to prefer a war against poverty to a war against progress.

As members of organized labor on this Labor Day 1964 we so resolve.

Two Opposing Philosophies:

Gains of 30 Years at Stake in '64 Election

Choice Now Up To Voters

By Alexander Uhl

WITHIN a matter of months the American working man is going to find out whether the United States will continue on the broad social and economic course of the past 30 years.

The Nov. 3 election is no ordinary one, especially for organized labor. Two sharply opposing philosophies face each other and the American people will have to determine which one they want.

Out of that election will come a government committed to liberal policies that have marked the administrations of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman, John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson.

Or—out of it will come a government committed to a radical change of direction, a government that sees the social and economic changes of the last 30 years as weakening and destroying the property rights system of the nation and debilitating its people.

2-Way Choice

With the results of the election still in the hands of the people there can be only two ways of looking into the political crystal ball, particularly as the results will affect American workers.

One view is what can logically be expected from a continued Johnson Administration; the other, a new highly conservative Goldwater Administration.

If the Johnson Administration is returned to power, here is what can be expected:

- Conscientious enforcement of the Civil Rights Act with federal intervention in the event that local and state authorities are unable or unwilling to enforce it.
- A continuation of the New Deal-Fair Deal philosophy of all Democratic administrations since the day of Pres. Roosevelt.
- Federal aid for expanded educational opportunities for all Americans. Democratic leaders in the White House and Congress have fought for and won much aid for education, especially on the higher levels. Pres. Johnson is committed to further efforts to expand federal investment in education.
- Efforts to increase employment. "We still have too much unemployment," Pres. Johnson has said. "We are trying to do everything we can about it." Tax reduction, manpower development and training, the "war on poverty," are part of the Administration's effort to get more jobs for more workers. This is certain to be a continuing program.
- Social security hospital care. This is still a top item on the Johnson agenda. Efforts are in the works to get the legislation through Congress this year. If these are not successful, hospital care is certain to be a top item for the new Congress, if the Democrats win.
- Peace and security. The Johnson Administration has sought to reduce cold war tensions with the Communist world so far as this is consistent with national safety. The test ban treaty is one example of what has been done. At the same time, the Administration has remained adamant against Castro in Cuba and has called for full military strength to resist aggression.
- Housing and urban redevelopment. "A decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family" is the stated goal of the Johnson Administration. For this purpose the Administration is expected to push for new legislation that will assist communities in cleaning up their housing problems and will push for further action in the field of mass transportation.

Concern for People

Both the Kennedy and Johnson philosophies of government, as expressed in their public speeches, illustrate a deep concern for human welfare on the grass roots level.

The contrast between a Kennedy or Johnson speech with a Goldwater speech, therefore, comes as a shock. The shock lies in the Goldwater philosophy of "root, hog, or die" which he presents with cold and sometimes menacing words. An example of what a Goldwater Administration would hold for the American people presumably can be found in Goldwater's acceptance speech at the San Francisco convention.

The address is notable not merely for the things it says but for the things it ignores.

- The basic theme of the speech was that the United States must not only be the most powerful nation on earth—a goal that Democrats would affirm—but that the United States must use this power in unexplained ways to "defeat" Communist enemy powers. Goldwater pooh-poohs fears of a nuclear war that might blot out humanity. He has yet to spell out precisely what he would do in the trouble spots of the world to check Communist aggression.
- The second basic theme of the Goldwater position—this time on the domestic front—has been complete trust in laissez-faire economics, the loosing of unrestricted American free enterprise with the government serving as the protector of business-oriented capitalism. In such a context, it is not surprising that there is literally—both in the Republican platform and the Goldwater acceptance speech—no hint of specific social legislation.

Labor Day Climaxes Year of Basic Change

By Harry Conn

IT SEEMS hard to believe that only a year has passed since last Labor Day.

So much has happened during this relatively short span of time.

Perhaps the current political climate has much to do with the feeling that fundamental changes have taken place since that last bright, sun-lit holiday which was Carpenter Peter McGuire's gift to the working men and to every American citizen.

This was America one year ago:

- Pres. John F. Kennedy, in his Labor Day message, called for more jobs and for civil rights legislation.
- AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called for peace, prosperity, full employment.
- The Senate weighed ratification of the nuclear test ban treaty.
- Oklahoma unionists engaged in a bitter fight against so-called "right-to-work" law.
- New York Teachers Union won a precedent-setting contract.

Less than two months after America enjoyed its Labor Day 1963 holiday and only days after he addressed the AFL-CIO convention in New York City, mad irrational tragedy struck on the streets of Dallas. Pres. Kennedy was slain by an assassin's bullet.

The bullet not only struck down a popular, dynamic, imaginative leader of the Free World, but for most trade unionists it wiped out much of the luster and hope and inspiration for the future.

The new President brought to the White House much of the same vision, the same aspirations for freedom and progress as his predecessor.

A New Leadership

Lyndon B. Johnson, enticed into public life by the ideals of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, brought a new type of leadership to the nation, but his goals were those of John F. Kennedy.

To a nation still wrapped in grief he galvanized the machinery of government into action. He knew intimately the legislative system and the members of Congress who determine its course. In the months that followed the wheels of Congress turned with a rapidity rarely seen on Capitol Hill.

A labor-backed, bipartisan civil rights bill was passed and signed into law by Johnson. For the first time in history, a southern filibuster against civil rights was crushed by the Senate.

While President Kennedy was still in the White House the Senate did approve the nuclear test ban treaty—the first, cautious step to turning the world back from an atomic holocaust which it never could survive.

Pushing the Kennedy program, Johnson was able to secure passage of other key legislation. There was the across-the-board income tax cut . . . inclusion of fringe benefits in prevailing wages under the Davis-Bacon Act . . . a mass transit bill . . . pay increases for government workers . . . foreign aid appropirations . . . a national food stamp plan.

There were other areas, such as hospital care and truth-in-lending and housing, where critically needed relief was given high priority by both the Administration and organized labor. On these, action is yet to be completed.

The greatest unsolved domestic issue, however, has been unemployment. There has been some progress since the depths of the Eisenhower recession days of 1959-60 but despite record-breaking increases in employment, joblessness has been persistent.

A number of steps have been taken by the Administration to meet this: the tax cut, area redevelopment, retraining, public works and others. But they don't appear to have been sufficient.

Still, the war on poverty has captured the imagination of the nation, and with its established programs, is looked upon as hope that we can meet the problem of chronic unemployment.

At the same time, however, this country is enjoying a degree of prosperity and economic growth rarely seen in peacetime. Whereas our economic growth rate ground to a virtual halt during the Eisenhower years, it has moved at a rapid pace recently.

On the other hand, automation and technological change, wiping out something like 40,000 jobs a week, makes the fight against unemployment a constant, uphill climb.

Meanwhile, U.S. labor has been growing more active in the field of foreign affairs. Operating on the theory that an effective, free trade union movement is the best guarantee of a free society, the AFL-CIO has coordinated many of its activities with U.S. government agencies.

Singular victories have been scored in Brazil and Bolivia in South America as the American Institute for Free Labor Development continues to expand its work.

Studebaker Plant Closed

At home, on the economic front, the biggest single blow came when Studebaker Corp, in South Bend, Ind., closed down its plant, depriving 6,000 workers of jobs.

Railroad workers felt the sting, too, particularly the road crews. For the first time in history Congress passed a compulsory arbitration law, wiping out thousands of rail jobs, hitting firemen the hardest.

There were encouraging developments in Oklahoma, where voters rejected a so-called "right to work" law, and in Texas where the Hatters won a new contract as a result of a lengthy boycott and effective use of the union label.

The highlight on the organizing front was among teachers. After winning major contract gains for 40,000 New York teachers, the American Federation of Teachers has scored impressive gains in winning bargaining rights in Detroit and Cleveland and other localities.

The major negotiation of the year was in automobiles, where the UAW bargained for new contracts covering 600,000 workers.

Two strikes moved into their second year. One was the Florida East Coast Railway, in which non-ops continued their bitter battle against the DuPont Estate headed by aged Edward Ball. And in Kingsport, Tenn., the fight against the strikebreaking activities of the printing unions by the Kingsport Press goes on.

By Union, Government Leaders:

Nation's Progress Hailed In Labor Day Messages

By Gervase N. Love

AFL-CIO members were urged by Pres. George Meany in his Labor Day message to register and vote because the presidential election, "to a greater degree than any since before World War II, will decide what kind of country you and I, and our children and grandchildren, are going to live in."

"This is one of the pivotal elections in American history—comparable perhaps to 1800, when Thomas Jefferson won for the people against property; to 1828, when Andrew Jackson won for the many against the favored few; to 1860, when Abraham Lincoln won for human liberty and federal government; to 1932, when Franklin Roosevelt won for the right of the people to use their government as an instrument of progress," Meany said.

"For the first time, a major political party is asking the American people to reverse not one but all of these historic decisions. That is the one great issue in 1964."

Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler called on AFL-CIO members to "rededicate themselves on labor's own day to the swift realization of what should always have been true in this land of freedom—equal rights, equal opportunity and equal hope for all."

Schnitzler on Brotherhood

Hailing the passage of the Civil Rights Act, he pointed out that the labor movement "grew from the proposition that all men are brothers. What kind of catechism can separate the two ideas? And what can separate them from the spiritual heritage we all share, no matter what our faith? 'All men are brothers.' This we learned, all of us, from the beginning."

In a separate statement to free world labor movements, Meany recapitulated the "major strides" of the past year in making "the lofty ideals of the American Constitution a living reality." He particularly cited enactment of the civil rights and anti-poverty laws and pointed out they were "initiated and adopted with the encouragement, cooperation and backing of the labor movement."

He called on workers in other countries to urge their governments to pursue a course leading to lasting peace, as the AFL-CIO has done in this country, and emphasized that U.S. workers "are tireless in our efforts to promote and defend freedom everywhere." So long as there is Communist aggression in the world, he asserted, "there can be no genuine relaxation of international tension."

"It is our firm intention to continue our international work," Meany said, "in order to hasten the day when working people everywhere are free from totalitarian tyranny, colonial oppression and the burden of poverty—until all nations and all workers enjoy the blessings of liberty, democracy and social justice."

Labor Day this year means more than ever before, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz said.

He cited 1.5 million more Americans working than a year ago, unemployment at its lowest in seven years, earnings at record highs, stabilized prices, and passage of civil rights and anti-poverty legislation.

"American labor has been a full partner in every one of these accomplishments," he said, "working to serve its own interests only as they are part of the common interest.

"And now we have raised our sights.

". . . to full employment for every American, in the only real meaning of that term,

". . . to full education for every American boy and girl,

". . . to full security for every man and woman as the rightful reward for life's labors."

Partner in Defense

The country is proud of the progress it has made, Wirtz said, but "our fuller pride is in our continuing purpose: that none be left out of what most of us now have."

In a message to the armed forces, Sec. of Defense Robert S. McNamara called for honoring the country's workers and recognizing their contribution to its continuing security.

"Through their efforts," he said, "supplies and equipment are produced to assure that our nation is able to safeguard its interests and to meet its commitments at home and around the world.

"Our military strength depends not only on our armed forces but also on the tools and weapons created by the technological and production genius of a free labor force in countless factories and shops. Labor Day is a reminder to us that American labor plays a vital role as one of the essential partners in the defense effort and that there must be continuous cooperation by all Americans in order to meet the challenges ahead."

ILO Thanks Labor

Dir. Gen. David A. Morse of the Intl. Labor Organization in a Labor Day statement hailed the support the U.S. and Canadian labor movements have given the ILO in the 45 years since Samuel Gompers, founding president of the AFL, took a leading role in establishing the worldwide body.

"Through their participation in the ILO, the North American labor movements have been closely associated with our many programs for the improvement of the social and economic conditions of workers everywhere under conditions of freedom, dignity and equal opportunity," he said.

"The effort to close the gap between the rich and the poor nations and promote social justice throughout the world can only succeed through international solidarity. We are indeed fortunate that we can count on your continued backing in this great task."

"Significant progress" during the past year was reported by Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, although rail workers "found it necessary to constantly fight" for each gain.

Rail Progress Cited

Rail unions made "real progress," he said, in the area of job security and stabilization of employment, "and recent developments convince me that the future is brighter" than the past several years with their steady decline in job opportunities.

The Clothing Workers in a statement issued by Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum and Exec. Vice Pres. Hyman Blumberg called the members' attention to the "clear and present danger" from the radical right in the Republican presidential candidacy of Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.).

"We urge the members and their families," it continued, "to do their part in continuing this nation on its course of greatness by registering and voting for Pres. Johnson and those candidates whose efforts will be used in our behalf."

No worker can escape the grim prospect "that our free society and all the gains achieved by labor today stand in danger from extremism," said Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO in declaring that "trade unionists on Labor Day must rededicate themselves to the highest degree of unity and action.

"Everything lending dignity to our lives as working people is at stake as never before," he said. "But no less important is the unprecedented attack upon the foundations of peace and freedom that could be unleashed after Nov. 3 by an electoral victory for the Birchers and their allies."

McDonald Sees Crisis

Pres. David J. McDonald of the Steelworkers told members of the union that the holiday "holds more significance than ever" for them and their families because of the coming "most critical national election."

Political extremists and the "hate" organizations they have spawned, McDonald declared, must be opposed not only because they are "bitterly anti-union but also because they would erase every bit of social progress" gained in the past 30 years.

"Everything we as a union have gained is on the line," he said; "unless we defend it at the ballot box, we will surely lose it."

"Sincere congratulations" were sent to "our North American brothers" by Sec. Gen. Arturo Jauregui H. of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT), Western Hemisphere arm of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

"Each year, the celebration of this day fills the workers of your nation with deep pride, and rightfully so," he said in a letter to Meany.

"From his humble beginnings many years ago, the laboring man has carved out for himself and his fellows a more dignified way of life, which serves as a landmark to be achieved by the entire inter-American family."

Bortz Is Appointed New BLS Director

UNION LABEL WEEK

ALL YEAR LONG
UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Postal Clerks to Press For Overtime Pay Law

Miami Beach, Fla.—The Postal Clerks convention put a demand for premium overtime pay for 50,000 substitute clerks at the top of the union's legislative program—labeling it the "paramount objective" in the next Congress.

Pres. E. C. Hallbeck termed the denial of overtime rates to substitutes, who make up one-fifth of the work force, "a stone age labor practice." This group of workers, he told the convention, has had to work as long as 70 hours a week at straight-time rates.

Other planks in the union's legislative program called for:

- Union recognition through law rather than through the existing presidential executive order.
- An end to the Post Office Dept.'s work measurement system, which the union has termed a "speed-up."
- The right to retire on full pension after 30 years of service.
- Liberalization of the Hatch Act, which restricts off-duty political activities by federal employes.
- Full payment by the government of health and life insurance premiums for government workers.
- A 35-hour workweek.
- Additional pay adjustments, following the 1964 increases, to make wage schedules "comparable" with private industry.
- A joint labor-management study of how to extend the economic benefits of Post Office automation to employes.

Hallbeck was elected unanimously to a third two-year term as president. Also elected without opposition were six other incumbent national officers and Patrick J. Nilan of Minneapolis, who was named to succeed the retiring legislative director, John O'Connor.

There were contests for six of the 14 regional vice presidencies, but only two changes in the incumbent lineup. Frederick Yowler, Cincinnati, defeated Harry Burleigh, Youngstown, Ohio. In the Minneapolis region, formerly represented by Nilan, delegates elected Hugo Monkkonen, Duluth, over Fred Driesen, Milwaukee.

A proposal to increase the per capita from $1 to $1.15 a month, which was voted on in the same secret ballot used for election of officers, failed of enactment. It was supported by a 467-376 vote, but this was less than the two-thirds margin needed for a constitutional amendment.

Cleo Batters Postal Clerks Convention

Miami Beach, Fla.—Not even the 125-mile-an-hour blasts of Hurricane Cleo could keep the 1,200 delegates to the Postal Clerks' convention from the swift completion of their union's business.

From midnight until nearly dawn, delegates huddled in corridors for safety as the hurricane battered the convention hotel, the Americana.

By morning, the lobby was a debris of shattered glass, broken furniture and shredded drapery. Pres. E. C. Hallbeck and Mrs. Hallbeck escaped to safety from their room just as the glass walls burst at the height of the storm. A delegate at a nearby motel was hospitalized—though just for the day—from injuries received when a roof caved in. Electric power was cut off throughout the area.

The delegates missed only one morning session while emergency repairs were under way. They made up for the lost time by meeting early the next morning.

Delegates paid tribute to the hotel staff and management for efficiency under disaster conditions; the hotel responded with praise for the calmness and consideration of the postal clerks and their families.

Union Scholarships Cite Rights Work

Chicago—A Negro graduate student and a young southern white girl have been awarded Russell Bull scholarships by the Packinghouse Workers for "service in the cause of civil rights and liberties."

Dr. Nathan P. Feinsinger, chairman of the union's public advisory commission, said the awards will go to Mack H. Jones, a graduate student at the University of Illinois, and Jan Jordan, who graduated from high school at Americus, Ga., but didn't attend the graduation ceremonies in public protest at exclusion of her invited Negro guests.

A. L. Lewis Dies at 72, Former URW Staffer

Winter Haven, Fla.—A. L. Lewis, who retired in 1957 as public relations director of the Rubber Workers, died at his home here after a brief illness. He was 72.

Born in Canton, Ohio, he had had a colorful career that included stints as a vaudeville performer and operator of a chain of California business colleges before joining the URW staff in 1942 as education and research director. He was widely known as "Doc" because of the honorary degree of doctor of literature given him by Olympic (Calif.) College.

How Labor Hunts New Voters in Ohio

IN CINCINNATI the AFL-CIO Council is working to add 100,000 new voters to the registration rolls. Sandy Schmidt, a collegian, fills out data cards on the unregistered for use by telephone crews.

EACH OF THESE CARDS, all so neatly stacked, represents an unregistered voter. Of the first 1,200 unregistered electors reached on the telephone, only seven were Republicans in this center of Ohio's Taft dynasty.

UNREGISTERED VOTERS on street list covering entire county are checked against criss-cross directory and underlined by Carol Lynn, a teacher. Concentration is on 400 low-registration districts.

INDIVIDUAL VOTER CARDS are collated and stacked by Blanche Lee of the Auto Workers. Broken down by convenient areas, they are in readiness for telephone workers who try to persuade the unregistered to change status.

HEADQUARTERS for the drive are in the office of the Clothing Workers. Irene Salie of the ACWA, who acts as office manager, checks union-provided lists of possible volunteers.

THE HEART OF THE OPERATION: This is where the calls go out from volunteers such as (left to right) Helen Baus, retired teacher; Carol Lynn, teacher; Irene Salie, ACWA, and Joan Ostendarp and Sandy Schmidt, college students who will be back in class by the Sept. 23 deadline.

Senate Votes Hospital Care For Aged

Social Security Bill Amendment Approved

would go to conference where an attempt would be made to reach an agreement between the two houses of Congress. An objection by a single member, however, can send the bill back to the House Rules Committee.

The Senate vote provided a direct confrontation between the Democratic and Republican presidential candidates and party platforms.

Sen. Barry Goldwater, the GOP nominee, flew back to Washington to vote against the hospital care amendment.

Pres. Johnson hailed the Senate vote as "a victory not only for older Americans but for all Americans." His running mate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, helped round up the 44 Democratic votes for the proposal.

Five Republicans broke with their party to support the measure, the same number that voted for the 1962 hospital care amendment. The only switch in the GOP vote saw Sen. John Sherman Cooper (Ky.) vote against the measure this year, while Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (Me.) shifted to support the proposal.

Following are the principal features of the Senate bill:

- Cash benefits would be increased a flat $7—$10.50 for a couple.
- Hospital benefits provide a choice of 45 days with no deductible, 90 days with a deductible of $10 a day for the first nine days, or 180 days with a deductible equal to the average cost of 2.5 days of hospital care.
- Nursing home service, after a patient is transferred from a hospital, for up to 60 days.
- Outpatient diagnostic services, subject to a $20 deductible.
- Home health services (not including physician bills) for up to 240 visits during a calendar year.
- If hospital costs rise beyond the ability of a special trust fund to meet them on a financially sound basis, additional deductibles can be imposed—although not before 1969.
- To finance the program, the social security tax would be raised from its present 3.625 percent from employer and employe to 4.25 percent, and rise gradually to a maximum of 5.2 percent, instead of 4.625 percent under existing law and 4.8 percent under the House bill. The taxable wage base would be increased to $5,600 a year, as contrasted with $5,400 in the House bill.
- Persons not under social security or railroad retirement who are already 65 or who will reach 65 in a few years will be covered through general Treasury funds. The principal exception is for those under the federal Civil Service Retirement System, who presently have the opportunity to continue a contributory health insurance plan.

The Senate action was hailed as "a great victory in the battle for adequate health care for our senior citizens" by Kenneth McCaffree, president of Group Health Association of America. John W. Edelman, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, also hailed the vote.

After completion of action on the social security bill, the Senate was expected to tackle anew the controversial issue of a congressional curb on the power of federal courts to order reapportionment of state legislatures.

A group of Senate liberals held the floor during the week before adjournment for the Democratic convention to block a vote on a "rider" to the foreign aid authorization bill which would have held up court-ordered reapportionment until 1966.

Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.), chief sponsor of the move, has said he may seek a two-thirds cloture vote to force action on the amendment. Opponents of the measure have suggested setting aside the authorization bill and continuing foreign aid appropriations at last year's level.

A more drastic bill, permanently denying federal courts jurisdiction over reapportionment, passed the House but has little support in the Senate.

Still on deck is a major Administration bill for large-scale redevelopment assistance to the 10-state Appalachia area. It faces its key test in the House, where the vote is expected to be close.

American Landmarks Celebration Opens

The American Landmarks Celebration, this country's observance of UNESCO's Intl. Campaign for Monuments, is under way and will continue through Nov. 30, with its highlight during American Landmarks Week, Sept. 28-Oct. 4. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is a member of the steering committee.

Labor Urges FEP Rules For Nation's Capital

The true goals of the Civil Rights Act will be attained only when the education and income of Negro citizens are on a par with those of the community as a whole, William E. Pollard, staff representative of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, told the District of Columbia Board of Commissioners.

Pollard and Ron Sheppard, representing the Greater Washington AFL-CIO, testified in favor of proposed regulations prohibiting discrimination in employment in the nation's capital. The act's goals, Pollard continued, "cannot be reached by a magic wand—they must be woven, strand by strand, throughout the fabric of American society."

"The fair employment practices laws that we seek should include conciliation and enforcement powers," he said. "We want unions covered by such fair employment practices legislation. This has always been our official position."

Pollard recalled testimony by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany before a Senate Labor subcommittee that "it seems plain" to organized labor "that most of the rights we seek to insure for our minority groups depend on our ability, first, to create jobs, and second, to assure their availability on a nondiscriminatory basis to all."

He urged that the district not wait for July 2, 1965, before job discrimination is prohibited under the Civil Rights Act, or until July 2, 1968, when the law's full impact becomes applicable.

"We need a strong, enforceable fair employment practices law in the District of Columbia now," he declared. "We need a law with an effective date now."

Sheppard told the commissioners that the Washington AFL-CIO is fighting discrimination "not only because it is morally wrong and that it breeds injustice and leads to strife, but because discrimination is a very real barrier to the alvancement of the economic welfare of all wage-earners and stands in the way of realizing full prosperity for the entire American community."

"Simple justice requires," he said, "that all of the citizens of the district and of the nation have equal employment opportunities, regardless of race, religion, color, ancestry, sex or national origin."

He urged that the proposed regulations be "clear, precise and enforceable" so as to avoid misunderstandings by workers who fear their jobs may be in jeopardy.

Painters Okay Plan to Move Headquarters

Minneapolis, Minn.—The Painters were authorized to move their international headquarters from Lafayette, Ind., to Washington by vote of the 1,200 delegates to the union's quadrennial convention here.

An enabling resolution, passed after a day of debate, empowered the executive board to make the move "whenever it feels the time is right." Delegates liberalized investment policies of the death and disability funds to obtain a greater return and suggested using a portion to finance a new building.

A proposal to hold the convention every three years instead of the traditional five years was defeated. Miami Beach, Fla., was chosen for the 1969 meeting.

A telegram was sent to the Democratic National Convention in Atlantic City congratulating the delegates for having nominated Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson for President and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) for Vice President.

"This message is intended to convey the unanimous endorsement and support of the Brotherhood of Painters & Decorators," it continued.

"Be assured that our brotherhood enthusiastically endorses the Democratic platform adopted and we shall actively support the campaign."

It was signed by the general officers headed by Pres. L. M. Raftery and Pres.-Elect S. Frank (Bud) Raftery. The endorsement, first in the union's history, was made possible by earlier convention action in amending the constitution to permit political action and a political education fund.

Board Bars Wage Clause In Coal Pact

A newly negotiated "protective wage clause" under which coal mine operators pay royalties into the miners' welfare and pension funds is unlawful, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

Splitting 4-1, the board denied a motion by the Mine Workers, unaffiliated, for a ruling that its new agreement is not in violation of the "hot cargo" clause of the Landrum-Griffin law, that those who signed the pact are in compliance with an NLRB order of last Aug. 27, and that the proceedings be closed.

The new wage clause provide a royalty payment of 40 cents per ton for all coal mined by the signers of the agreement, and a payment of 80 cents for all coal bought from non-signers. The board majority found that the clause "imposes a substantial financial penalty" on signers who buy coal from pact non-signers and that the penalty was imposed to "restrain signatory operators from procuring or acquiring coal from non-signatory sources."

Such a clause constitutes secondary pressure on unsigned operators, and conflicts with the law designed to eliminate such pressures, the majority said. It held also that the UMW national contract does not cover a single industry-wide unit, though the union first comes to terms with one employer group—the Bituminous Coal Operators' Association—and then separately with others.

Member Howard Jenkins, Jr., dissenting, said he would issue a separate opinion shortly.

Johnson to Open Drive on Labor Day

Kickoff of Campaign Scheduled for Detroit

By Willard Shelton

Pres. Johnson will open his formal re-election campaign with a speech in Detroit's Cadillac Square on Labor Day, the White House announced as the Democratic campaign organization began moving into high gear for the Nov. 3 election, now less than two months off.

Johnson and his vice presidential running-mate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota, had gone from the Democratic National Convention to the President's Texas ranch for an intense weekend of campaign planning before Congress reconvened Aug. 31.

In advance of the formal campaign take-off, the AFL-CIO General Board voted to endorse the Johnson-Humphrey ticket on the basis of a comparison of candidates with the Republican nominees—Sen. Goldwater of Arizona and Rep. William E. Miller of New York—and a comparison of the party platforms in relationship to proposals filed with both conventions by federation Pres. George Meany.

Post-Convention Session

The board acted on recommendation of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which had summoned the board into session Sept. 1, after both parties had completed their conventions.

In their acceptance speeches the closing night of the Democratic convention, the President and Humphrey indicated the outlines of their campaign by re-emphasizing the major themes already set forth in the party platform.

In a speech clearly designed to reach across party lines to Republicans disturbed by the GOP nomination of Sen. Goldwater, the President stated bluntly that U.S. military might is "greater than the combined might of all the nations, in all the wars, in all the history of this planet," but that our objective is to use "strength and courage and responsibility as the keys to peace."

The world is "dangerous and difficult," he told the delegates, "and there are no easy answers." While there is "no place for weakness," neither is there a place for "recklessness," he declared.

In our affairs at home, he said, the responsibility to assure "fair play for all Americans" is major, and "I intend to carry out what the Constitution demands—and justice requires—equal justice under law for all."

Without referring directly to Republican convention emphasis on "violence in the streets"—a "white backlash" phrase apparently destined for further GOP development—the President pledged full federal support to local officials needing help but warned against those offering the "false and empty promise" that he can "hold back progress and keep the peace."

Decency Stressed

"The growing forces in this country are the forces of common human decency," he said, "not the forces of bigotry and fear."

Humphrey, the Minnesota senator whose endorsement by Johnson for the vice presidential nomination was clearly welcomed by delegates at the Atlantic City convention, reflected the President in saying in his acceptance speech that U.S. leadership in the foreign field must be "prudent, restrained, responsible."

"Shrill voices laid claim to the spirit of the past" at the Republican convention that nominated Goldwater, Humphrey said, but "in their recklessness and radicalism" they distorted the conservative image.

Goldwater himself "is not an authentic spokesman for the party of memory," he charged, saying "the temporary Republican leader . . . is even out of step" with the majority of GOP members of Congress.

"Most Democrats and most Republicans in the Senate" voted, on five key issues, to ratify the nuclear test-ban treaty, establish the U.S. Disarmament Agency, pass the civil rights bill, expand medical education and expand other federal education programs, Humphrey pointed out, "but not Sen. Goldwater."

Bailey Stays On

As campaign opening day neared, the Democratic National Convention re-elected Chairman John W. Bailey and Vice Chairman Margaret Price.

Cliff Carter, a longtime political aide to Johnson, is the President's personal representative on the committee staff, but two trusted lieutenants of the late Pres. Kennedy will have major campaign responsibilities—Kenneth O'Donnell and Larry O'Brien, both of whom have remained in the White House under Johnson.

O'Donnell, presidential appointments secretary, will be executive director of the campaign, and O'Brien, top White House legislative spokesman, will become director of organization after Congress adjourns.

Although convention delegates held only night sessions at Atlantic City, the days were filled with meetings between national committee leaders and key state leaders and candidates, planning coordination of national and local campaigns.

These briefing sessions—dealing with fund-raising, campaign materials, women voters, independents, young citizens and advance planning for presidential and vice presidential nominees—will be supplemented by an elaborate communications network allowing high-speed teletype communication between national party headquarters and nine regional offices, the latter of which will be linked to state offices.

Chicago Housing Set by Teachers

Chicago—Retired teachers will be given priority in choice of apartments in a new $3.4 million retirement residence and social and cultural center to be built on the near North Side, Pres. John M. Fewkes of the Chicago Teachers Union has announced.

The 30-story building will contain 212 one-bedroom, six two-bedroom and six efficiency apartments to be rented at $135 to $185 a month. It will be surrounded by a park-like plaza and will have a penthouse solarium and roof garden, clubhouse, lecture hall, social lounge and a half-dozen shops. Underground parking will be provided for 113 cars. Many built-in features will accommodate elderly residents.

A non-profit corporation, the Chicago Teachers Residence Corp., has been organized to handle construction and management of the building.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS in the Japanese labor movement were discussed by officials of the All-Japan Telecommunications Workers Union (ZENDENTSU) and AFL-CIO officials at a meeting in AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's office. From left are Pres. Totaro Kasahara; Dir. Shinichi Sasaki of the Political & Intl. Dept. and Regional Gen. Sec. Kanji Hachiya of the Japanese union; M. Kondo, interpreter; Harry Goldberg of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs; Meany and AFL-CIO Intl. Affairs Dir. Jay Lovestone.

Empire State Labor Endorses Kennedy

New York—Delegates to the New York State AFL-CIO 7th annual convention unanimously endorsed the Johnson-Humphrey ticket and went on to pledge all-out support for Atty.-Gen. Robert F. Kennedy as U.S. senator.

In the jam-packed grand ballroom of the Commodore Hotel, the nearly 1,650 delegates voted, with only 3 standing in the negative, to endorse Kennedy. During debate on the resolution, however, delegates of the Seafarers, National Maritime Union and Plastic, Toy & Novelty Workers, had previously announced their official intention to abstain.

Kennedy in an appearance before the convention, was greeted with uproarious applause, whistles and improvised sound effects as he spelled out his position on major issues and programs of the campaign.

He remarked that his Republican opponent, incumbent Sen. Kenneth Keating, who addressed the convention the previous day, had "brought someone with him—Sen. Jacob K. Javits." Informed that he could also bring someone with him, he said, "I brought my wife," adding that since the subject of alleged Democratic "bossism" had been mentioned in the press, "I brought the boss."

Keating Defends Record

Keating, in an earlier speech, had defended his record as a Republican progressive. The COPE voting report shows that Keating in his six years in the Senate is credited with 17 "right" votes and 14 "wrong." His overall record including earlier service in the House, shows 27 votes listed "right" by COPE and 36 "wrong."

Keating has refused to pledge support of the Republican presidential nominee, Sen. Goldwater, and faces opposition from the Conservative Party, a group of dissident Republicans which also opposed Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller in 1962.

The resolution endorsing Kennedy was made by State AFL-CIO Pres. Raymond R. Corbett, delegate from Local 40 of the Iron Workers, who temporarily turned the chairmanship over to Ellis Van Riper, a vice president and an official of the Transport Workers.

"New York with its great traditions of leadership in labor and social measures should be represented in the Senate by a man who will follow in the footsteps of our beloved and respected Herbert H. Lehman," the resolution began, concluding as follows:

"The nomination made by the Democratic Party makes it possible for us here in New York to keep in the public service a liberal statesman of proven experience and ability who will effectively promote the interests of the State of New York and the nation as a whole. . . . Therefore the New York State AFL-CIO . . . endorses the candidacy of Robert F. Kennedy . . . and pledges its full support for his election."

Backed by Liberals

Kennedy was nominated for the Senate by New York Democrats the day before he appeared at the AFL-CIO state convention and also won Liberal Party backing.

He resigned as Attorney General in a meeting with Pres. Johnson and began what was expected to become an intense campaign against Republican charges that he is a "carpetbagger" who has voted in Massachusetts and lived in Virginia.

There are no legal bars to Kennedy's nomination, and he pointed out that his family has had a New York residence for 40 years, that he himself was educated partly in New York schools. He began his acceptance speech before the Democratic nominating convention, "Fellow New Yorkers. . . ."

Labor Day Traffic Toll Feared High

Chicago—A grim warning that between 490 and 590 Americans may die in traffic accidents over the long Labor Day weekend was sounded by the National Safety Council in an appeal for extra care in driving.

In addition, between 20,000 and 23,000 persons may be injured, the council predicted. A study of past Labor Day accidents, it said, has shown that speeding was a factor in more than half and that drinking, a factor in one out of eight accidents on a year-around basis, is doubled to one in four over the holiday weekend.

Michigan Foe Of Rights Bill Loses Seat

while Lesinski voted against it, the latter raising some of the same questions about the measure later used by Sen. Barry Goldwater, Republican presidential nominee, in announcing his hostile Senate vote.

Lesinski carried the Ford Motor Co.'s home city of Dearborn, where thousands of Negroes work but very few live, but by less than a 5-4 margain. In nine other suburban communities and in southwestern Detroit, Dingell built up a lead giving him more than 30,000 total votes to Lesinski's 25,000 in nearly complete unofficial returns. Only about 12 percent of the district's population is Negro.

Both organized labor and the Michigan state Democratic organization assailed Lesinski's anti-civil rights vote. His response was to proclaim himself an "unbossed" candidate.

City of Detroit voters approved a so-called "homeowners' rights" ordinance designed to aid resistance to open-occupancy principles. A sponsor of the ordinance, Thomas L. Poindexter, ran first in a multiple-candidate race for a city council vacancy.

Democratic Sen. Philip A. Hart of Michigan, a first-termer beginning to gain prominence, won renomination without a contest. He will face Mrs. Elly Peterson, until recently Republican National Committee women's activities director, in November.

Republican Gov. George W. Romney overwhelmed his only rival, George N. Higgins, who had tried to hitch himself to Goldwater's coattails, in winning renomination for a second term, by a 7-1 margin. The Democratic nominee, who had no opposition, is Neil Staebler, former party state chairman and now a representative-at-large in the House.

UAW Wins 'Historic' Pact at Chrysler

Pensions, Relief Time Top Gains

By Eugene A. Kelly

Detroit—An early retirement pension of up to $400 a month for Chrysler workers at age 60 with 30 years of service has been won by the Auto Workers in an agreement with the Chrysler Corp. hailed by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther as "historic."

The three-year settlement, reached within minutes of a scheduled walkout of 74,000 workers in 46 Chrysler plants, will give Chrysler Corp. workers an unprecedented pension benefit of $4.25 a month per year of service; more relief time in the shop, and these additional gains:

- Wage increases of 6 to 12 cents an hour each year, with the first year's increase going into the fringes.
- Two additional paid holidays.
- New and improved early retirement benefits.
- Increased protection for widows and families of deceased employes and retirees.
- Group life, sickness and accident insurance fully paid by the company.
- Higher pensions for workers already retired.
- Increased supplemental unemployment benefits, jury duty pay, bereavement pay, certain psychiatric benefits, and other improvements.

Besides these gains, the union won what Reuther called "the largest increase in relief time ever negotiated in a single contract"—from 24 minutes per day of time away from the production line to 36 minutes, an increase that was a major UAW objective.

The union, after ironing out contract language and seeking membership approval of the new pact, next will try to win similar agreements from General Motors and Ford Motor, covering 470,000 more UAW members. After that it will turn its attention to the smallest manufacturer, American Motors.

The union and management listed these highlights of the new accord:

Annual Improvement Factor: Pay increases of 2.5 percent will be continued for the first two years of the contract and 2.8 percent will be given in the third year. The increase due immediately will be diverted to help pay for improvements in other benefits, but employes will realize a pay increase as management assumes the full cost of insurance.

The increases will be 2.5 percent of each employe's base rate or six cents an hour, whichever

1 Man, 1 Vote Forces Win Major Decision in Senate

FOLLOWING A TRADITION of all recent Democratic presidential candidates, Pres. Johnson opens his formal reelection campaign with a Labor Day speech in Detroit's Cadillac Square. The President pledged that his Administration would keep control of nuclear weapons in the Chief Executive as the nation's top elected civilian official.

Cloture Bid Swamped By 63-30

By David L. Perlman

The Senate delivered a stunning setback to a drive to nullify the Supreme Court's one man, one vote mandate for reapportionment of state legislatures — a drive which had appeared virtually unstoppable just a few weeks earlier.

By a lopsided 63-30 vote, the Senate defeated an attempt by Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) to limit debate and force a vote on his proposal to block federal court action on reapportionment at least until 1966.

This issue remained alive, however, as the Senate rejected, 49-38, a motion to table the court-curb proposal. The tabling motion was made hastily by a supporter of Dirksen, who then voted against his own motion.

The court-curbing plan had been offered as a rider on the foreign aid bill before the Democratic convention, and it appeared for a time that it would be adopted as an alternative to more drastic measures. A then-small group of liberals took the floor with the avowed intention of preventing a vote until public opinion had a chance to express itself.

Margin Unexpected

Dirksen had conceded in advance that he was unlikely to win the two-thirds majority needed under the Senate rules to limit debate. But he had predicted a close vote, which would set the stage for a second cloture effort more likely to succeed.

The unexpectedly large vote against cloture—more than two-thirds the other way—demolished any immediate prospect of a second try. Fifty-four Democrats and

Meany Tells IAM Convention:

'Clear-Cut Choice' Offered by Johnson

By John M. Barry

Miami Beach—The 1964 presidential election gives organized labor a "clear-cut choice" between progress and retreat, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared as he called on the nation's trade unionists to translate their support for Pres. Johnson into "votes in the box" on election day.

Addressing nearly 1,500 delegates to the Machinists convention, largest in the IAM's history, Meany noted that the AFL-CIO General Board had given unanimous endorsement to the Johnson-Humphrey ticket after comparing the platforms and candidates offered by the Democratic and Republican Parties.

On the one hand, he observed, "we have Lyndon Johnson, thrust into office by the assassination of John F. Kennedy, with a 10-month record of legislative accomplishment as fine as any 10-month period in our history."

On the other hand, the GOP candidate, Sen. Barry Goldwater, has compiled a Senate voting record that by labor's scorecard is "100 percent wrong," the AFL-CIO president asserted. "He didn't vote right once—even by mistake," he added.

"On Nov. 3 we are going to decide whether we move forward with those who stand for progress or move backward into the last century."

Urging the IAM to work closely with the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education to get its members registered and to the polls, he observed that labor has the organization, the members and the votes to provide the basis for a

Peace, Unity Theme Set By President

By Willard Shelton

Pres. Johnson opened his reelection campaign with a Labor Day speech in Detroit's Cadillac Square, appealing for national unity across group lines and pledging that under his Administration control of nuclear weapons would remain strictly the province of the Chief Executive.

A crowd estimated at 100,000 persons thronged the square as the President devoted a major section of his speech to the theme of peace and the building of a national society of justice to all, every man enjoying his constitutional rights to the full without regard to "race or color" or "how he spells his name."

Johnson's tone was almost nonpartisan in this first campaign speech and placed heavy emphasis on the common task of building "prosperity, justice and peace."

He hit hard, nevertheless, at the proposal of Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Republican nominee, that military commanders in the field be given "more leeway" in deciding when and whether to use "small tactical" nuclear weapons in case of an attack on our forces.

Without naming Goldwater, the President assailed the suggestion that "tactical" nuclear weapons might be described as "conventional," and said flatly, "There is no

Labor Day Broadcasts Cite Unfinished Tasks

Organized labor's message was carried to all parts of the United States and Canada on Labor Day in a series of radio broadcasts stressing the "unfinished business" of providing better lives for all Americans.

Top-ranking AFL-CIO spokesmen warned that the problem of unemployment must be met head-on, that automation must be made to serve the people—and that the labor movement must ever be on the alert to frustrate those who would destroy it.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, speaking over the Columbia Broadcasting System network, put unemployment "first on our agenda on unsolved problems and unfinished business.

"The rate of automation and technical change is such," he said, "that while new workers are entering the labor force in ever-increasing numbers, fewer and fewer workers are needed to maintain the same level of production. Consequently, rising levels of production, sales and profits have not been matched by any substantial reduc-

Merged Union Starts Life in Graphic Field

New York—A new union, the Lithographers & Photoengravers Intl. Union, came into existence here on Labor Day.

Offspring of a merger between the Lithographers, founded in 1882, and the Photo Engravers, founded in 1900, the merged union has more than 50,000 pressmen and platemakers as members.

Its new head is Kenneth J. Brown, who was ALA president. Other officers are Executive Vice Pres. William J. Hall, former IPEW president; Recording & Financial Sec. Donald W. Stone, former ALA

CENTENNIAL CONVENTION of the Plasterers, held in Philadelphia, was opened with a special ceremony at the Liberty Bell in Independence Hall during which Pres. Paul D'Ortona (right) of the City Council presented a resolution of welcome to Union Pres. Edward J. Leonard, who is a former president of the Pittsburgh City Council.

Plasterers Back LBJ In First Endorsement

Philadelphia—For the first time in its 100-year history, the Plasterers & Cement Masons endorsed candidates for President and Vice President of the United States, giving unanimous support to Democrats Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey.

The unanimous action of the association's 40th convention followed a declaration by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that "preservation of the free way of life and our type of society" depended on defeat of Sen. Barry Goldwater in November.

"There is nothing else at the moment that is as important," Meany told cheering delegates representing 66,785 members in 512 locals.

Warning against taking Goldwater's candidacy too lightly, Meany reminded his audience of the 22 million lives lost in World War II because "nobody took Adolph Hitler seriously."

"When I saw the takeover of the Republican Party by the John Birch Society, I couldn't help but compare what happened in Germany and what was taking place here," he said in assailing the GOP candidate's support of political extremism.

Record Cited

Pointing up the threats to maintenance of labor's hard-won rights in Goldwater's support of a national so-called "right-to-work" law and his "opposition to everything that is for the people—unemployment insurance, social security, minimum wages, medicare, etc.," Meany stressed that maintenance of world peace also rested on Goldwater's defeat.

"This," he declared, "is more important than wages, hours or anything else we could talk about.

"Who is going to have the responsibility of guiding us, keeping us militarily strong and making the decision or refusing to make the decision which could perhaps wipe out civilization as we know it? Is it to be the Lyndon Johnson we have seen in action and at the side of John F. Kennedy in time of crisis, or Barry Goldwater, of whom we are unsure what he stands for because he himself is not quite sure?"

Meany closed with the assurance that victory is certain in November with "American labor again demonstrating its devotion to a free and a peaceful world by going right into our home communities and getting out the vote."

The importance of "grass roots" activity also was stressed by National COPE Dir. Al Barkan. Other convention speakers included Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building Trades Dept., Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. John Livingston and Robert H. Moore, deputy director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

500 Teachers Out on Strike On Pay Issue

East St. Louis, Ill. — Summer vacation didn't end on schedule for many of this city's 21,000 public school pupils, who stayed home because of a teachers' strike.

On school-opening day some 500 members of AFT Local 1220 picketed board headquarters in protest against what they called broken promises by board members. Another 225 teachers, not in the union, reported for class but fewer than 10,000 pupils crossed the picket lines and many of those were dismissed, the union said.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, three teachers named in a court injunction agreed to stop picketing but their colleagues said they would keep trying to hold the lines pending a showdown with the school board.

The strike was the second effort within a few months to win a better deal for teachers in this heavily Democratic community across the Mississippi from St. Louis.

Mayor Intervenes

Mayor Alvin Fields (D) stepped into the dispute by offering to "do all we can to settle it."

The union struck to protest the board's refusal to keep an agreement reached last May to end a four-day strike, first in local history. The agreement, the union said, was for wage increases totaling $306,000 and a proviso that no teacher would get a pay cut for respecting the picket line.

Last summer the board "welched" on the agreement, union officials said, and the union then sought a new contract with a 10 percent wage increase.

The Illinois Federation of Teachers is in full support of Local 1220, Executive Sec. Oscar Weil announced.

Pres. Matthew Lynch of the Tennessee AFL-CIO has been appointed by Pres. Johnson to the National Citizens Committee for Community Relations, set up in the Commerce Dept. under the Civil Rights Act.

Automation Impact Recognized:

CWA Wins 15c Wage Hike In Michigan Bell Reopener

Detroit—A wage agreement involving increases up to $8.50 per week and including recognition of the impact of automation was reached here between the Communications Workers and the Michigan Bell Telephone Co., covering 15,000 workers.

CWA President Joseph A. Beirne placed the wage gains at a range of 7 to 22 cents per hour. The average hike was estimated at 15 cents. This year's 15-cent average wage increase comes on top of the 20 cents won last year in wages and fringe benefits for the first year of the 38-month contract.

The settlement is expected to affect the wages of employes of various companies in the Bell System throughout the nation, CWA said.

The agreement was reached under the terms of a wage reopener. In addition to basic wages, it involves pay boosts through town and job reclassifications—two of the union's major goals in this round of negotiations.

The union won recognition of the effect automation has had on the jobs of telephone operators. Experienced operators throughout Michigan will have their jobs upgraded an extra $1 per week over and above any other wage increases. The job upgrading takes into consideration the higher skills required in working with automated equipment.

The upgrading of the job of experienced operators in Michigan is the first provision of its kind negotiated in the telephone industry.

Other details include wage hikes ranging from $2.50 per week for new employes to $5 per week for top skilled craftsmen in all towns and all wage zones in Michigan. In addition, new operators in Detroit will get an extra $3. New operators in other towns will get an extra $2.50.

All switchmen, switchboard and telephone installers in Grand Rapids, Saginaw and 19 smaller towns in Western Michigan are being upgraded up to an extra $3.50 to narrow the gap in wage zones. All operators in the same area and towns will be upgraded an extra $2.

In the 21 upgraded towns, this year's wage boost for top skilled craftsmen will be $8.50.

Typical wage levels before the new settlement include $141 for top craftsmen and $87 for telephone operators in Detroit. The old rates ranged downward to $75 for operators in such smaller communities as Iron Mountain.

Approval of the settlement is required by the union's 19-member national executive board which flew into Detroit. It must also be approved by the union's 15,000 members in Michigan. A vote will be conducted within a few days.

July Lost Time At Postwar Low

Work time lost because of work stoppages in July was at the lowest level for the month since the end of World War II—15 one-hundredths of 1 percent of total estimated working time.

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that 660 stoppages affected 194,000 workers during the month.

Government Employes Hail Membership Rise

Dallas, Tex.—Membership in the Government Employes has increased by about 30,000 since 1962 to 140,000 and at its present rate of growth the union's rolls will reach the 250,000 mark within four years, delegates to the union's 19th convention were told.

In his report to the Dallas parley, Pres. John F. Griner stressed the union's continued upswing in membership and the need for expanded services and activities to take full advantage of the collective bargaining rights now available to federal workers under an executive order issued in 1962 by the late Pres. Kennedy.

About 250 AFGE locals have been recognized for bargaining purposes at U.S. installations throughout the nation, Griner declared. They represent about 175,000 federal employes, including some who have thus far failed to join but are nevertheless in the bargaining units.

Reviewing the union's legislative activities, which constituted a major part of its program, Griner cited the recently-enacted federal pay hike as a key accomplishment.

Per Capita Vote

Delegates were scheduled to vote later in the convention on a number of proposals to increase the 75-cent per month per capita tax. Griner said a rise is needed to expand organizing activities and improve service to locals.

Griner also urged the convention to adopt a program calling for changes in the government's labor-management program. Among them were access to arbitration procedures to resolve bargaining deadlocks and establishment of a board with union representation to interpret and police the policy laid down by the Kennedy order.

Speakers early in the convention included Senate Civil Service Committee Chairman Olin D. Johnston (D-S. C.), Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), Rep. Joe Pool (D-Tex.) and Rep. James Morrison (D-La.). Interior Sec. Stewart Udall, who was accompanying Yarborough on a visit to Texas, paid an unscheduled call on the convention and addressed the delegates.

Johnston reviewed this year's successful campaign for federal employe pay raise legislation and praised the union for the part it played in gaining enactment of the bill. Turning to politics, Johnston attacked Republican Presidential Nominee Barry Goldwater's voting record on labor-backed legislation.

In response to a resolution, a special committee recommended that a delegation composed of representatives of each of the union's 14 districts place a wreath at the site of Pres. Kennedy's assassination here. After two brief but emotional speeches by delegates, the recommendation was amended to provide that the convention recess and the approximately 600 delegates make the six-block journey to the assassination site to honor the memory of the late President.

Included in business slated for the final days of the meeting was the election of the union's two top national officers, president and secretary treasurer. Both posts were being contested.

Pensions, Relief Time Gains Mark UAW-Chrysler Contract

is larger, in accordance with a payment schedule that starts at 6 cents for those with a straight-time hourly wage rate less than $2.60 and goes to 12 cents for those earning $4.60 and up.

Cost of Living Allowance: Nine cents of the current 14-cent cost of living allowance are incorporated into base pay rates at once. The allowance could not decline more than five cents, therefore, and the employe's base rate for insurance and incentive pay would be higher, the negotiators said.

Relief Time: Time off the job for employes receiving "tag relief" and employes on jobs where workers have no control over their work pace will be increased from 12 to 18 minutes before lunch, and from 12 to 18 minutes after lunch for a total of 36 minutes.

Pensions: The current plan has been "improved significantly," the company and union agreed, by substantial increases in the benefit rate for all future retirements and new incentive benefits for early retirement.

For employes retiring in the future the pension benefit rate beginning Jan. 1, 1965, will be increased from $2.80 a month to $4.25 for each year of credited service. Combined with new supplemental benefits, this total can reach $400 a month to a maximum of 70 percent of the employe's base pay.

The wife or dependent husband of an employe who dies on or after Sept. 1, 1964, and who had reached retirement age with 10 or more years of credited service, would receive a monthly survivor's benefit for life, equal to 55 percent of the basic monthly benefit the employe would have been eligible for had he voluntarily retired and elected a survivorship option.

Other pension benefits include: retirement at age 62 or older without reduction of the monthly benefit rate; incentive supplemental payments to age 65 for certain retirements; liberalized benefits for permanent total disability retirements.

Expanded Group Insurance Coverage: Effective October 1964, Chrysler Corp. will pay the full cost of premiums for life and sickness and accident insurance for employes while actively at work—an increase in take-home pay for those now contributing $4 to $11.64 monthly.

Widow's Pension

The survivor of an insured employe who dies on or after Oct. 1, 1964 would get $100 a month for up to 24 months. If a widow dies within 24 months, the remaining benefit would go to dependent children under 21 or a dependent parent.

Other improvements include increased life insurance for future retirees, the waiving of contributions for certain employes who become totally disabled, and other changes.

Hospital-Medical Coverage: The agreement will provide new programs offering short-term therapy for psychiatric illnesses, increased hospital benefits for nevous and mental disorders, long-term illness, convalescent care, post- and prenatal care, and better protection for survivors of retirees and employes over 60.

SUB Plan: Effective in 1965, the maximum supplemental unemployment benefit will be raised to $50 plus $1.50 for each dependent up to four ($60 for salaried workers). Current maximums are $40 and $50 with no added payment for dependents.

Separation payments by the company will be raised approximately 40 percent. A laid-off employe with a wage rate of $3 an hour and 15 years of seniority could receive severance pay of $1,500 under the former plan, $2,100 under the new one.

Holidays: Good Friday and an employe's own birthday will be aded to the previous seven holidays.

In Washington, Pres. Johnson said at a press conference he was pleased a settlement had been reached "peacefully and privately on true good faith and collective bargaining." Adding that he did not know all details, Johnson said he was "gratified" by statements of both parties that the agreement will mean more jobs and will be noninflationary.

The Chrysler-UAW agreement negotiated three years ago had an Aug. 31 expiration date but was extended to Sept. 9 by agreement.

Local Strikes

Strikes over unsettled local contract issues were called at a few Chrysler locations but Reuther in a statement announcing the settlement said that all locals were notified to "continue to negotiate on local union matters until further notice and further instructions."

Reuther called the national pact "the most historic agreement in the history of the American labor movement with respect to the broad problem of pension security for workers."

The pension plan will permit retirement at a reduced pension at age 55, Reuther said, and will increase the pension benefits of all previously retired Chrysler workers.

Factory Injuries Up 6% in Quarter

The injury rate in U.S. factories rose sharply in the second quarter of 1964 to a level of 12.6 disabling injuries per million hours worked, the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Labor Dept. has reported.

This was 6 percent above the level of the preceding quarter and the second quarter of 1963. At the same time the cumulative average rate for the first six months of 1964, at 12.4, rose 6 percent above the comparable 1963 average for six months.

The BLS said the second quarter rise was widely dispersed through many industries.

Rail Firemen Weather 5,300 Membership Loss

Cleveland, O.—The Firemen & Enginemen have "weathered" the loss of some 5,300 members following the arbitration ruling in the dispute between U.S. railroads and the BLF&E on the use of locomotive firemen-helpers, Pres. H. E. Gilbert has reported.

Under terms of an arbitration proceeding ordered by Congress, the railroads were permitted as of May 7 to begin eliminating up to 90 percent of the firemen in freight and yard service on the basis of attrition, Gilbert said. He noted, however, that a two-year time limit on the ruling of the arbitration board, plus safe-crew laws in several states, prevented railroads from applying "the full potential" of the ruling.

A survey among general chairmen of the union to determine the number of men eliminated in the period May 1- Aug. 1 indicated that 9,564 men, including 4,206 members of other rail operating unions, had been separated from service and had received a total of $22 million in severance pay, the BLF&E man said.

The figures released by Gilbert on BLF&E membership showed 50,254 active and furloughed members as of May 1 and 44,896 as of Aug. 1, a drop of 5,358, which includes members who died, retired or withdrew as well as those separated under the arbitration ruling.

"The BLF&E has weathered the award's impact," Gilbert said in the Enginemen's Press. "I look for a more stable membership figure for the rest of the award period.

"Our organization remains strong and is determined to fight with honor" those who hope to "pick our bones."

Machinists Convention Stresses Election Drive

Johnson-Humphrey victory.

"But this doesn't mean a thing unless you get the votes in the box on election day," he warned.

Meany's address followed a strongly worded keynote speech by IAM Pres. A. J. Hayes attacking the extremism advocated by Goldwater in the defense of a "selfish, self-serving brand of liberty, justice or freedom."

"We happen to believe that extremism to defend the kind of freedom Sen. Goldwater espouses is a vice," Hayes declared.

"We do not believe that the word 'freedom' in our Constitution was ever intended to mean freedom to exploit the disadvantages of others . . . to work for low wages . . . to live in slums . . . to suffer discrimination . . . to be denied an education . . . to suffer unnecessarily from sickness and disease."

The extremism forces and "their chosen leaders," he said, "believe that they and they alone own freedom, and that they and they alone have the right to define freedom and to ration freedom on the basis of their definition.

Unequal Rations

"Throughout our entire history these self-proclaimed guardians of freedom and their predecessors have, through their power and influence, rationed freedom in unequal amounts. Those with the greatest advantages of wealth, influence and prestige get the lion's share and those with the greatest disadvantages get the least."

Citing the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts and state so-called "right-to-work" laws, Hayes warned the delegates not to "shrug off" or take lightly the efforts of extremist forces to "divide and disintegrate" unions. The gains accomplished by organized labor over the past 75 years are at stake in the current election campaign, he declared.

Meany, too, hit at Goldwater's advocacy of "extremism in the defense of liberty" during the GOP candidate's acceptance speech at the Republican convention and scoffed at his attempt to explain it later.

Political Extremism

Republican moderates who had urged the convention to take a strong stand against extremism "weren't talking about extremism in music," he said.

"They weren't talking about extremism in architecture, or by a nation when it goes to war," he continued. "They were talking about political extremism as exemplified by the Communist Party, by Hitler in Nazi Germany, by the Ku Klux Klan—the kind of extremism that says it's all right to use any means to gain an end, the kind of extremism employed by the John Birch Society when it labeled John Foster Dulles and former Pres. Eisenhower as agents of the Communist Party."

Beyond labor's immediate stake in the coming election, the federation president observed, is an issue that transcends all others in importance to the survival of the nation—the control of nuclear weapons.

"Whose hand is going to be on the trigger?" he asked. "Who's going to push the button?"

Citing Goldwater's suggestions that field commanders in the armed forces be given authority to employ certain nuclear weapons, Meany continued:

"Are we going to trust someone who spends the best part of today explaining what he meant yesterday, or someone whose judgment is sound and solid?"

Hayes, noting that he was presiding for the last time at an IAM convention (he will reach the union's compulsory retirement age of 65 next year), recalled that the IAM's membership rolls had grown by 69 percent to a total of about 875,000 since he took office in 1949.

Solutions Needed

"The present trend is upward," he said, but he warned that the labor movement faces a "serious challenge from automation" and that a major task of the delegates would be to seek solutions to unemployment and the other human problems left in the wake of technological progress.

An officers' report also warned that the nation could find itself engulfed in "economic chaos" unless it finds solutions to these problems.

The report urged the delegates to establish bargaining and legislative goals to counter technological job displacement, including increased consumer purchasing power, reduction of the workweek to 35 hours, longer vacations, earlier retirement on adequate pensions and extension of free public education beyond high school.

Meany Spurs Telegrams For Hospital Care Bill

Miami Beach—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany made a strong appeal to Machinists convention delegates here to help win passage of social security hospital insurance by sending personal telegrams to their representatives in Congress and rallying similar support in their home locals. Meany noted that the hospital care measure had been passed in the Senate and that House members soon would have to stand up and be counted on the issue.

He urged the delegates to wire their congressmen from the convention hall. A Western Union representative was stationed at a display booth sponsored by the National Council of Senior Citizens to process the wires.

The hospital care bill, Meany told the delegates, will help "not only our retired workers, but every single one of us who has parents, relatives, uncles, aunts or anyone else who is faced with catastrophic illness and almost impossible bills for medical care."

With Senate passage of the measure, he observed, "We now have a chance to win."

Adopting a phrase by the Democratic vice presidential candidate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, Meany drew laughter from the 1,500 delegates when he pointed out that 49 senators had voted in favor of social security hospital care—"but not Sen. Goldwater."

In Letter and Spirit

THE OVERRIDING FACT about the Civil Rights Act of 1964 is that its enactment represented a national consensus. An overwhelming majority of both parties in both the House and Senate voted for the new law. Without the bipartisanship that dominated the debate there would have been no legislation.

It is against this background that the AFL-CIO has launched its broadly-based drive to secure support of the spirit and the letter of the new act. Organized labor was in the thick of the fight to win passage, working with the men of good will in both parties—not because of any self-interest but because a meaningful civil rights bill was right in the moral, economic, political and social sense of that word.

The bipartisanship that was responsible for the passage of the act, the national consensus that provided the votes for passage, must now be turned to the job of securing voluntary compliance with the act's provisions. This means business and industry as well as labor, and the entire range of community and civic organizations.

The establishment of a clear consensus by law can begin to reduce prejudice and hate. The job now is to make sure that the law does not become an empty legislative monument.

Humphrey for Vice President

THE CONTRAST between the Republican and Democratic tickets is nowhere sharper than in the choice of vice presidential candidates.

In this complex and complicated age, with its ever-increasing burdens on the presidency, the choice of a vice presidential candidate can no longer be dictated by political considerations—the balancing of a ticket by geographical, religious or other considerations.

Yet in San Francisco, the Republicans chose, in the words of the AFL-CIO General Board statement, "a wheelhorse of the least enlightened wing" of the party, a man who is ill-equipped to be the country's vice president, much less to assume the presidency.

The selection of Rep. William E. Miller by the GOP reflected not only the ticket-balancing bit but also the total victory by the right-wingers, not only control of the convention but absolute control of the party itself.

In Atlantic City the choice of Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey was made in terms of more vital considerations. Pres. Johnson's basic approach was to find a man who could, if necessary, assume the duties of the presidency; who would be qualified also to aid the President in the discharge of the numerous and important tasks that have in the last few decades come to the Chief Executive.

Humphrey's record of legislative achievement and leadership is one of the finest ever compiled in the Senate. Alongside his accomplishments, his articulate advocacy of human rights and human progress, Miller's record and views are at best nondescript and pedestrian even in terms of his right-wing views.

The comparison comes through most vividly perhaps in the voting records of the two men on positions supported by the AFL-CIO.

Since his election to the Senate, Humphrey has voted with the position urged by labor 60 times; he has never voted against it.

Miller in his years in the House has compiled a record of 8 votes for the position urged by the AFL-CIO and 47 against measures that would best serve labor and the nation.

Election a 'Necessity':

Johnson-Humphrey Candidacy Endorsed by New York Times

The New York Times endorsed the Johnson-Humphrey ticket on Aug. 27, last day of the Democratic convention in Atlantic City. Following is the text of the endorsement editorial.

IN THE NINE MONTHS he has held the office which he attained under such tragic circumstances, Lyndon B. Johnson has acquitted himself well.

He effected the transition from the Kennedy Administration to his own with dignity and skill; he made no serious misstep at a time when missteps would have been easy, and he has carried on with conspicuous success the legislative program established by his predecessor.

But all through this year it has inevitably been a legacy that Lyndon Johnson was executing. He has been finishing out an unexpired term; and although he has stamped the various accomplishments of the year with his own particular brand of fitness, the programs and policies have—with the sole exception of the anti-poverty proposals—been basically those of the man who defeated him for the Democratic presidential nomination four short years ago.

Now, and from here on out, Mr. Johnson is on his own. He has at last achieved the great ambition which has haunted him so long, the nomination by his party for the presidency of the United States—and he has achieved it without one single dissenting vote.

If the action of the Democrats assembled at Atlantic City seems more in the nature of a coronation than a nominating convention, even that is politically understandable in view of Mr. Johnson's record in the presidency thus far, his relations with the Congress and the control he has so clearly established over his own party machinery.

Lyndon B. Johnson is without doubt one of the master politicians of this century, with the weaknesses that the characterization implies as well as its strengths. But he is a good deal more than that. A man of enormous ability and energy, his philosophy of government is generally progressive in domestic policy and responsibly outward-looking in foreign policy, in favorable contrast to both the proclamations and the platform of his opponent.

As the campaign develops, the points of difference between Mr. Johnson and Mr. Goldwater will become increasingly apparent in respect to such issues as civil rights, management of the economy, the social responsibilities of government, the control of nuclear weapons, the policy of the U.S. toward its actual friends and its potential enemies.

We will discuss these in detail in the ensuing weeks but they are clear enough already. In our opinion they point to an inescapably logical conclusion: the necessity of electing Lyndon Johnson as President and of administering a decisive and definite defeat to the voices of the past.

THE NOMINATION of Sen. Hubert Humphrey for Vice President is a deserved recognition of capacity, public service and personal growth. When he first appeared on the national scene as a freshman senator from Minnesota in 1948, he struck many observers as a man of glib tongue and mechanical convictions. He is still in no danger of being thought taciturn, but his patient, tireless and constructive work in the Senate has amply demonstrated the depth and seriousness of his convictions.

His interests are exceptionally diverse; so is the breadth of his knowledge. He has lost none of his early idealism and candor, yet he has also grown as a political leader through his willingness to take on the hard, unglamorous tasks of legislative compromise and political negotiation. The imagination and skill with which he worked to effect an honorable settlement of the dispute over the rival Mississippi delegations are not diminished by the eventual refusal of either faction to go along.

Mr. Humphrey and Lyndon Johnson entered the Senate together and early developed the close working relationship that now enters a new and more significant stage. With his debating skill, ready wit and keen mind, the vice presidential nominee will strengthen his party in the coming campaign. His expert knowledge of disarmament and his broad understanding of the complexities of foreign affairs should enable him to make an effective rebuttal to those who discuss America's world role in simplistic terms.

But dwarfing all other considerations is Mr. Humphrey's manifest capacity to take over the grave responsibilities of the Presidency if need should arise. In choosing him, Pres. Johnson has honored himself and his high office.

Morgan Says:

Some Thoughts on Labor Day, The Outer Banks and Politics

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THE WORLD is spinning toward autumn like a falling leaf. In some ways the Labor Day weekend is the saddest of holidays. The long summer days are already shortening and soon the late afternoons will huddle together in the dark.

Sensing this, people troop to the shore or hie to the hills for a last touch of nature before the season turns bleak and raw. The schoolboy sees the world closing in on him and the birds prepare to migrate from a fading summer to a fresher one.

Morgan

There can be a sharpness, a zest, to enjoyment in such a poignant atmosphere, however, as one lingers over the last drops of a good wine. For instance, scores of campers enjoyed the September surf pounding the beaches of Cape Hatteras, the long, clean but treacherous jut of sand in North Carolina's Outer Banks.

Sand crabs emerged tentatively from their holes, hoisted their black periscope eyes and peered warily over bits of driftwood. At the edge of the foam on the hard beach, sandpipers scurried for food. Terns and gulls wheeled overhead. Boys wrestled and girls preened, and vice versa, along the shore.

Looming over the scene was the great Cape Hatteras lighthouse. Taxpayers dogged or foolish enough to climb its 248-step spiral staircase leaned over the observation deck railing into the wind and stared out to sea. Some of them seemed deliberately to turn their backs on the mainland, which they would have to return to soon enough, and where, as if they didn't know, the politicians were already in full cry.

If this dwindled holiday has been sadder than the average Labor Day weekend perhaps it was in the knowledge that people would be returning not just to their own personal errands and problems but to the caterwauling of an election campaign wherein virtue is exaggerated, truth is strained and imprecations are scattered like litter at a picnic.

At such depressing junctures, in order for the population to survive the depredations of demagoguery, it may be wise for all of us to recall H. L. Mencken's axiom that more than a little of the art of lying resides in everybody. The devil of it is that we are all more covetous than we want to admit and this concealment provides the politicians with a hide-and-seek game in which to ply their promises.

"No healthy man, in his secret heart," Mencken wrote nearly 50 years ago, "is content with his destiny. He is tortured by dreams and images as a child is tortured by the thought of a state of existence in which it would live in a candy store and have two stomachs.

"Lying is the product of the unconscious yearning to realize such visions, and if the policeman, conscience, prevents the lie being put into plain words, then it is at least put into more or less plausible acts. We all play parts when we face our fellow-men, as even poets have noticed. . . .

"A man's wife, however realistic her view of him, always flatters him in the end, for the worst she sees in him is appreciably better, by the time she sees it, than what is actually there. What she sees, even at times of the most appalling domestic revelation and confidence, is not the authentic man at all, but a compound made up in part of the authentic man and in part of his projection of a gaudy ideal. The man who is most respected by his wife is the one who makes this projection most vivid—that is, the one who is the most daring and ingratiating liar. He can never, of course, deceive her utterly, but if he is skillful he may at least deceive her enough to make her happy."

THIS PASSAGE from the sardonic pen of the seer of Baltimore provokes a number of questions. How eager are we to be deceived? Granted that we all have secret, selfish dreams, are we so hungry for them that we will fall for any spellbinder's spiel that promises to make them come true—thereby revealing gullibility as our foremost national trait?

Is the fellow from Ohio, for example, who loads his family into a camp trailer and establishes a temporary beachhead at Cape Hatteras revolting against modern society and returning to nature? Or is he manifesting the normal need for a momentary change of scenery? And if that scenery is preserved by government against private exploitation so that he can enjoy it, does he resent it in the name of rugged individualism?

Or does he, trying to keep his own self-deception at a minimum now, concede that the structure of society is delicate and enormously complicated even unto the ebb and flow of holiday traffic, and allow that the politician who concedes it too is more realistic—and less of a prevaricator—than the one who does not?

Washington Reports:

Medical-Dental Study Loan Bill Seen Aid to Small Communities

NINETY-NINE U.S. counties haven't the services of a physician, Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.) declared as he argued for a bill that would offer incentives to young dentists and doctors to settle in communities that need them most.

Cotton was interviewed with Sen. Quentin N. Burdick (D-N.D.) on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 radio stations.

Burdick said the situation is extremely serious in his state of North Dakota.

"We have seven or eight cities, medium sized, without a doctor of any kind," he declared. "When someone becomes ill or is stricken with an attack, all he can get is first aid, and then travels 100 or 200 miles in an ambulance. It means death in some cases."

Cotton explained the bill would grant a forgiveness of 10 percent a year up to five years of the loan provided dental and medical students under the Health Professions Educational Act if the young man or woman settles in a community designated as in special need of such service.

Both senators pointed out that the situation in rural areas is deteriorating, since most medical and dental graduates today settle in metropolitan areas. Small communities that now have medical service often have to depend on men 65 years of age or older.

COTTON SAID a survey showed that 11 counties in Nebraska have no doctors; 60 towns in the state have no doctors, 10 have one, and 30 have doctors over 65 years old.

The situation is growing worse, he asserted, since people fear to live in communities that do not have a doctor.

"You can't get people to buy old farm houses or stay in them," he said. "Wealthy people don't want to take over an old farm house as a summer home or permanent residence any more, since one of the first things they ask is the availability of medical care."

The small communities, as in North Dakota, are most desirable locations, Burdick declared.

The measure was originally a part of the Health Provisions Education Act, which includes authority for loans to doctors, dentists and nurses to help them through college. As it stands now, as a separate bill, it would forgive up to 50 percent of the loan if the dentists and doctors settled in designated small towns and rural areas.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

SEN. GOLDWATER HAS PLACED his immediate future in the hands of the voters, and unless he upsets the predictions and wins the presidency he will be out of public office after Nov. 3. But either the senator himself or the political organization which built the powerful coalition of South and Midwest that assured his nomination at the San Francisco convention is taking steps to perpetuate Goldwater influence in the permanent party machine, the Republican National Committee.

The remaking of a national committee staff, after a new leader takes command of a party, is common enough—but usually the changes come at the top levels and professional staff members with long years of experience are retained. The Goldwater revamping has been swift and drastic.

A new national chairman in sympathy with the candidate is obviously needed, and the Republicans would have required a newcomer anyway because (1) former Chairman William E. Miller had announced his intention of resigning and (2) Goldwater picked him for the vice presidential nomination. The Arizona senator chose as chairman one of his own young men, Dean Burch of Phoenix, who previously served four years in the senator's Washington office.

It was widely assumed that Goldwater might pick F. Clifton White, one of the original group that in 1962-63 launched the drive to nominate the Arizona senator. White was credited by reporters who covered the California primary as the man who successfully organized Goldwater's forces against Gov. Rockefeller of New York—but White is older than Burch and he had the apparent disadvantage of having worked for GOP candidates in the past.

Burch is tough, terse and hardworking, and there is no question about his personal loyalty. He got the national committee job, while White ended up as head of whatever kind of citizens' committee of independents and dissident Democrats he can gather.

A FIGURE OF ALMOST EQUAL IMPORTANCE—perhaps of greater importance in the long run—is John Grenier of Alabama, kingpin in building the Republican organizations that sent 279 southern-state delegates to San Francisco and delivered almost all of them in a solid bloc to Goldwater.

Grenier, a 34-year-old lawyer, was announced at the national committee meeting immediately after the convention as "coordinator" for the southern section of Goldwater's campaign. He has been upgraded to the post of director of the entire operation and he is pushing experienced staff members into minor roles.

Dr. William Prendergast, the highly respected committee research director has been forced out. I. Lee Potter, for years director of the committee's southern division, is no longer functioning in the field, although he was just elected as Virginia's national committeeman. Lee Edwards, recently public relations director, was moved upstairs to vague duties as assistant to Burch. A. B. Hermann, probably most widely known among top committee officials, is in a minor role.

THE NEW CHIEF for press and information is L. Richard Guylay, brought back after serving in a similar capacity in the Eisenhower and Nixon campaigns of 1956 and 1960, whose original experience was gained as press chief for the late Sen. Taft.

Sen. Goldwater has a new personal press secretary—Paul J. Wagner, a public relations man with presumed Goldwater affinities although he says he had never met the senator in 12 years in Washington before the San Francisco convention. Edward K. Nellor and Tony Smith, previously functioning as the senator's press secretaries, have been moved to narrower duties.

Goldwater assured the national committee members at San Francisco that the campaign would be run through the regular party machinery, with state chairmen consulted before regional directors and coordinators were named for the immediate campaign. The consultation presumably is taking place, but control of the national committee allows the Goldwater forces to keep a tight rein.

"DOCTORS WHERE THEY'RE NEEDED MOST." That's in small towns and rural areas, Sen. Norris Cotton (R-N.H.), left, and Sen. Quentin Burdick (D-N.D.) declared as they were interviewed on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People. They are sponsors of a measure to forgive 10 percent of college loans each year for five years if the graduates settle in designated areas.

A TRIO OF PUBLICATIONS in the AFL-CIO's drive to secure voluntary compliance with the Civil Rights Act is available in quantity free of charge. They include, above, the 22-page pocket-size question-and-answer booklet "Equal Rights for All," a leaflet containing the Executive Council's five-point program, and, at right, the flyer "Civil Rights: Facts vs. Fiction." The three pieces can be ordered from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

Civil Rights: Facts vs. Fiction

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 is a new bill of rights for everyone, regardless of race, creed or color.

This basic fact has been overlooked, ignored or distorted by those who are opposed to equal rights for anyone.

This is—in capsule form—what the act provides:

JOBS: Starting in July 1965, discrimination and segregation in employment, or in unions, is forbidden. Complaints will be processed through state agencies; the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission acts only if a state fails to act.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS: Effective at once, every hotel, restaurant, theater or other facility catering to the general public must do exactly that. Thirty-one state laws, already in effect have even stronger provisions.

SCHOOLS: The Attorney General of the United States has greater power to implement the Supreme Court decision of 1954 prohibiting segregation in public schools.

VOTING RIGHTS: Both the federal courts and the Attorney General are instructed to make sure registration and voting rights are safeguarded under uniform, reasonable standards.

There are other provisions in the law; a detailed analysis is available free of charge from the AFL-CIO. But these are the basic points.

Enemies of civil rights, enemies of labor, enemies of democracy itself are spreading lies about the terms of the act in order to play upon the fears of homeowners, parents, employers and workers. Here is the truth about the kind of lies that are told:

FICTION: "If you sell a house, you have to sell to a Negro."

FACT: The AFL-CIO believes that discrimination in housing should be ended. But there is no reference whatever to housing in the Civil Rights Act.

FICTION: "Your children will be sent out of the neighborhood to some Negro school."

FACT: Local school boards in some cities, operating under state and local statutes, have instituted pupil transfers in an effort to achieve better racial balance in their schools. But there is no such requirement in the Civil Rights Act, which provides only that schools must not be segregated.

FICTION: "A certain number of Negroes will have to be hired on every job, even if white people have to be fired to make room for them."

FACT: This is a myth. The law will properly put an end to discrimination in employment —including discrimination in seniority systems. But it does not in any way interfere with existing job rights. There are no "quotas" established. As a matter of fact, "inverse discrimination," even if intended to offset past evils, would actually be a violation of the law.

In short, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, in letter and spirit, is dedicated to justice—to the principles of democracy and fair play which are in the highest American tradition.

Wirtz Calls Backlash 'Slander and a Libel'

"Loose talk" about "something called the so-called white backlash" to the Civil Rights Act is a "slander and a libel designed to poison the wellsprings of truth upon which democracy depends," Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said in a Labor Day talk at annual wreath-laying ceremonies at the Cardinal Gibbons monument in Washington, D. C.

"Rarely has the truth been so corrupted by a catch-phrase," said Wirtz, who asserted that the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its Washington meeting "rejected squarely the infamous implication that American labor would condone the bigotry this phrase implies."

Declaring that violence in a government by the people is anarchy—a matter of civil disobedience—he said "murderers in southern swamps and rioters in eastern cities must be clearly identified for what they are—corrupters of law and order and enemies" to themselves and others.

The roots of bigotry and violence are poverty and ignorance, said Wirtz, who declared Pres. Johnson's "war on poverty" represents the "great national commitment" of the century and must include an "equally urgent war" on ignorance.

Sermon by Msgr. Higgins

Wirtz's talk followed the annual St. Joseph the Workman mass of the Catholic archdiocese at the Shrine of the Sacred Heart, with Msgr. George G. Higgins of the National Catholic Welfare Conference as speaker. Labor with all its strengths and faults is doing a creditable job, he said, and the "staggering" problems of widespread unemployment, degrading poverty and race discrimination must be solved by all groups, he declared.

Archbishop Patrick A. O'Boyle of Washington said that the labor movement has progressed far from the days of his boyhood, in a coal and steel town in Pennsylvania, when the injured were brought home from the mills and "practically forgotten." He urged that Labor Day and other national holidays be celebrated as days of prayer and thanksgiving.

ILPA Issues Directory of Labor Press

A new labor press directory has been made available by the Intl. Labor Press Association listing 360 union publications in 32 states, two Canadian provinces and the District of Columbia.

The directory is the fourth issued by the ILPA. It gives the name and address of each publication, the name of the editor, the frequency of publication, format, circulation and its policy on paid advertising.

Ninety-four international or national union-publications are listed; 104 are owned by state or local central bodies, and 132 by local unions or groups of unions. The rest are official publications of the AFL-CIO or its departments and the official publication of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Included in the directory is the Code of Ethics to which all ILPA members must subscribe; the names of associate members, who are public relations directors of unions; the presidents, secretaries and addresses of regional affiliates, and a list of advertising agencies that serve union publications. ILPA Pres. Leon Stein, editor of the Ladies' Garment Workers' publication Justice, has written an introduction.

Copies may be obtained at $2 each from ILPA Sec.-Treas. Kenneth Fiester, 815 Sixteenth Street, N. W., Washington, D. C. 20006.

Biemiller Sees House Approval Of Hospital Care for the Elderly

House passage of a social security program of hospital care for the elderly was predicted by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller on the basis of a reawakened public demand for the program.

Biemiller said Senate approval of a hospital care program made it virtually certain that the issue will be decided by a rollcall vote of the House before Congress adjourns. The vote will be close, Biemiller said, but "it will carry."

As the hospital care issue simmered in the House, awaiting appointment of conferees to meet with senators, another AFL-CIO spokesman warned that a "million dollar propaganda campaign" against the bill is expected from the American Medical Association.

Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank, in a letter to 819 AFL-CIO state and city central bodies, cited newspaper reports that the AMA has a $1 million budget earmarked for ads attacking the Administration's program.

Cruikshank said the advertising campaign is expected to cover all large cities, some 7,000 weekly newspapers, and "whatever television station will accept them."

The three television networks recently refused to sell the AMA time for a series of controversial one-minute dramatized commercial "spots" attacking social security hospital care for the aged. The advertising agency handling the AMA's account said it would try to place the spots with individual TV stations throughout the nation.

'Educational' Program Set

An AMA spokesman said the organization plans a television "educational" program in October. Although this falls in the height of the election campaign—in which social security hospital care is a major issue between the two presidential candidates—the AMA said the time was chosen to coincide with Community Health Week, Oct. 18 to 24.

Cruikshank predicted the newspaper and television advertising "will follow the pattern of previous AMA campaigns—shot full of distortion, misrepresentation and innuendo, charging the bill interferes with doctor-patient relationships, at great and needless cost to the taxpayers." He added:

"This, of course, is nonsense, but it cannot be allowed to go unchallenged."

While the labor movement "cannot match the million-dollar outlay of the AMA," Cruikshank said, local union spokesman can promptly refute the AMA advertisements through press statements and letters to the editor.

Cruikshank and Biemiller, in a separate letter to AFL-CIO central bodies, stressed that it is "vitally important" that congressmen hear from union members before the House showdown vote.

Vote on Instructions

Biemiller, in an interview on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs radio program, said he expected that the House—through one of several possible parliamentary routes—would be asked to vote on instructing its conferees.

The decision would then be either to tell its conferees to agree to the Senate hospital care amendments to the social security bill, or to hold firm and force the Senate to back down.

"I think the congressmen are going to hear from people throughout the country," Biemiller said. As a result of the Senate action, after a long period when the legislative outlook appeared discouraging, "interest has revived all over the country," he said.

Captive Nations Group Thanks U.S. Workers

Labor Day greetings were sent AFL-CIO members by the Assembly of Captive European Nations in a telegram expressing awareness of "the immense role the free American labor movement played in the struggle to raise the moral and material position of American workingmen to a level unmatched in any other past or present society."

"People in captive lands . . . are grateful," Chairman Alexander Kutt and Sec. Gen. Britus Coste wired AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, "for your untiring work to keep alive in the free world awareness of the true nature and purposes of communism, as well as for your steadfast advocacy of policies apt to ensure the worldwide victory of the forces of freedom, justice, decency and progress."

Tax-Exempt Status Queried:

Hunt's Propaganda Foundation Under Congressional Fire

Congressional investigators are probing the tax-exempt status of a foundation set up by Texas Oil Billionaire H. L. Hunt which has poured out a steady stream of right-wing propaganda through radio and television programs, books, pamphlets and newspapers.

Hunt, described by Time magazine as "the big daddy to many a far-right crusade," set up Facts Forum in 1951 and was the principal financial contributor to its broadcasts and publications portraying the nation in the grip of a Communist conspiracy and the income tax as the fount of all evil.

In 1958, Hunt changed it name to the Life Line Foundation, a self-described "patriotic, educational and religious program."

Rep. Wright Patman (D-Tex.), who is directing a House Small Business subcommittee investigation of tax-exempt foundations, drew from Internal Revenue Service officials an acknowledgment that an IRS examiner three years ago recommended revocation of Life Line's tax-exempt status, although the agency has not yet acted on it.

Evidence in Record

Patman put into the hearing record data showing that:

- Direct contributions to Hunt's foundations—presumably deducted from taxable income of the donors—totaled $3.05 million in fiscal years 1951 through 1960, of which Hunt contributed $2.9 million. Among the listed donors were Gulf Oil and other oil companies.
- During a three-year period in the 1950's, 114 corporations and individuals contributed $274,000 for subscriptions to Facts Forum News. In addition to Hunt, who gave $100,000 of the total, major donations were made by the First National Bank of Dallas, with $33,000, and the Continental Supply Co. of Dallas, a division of Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co., $35,000. Other corporate donors of subscriptions included Sears Roebuck & Co., whose former board chairman, Gen. Robert E. Wood, served on the advisory boards of both Facts Forum and Life Line.

"Each of the donors no doubt took the maximum charitable deductions on their income tax returns or deducted such contributions as business expense," Patman declared.

He said committee investigators have been unable to discover who received the subscriptions.

From the committee hearings, this picture emerges:

Shift in Financing

While Facts Forum was primarily financed through contributions, mostly from Hunt himself, Life Line's revenue comes primarily from commercial sponsorship of its broadcasts—with the largest group of sponsors composed of companies owned or controlled by Hunt. During the 1962 fiscal year, income from radio and television programs came to more than $335,000.

Patman also produced tax data showing that Life Line had received $118,000 from sales of its tri-weekly newspaper in 1962, with the Hunt companies by far the largest purchasers. A similar pattern showed up in purchases of books from the foundation.

According to Group Research, Inc., an authority on a network of right-wing organizations, the shift in emphasis appears to bear out Hunt's frequent urging that business use its $11 billion-a-year advertising budget to combat the viewpoint of "the mistaken."

Group Research pointed out that by Life Line's own definition, "mistaken is the title which Life Line has fixed in the public mind as a specific, but non-libelous designation for all enemies of freedom—Communists, fellow-travelers, etc., leaving them to classify themselves."

Thus, in Life Line propaganda quoted in a Senate speech last year by Sen. Maurine Neuberger (D-Ore.), statements such as these are made:

"As anti-Communist sentiment grows stronger in the United States, the 'mistaken' forces seeking to end freedom feel the damage to their cause. . . .

Step to World Conquest

"The Second World War was but another step in the program of the 'mistaken' to conquer the entire world."

As Mrs. Neuberger pointed out, the use of the phrase "is Hunt's not-so-subtle way of accusing anyone who disagrees with him of being a Communist without risking a libel suit. But the vicious innuendo is no less vicious because it is put into this kind of transparent code."

The Oregon senator pointed out that the tax-exempt status of extremist foundations means that other taxpayers must pay a larger portion of the nation's tax bill.

"There is probably no one who gets more radical right-wing propaganda value for his tax-exempt dollar than Haraldson Lafayette Hunt," she declared.

With tax-free contributions and advertising charged off as business expenses, "Hunt indulges his urge to convince his fellow citizens that the U.S. government is so thickly infiltrated with Communists that it is practically Communist now, and that any man or woman who favors medicare, foreign aid and virtually any other social welfare measure which you might care to name, is an enemy of freedom."

Patman prodded the IRS to speed up its decision on whether the Life Line Foundation should continue in a tax-exempt status, charging that the agency appears to be buried "in the quicksand of inertia."

Acting IRS Dir. Bertrand M. Harding conceded that the agency is "not exactly proud of our record in the past" but is proceeding actively in an investigation of controversial foundations.

In the course of its current investigation, Harding said, it has uncovered such data as purchases of a John Birch Society magazine by an oil company "concealed in crude oil purchases" in the company's records. He did not identify the company.

secretary-treasurer, and Treas. Ben G. Schaller, who was secretary-treasurer of the Photo Engravers.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called the merger "a testament to the intelligence, understanding and good judgment of the membership of both organizations who overwhelmingly supported and ratified the actions" of the merger committees.

The natal day of the new union was celebrated after a year and a half of study and planning in a series of special events which included installation of officers, the first session of the new international executive council and a banquet in the Americana Hotel at which Meany spoke.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz in a message sent to the dinner congratulated Brown and Hall, saying both "your unions and your industry will benefit." Declaring that the problem of technological change is an old one in an industry so susceptible to new processes, he added:

"It is an indication of the affirmative and progressive leadership of the two unions, and of the enlightened attitude of your membership, that your policies have kept pace."

Meany gave the "warm fraternal greetings" of the AFL-CIO to members of the new union, pointing out that the federation has "strongly endorsed and encouraged the steps" leading to merger.

Brown and Hall in a joint statement observed that the merged unions work in a common area of the graphic arts. The united organization, they declared, will provide a broader base of job security and job opportunity and "enable maximum anticipation and avoidance of job dislocation due to technological revolution."

tion in the level of unemployment.

"Unless we are able to find more effective answers to this basic problem, the long-range outlook will remain dim and foreboding. Any recession, any failure to maintain an expanding economy, holds the threat of mass unemployment."

In second place Meany put civil rights, pointing out that "a law does not automatically become a pattern of life."

"The trade union movement played a major role in helping to bring this law into being," he said. "We intend to play a major role in helping to enforce its principles not just in the legal sense, but in the heart, mind and spirit of America."

"Too many Americans," he added, "and this includes wage earners and their families, simply do not take the trouble to register and vote. When that is the case, national elections—local ones too—are not a true measure of what the people want. Democracy works only when it is used.

"We in the AFL-CIO have strong feelings about the coming election . . . on this Labor Day, my appeal to all who are listening is this: Look at the platforms and the records, weigh the prospects, make up your mind—and then, above all, go to the polls on Nov. 3 and vote."

Speaking over the National Broadcasting Co. network, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther called for a strong and steady U.S. foreign policy and a renewed effort to bolster the security of the nation's millions of retired workers.

"This is no time for America to replace the steady hand of responsible and restrained use of nuclear power with reckless and trigger-happy policies which would frighten our friends, provoke our enemies and culminate in catastrophe," said Reuther, president of the Auto Workers.

Urges Health Care

"As a nation we must never be satisfied so long as we are denying our oldest citizens that measure of security and dignity to which a life of useful and productive work entitles them during the autumn of their lives. We must not be satisfied so long as millions of our oldest citizens are denied adequate hospital-medical care," he continued.

"We are doing less as a free society to meet the health care needs of our senior citizens than any other industrial nation of the world. American labor fully supports the medical care bill proposed by Pres. Kennedy and supported so effectively and enthusiastically by Pres. Johnson."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. J. Hayes, heard over the American Broadcasting Co. radio facilities, pointed out that the "good life" so many Americans enjoy "did not come easily, or automatically, or through natural evolution."

"It came only because at each stage in our industrial development," he said, "there were always some who rebelled against economic injustice. There were always some who were willing to work, fight and often suffer for greater equity and justice in the relationship between workers and our developing industrial system.

"And those who rebelled . . . soon learned that they—as individuals—were helpless and ineffective in their individual efforts to bring about corrections. The very nature of our industrial system compelled those workers to organize."

Hayes, who is president of the Machinists, stressed the need for an all-out attack on poverty, declaring that "a thriving, prosperous work force is the most essential foundation of any good and just society."

"And finally, let us recognize that labor is not an abstraction. Labor is work—and workers are human beings, the human beings of which America is made."

A vacation with pay isn't much good if there is no place to go, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne said in a plea for conservation of natural resources over the Mutual Broadcasting System's network.

"A house with a view isn't much good," he added, "if you can't see across the street because of the smog. A new car loses a lot of its zing when there's no place to drive except into a traffic jam."

Constant Job

Beirne, president of the Communications Workers, listed some of the things for which labor has worked and is still working—education, social security, jobs, the war on poverty—and called the effort "a constant and at times fatiguing job, especially when people throw knives at us."

"We are a nation of people, not machines," he said. "No robot, no computer should ever be allowed to enslave us. Neither should we let our thinking become enslaved to the idea that the machine is the only important thing that counts.

SAG Seeks to Better Service Entertainment

Hollywood, Calif. — A special overseas talent committee headed by Frank Ferguson has been named by the directors of the Screen Actors Guild to seek ways of improving entertainment for U.S. armed forces abroad.

The committee was named on the recommendation of Raymond Burr after trips to Vietnam and other countries.

William Jenoves, CLC Official, Dies

Toronto, Ont.—William Jenoves, one of the architects of Canadian labor unity and a vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, died here following an operation. He was 75.

Born in Pennsylvania, he was brought to Toronto as a child and began his union career at the age of 13, when he became an apprentice bricklayer. He was president of Bricklayers Local 2 from 1915 to 1923 and business agent from that time until his death. Since 1941 he had been president of the former Toronto Trades & Labor Council and the successor Toronto & District Labor Council.

He was a vice president of the old Trades & Labor Congress of Canada and was one of its representatives in negotiations with the former Canadian Congress of Labor which led to merger and the CLC in 1956. He also held a wide range of civic and community posts.

Apportionment Foes Lose Cloture Bid

Fight Continues to Kill Move to Curb Court

nine Republicans voted against cloture; only seven Democrats and 23 Republicans voted for it.

The AFL-CIO, strongly supporting the one man, one vote principle, has denounced the proposed rider as a "revolutionary" usurpation of court powers and a "suspension of constitutional rights" of voters living in under-represented city and suburban areas.

A new move was under way, with a suggestion of White House approval, to shelve the controversial rider and substitute a non-binding "sense of Congress" declaration that courts should give states "adequate time" to conform to the Supreme Court's criteria.

Senators Eugene J. McCarthy (D-Minn.) and Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) co-sponsored the proposed substitute, and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.), Democratic vice presidential candidate, added his name to the resolution shortly after returning from a White House conference. This was credited with building up the heavy majority against cloture.

Dirksen, who has led the drive for the court-curbing rider, has said that his intent is to gain time to enact a constitutional amendment which would permit one house of a legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population.

The House earlier passed a more drastic bill which would permanently deny federal courts jurisdiction over apportionment.

The small group of liberals who began what they termed "extended debate" before Congress adjourned for the Democratic convention have picked up additional support as mayors of major cities and civic groups that have been battling for equitable representation denounced the court-curb proposal.

Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), a leader of the opposition to the rider, told the Senate that his group has sought only to delay, not prevent, a vote. The purpose of the delay, he said, "is so members of the Senate and the public may become better informed about the issue and thus be able to reach a more mature decision."

By agreement of both sides, the Senate has on several occasions set aside the foreign aid bill and its reapportionment rider to take up other legislation. In fact, after the cloture vote, the Senate turned to a leadership resolution to renew an investigation into the activities of Robert G. Baker, former secretary to the Senate majority.

Sen. John J. Williams (R-Del.), who set the stage for a renewed investigation with a charge of political kickbacks on a District of Columbia stadium construction contract, moved to turn the investigation over to the Government Operations Committee of Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.). The Democratic resolution would continue the Rules Committee as the investigating body.

SET TO FLY to Blackpool, Eng., for the convention of the British Trades Union Congress are Pres. Max Greenberg (right), one of the AFL-CIO's fraternal delegates. With him is Max Steinbock, editor of the RWDSU Record. Greenberg was to be joined in Britain by Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes, the other AFL-CIO fraternal delegate to the TUC parley.

Civil Rights Supporter Renominated in Georgia

Democrats and Republicans in six states gave party renomination to incumbents, without exception, in primaries held Sept. 8—including two Georgia congressmen who had provoked conservative opposition by backing Pres. Johnson's national program.

Rep. Charles R. Weltner (D) won by a 36,000-to-23,000 margin in Georgia's 5th Congressional District (Atlanta) although he voted for the civil rights bill and had campaigned only intermittently against a self-proclaimed conservative, Wyman C. Lowe.

Landrum Ahead

Rep. Phil Landrum, sponsor of the administration anti-poverty bill, had a closer race in the 9th District but apeared to have a clear majority over two rivals, thus avoiding the ncessity of a runoff primary. On the basis of nearly complete unofficial returns, the tally showed 25,327 for Landrum, 20,373 for State Sen. Zell Miller and 2,842 for a minor candidate, Franklin Uhl.

The Republican nomination for Arizona's U.S. Senate seat, given up by Sen. Goldwater to run for President, was won by Gov. Paul Fannin without opposition. He will be challenged in the November election by Democrat Roy Elson, a former administrative assistant to Arizona's veteran Sen. Carl Hayden. Elson had more than 52,000 votes against 44,000 for a former state supreme court justice, Renz Jennings, on the basis of incomplete but decisive returns.

A former Goldwater campaign manager, Richard Kleindienst, won the GOP nomination for governor, and will be opposed by Democrat Sam Goddard, who beat three opponents handily.

Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D), seeking a second term, won renomination overwhelmingly in Minnesota. He will face Republican Wheelock Whitney, an investment broker, in the election.

Democratic Gov. John W. Reynolds won renomination in Wisconsin, as did Sen. William Proxmire, seeking a second six-year term. The Republican nominee against Reynolds is a veteran political leader, Warren Knowles, who easily defeated an ardent Goldwater supporter, Milo Knutson. A GOP moderate, Wilbur Renk, won without opposition to run against Proxmire.

A newcomer with a famous name, Bronson La Follette, won the Democratic nomination for attorney general in Wisconsin. He is the grandson of the original Robert M. La Follette and son of Robert M. La Follette, Jr., who were first Republicans, then Progressive Party members.

The political comeback hopes of New Hampshire's former Gov. Wesley Powell were broken when he lost a race for Republican nomination for governor to John Pillsbury, beaten two years ago by incumbent Democratic Gov. John W. King. King, unopposed for renomination, got more than 3,000 write-in votes on GOP primary ballots.

Gov. Philip H. Hoff won Democratic renomination in Vermont and will face Republican Lieut. Gov. Ralph A. Foote. Republican Sen. Winston L. Prouty was renominated and will be opposed by State Sen. Frederick J. Fayette, who defeated former Rep. William H. Meyer in the Democratic primary.

Johnson Stresses Unity As Campaign Opens

such thing as a conventional nuclear weapon."

Existing law places responsibility for deciding whether to use nuclear warheads in the Chief Executive, the President noted, and for the past 19 years no nation has used such weapons.

"To do so now is a political decision of the highest order," he declared. "It would lead us down an uncertain path of blows and counterblows whose outcome none may know.

"No President of the United States can divest himself of the responsibility for such a decision."

The President's opening guns were fired as his vice presidential running-mate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, campaigned through Ohio's industrial cities warning that election of Goldwater would make solution of the nation's racial problems more difficult.

Goldwater would have to try to enforce the new Civil Rights Act, the Minnesota senator acknowledged, but he voted against it and "he isn't for it."

Warns on Politics

Ohio has a state civil rights law of its own, and "I hope no one plays politics" with the national law, he told workers in the Akron area. The Democrats "may lose a few votes because of misunderstanding," he continued, "but here in this great industrial area I want it understood it [the law] will not affect job rights."

"What we did in Congress was right—morally right, politically right and economically right—and we have no apologies to make to anyone," the senator declared.

Meanwhile on the Pacific Coast, Goldwater promised a 25 percent income tax cut, for individuals and corporations, by means of an automatic 5 percent slash each year for five years.

Opposed '64 Cut

The Kennedy-Johnson tax cut of 1964—which he voted against, although most Republican senators supported it—the GOP candidate labeled as "impulsive, massive, politically motivated gimmickry," not comparable to his own proposal for "a return to sound Republican principles of fiscal responsibility."

Goldwater aides acknowledged that the total 25 percent tax slash the candidate proposed would cause some red-ink deficit budgets but said it would "balance out" across the five years. The senator said he would hold down federal spending and that tax revenues at reduced rates would catch up with expenditures. He would, additionally, transfer to the states certain existing federal programs, he said.

In a foreign policy speech the next day, Goldwater said in Seattle that the Administration's foreign policy was "cynical," that it was a "record of disaster," and that the President wouldn't "admit that communism is the major cause" of the war in Vietnam. He also announced formation of his own foreign policy advisory group headed by former Vice Pres. Nixon.

Rep. William E. Miller (N.Y.), running for vice president with Goldwater, attacked Humphrey's past membership in Americans for Democratic Action, which he branded "the most influential organization . . . attempting to subvert and transform our government into a foreign socialistic totalitarianism." Humphrey contemptuously replied that his voting record across 14 years in the Senate was well known.

ADA was founded in 1947 as a liberal group with an absolute bar against Communist membership. Its spokesmen rejected Miller's charges that its program has anything to do with subversion, socialism or totalitarianism.

Johnson Asks Brotherhood

Johnson in his Detroit speech warned against the "passions" that sometimes arise because of "conflicting interests" and said, "I call for national unity. I plead for brotherhood among men and understanding among nations."

"Peace is more than the absence of aggression," he said. "It is the creation of a world community in which every nation can follow its own course without fear of its neighbors."

The President at the end evoked his "dream" of America as a nation concerned with "the simple wants of people." He had had this dream as a boy in Texas, he said, and "this is what America is all about."

"Reality rarely matches dream, but only dreams give nobility to purpose," he said. "This is the star I hope to follow."

Incentive Plan Dispute Talks Are Renewed

Schenectady, N. Y.—The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers have served notice on the General Electric Co. that a chainwide strike by 70 IUE locals at GE plants will be called "unless the company halts its unilateral attempt to eliminate incentive work" among members of Local 301 at the GE plant here.

Talks by union and management were resumed after Labor Day on a dispute over a local incentive plan. IUE charges GE broke a national contract when on July 19 it abolished the plan and cut the wages of 3,000 incentive workers here by 35 percent, or more than $1.60 an hour.

The union said GE has refused to postpone its action and has denied the dispute is arbitrable. If Local 301 is compelled to strike, all other IUE locals at GE plants will strike also, it said.

USWA Pact Ends 70-Day Copper Strike

Salt Lake City—A 70-day strike by the Steelworkers against Kennecott Copper Co. has won new benefits in a three-year contract covering more than 2,000 workers at the firm's Arizona copper mine.

The agreement, subject to a vote by affected USWA members, includes these gains:

- Wage increases of 6 to 8 cents an hour each year.
- An increase in shift differentials.
- An SUB plan similar to one in the steel industry. The plan provides for company payments to supplement state unemployment benefits; a retirement and death benefit fund providing pay up to 26 weeks, and payment of unused sick leave on retirement or death.
- Improved vacation benefits.

The union stopped work July 1 after contracts had expired and negotiations bogged down. The shutdown, and observance of USWA picket lines by other unions, brought the closing of operations affecting some 7,500 workers.

AFL-CIO Affiliates Hike Election Wins

AFL-CIO unions won 60.1 percent of the elections in which they were on the ballot in July, somewhat higher than their average for the preceding six months, the National Labor Relations Board has reported.

The board listed 437 July elections with AFL-CIO unions having won 263, other unions 17 and 157 in which no union was chosen.

For the first six months of the year, the NLRB conducted 2,344 elections involving affiliated unions. The affiliates won 1,228 as against 130 won by unaffiliated unions and 986 where no representative was chosen—a 52.2 percent average for the affiliates.

Aged Care Fight Moves to Conference

LBJ Stresses Jobs, Peace, Control of Nuclear Arms

'Long Overdue':

Meany Asks Action On Hospital Care

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged House-Senate conferees, who "have in their hands the future well-being of millions of their fellow citizens," to agree on a "long overdue" program of social security hospital care for the aged.

The 12 conferees have the task of reconciling a House-passed bill raising cash benefits under social security with a Senate-adopted amendment adding the Administration's hospital and nursing home program.

The chairman of the House conferees, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), assured supporters of the hospital care amendment that he will bring an open mind to the conference table and consider any "good compromise" that might be suggested, even though he has opposed such legislation in the past.

Meany expressed the hope, based on "confidence in the American legislative system," that the conferees will be able to come up with a "realistic, humanitarian and effective" proposal to "insure the hospital costs of our aged citizens in a decent and moral manner."

As the conferees prepared to meet, Pres. Johnson reaffirmed in strong language his support for a social security hospital care program.

Addressing the Machinists convention minutes after it became clear the issue would go to conference, Johnson broke into his prepared text to say "to all Ameri-

Court Curb Faces New Senate Test

Senate foes of a drive to block one man, one vote reapportionment of state legislatures prepared to make a new effort to dispose of the issue through a "sense of Congress" resolution which would be neither binding nor derogatory of the courts. A first attempt failed by a slim 42-40 margin.

Developments of recent weeks clearly demonstrated that:

- The group of liberals opposing any interference with court reapportionment orders is able to prevent a vote on a labor-opposed rider to the foreign aid bill which would hold up federal court action on reapportionment at least until 1966.
- The Senate will not invoke cloture to force the issue to a vote. Republican Leader Everett McKin-

PRESIDENTIAL MEDAL OF FREEDOM, the nation's highest civilian award, is conferred on A. Philip Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and an AFL-CIO vice president. Pres. Johnson congratulates Randolph as his military aide, Maj. Chester Clifton, places the award.

29 Others Honored:

Randolph Receives Medal of Freedom

Pres. Johnson conferred the nation's highest civilian honor—the Presidential Medal of Freedom—on AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph and 29 other "great Americans" who "have made freedom stronger for all of us in our time."

Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and long a leader of the civil rights movement, was one of two trade unionists honored. Another award winner was John L. Lewis, president emeritus of the Mine Workers.

The national honors program was started last year by the late Pres. Kennedy and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany was included in the first group of noted Americans chosen for the award.

The citation for Randolph honored him in these words:

"Trade unionist and citizen, through four decades of challenge and achievement he has led his people and his nation in the great forward march of freedom."

Path to Greatness

Johnson, in presenting the awards, said America's path to greatness has been marked by "outstanding achievement by outstanding individuals." Its future, he said, will be dependent "upon the individual who envisions more, aspires to more, and who achieves more for all of us."

In addition to Randolph and Lewis, the President's list included:

Dean G. Acheson, former secretary of state; Detlev W. Bronk, educator and scientist; Aaron Copeland, composer; Walter Disney, motion picture artist; J. Frank Dobie, historian; Lena F. Edwards, humanitarian and physician; T. S. Eliot, author; John W. Gardner, educator; Theodore M. Hesburgh, educator; Clarence (Kelly) Johnson, aeronautical engineer; Freder-

President's Trip Keyed To Unity

By Willard Shelton

En Route With Johnson—Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson carried his campaign for election from southeastern Florida to California and the empire of the Pacific Northwest in a whirlwind three-day tour rallying the people to support his Administration's policies.

In Seattle he strongly affirmed that the direction and control of U.S. nuclear weapons must remain the sole responsibility of the President, warning that atomic weapons are "not simply bigger and more destructive" than conventional weapons but a potential "terror and tragedy." (See story, Page 12.)

In Sacramento, Calif., the President announced that the U. S. has developed new weapon systems capable of intercepting and destroying bomb-carrying satellites orbiting the earth, and over-the-horizon radar to provide instantaneous warning of a hostile missile attack. GOP Presidential candidate Barry M. Goldwater has charged that the Administration has failed to develop any new weapons systems.

Never once did the President mention Sen. Goldwater or Rep. William E. Miller, the Republican presidential and vice presidential candidates, or Goldwater-Miller attacks on his private actions as a public official, the Republicans' assault on Administration welfare

Rail Shopcraft Unions Issue Strike Warning

Refusal of major U.S. railroads to agree to the job protections recommended by a Presidential Emergency Board for 150,000 shopcraft workers may force the unions to call a walkout on one or more roads, Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. has warned.

Leaders of the six shopcraft unions have issued the strike call required by the Railway Labor Act before a walkout may take place, but will set no date until all hope of settlement is gone, said Fox.

"We still hope to get an agreement," he declared as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

All shopcraft unions have been notified, Fox said, that a 72-hour advance notice of a strike against any road will be given to the National Mediation Board, which was continuing its efforts to get negotiations resumed.

The unions involved are the Boilermakers, Firemen & Oilers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Railway Carmen, and the Sheet Metal Workers.

A special board, named by Pres. Johnson to mediate a dispute over job layoffs which dates back to 1962, reported on Aug. 7 that shop workers on 147 U.S. railroads are entitled to better protection against the job-destroying effects of automation and technology.

The board, headed by Boston ar-

Labor Board Shifts Stand on 'Hot Cargo'

Building trades unions may lawfully use economic force to seek agreements with prime contractors that they will use only union subcontractors on construction jobs, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled in a reversal of prior decisions.

Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. hailed the ruling as one upholding the department's position in a legal dispute over picketing. He said it showed "courage" because "it is a rare thing for the NLRB to admit error."

The decision, Haggerty said, will "give real meaning to the enactment by Congress permitting the building trades to seek agreements requiring prime contractors to take on only union subcontractors." It will, he said, "protect our union security" and stabilize the industry.

The decision involves the Northeastern Indiana Building & Construction Trades Council, eight of its affiliated local unions, and Centlivre Village Apartments, a $7 million construction project in Ft. Wayne, Ind.

A trial examiner ruled in February that picketing by the unions at the jobsite, where a subcontractor was working with members of an unaffiliated union, violated Sec. 8(b)(4)(A) of the Taft-Hartley Act in light of NLRB doctrines set

MOHAWK INDIAN MEMBERS of Iron Workers Locals 40 and 361, who help erect the steel framework of New York's skyscrapers, made Pres. Raymond R. Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO an honorary chief of their tribe at a ritual during the state body's convention. From left are Chief Fallen Tree, carried on the union rolls as Paul Horn; Young Deer (Frank Roberts); White Tail (Miles Deer); Corbett; White Fawn (Mrs. Joe Deer); Green Leaf (Mrs. Louise Deer); Running Deer (Joe Deer) and, kneeling, Bright Canoe (John Diabo). Corbett, who also is business agent of Local 40, was reelected to a new term as president of the State AFL-CIO shortly after the ceremony.

AFGE Sets Program:

'Fair Share' Goal Of U. S. Employes

Dallas, Tex.—Delegates to the Government Employes convention here re-elected the union's top officers and adopted a program keyed to assuring federal workers a "fair share" of the nation's increased productivity and "organizing the unorganized" in the civil service.

Pres. John F. Griner won re-election to a second two-year term by defeating Adrian Roberts of Washington, D. C., 80,230 to 28,353. Mrs. Esther F. Johnson won her fifth consecutive term as secretary-treasurer when her opponent, Irving Geller, conceded while the rollcall was in progress.

The convention, largest in the AFGE's history, adopted a constitutional amendment establishing a third full-time post of executive vice president. The first incumbent will be appointed by Griner and the office will be filled by election starting at the 1966 convention.

A compromise 10-cent per capita increase—from 75 to 85 cents a month—was adopted after proposals calling for larger increases failed to receive the required two-thirds majority.

Major resolutions called for:

- An increase in the government's contribution to health benefit premiums to 75 percent. At present it pays a fixed dollar amount which comes to less than 50 percent of the cost of most health insurance programs open to federal employes.
- Doubling the government's contribution to the federal employe life insurance program—presently 25 percent of premiums—and reducing the policy's decline in value after retirement. Now, when an employe retires or reaches 65, the face value of the policy declines 2 percent a month until it drops to 25 percent. The AFGE proposal would cut the rate of decline to 1 percent a month and set the floor at 50 percent of the face value.
- Establishment of a 35-hour workweek in the federal service.
- Automatic within-grade increases on the basis of a satisfactory performance rating, dropping the present requirement for certification by supervisors of an "undefined level of competence."
- Optional retirement on full pension after 30 years of service, regardless of age.
- The right of employes to borrow money from the Civil Service Retirement Fund at moderate interest, with the amount based on the employe's contribution to the fund.

The convention asked that wage survey teams, which gather data on prevailing area wages paid to blue collar workers, include at least 50 percent union members from wage board occupations. The resolution proposed that wage comparisons be limited to shops under union contract.

Delegates also adopted a resolution calling on all government agencies to include the union's literature in kits furnished the new employe.

Another resolution denounced the "selection-out" process sought by the Agency for Intl. Development to permit dismissal of employes without regard to normal procedures and appeal rights. The convention termed it "an effort to destroy the civil service merit system and bring back the spoils system with its inevitable corruption."

Miami was selected as the site of the 1966 convention.

Typographical Union Convention Doubles Strike and Defense Funds

Honolulu—Closing on a strong note of unity after some internal political skirmishing, the 106th convention of the Typographical Union hammered out a number of major constitutional amendments and changes in its bylaws and general laws, some of them of far-reaching effect.

Two of the proposed constitutional amendments provide for increases of $500,000 each in the floors of the strike benefit and defense funds, or from the present $500,000 to $1 million. The proposals must be sent to a referendum of the membership.

Among other actions, the convention:

- Praised the late Pres. John Fitzgerald Kennedy.
- Strongly opposed Sen. Barry Goldwater's candidacy for president.
- Urged the U.S. public printer to give serious consideration to establishing a basic 7-hour workday and 35-hour workweek for printers in the Government Printing Office.
- Strongly opposed legislation which would remove the limitation on the number of apprentices employed at the GPO.

In his opening address, ITU Pres. Elmer Brown stressed that automation and one of its principal byproducts, the computer, constitute one of the greatest threats facing the union.

"The technological evolution we are passing through today is as profound, far-reaching and potentially threatening to our trade as was the introduction of the linecasting machine some three-quarters of a century ago," Brown said.

Army of Robots

" In a breathtakingly short time the computer has invaded ITU jurisdiction. True, we have not been overwhelmed by it—as yet—but there is a veritable army of the robots in battle formation poised at the doors of our printing and mailing establishments, ready to annihilate our jobs.

"And they will do just that if we relax our vigilance for just a moment. . . .

"It is unthinkable that we of the ITU would allow the computer to do to us what the teleprinter did about three decades ago when, almost overnight, it snuffed out the jobs of approximately 40,000 telegraph operators."

He described the seminars and training sessions the ITU has been conducting to give its international and local leadership the knowledge needed to deal with the problems posed by automation. In addition, Brown said, union officers have held a number of off-the-record conferences with leading publishers "at which we 'let our hair down' in frank discussions of the computer and other mutual problems of the industry."

"Too many employers are attempting to deter us from our avowed goal of maintaining our jurisdiction," he declared. "No matter how many computers march into our printing and mailing plants, we will meet every challenge—first with knowledge and training, but with economic sanctions if necessary."

Brown warned the printing and publishing industry that the ITU will not accept attrition, guaranteed jobs, or any other "sweet-sounding phrases" which mean denying union printers a share in the benefits of automation.

Stressing the importance of the union campaign for state and municipal citizens' job protection laws, which bar professional strikebreaking, Brown said that the past year "has been the year of the rat plague."

Strikebreakers Busy

He said that because of the strikes and lockouts in San Francisco, Toronto, West Palm Beach, Kingsport, Pensacola, Martinez, Binghamton, Dallas, and other cities, professional strikebreakers "have had rather lucrative pickings."

If job protection laws had been in force in these cities, he said, the importation of strikebreakers might have been prevented, "and the members of the ITU would have been saved hundreds of thousands of dollars in strike benefits and defense assessments."

4-Day Strike Wins Pay Hike For Teachers

East St. Louis, Ill.—Members of Teachers Local 1220 went back to the classroom here Sept. 14 after winning a salary dispute in a four-day strike.

After an all-night negotiating session with members of the East St. Louis School Board, it was agreed that the teachers will get a 10 percent wage increase, previously granted other school employes but denied to classroom teachers.

At union insistence, the board also agreed that pupils who refused to cross union picket lines should not be recorded as absent under the school system's 10-day rule—unexcused absences for 10 days may lead to a pupil's expulsion.

Union members voted to end their strike with the board's assurance that it will observe the terms of an agreement won last May after another four-day strike.

Executive Sec. Oscar Weil of the Illinois Federation of Teachers, reporting the strike's end, said local 1220 intends to keep striving for higher standards in the future.

Some 500 local union members started the protest walkout when schools opened for the fall semester. Another 225 non-union instructors ignored the pickets but fewer than 10,000 of the system's 21,000 pupils reported for class.

Michigan Labor Backs Democrats 'All the Way'

Grand Rapids, Mich.—With its treasury strengthened by a 1-cent per capita increase, the Michigan AFL-CIO prepared to launch its most vigorous registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns geared to Democratic candidates in the Nov. 3 election.

Meeting here in their 4th biennial convention, 900 delegates representing 600,000 members unanimously endorsed a "vote Democratic all the way" slate of national and state candidates.

A Democratic sweep in Michigan was rated a distinct possibility by G. Mennen Williams, assistant secretary of state for African affairs and six-term former governor.

Because state legislative districts were reapportioned this year on a court-ordered "one man, one vote" formula, Williams said, "Michigan has a chance to have a Democratic governor working with a Democratic legislature for the first time since 1932."

He cautioned that the campaign will be a tough one, and Al Barkan, national COPE director, warned against over-optimism.

"I don't care what the polls show," Barkan told the convention. "The outcome of the Nov. 3 election is still in doubt. . . . You'd be fools to believe this fight is over and won."

Pointing out that Sen. Goldwater voted wrong on all 53 issues on COPE's voting record, Barkan declared:

"Involved on Nov. 3 is the very existence of our trade union movement, so everything you do must be directed toward victory in that election."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the convention the "right-to-work" section of the Taft-Hartley Act must be repealed to make collective bargaining more effective and to aid in the union fight for higher wages and better working conditions. Wirtz reviewed the record of the 43 months of the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations, which included a 3,743,000 increase in jobs. He urged, however, that strong support be given Johnson Administration programs to reduce unemployment.

The convention was host to the first debate between Michigan's gubernatorial candidates, Republican Gov. George W. Romney and Democratic Congressman-at-Large Neil Staebler.

Monthly per capita paid by state AFL-CIO affiliates was 7 cents before the increase approved by the convention.

Incumbent officers were re-elected without opposition. They are August Scholle, president for 22 years; Barney Hopkins, secretary-treasurer for 20 years; and William C. Marshall, executive vice president for four years.

Strike Deadline Set:

Auto Union Steps Up Ford Contract Talks

Detroit—The Auto Workers and Ford Motor intensified their efforts to reach an agreement here on a new contract for 125,000 Ford workers ahead of a strike deadline set by the union in an effort to catalyze a settlement.

UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther and Ford Labor Relations Dir. Malcolm Denise led negotiators to the bargaining table after a night of subcommittee meetings and agreed to meet all day and through the night of Sept. 17 if necessary to resolve their differences by the Sept. 18 deadline.

Ford Offer Analyzed

As the talks entered their final stage, Ford made a contract offer which the union said was "equivalent to the Chrysler settlement in basic benefits" but not acceptable in the areas of working conditions, including relief time; production standards, and wage inequities.

Reuther told newsmen the union had tried to avoid "crisis bargaining" but concluded—reluctantly, he declared—that the "dynamics of the situation" required a change of approach. Therefore the UAW bargaining committee gave notice of termination of the national Ford agreement as of 10 a.m. Sept. 18, and a Sept. 25 deadline for locals that have not reached agreement with Ford plant managements on local contract issues.

A wildcat strike at the Ford River Rouge plant near here delayed negotiations about five hours. After it ended, the UAW sent word to all Ford plant locals to exercise self-discipline while negotiations proceed.

The Ford negotiations were stepped up after the union reached a settlement Sept. 9 giving 74,000 workers at 46 Chrysler plants substantial contract improvements—an early retirement pension with a top benefit of $400 a month; pension improvements for retirees and their families; more relief time off the production line; wage increases and company-paid life, accident and sickness insurance.

At Chrysler, union and management committees still were meeting to reduce the "historic" agreement to contract language, which will be submitted to local union meetings in Chrysler locations for membership approval or rejection. Also subject to vote are local agreements.

More details of the early retirement benefit in the Chrysler agreement were issued by UAW Chrysler Dir. Douglas Fraser in a "newsgram" to Chrysler local leadership. Fraser explained:

- A worker who gets $3.35 an hour and retires at age 60 after 30 years of service will get $400 a month until he reaches 65, when his monthly income will be $285.54, provided both he and his wife are eligible for social security.
- The early retirement benefit is composed of two parts: the normal pension benefit actuarially adjusted to retirement below age 62, and a supplemental benefit from the company.
- Between ages 62 and 65, Chrysler will pay the early retirement even though the retiree would be eligible for social security payments at 62, Fraser reported. The company supplement will be paid, however, only to those who retire on or after Sept. 1, 1965, the union told its members.

Jobs Get Top Priority In Johnson's Program

Las Vegas, Nev.—Pres. Johnson in a filmed talk to the 575 delegates attending the 68th convention of the Bricklayers here, declared that the No. 1 priority of his Administration is jobs.

"We must not have a stagnant America," the President said. "If life tomorrow is good for any American, it should be good for all Americans,"

Expressing deep satisfaction at the passage of the civil rights law, the President said, "We must now move also on housing and hospitals. We have declared war on poverty and we will continue to wage it."

Recalling that in 1961 the late Pres. Kennedy had asked the help of labor in "getting America moving again," Johnson said "tragic history has placed on me the burden of continuing this work." He concluded by declaring: "Let us put the people's business first. Let us keep America on the march." Rising applause was given the President's remarks.

In his keynote address to the convention, Bricklayers' Pres. John J. Murphy said he was proud the membership generally was working under the best wages, hours and working conditions in the union's 99-year history.

While prospects were bright in the immediate future, Murphy noted that the country had a "mixed economy — an economy that confers many blessings if you happen to be a strong, active member of the working force, but also an economy that leaves a sour and bitter taste if you are one of those who has been cast on the slag heap of unemployment by automation, or by other factors over which the worker has no control."

Other Speakers

Other convention speakers have included Hugh C. Murphy, recently named administrator of the Bureau of Apprenticeship Training, in the U.S. Dept. of Labor; Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Douglas Whitlock, chairman, Structural Clay Products Institute; George Miller, executive vice president, Mason Contractors Association; Pres. William Peitler of the Marble Polishers; J. L. Loomis, executive secretary, Tile Contractors Association; Charles Donahue, solicitor, U.S. Dept. of Labor; and Edmund P. Tobin, president, Union Labor Life Insurance Co.

Training Data Center Opened in Baltimore

Baltimore, Md.—An Apprenticeship Information Center for the Baltimore area was dedicated by Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, who said young people "must be given every opportunity to realize their full occupational potential regardless of race or national origin."

The center will make information on job training available to an estimated 500 youths a week and will be staffed by experienced counselors. Centers also have been opened in Washington, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati and Detroit, with more in prospect.

forth in the Colson & Stevens case, decided in 1962.

The board's opinion in Colson & Stevens was that Congress intended to legalize voluntary agreements on contracting at construction sites but that the use of economic force to compel an employer to enter into a "hot cargo" agreement violated the law.

Contrary Rulings

Since then, the U.S. Court of Appeals in three separate circuits has ruled the board wrong, holding in one leading case that "secondary subcontracting clauses in the construction industry are lawful under the proviso to Sec. 8(e), and economic force may be used to obtain them."

All five board members in the Northeastern Indiana case, concluded "in view of the unanimous court rejection" of the Colson & Stevens rationale, the board has "re-examined its position and now agrees" with the courts.

Therefore they overruled that portion of the former decision on which the examiner relied, and dismissed his finding that the unions violated one section of the law.

But the board upheld the trial examiner's ruling that another section of the law was violated. It found that the picketing had as one of its objects forcing or requiring Centlivre to cease doing business with Kimes & Kocks, a carpenter subcontractor who had not reached agreement with the unions. It ruled:

"Picketing by a union in the construction industry to interrupt business relations between a neutral general contractor and an identified subcontractor" violates a section of the law despite the fact that the picketing also has a lawful objective of securing a "hot cargo" agreement.

The board declared that "the court decisions in which we have acquiesced state, and we agree, that (once they are agreed upon) lawful 'hot cargo' clauses may be enforced only through lawsuits, and not through economic action."

Building trades attorneys say the ruling clarifies the legal right of construction unions to picket to obtain "hot cargo" clauses in their agreements with contractors.

Staff Union Upheld In NLRB Ruling

A trial examiner for the National Labor Relations Board has ruled that local union business agents and organizers for the Retail Clerks are employes within the meaning of the law and that the union, as an employer, must bargain with the Agents & Organizers Association, representing the employes.

Examiner Ramey Donovan recommended that the NLRB order the RCIA and its Local 880 in Cleveland to cease discouraging membership in the AOA and to bargain on request. Donovan also recommended dismissal of a complaint that RCIA Local 698 in Akron fired organizer George Rhyne because of his AOA membership and activities.

Drug Clerks Win Gains in California Pact

Hollywood, Calif.—A new five-year agreement yielding increases in both wages and fringe benefits has been negotiated with the Southern California drug store industry by Retail Clerks Local 770.

The contract retains wage rates at $2.515 an hour for drug clerks and $6 for pharmacists during the first year, but raises them to $2.815 and $6.40 in the final year. In the first year 8.8 cents an hour for clerks and 15.1 cents for pharmacists is being completely applied to other benefits.

These include a death benefit of $5,000 for a member, $500 for a spouse and up to $2,500 for pensioners; a 90 percent prepaid prescription plan for members, families and pensioners; preventive medical care, a vacation plan based on industry experience and payment at the end of the year for unused sick leave.

Connecticut Convention Backs Democratic Slate

Bridgeport, Conn.—The Connecticut AFL-CIO formally endorsed Sen. Thomas J. Dodd (D) for re-election and threw its support to the six Democratic candidates for the House at its convention here.

Pres. Johnson was roundly cheered when a telegram from him was read welcoming support for a program "to achieve a society of tolerance, productivity and progress."

Advancement, he said, depends not only on natural resources but also on "the prudent and proper use of human talent and skills." The nation will lose something, he maintained, unless opportunity to improve himself is available to every citizen "regardless of the circumstances of his life."

Endorsed for the House were five incumbents and former Rep. Don Irwin, Democrat, seeking to unseat Rep. Abner W. Sibal (R) in the 4th District. Incumbents supported were Representatives Bernard F. Grabowski, at large; Emilio Q. Daddario, 1st District; William L. St. Onge, 2d District; Robert N. Giaimo, 3d District, and John S. Monagan, 5th District.

Gov. John M. Dempsey (D) addressed the convention just before a hearing on reapportionment in the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Haven. Other speakers included Dodd, who was kept in Washington by legislative duties but was heard on a telephone hookup; his colleague, Sen. Abraham N. Ribicoff; his GOP opponent, John Lodge; and Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers.

The convention adopted a program aimed at implementing the Civil Rights Act, and endorsed hospital care for the elderly under social security, the $2 minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act and federal standards for unemployment compensation.

Among other resolutions were calls for improvements in workmen's compensation, for fluoridation of drinking water and for construction of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project.

Union Endorses Ticket:

Johnson Rallies IAM In 'Year of Decision'

Miami Beach, Fla.—"I come to call you to the works we must do so that these shall be remembered as America's proudest years," Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson told 4,000 cheering delegates and guests at the Machinists' 26th convention here.

America is "vastly different" from the nation in 1888, when the founders of the IAM "were forced to meet in secrecy and fear . . . [and] the laboring man and his family sat at the second table," the President said.

The 60-hour week, the 20-cent wage, child labor and sweatshops are gone, he told the delegates, and they now can meet "as free men ought to meet—out in the open, your rights assured, your rewards increased, your place secure at the first table of the nation's success," but this "success is our trust—yours and mine," he declared.

"That is the challenge before us," he said. "I am determined that generations to come after us shall shed no tears of shame or sorrow when they remember our stewardship."

Appearing just four days after the 1,500 delegates had without dissent endorsed the Johnson-Humphrey ticket for election, the President made his speech to a large extent a broad appeal for national unity in meeting the problems still ahead.

Approval Given

But he acknowledged the endorsement as an expression of confidence in himself and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, his running mate, and the delegates roared approval as he ran a long list of measures approved under Democratic Presidents in the past which have become issues in the current political campaign.

"I believe, and I know that you believe," he said, "in the nuclear test ban treaty" allowing us to be sure "we do not contaminate the milk for our children.

"I believe, and I know that you believe, that one of the proudest moments in our history was when we wrote our social security system into the lawbooks.

"I believe, and I know that you believe, that there ought to be a job for every man willing to work, a classroom and a teacher for every child to get all the education he is capable of, and that we always must be prepared to reason out our problems with the nations of the world."

This is a year of decision, the President said, because "this is the time we decide our course.

Progress, Not Prejudice

"The prosperity of the many must not be sacrificed to the partisanship of the few," he added. "The progress of all the people must not be victimized by the prejudices of any of the people."

Greeted by huge "LBJ for the USA" banners in the convention room of the Deauville Hotel, the President was interrupted by applause more than 30 times as he told the delegates:

"There is far too much work for Americans to do together in the future for Americans to divide now over the past.

"Too many Americans who want jobs still can't find jobs. Too many of our families are too poor.

"Too many of our young people must end their education too soon. Too many of our older couples must dip too deeply into their life earnings to pay their hospital bills."

In a direct tribute to IAM Pres. Albert J. Hayes, who introduced him to the delegates, Johnson reminded the convention that Hayes, who retires in a few months, "can know that he spent his life participating in the greatest advance made by labor anywhere—in all the history of man.

"The success of all the American people is running at the flood," the President said, citing statistics on August employment, factory payrolls and record-high weekly earnings.

The country has added "nearly 90,000 new jobs every month" for three and a half years in contrast to "a little less than 40,000 a month" in the preceding 42 months.

What Kennedy Meant

"This is what our late beloved Pres. John Kennedy talked about when he said 'we're going to get America moving again," Johnson said.

Speaking slowly, in an almost conversational voice but with great emphasis, the President declared:

"What we enjoy today we are able to enjoy because we and the world are at peace. I don't intend that it shall be lost—for your children or mine."

The "success of America is our trust," he said.

"I know the strength of this nation. I know that we can live as we live now—prosperous, progressive and unafraid—so long as we live together.

"There is no problem at home—no provocation in the world—from which we need to turn away.

"The care of human life and happiness, and not their destruction," he said in a quotation from the nation's third President, Thomas Jefferson, "is the first and only legitimate object of good government."

Machinist Parley Sets Program To Counter Automation's Impact

Miami Beach, Fla.—The search for solutions to the pressing job displacement problems wrought by the nation's advancing technology was given high priority attention by the 1,500 delegates to the Machinists' 26th convention.

Unless quick action is taken to counter the adverse impact of automation, the convention declared, the growth and strength of the national economy and the labor movement will be jeopardized.

A resolution adopted by the delegates expressed faith in the ability of the American system of industrial relations to adapt to the challenges posed by automation and called on IAM negotiators to seek these safeguards in the union's collective bargaining agreements:

- Advance consultation whenever an employer plans major operational changes.
- The right of displaced employes to transfer within the same plant and to other plants of the same employer with adequate moving allowances.
- Retraining of displaced workers at full pay.
- Maintenance of full pay for workers downgraded by technological changes.
- Supplementary payments to workers laid off as a result of automation.
- Provisions for early retirement under adequate pensions.
- Continuation of insurance and other fringe benefits during layoff or retirement.
- New job classifications and higher pay wherever automation increases skill requirements or work demands.
- A fair share of the productivity gain resulting from automation through general pay increases, added leisure time "or in some other socially desirable fashion."

Shorter Workweek Asked

In a separate action, the convention called for redoubled efforts, legislatively and at the bargaining table, to win a standard 35-hour workweek with doubletime pay for overtime, and to reduce the total hours of labor through more holidays, longer vacations, worker sabbaticals, early retirement and a lengthened period of education for the nation's youth.

Major internal decisions included adoption of a 50-cent per month increase in per capita payments to the IAM, sending the rate to $2.50, and rejection of proposals that international vice presidents be elected on a regional basis.

The problems of automation also were given heavy stress by speakers addressing the delegates.

Industrialist John I. Snyder, Jr., who with IAM Pres. Albert J. Hayes is co-chairman of the American Foundation on Automation & Employment, called for more "thinking" on the part of government and the private sector of the economy aimed at creating new industries to provide added job opportunities and absorb the unemployed.

New Markets Seen

Snyder, whose U.S. Industries, Inc., manufactures automation equipment, also called for a searching study of the industrial needs of emerging nations with the view of creating new markets for this nation's output.

"The continued elimination of jobs by machines and the greatly increased amounts of leisure time for those who continue to work," he declared, "will probably be the two primary problems that our society faces between now and the turn of the century."

To "grapple effectively" with these problems, he continued, will require "a far greater degree of wholehearted cooperation between labor, management and government than mankind has ever known before."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz declared that the basic answers to the need for full employment under automation lie in a revision of the education system, with the first step being to make sure that young workers are prepared for "the kind of jobs there are in an automated economy." Beyond that, he added:

"Shouldn't our purpose be to see to it that every boy and girl has his or her talents developed to the fullest extent, whatever they may be, and that the system will be deemed to be working only if it provides opportunity for the use of that kind of talent?"

bitrator Saul Wallen and including Arthur M. Ross of the University of California and Jean McKelvey of Cornell University, recommended 13 steps for cushioning the impact of what it called a "most shattering" drop in railroad jobs—60 percent between 1945 and 1962.

The unions and management had 30 days to negotiate an agreement based on the recommendations but, said Fox, the railroads failed to make any meaningful proposals incorporating the 13 steps.

Strike Call Voted

The strike call was issued Sept. 11, with no date set for a walkout. The dispute goes back to Oct. 15, 1962, when the unions requested contract changes to slow down the fast pace of disappearing jobs. Eleven months ago union members voted overwhelmingly to authorize a strike if all settlement efforts failed.

The Wallen board recommends that:

- Any employe adversely affected by work transfers or job eliminations caused by technological or operational changes should get the benefits of the Washington Job Protection Agreement of 1936—dismissal pay, fringe and relocation benefits and other protective measures.
- The general chairman of the affected union shall be given a 90-day advance notice containing full details of the proposed job elimination.
- The burden of proof as to the cause of any job change shall be on the employer, and unsettled grievances shall go to an expedited arbitration procedure.
- Both parties shall recognize that management has a right to introduce technological and operational changes "except where such changes are clearly barred" by existing rules or agreements.

The board also proposed other changes which were to be reduced to contract language but the parties failed to agree on such language, Fox reported. For example, the roads changed the proposed 90-day advance notice to 15 days, he said.

UAW Foundry Parley Pushes Sickness Aid

Philadelphia — Delegates representing 100,000 foundry workers in the United States and Canada voted to continue pressing their campaign for a 21-day paid sick leave for foundry workers within the framework of Auto Worker contracts.

The delegates, here for the UAW's 19th annual foundry worker wage-and-hour conference, urged local unions to seek sickness and accident benefits of at least $50 a week, and to request company supplementation to make daily benefits equal to a fifth of the weekly benefit, payable from the first day of sickness regardless of condition.

The conference said an extra week's vacation or paid absence allowance, won by the UAW in the new Chrysler Corp. contract, was a "major breakthrough" toward paid sick leave for production workers. It approved a proposal to seek supplemental pay for short-term illnesses also.

Nelson Jack Edwards of the UAW is the foundry department director.

Ontario to Build Retraining Center

Toronto, Ont.—The Ontario provincial government will build a $4 million adult retraining center here to open in 1966. Organized labor has sharply criticized present facilities as so inadequate as to undermine the effectiveness of retraining legislation.

At British Trades Union Congress:

Fraternal Delegates Report On U.S., Free World Gains

Blackpool, Eng.—The outcome of the elections in the United States and Great Britain "will reflect the deeply felt desires of working people for security, social progress and peace with freedom," Pres. Max Greenberg of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union told the annual session of the British Trades Union Congress here.

Greenberg and Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes addressed the convention as fraternal delegates from the AFL-CIO.

In discussing domestic affairs in the U.S., Greenberg noted that the political climate is changing and that differences between the Democratic Party and the Republican Party are sharper than ever before.

"It is our hope and belief," he said, "that the election campaign this year will make unmistakably clear to the American people the direction in which true progress lies and that they will follow that path to a brighter and more hopeful future."

American labor's activities in the international free trade union movement are " a continuance in good use" of the moral support it received in its formative stages from British labor, Sullivan told the congress.

"While we must accept the facts of life wherein the educational levels of people in many areas of the world cannot be sufficiently elevated in a generation," he said, "where non-Communist leadership in the developing countries may not embrace or effectively utilize democratic principles and free institutions, and where economic potential and possibilities do not exist for a rapid economic expansion sufficient to satisfy the yearnings of the people—there we must lend our support and assistance to free trade unionists and their organizations.

"In this way we more than maintain our own freedom; we enhance the opportunities of all others to create tolerable conditions of life which, under any other known system, are mere empty promises, objectives without substance, without hope.

Greenberg expressed confidence that Pres. Johnson will be returned to office by an overwhelming majority because the people recognize his "ability, courage and integrity."

He urged the delegates not to worry about America's role in world affairs after the election.

Isolation Rejected

"America turned its back—forever, I'm convinced—on isolationism and reaction a generation ago," he said. "During this same generation we have experienced the upsurge of McCarthyism, the brinksmanship of the Eisenhower Administration on the world front and its laissez-faire economic policy on the domestic front. But we overcame these, and we shall overcome the threat now posed by the extremists of the right."

Domestic problems in the U.S., Greenberg said, are highlighted by continuing unemployment, intensified by automation, and the "sharpening and intensification" of the Negroes' struggle for first-class citizenship. The problems, he said, are "intimately linked."

"I am proud to say that a leading force in awakening the conscience of white America has been the labor movement. This is not to suggest that the labor movement is perfect. It is true that some sections of the labor movement reflect the prejudices and social climates of their communities. But overwhelmingly the trade unions have supported the efforts of Negroes to win full equality and have played a key role in achieving the progress that has been scored to date."

Sullivan told the TUC delegates of the AFL-CIO's role in establishing the American Institute for Free Labor Development, which has trained more than 5,000 Latin American trade union leaders, has secured commitments of more than $90 million for low-cost housing, and has worked closely with the Alliance for Progress.

A comparable Afro-American Labor Center is being organized, he said, adding an assurance that in its work of this type, "the AFL-CIO has no motive which will not bear the closest inspection" and will continue to work closely with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and its regional organizations.

He called Communist efforts to subvert free and developing nations "the fundamental challenge of our times," but warned against being misled by the "third force" of neutralism.

"One must inevitably come to the realization," Sullivan said, "that in vast part it is the free world which possesses the economic means to rapid growth and progress. Where the captive world's despotic leaders would attempt to manipulate and destroy this capability and use debilitating and harassing maneuvers to capture the volatile and impressionable imaginations of the so-called uncommitted peoples, they must be stopped.

"The capital and productive capacities of the West, created by the work forces which free labor represents, must be intelligently guided for the superb performance the situation demands. To diminish the effort by spreading dissension and division in the free world is to convey to our opponents a call to increase subversion."

PROGRAM FOR NATIONWIDE observance of Eleanor Roosevelt's 80th birthday is gone over by United Nations Ambassador Adlai Stevenson, left, chairman of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation. With him are Sec. of Commerce Luther Hodges, chairman of the Greater Washington Dinner Committee, and Under Sec. of Commerce Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. The Washington dinner will include honors to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan. (See story this page.)

West Virginia Labor Backs Johnson Slate

Charleston, W. Va.—The West Virginia AFL-CIO unanimously endorsed the Democratic ticket of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson for President and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey for Vice President at its fourth special convention here.

Some 300 delegates, with 50 guests looking on, acted by reaffirming the resolution of endorsement passed by the AFL-CIO General Board.

The convention, called primarily for political endorsements and to draw up a state legislative campaign, also gave its backing to Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D) for reelection to a second term despite some opposition. His rival on Nov. 3 will be Cooper P. Benedict, a Goldwater enthusiast who was deputy secretary of defense in the cabinet of former Pres. Eisenhower.

Seventy-seven other candidates for national and state office were endorsed. They included the Democratic candidates for Congress from the state's five districts: John L. Bailey, seeking to unseat Rep. Arch Moore (R) in the 1st District; incumbents Harley O. Staggers, John M. Slack, Jr., and Ken Hechler in the 2d, 3d and 4th Districts, respectively, and James Kee in the 5th District to succeed his mother, Rep. Elizabeth Kee, who is retiring. Mrs. Kee has served since 1952, when her late husband, Rep. John Kee, died after 17 years in the post.

Former Democratic State Chairman Hulett C. Smith was endorsed for governor over former Gov. Cecil H. Underwood.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller contrasted the Johnson-Humphrey ticket with that of their Republican opponents, Sen. Barry Goldwater for President and Rep. William E. Miller for Vice President, at a luncheon meeting. Walter Davis, recently appointed director of COPE Area 2, congratulated the state organization on the success of its COPE program. Five girls were presented with pins on completing 500 hours of volunteer work, and six on finishing 100 hours.

The delegates endorsed a proposed $200 million road bond issue, to match interstate road funds, which will be on the ballot in November, and called for a $1-an-hour state minimum wage.

They also voted opposition to the move by Sen. Everett McK. Dirksen (R-Ill.) to delay effectiveness of Supreme Court reapportionment decisions, backed hospital care for the elderly through social security, and unanimously approved a program designed to implement the Civil Rights Act.

NLRB Ruling Hits Division Of Dock Work

An all-white local union of the Longshoremen in Brownsville, Tex., and the ILA's South Atlantic and Gulf Coast District have been ordered by the National Labor Relations Board to stop enforcing contract terms under which dock work was divided on a 75-25 percent basis with members of all-Negro Local 1368.

Local 1367 and the ILA district also were ordered to stop preventing white and Negro gangs from working in the same ship hatches, and to remove a trusteeship placed over the Negro local because it had filed charges against the white local.

Local 1367 and the district also must reimburse the Negro local for any extra costs levied on the Negro local because of the trusteeship, under which Local 1368's officers were removed by the ILA, the board ruled.

The NLRB upheld findings by Trial Examiner Thomas N. Kessel that the racially discriminatory practices of the white local and the ILA district in Cameron County ports—Brownsville, Harlingen and Port Isabel—must be ended and control of Local 1368's affairs must be returned to its own officers.

Board members Boyd Leedom, Gerald A. Brown and Howard Jenkins, Jr., wrote the majority decision. Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and member John H. Fanning agreed in part but dissented from the majority's findings that the white local and the district violated another section of the law by enforcing a discriminatory work allocation arrangement.

Lathers Press Drive To Recoup Membership

New York—Lathers attending their union's 25th convention here were advised to re-appraise their industry and reverse a tide of shrinking membership through the development of new construction materials and building techniques. The advice came from political dignitaries and building construction employers.

In a report to some 350 delegates and an equal number of alternates at the 25th convention of the Lathers, Pres. Sal Maso noted that his union had lost over 700 members since its last convention in 1961. He called for "renewed determination by members to increase the strength of the union."

Maso told the delegates that with the many new products coming on the market constantly that come under his union's jurisdiction, "there is no reason why our membership should not increase."

The Lathers Union president explained that as a measure to stimulate organizational work and build membership he had assigned additional international representatives throughout the United States, Canada, Alaska, Hawaii and the Bahamas so that the union would have representation in all areas. He noted that the AFL-CIO building trades have several organizational campaigns in progress at present, and urged Lathers local unions to cooperate.

He disclosed that his union is ready to launch an apprenticeship training program, a project which has been in planning for more than nine years. He said that local joint apprenticeship committees soon will open classes to train journeymen in new methods, techniques and materials in the lathing and plastering industry.

Pension Payments Soon

He noted that the union's pension program, established in 1961, is expected to commence paying benefits soon. He commended delegates for their cooperation with COPE, pointing out that the union had won an award for meeting 100 percent of its quota from 1956 through 1963. He also reported that the union has paid out nearly $325,000 in benefits under its death benefit plan, established in 1959.

A lengthy message from Pres. Johnson lauded the Lathers for the record the union has established since 1899, noting that it had been one "of steady improvement." Johnson cited the union for building a better life for its members, and "for all our citizens."

New Film Offered For Sale or Rental

The AFL-CIO documentary film, When the Day's Work is Done, which appeared on 142 television stations over the Labor Day weekend, is now available for rent or purchase by union and community groups.

The purchase price is $50 for AFL-CIO affiliates, $95 for others. To rent for $3 per showing, 10 days notice must be given with two alternate rental dates a minimum of 10 days apart. The film may be obtained through the Film Div. of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006.

Plans Drawn For Tribute To Mrs. FDR

Nationwide observance of Eleanor Roosevelt's 80th birthday will take place Oct. 11 at commemorative dinners across the United States, including Washington, D. C., where AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan will be among those honored.

United Nations Ambassador Adlai Stevenson, chairman of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation, of which Meany and Keenan are resident trustees, announced the dinners will pay tribute to the memory of the "first lady of the world" and will serve as a stimulus to the foundation's work in human relations.

In addition to Washington, dinners will be held in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Miami and Milwaukee.

The Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation was inspired by the late Pres. John F. Kennedy and chartered by Congress in 1963 to carry on Mrs. Roosevelt's work in the fields of human rights, world peace, cancer research and aid to underprivileged children.

One Accurate Statement

SEN. BARRY GOLDWATER'S battle cry that the 1964 election presents a choice, not an echo, is probably the most accurate statement he will make in the campaign.

His attacks on the U. S. Supreme Court and its reapportionment decision, his oblique and indirect attacks on civil rights legislation, his outrageous charge that Pres. Kennedy's magnificent handling of the Cuban missile showdown was staged for political purposes—all these reinforce labor's view that there is only one choice for the American people: the election of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey.

The Goldwater campaign to date, affixed to his record in the Senate and his voluminous outpourings of statements and clarification of statements, make it more important than ever that all groups in the country understand the alternatives posed by the GOP candidate.

Goldwater's voting record in the Senate on 53 issues supported by the AFL-CIO is 100 percent wrong. His proposals on the key issues of prosperity, peace and justice would have a disastrous effect on the nation and the world.

On this basis, and on an analysis of the platform written to support Goldwater's candidacy at the Republican National Convention compared to the record of the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations and the Democratic Party platform, labor made its choice.

IT IS ENCOURAGING to find that a number of other groups in the nation are making the same choice, and especially enlightened Republicans who are forming Republicans for Johnson organizations.

The reason for the formation of these groups is easily understood when Goldwater's record in the Senate is compared to the record of the majority of the party in the upper chamber. On 10 issues in the 87th and 88th Congress a majority of Republican senators ranging from 67 to 93 percent has voted with a majority of Democratic senators. On each issue Goldwater is recorded as opposing the majority in his own party.

The issues are wide-ranging, covering the nuclear test ban treaty, the arms control agency and the tax cut as well as civil rights, vocational education and trade expansion.

It is because of these votes that an advertisement in a number of newspapers by "Republicans for Johnson" declared: "We have checked your voting record—seldom in accord with Republican majorities on vital issues. And we have wondered: Is this in the mainstream of our party's political philosophy?"

Declaring that "we can't go along with you, Senator Goldwater, down a reckless road to nuclear war," the ad continued, "as good Republicans and members of the human race we must decide to cast our vote for two steady and responsible men: Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey."

There is every indication that by Nov. 3 the great majority of the voters will make the same choice and turn back in overwhelming defeat the rightwing extremist movement that has produced Barry Goldwater as its leader.

Clear-Cut Choice

Meany Asks Machinists:

Do We Move Ahead on Nov. 3—Or Back into the Last Century?

IN THE NEXT few weeks we are going to decide as a people whether or not we are going to move forward; we are going to decide what kind of a future America we are going to have. On Nov. 3, we are going to decide: Shall we move forward or shall we move back into the last century?

We still have our Democratic and Republican parties but this year we have a different situation. The parties' names are the same but actually they are not the same.

One party has been captured, lock, stock and barrel, by the extreme right-wing elements. Make no mistake about it, this control may be temporary but it is here now and it exists for this campaign and so we do have a clear-cut choice.

The Democratic Party under the leadership of Pres. Johnson, while it is not perfect by any means, is at least, by comparison, the party of progress; and the Republican Party stands captured, as I said, lock, stock and barrel, by the right-wing elements in this country. It is these two parties that we will choose between.

For many years we have been up against those who feel that this would be a better society if we did not have trade unions—that the trade unions are a menace, an expression of the selfish few of the desire to get more of the good things of life at the expense of their neighbors. We have had evidence from time to time that this particular group in our society is quite active. We have had the "right-to-work" laws; we have people who make a career of promoting "right-to-work" laws.

And so here again we have a clear-cut choice, because those who are in control of the Republican Party are the same people who advocate "right-to-work" laws or labor control throughout this entire country. Incidentally, the first bill that was introduced in 1953 by the standard bearer whom Sen. Humphrey refers to as "temporary head of the party," the first bill he introduced in 1953 was a bill calling for a national "right-to-work" law. Therefore, we have a choice not only on the question of the liberal attitude of the candidates and the parties but also on their attitude toward something in which we have a very great interest—the maintenance of free trade unions.

Here we have a choice between those who believe in national "right-to-work" laws, those who believe that the only union that is worth anything is a union that doesn't do anything for its members; and then those who believe, as we do, that trade unions can make a contribution not only to the life of our members but to society as a whole.

For many, many years we have been battling for legislation, battling to improve the conditions of life and I defy anyone to show me any piece of legislation that we battled for that did not benefit all the people of America.

NOW, LET'S TAKE a look at the candidates for a moment. The record of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration the last four years speaks for itself. There is a long list of legislative achievements that I am not going to attempt to read to you, but I can say quite frankly that this is the best legislative session that we have had since the days of the Roosevelt Administration 30 years ago.

Now, let's go into Barry's record. You know, we keep a score sheet and I want to make this clear. We don't keep it for Barry's special benefit. We keep it on all members of Congress and have kept it as long as the AFL has had an office in Washington.

We don't take every measure. We take every measure which we think is important to the little people of this country, whether it is on labor unions, labor and management, education or anything else, and we list 10, 12, 14 votes, whatever we feel is important for each session of Congress.

This man has a unique record. Since he came to the Senate in 1953, his record on the things that benefit little people of this country as opposed to the big interests, his record is absolutely 100 percent wrong. He didn't even vote for us once by mistake.

We have the organization. We have the members, and we have the votes. But having the organization and having the members and having the votes doesn't mean anything unless you get the votes into the box on Election Day. So I would like to plead with all to work closely with COPE, with the political arm of the AFL-CIO. See that you get registered. See that your neighbors and your family get registered and see that on Election Day they get out and vote.

I'm sure if you do this, that on the 4th of November the sun will be shining brightly, and we will be getting ready to move forward with the type of America we all love.

Morgan Says:

Goldwater Seen Running Short Of Issues, Support and Funds

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

IT WOULD BE recklessly premature to say that Sen. Goldwater is in hot water but there is no evading the fact that the Republican presidential ticket is beset with a multiplicity of problems.

Pres. Johnson continues to be the overwhelming favorite in the preponderance of polls, for whatever they are worth, and more and more observers are conjecturing on the possibility of a 15-million-vote landslide margin for the Democratic incumbent.

Morgan

It is true that his GOP opponent had a fine day in San Diego and Los Angeles, but it would have been a disturbing thing if he had not, because this is true-blue Goldwater country. It was, in fact, Los Angeles County which gave the Arizona senator his slim margin of victory in the California primary in June over Gov. Rockefeller and projected him into the Republican nomination at San Francisco. Also Mississippi's Gov. Paul Johnson has endorsed Goldwater but this was about as unexpected as the White Citizens Councils embracing segregation.

The senator's problems are both large and small. A Wall Street Journal story by its astute political correspondent, Alan L. Otten, reports that Republican fund-raisers, discouraged in part by the readings of the polls, are having grave difficulty raising the money needed to finance the Goldwater campaign.

"Many businessmen and other well-heeled citizens who ordinarily contribute to GOP presidential campaigns are backing Democrat Johnson this time," Otten wrote, adding that many state Republican organizations controlled by liberal members of the party were just not knocking themselves out to find funds for the Goldwater-Miller ticket.

As if to emphasize that finding, a blue-ribbon list of District of Columbia Republicans took a full page ad in Washington newspapers proclaiming their support for Pres. Johnson and Sen. Humphrey, declaring: "Sorry, Senator (Goldwater) . . . we can't go along with you . . . down a reckless road to nuclear war."

Despite the violently visceral pitch of his attacks on the Democrats, Barry Goldwater's running mate, New York Rep. William Miller, had a little trouble drawing crowds and stirring their attention in Indiana on Labor Day, according to dispatches. By contrast, Sen. Humphrey was greeted by a torchlight parade of more than 1,000 persons when he landed in Akron, O., at 1 a.m.

Miller suffered a little more embarrassment as he began stumping New England. Arriving in Bangor, Me., he was informed that the Penobscot County Republican chairman, Llewellyn R. Michaud, had resigned, saying he could not in good conscience support the Goldwater-Miller ticket.

Even the Communists in Chile have been unaccommodating. If their candidate had won the Chilean presidential elections it would have given the senator a sharpened point with which to attack the Administration's handling of the Alliance for Progress, but the moderates won instead, though whether this is a feather in the Alliance's cap is not clear.

Belatedly and with questionable enthusiasm the Senate Democratic majority nevertheless moved to deflate scandal as an issue by voting unanimously to reopen the Bobby Baker case—thereby at least minimizing the charges of whitewash.

BUT PERHAPS the biggest theft of a potential issue for the Goldwater camp was perpetrated by the Chrysler Corp. and the Auto Workers by coming to an agreement, an hour before a strike deadline, on a new contract which was hailed by both management and the union as a milestone in free collective bargaining.

A work stoppage in such a vital industry as automobiles would not only severely impede the extraordinary long-range climb of the economy but fill the air with angry words at precisely the time the leaders of industry (including Henry Ford) and labor (including Walter Reuther) were being drawn closer together in support of Johnson and his unifying vision of a "great society."

The Chrysler pact sharply damages the Goldwater argument that business and labor cannot thrive in the "specious" economic atmosphere created by the Administration.

What cutting issue is there left, then, for Sen. Goldwater to saw wood with? He can, presumably, add to his remarkable attacks on the President for not mentioning communism in his acceptance speech and for leaving out the word "freedom" in his Labor Day speech in Detroit, by winging him again if he leaves motherhood out of his next address. And there is still the white backlash to exploit further with moralistic calls for law and order in the streets.

Finally, of course, the senator might attempt something absolutely revolutionary; a serious, sober, carefully researched discussion of the meaning and place of conservatism in our society and how adherence to its tenets would improve the national political balance. After all, he did, once upon a time, promise to do just that.

Washington Reports:

'Absolute Need' Seen Assuring Social Security Hospital Care

HOSPITAL CARE for the aged under social security was approved by the Senate because it believed there is an absolute need for the program, Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) and Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.) declared in interviews on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

"We kept presenting to the Senate the cold facts, the pressing need," said Gore, who introduced the hospitalization amendment. "By 1975 we will have 25 million people over 65. An overwhelming percentage will have no significant income. We can't walk off and let these old people die.

"I think the social conscience of the nation has been stirred. We are the only highly-developed nation on earth that doesn't have some progressive, enlightened system for health care for the elderly. We are the richest nation on earth; we can afford it. In fact, we cannot afford to be without it."

The Senate added the hospital care provision as an amendment to the social security benefit improvements bill passed by the House. The measure provides for a prepaid system of health insurance through a tax of four-tenths of 1 percent on payrolls, borne equally by employer and employe. Out of the trust fund thus set up, any person past 65 may get stipulated hospital or nursing home care.

Both senators stressed that the benefits would come "as a matter of right, not as a charity or welfare proposition."

CASE ANSWERED the argument that the wealthy should not be covered by saying that all insurance systems are based on broad coverage with everyone paying his share.

"We are not attempting to distinguish between those who have riches or those who are in poverty," he said. "I think this is a great social gain."

This legislation is supported by a majority of the people, Gore declared. He said he is hopeful for House approval of the Senate amendment.

Many physicians oppose the program, Case asserted, because of a mistaken fear that it is a step toward socialization. "The fact is," he said, "we are likely to get socialization if we don't take care of pressing hospital bills. This measure takes the pressure off."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

EN ROUTE WITH JOHNSON—Democrats around the country are happy indeed when Pres. Johnson sweeps into their states—as he has in eight states since the Atlantic City convention—even when the trip is labeled non-political. But they have discovered that when it bears that brand, they get only the set speech, and they will be glad when he comes back campaigning.

When he went to Miami Beach for his Machinists convention appearance, for example, he saved no time for meetings with state or local party leaders—not even with members of the President's Club, the $1,000 contributors who had announced he would greet them. He didn't.

In Harrisburg, Pa., he had the state's Republican governor, William W. Scranton, on the platform with him, and Michigan's Gov. George W. Romney was very much present for the President's Labor Day speech in Detroit's Cadillac Square.

It was much the same in Johnson's northwestern trip, where Montana's GOP Gov. Tim Babcock shared the spotlight at Great Falls, and Oregon's Gov. Mark O. Hatfield traveled with the President from Vancouver, British Columbia, back to Portland. Local Democrats have noted, however, that the President is steadily increasing the political explosiveness of his speeches—beginning to take heavy swings at the Republican nominee Sen. Barry Goldwater by the simple device of strongly reaffirming foreign and domestic policies that Goldwater has repeatedly voted against or denounced.

DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES running against GOP incumbents will be grateful when the President comes back frankly campaigning for the whole ticket—and asks the people to vote for them. In the Northwest, at least, the President pulled far larger crowds even for his non-political appearances than Goldwater had seen a week earlier.

A crowd estimated at above 10,000 greeted Johnson at the Great Falls airport, and local officials said the roads were traffic-jammed with as large a number trying to get there. Goldwater drew about 4,800, reporters with him said, for a full-scale speech in the city.

An impressive crowd lined the streets in Seattle, waiting in a heavy rain for more than an hour, for the Johnson cavalcade, and those who had been there with the Arizona senator a few days earlier said the contrast with the sparse interest Goldwater aroused was startling.

Goldwater had a huge crowd in Los Angeles, and has drawn well in the South—though not so well, in some places, as Richard M. Nixon did four years ago. Elsewhere, his pulling power has seemed to be slipping.

LOCAL DEMOCRATS are anxious for a heavy Johnson campaign because they think they themselves can sense the Arizona senator's slippage.

Sen. Henry (Scoop) Jackson of Washington told the President the state's primary elections Sept. 15—a kind of popularity poll because a single ballot lists both Democratic and GOP candidates—indicates Democratic strength on the upsurge. The President himself seems likely to carry the state heavily, and two Republican incumbent congressmen, Representatives Jack Westland and William Stinson, might be beaten, he reported.

GOP leaders also see Goldwater weakening, even in the Midwest, where normally Republican Chicago suburbs are reporting a sharp swing to Johnson. Women Republican voters, they acknowledge, are overwhelmingly for the President.

State and local Democratic candidates are beginning to think they may win in areas they normally lost, if Johnson campaigns wholeheartedly.

THE HOUSE was urged to approve the old-age hospital care provision added by the Senate to the social security bill, in interviews by Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.), right, and Sen. Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.) on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Highest Tuition Costs on Record Face Returning College Students

STUDENTS RETURNING to college this fall will have to cope with the highest tuition costs on record. Similarly, families with children now in high school, who hope they will go to college, are going to have to do some knowledgable planning to achieve the increasingly urgent goal of higher education for their children.

Does this mean that moderate-income families and poorer students must abandon hope? No. But it does mean you need to know about all available aids, including several now in the making, and encourage your children to seek higher education, and urge your state legislators to give all possible support to public colleges in your area. These are especially vital to wage-earning families.

Here are the findings of our survey of 1964-65 costs covering 700 colleges and universities:

- Expenses range from as much as $3,500 a year at some prestige universities to as little as perhaps $150 for tuition plus $500 for carfare, books, lunches and incidentals, at some public and two-year community colleges.
- Average among most fee-charging four-year colleges for students who will live on campus is now $2,400 a year, including $980 for tuition and fees, $822 for room and board, and $500-$600 for books, clothing, travel and other incidentals. (This figure can be as little as $400 for a student whose home is within 100 miles of the college.)
- Private universities and colleges, of course, have highest fees. At "prestige" colleges, typical cost, counting all incidentals, now is $3,400 a year. Another group of well-known private universities costs somewhat less. These are the colleges often centered in the large cities, such as University of Pittsburgh, Tulane, University of Southern California, George Washington, Boston University, University of Rochester, and others. Their typical complete cost is about $2,750 a year. Many independent liberal-arts colleges, usually with about 1,000 to 2,000 students, also have costs around this level.
- Major state universities still are less expensive than private universities for in-state residents, although charges for out-of-state students are approaching those of some of the private universities. Tuition and fees for residents average $300; for non-residents $655. Room and board averages $710. Total costs, including books, clothing and incidentals, typically now are $1,500-$1,600 for residents, and $1,900 for non-residents.

Residents of Idaho, Oklahoma, Texas and West Virginia, and most southern states, can attend their state universities for $1,400 or less a year for all costs. But at some state universities, including a number for which there is high demand—including Wisconsin, University of Michigan, Penn State, Rutgers and University of Vermont—full costs, even for state residents, now are $1,750 to $1,900. Costs for students from other states attending these schools often is $2,000-$2,500.

- State colleges and smaller state universities are less expensive. In fact these are the lowest-cost dormitory-providing colleges with the possible exception of a group of small church-related colleges in the Midwest and South. Costs average $240 for tuition and fees and $600 for room and board. Total cost including an estimated $500 for incidentals is $1,300-$1,400.
- Publicly-supported junior or community colleges are least expensive, although not really free except in California, some in Kansas and Illinois, and a scattering in other states. Tuition fees usually range from $100 to $500 a year. Most typical fees are $200-$250 for in-district students, and $250-$300 for those from outside the district but within the same state.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Madison Avenue's Sweet Talk Big Help to Housewife's Morale

AN OPEN LETTER TO MADISON AVENUE:

Gentlemen:

This is a thank you note. Surprised? I'll bet you are. You fellows in advertising have been scolded so much lately that you must sometimes feel that nobody loves you.

Well, I do, and I am a typical American housewife—one of those poor, befuddled creatures who are supposed to be your helpless pawn. They say you put innocent housewives like me into hypnotic trances and send us off to the merchandise marts on wild, bacchanalian shopping sprees. They say you're poking around in our unconscious minds, searching for Freudian impulses and deep-seated anxieties that impel us to buy the products you're selling.

Well, I don't care if you are the Svengalis they make you out to be. Just between you and me, gentlemen, I'm touched by your interest. It proves that you care. It really matters to you how I feel about my shampoo, and you're profoundly interested in my deep-down attitude toward noodle soup.

You'll understand why I'm so grateful for your attentiveness when I tell you that my own husband didn't notice that I'd switched from an ordinary hairspray (which left a dulling, unattractive film on my hair) to a totally new formula (which gave my hair natural body and sheen plus greater manageability).

It depresses me to think what life would be like if I didn't have you to tell me what a provocative, intoxicating creature I become when I dab La Passionata perfume on my ear lobes. If it weren't for you, I'd never know that my Sizzling Pink lipstick sets my lips aflame with exuberant, incendiary, come-hither bewitchery.

I'd lack the inner security and confidence that comes from knowing that my gossamer, glamorglo hosiery is turning heads everywhere; that my liquid makeup gives me the dew-drenched look; that my glassware echoes the elegance of the 18th Century and expresses my flawless taste and discrimination. Nobody else says such nice things to me.

YOU'VE ADDED MAGIC to my life in so many ways. I used to feel apologetic when I served canned spaghetti to my family for dinner. But you taught me to hold up my head, and serve it proudly and triumphantly. You awakened me to its lusty, gusty, slow-simmered, herb-seasoned, real Florentine flavor. You educated me to taste the difference. Now, knowing as I do that it was created from a carefully guarded heirloom recipe handed down from one generation to another by one of Italy's noblest families, I serve it with a flourish—humming snatches of Verdi.

Your critics carp that I pay a pretty penny for your seductive cajolery and honeyed words. They say you should stop filling my head with moonbeams and treat me like a rational adult. You understand me better than that, don't you? You've peeked into my unconscious mind, and you know that the last thing I want is to be treated like a rational adult.

Gentlemen, you have added magic, poetry, sparkle, romance and color to my life, and I'd be utterly lost without you.

Gratefully yours,
Jane Goodsell

Unions Urged to Back '64 United Fund Drives

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has called for support of the 1964 United Community Campaigns of America.

In a letter to Campaign Chairman Charles H. Brower, Meany pointed out that the AFL-CIO believes "citizens should join together in supporting voluntary social agencies, which are an essential element in the overall effort to meet human needs.

"We believe united giving—that is, a single campaign for all worthy endeavors—is the equitable and effective way to rally that support. And we believe the policies of the agencies thus supported should be determined by those who support them," Meany wrote.

"Therefore, we enthusiastically endorse the 1964 efforts of the United Community Campaigns. As you know, many union members play leading roles as policy makers as well as fund-raisers for the 34,000 health, recreation and welfare agencies which benefit from these campaigns.

"I have no doubt," Meany concluded, "that union members will continue to fulfill their major role as givers, too."

Landmarks Week:

Celebration Focuses On Nation's Heritage

AMERICAN LANDMARKS WEEK, during which those who love America make a special effort to focus attention on safeguarding her rich and diverse architectural, historical and natural heritage, is observed from Sept. 28 to Oct. 4.

It is the climax of the American Landmarks Celebration, this country's observance of the Intl. Campaign for Monuments, held from Aug. 1 to Nov. 30.

The international campaign, conducted throughout the world at the same time, was set up in 1960 by the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization to encourage member countries "to develop and improve the efficiency of technical and legal measures for the protection, preservation and restoration of cultural property, and for the protection of the beauty and character of the landscape and of sites. . . ."

"These are values," said Pres. Johnson in a message to UNESCO read at the opening ceremony in Paris, "which our citizens hold in high esteem. . . . We look back with reverence to lasting reminders of a vital past. We look forward to achievements which will enhance our future with accomplishments to match our monumental past."

Mrs. Johnson is honorary chairman of the U. S. celebrations, with Sec. of the Interior Stewart L. Udall and Chairman Gordon Gray of the National Trust for the Preservation of Historic Monuments serving as the active co-chairmen. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is a member of the steering committee.

The observance was touched off on July 30 when Mrs. Johnson formally presented Gray a certificate designating Pres. Woodrow Wilson's last home in Washington as a national historic landmark to be administered by the National Trust for Historic Preservation.

"In this age of vast and constant change," she observed, "it is more important than ever that we preserve our rich inheritance and remember its significance—both for the present and for our future."

ORGANIZATIONS of all sorts and publications of every level are cooperating in seeking to make the celebration a success. Their motivation was summed up in a statement by the observance committee which said:

"The progress of our mobile society must continue, but our great technological civilization has reached a crossroads. We must now ensure that the affluent society does not erase the national memory."

Historical sites and buildings and areas of natural interest "provide a vital physical contact with history," the committee said, that gives the past "vivid reality and meaning."

"One of the greatest gifts we can offer the future," it continued, "is the preservation of those buildings, forests and countrysides which bring fresh perspectives to each generation. . . .

"Today, when accelerated highway construction, badly planned housing development, irresponsible commercial speculation and sheer indifference threaten so many irreplaceable sites, the need for foresight is greater than ever.

"Highways can be planned to blend with forested and scenic areas. Very often an historic building can become a central feature of a new development rather than a casualty. And the only remedy for indifference is our own conscience—that of the individual and the nation."

Backwards Step:

Employer Warns Against 'Work' Laws

The industrial growth of states that have adopted so-called "right-to-work" laws has "gone backwards," Abraham Savitt, executive director of the Philadelphia Apparel Producers Association, declared in a warning prompted by the efforts of a Washington-based management group to enact such legislation in Pennsylvania.

"The claims made by advocates of this law that it would bring industry to these states has proved to be false," he added. "Neither has it prevented work stoppages."

Pres. Johnson in seeking reelection has taken a strong stand against "work" laws and the Democratic platform pledges repeal of that section of the Taft-Hartley Act which authorizes them.

Goldwater for R-T-W

In direct contrast, Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Republican presidential candidate, introduced a national so-called "right-to-work" law in the present Congress and has consistently urged state laws that would destroy collective bargaining.

"I believe that collective bargaining has proven to be one of the best and most democratic systems in our great country—it is the American way," Savitt said in a statement made public by the National Council for Industrial Peace, which was founded by the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt and the late Sen. Herbert H. Lehman to oppose "R-T-W" in the public interest.

Extremist groups, including the John Birch Society, have been active this year lobbying for so-called "right-to-work" laws in Kentucky, New Mexico, Montana, Idaho, Oklahoma, Oregon and Washington state as well as in Pennsylvania, the council said. An "R-T-W" amendment to the Oklahoma constitution was defeated in the May 5 primary and a petition to get such a proposal on the November ballot failed in Oregon.

Savitt said that as a representative of management in the second largest industry in Philadelphia, and also a "very important" industry in Pennsylvania, "I am definitely opposed to the so-called 'right-to-work' law.

No Need for Law

"I have been a student of labor-management relations and collective bargaining for many years and I find there is no need for a 'right-to-work' law," he said.

"The system of collective bargaining that has prevailed in the United States whereby management and labor can sit across the bargaining table and iron out their differences and solve problems . . . gives each side the right and opportunity to present their grievances and settle them.

"If, by law, this system is disrupted, labor and management both will be the losers."

Meany Urges Conferees To Act on Hospital Care

cans everywhere" that "if you believe in medical care under social security, now is the time to stand up and say so."

Earlier Johnson had said: "Too many of our older couples must dig too deeply into their savings to pay their hospital bills and that is why we are working so hard, so long, to try to pass medicare."

The Senate-passed bill, strongly backed by organized labor, includes, in addition to a $7 cash increase, a program of hospital care, nursing home recuperation and home health services other than physicians' bills. Both the House and Senate versions raise social security taxes and the taxable wage base to pay for the added benefits.

A tentative plan to try to have the House instruct its conferees in advance to accept the Senate hospital care amendment was dropped when it became evident that some hospital care supporters would vote against tieing the hands of the conferees. The House has never voted on the social security hospital care issue and Administration leaders were concerned lest a vote against instructing conferees be considered a rejection of hospital care.

The conferees include Rep. Cecil King (D-Calif.) and Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.), sponsors of the King-Anderson bill, and Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.), who introduced the hospital care amendment adopted by the Senate.

Although the other members of the Senate conference committee voted against hospital care, a majority voted for the bill as a whole and the group is committed to support the Senate position.

Mills, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, is considered the key man in the House conference committee which otherwise is divided evenly on the issue.

The president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, John W. Edelman, welcomed what he described as "a conciliatory note" in the statement by Mills that he would take an open-minded approach to the conference.

Edelman said that the House and Senate conferees "share a grave responsibility because for many of our needy elderly the decision of this conference may literally mean a matter of life or death."

He added that the action of the conferees "will be eagerly awaited by 18.5 million senior citizens and their 100 million children and grandchildren."

ITU Issues 1st Volume of New History

Colorado Springs, Colo. — The first volume of a new history of the Typographical Union, the country's oldest, has just been published, according to an announcement by Pres. Elmer Brown.

It is called "A Study of the History of the International Typographical Union" and is divided into three sections. These cover the period from the invention of movable type to 1850; the development of the ITU's laws and fundamental principles from its start to the present, and the evoultion of its ideals and purposes into its basic philosophy of unionism.

The ITU is 112 years old. The new history is not intended to be a sequel to the union's only other history, "History of the ITU," published in 1913, Brown said.

The volume contains 411 pages. It may be ordered from Brown at ITU Headquarters, Colorado Springs, Colo., at $4.50 each, postage included.

A VISIT to the Maritime Union's pension and welfare fund offices was on the agenda of delegates to the National Foundation of Health, Welfare & Pension Plans conference in New York.

Welfare, Pension Fund Workshop Helps Bargaining Teams Bone Up

New York—Union and management negotiators who face each other at the bargaining table at contract time sat side by side during three days of workshop sessions here studying mortgage investments, stock and bond portfolios and the practical problems of administering billions of dollars held in trust for pensions, health and welfare benefits of millions of workers.

The group which brought them together was the National Foundation of Health, Welfare & Pension Plans—the nation's largest forum of labor-management cooperation.

Among the 1,800 conference participants were professional administrators employed by joint trust funds, leading actuaries, prominent economists, and experts in the health insurance and medical cooperative field.

AFL-CIO Investments Dir. Alexander Bookstaver, a conference speaker, urged fund administrators to give greater consideration to investments in government-backed mortgages. These, he stressed, combine safety and profit to the investor with a socially desirable program which will stimulate the nation's economy.

He described the pooled investment trust being established by the AFL-CIO—a non-profit service offered to affiliates and interested joint trust funds.

The pooled funds, Bookstaver said, will provide financing for union-built residential housing—both private homes and apartments—and thus create jobs both for construction workers and for workers in a multitude of industries providing materials and furnishings for homes.

'Seed Money' Corporation

Bookstaver also outlined the role of the auxiliary corporation the AFL-CIO is setting up to provide initial equity or "seed money" for non-profit housing for moderate income groups and for the elderly. Since the basic financing for these programs comes from direct, low-interest government loans, and since the "seed money" is repaid on completion, the initial investment will become a revolving fund to help get such projects started.

There was not even a ripple at this conference of the Teamster-created turmoil which ended last year's workshop and led to the technical dissolution of the former National Conference of Health, Welfare & Pension Plans.

In the words of Federal Dist. Judge George Hart, Teamster Pres. James R. Hoffa and his cohorts had "set about to make it impossible for the duly elected officers and directors . . . to conduct a convention in a proper and orderly manner."

The court's findings of facts described a rump business session, called by Hoffa but boycotted by a majority of delegates, as "designed to give control" of the organization to Hoffa. Those participating, Judge Hart commented, performed their roles like "well-trained seals."

After a battle of injunctions and counter-injunctions, the officers succeeded in voluntarily dissolving the former organization and immediately reorganizing with the same leadership under a charter limiting the group's functions to educational programs and providing safeguards against any future attempt to capture the association—and its reputation and influence in the labor-management welfare and pension field.

Prepaid group health plans, providing comprehensive physician and clinical care as well as hospital and surgical services, received strong endorsements from four speakers at a panel session.

Sam Pollock, president of a Cleveland Meat Cutters local, urged that union-management welfare funds join with other community groups to establish a comprehensive health care plan on a citywide basis.

Not 'Health Care'

Stressing the value of preventive medical care, he said use of the phrase "health care" to refer to plans limited to hospital and surgical benefits is as "twisted" in meaning as the phrase "right to work."

Pollock said his union has helped launch Cleveland's new Community Health Foundation because "this is the best way to serve the community of which the Meat Cutters are a part."

Mrs. Dorothy Rice, medical economist with the U.S. Public Health Service, reported that persons covered by comprehensive group health plans spend less time in hospitals than those covered by other forms of health or hospital insurance.

This is borne out, she said, by the experience of the Federal Employe Health Benefit program under which government employes who selected a comprehensive group health plan spent 40 percent less time in hospitals. For health and welfare programs, she suggested, "the lower utilization of hospitalization under group practice means savings in dollars and cents."

Two other panelists, Dr. W. P. Dearing, director of the Group Health Association of America, and Dr. Caldwell B. Esselstyn, director of Detroit's Community Health Association, stressed the improved services as well as economies under a comprehensive prepaid group practice program.

At another panel, Dr. Frank Vandever of the Continental Casualty Co. predicted a major growth in dental insurance, which he termed "one of the major gaps" in the present health coverage.

He credited the "foresight and initiative" of unions at the bargaining table for the massive expansion of health insurance generally. In the relatively new field of dental insurance, he said, 16 of 23 plans in operation are sponsored by unions.

A proposal that welfare funds be used for broader purposes than is customary was made by Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of New York City AFL-CIO, who addressed a luncheon session.

Scholarships Urged

He suggested that the funds could finance studies of automation's impact on the industry involved and that a portion of fund earnings be earmarked for college scholarships for qualified youngsters who would not otherwise be able to continue their education.

In the investment area, Van Arsdale urged that money be put into construction designed "to provide homes for working people and at the same time aid in the development of a full employment economy."

In some other highlights:

- Joseph Swire, pension director of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, reminded the conference that "the basic fact in pension and welfare negotiations is the raw economic power to strike. If our unions did not have this power, we would not have succeeded in getting pension and welfare programs negotiated in the first place."
- A self-described Republican economist, Dr. Pierre A. Rinfret, said the economic policies of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations have been "good for business." Rinfret, board chairman of the investment firm of Lionel D. Edie & Co., predicted that 1965 will be a year of good economic growth and said he was "fundamentally optimistic" about long-term as well as short-term prospects for the economy.
- Assistant Atty. Gen. Herbert J. Miller, Jr., warned that laxity in safeguarding trust funds could lead to moves for tighter government controls.

CORRECTION

A story in the AFL-CIO News for Aug. 29 incorrectly identified Sen. George McGovern (D) as a senator elected in 1962 in North Dakota by an extremely close vote.

It was a close vote, all right—but McGovern is from South Dakota.

PETER T. SCHOEMANN DAY was officially proclaimed in Wisconsin by Gov. John W. Reynolds and was climaxed with a dinner in Milwaukee at which honors were heaped on the president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters. The union, of which he has been a member for 50 years, established a scholarship fund in his name. Here Schoemann (left) is receiving an inscribed copy of the executive board's resolution setting it up from Sec.-Treas. William C. O'Neill (center) and Assistant Sec.-Treas. Martin Ward.

Tributes to Schoemann Cite 50 Years in Union

Milwaukee—Saturday, Sept. 12, was officially "Peter T. Schoemann Day in Wisconsin," so proclaimed by Gov. John W. Reynolds in a resolution lauding the Milwaukee-born president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters.

The recognition by the governor was but one of a long series of honors and tributes paid Schoemann at a testimonial dinner here marking his 50th year as a member of the union.

Heading the list of speakers was AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, himself a member of the Plumbers and longtime friend and associate of Schoemann.

Other speakers were Gov. Reynolds, U.S. Senators William Proxmire and Gaylord Nelson, Rep. Clement Zablocki (D-Wis.), Milwaukee County Executive John Doyne, and Milwaukee Mayor Henry W. Maier.

More than 1,000 of Schoemann's friends jammed all available halls of the Schroeder Hotel to participate. Those who could not get into the main ballroom saw the program via huge closed-circuit television screens.

Toastmaster George Haberman, president of the Wisconsin State AFL-CIO, read congratulatory telegrams from Pres. Johnson and Vice Presidential Candidate Sen. Hubert Humphrey.

Lauded by Meany

Meany praised Schoemann for his "countless services to his fellow man" and hailed his stewardship of the plumbers' union, declaring that no other labor organization approaches it in its apprenticeship training. Its success in this area is due, the AFL-CIO president said, to the dedication of Schoemann in constantly seeking to upgrade and improve all aspects of the craft. Meany referred to the annual plumbers' apprenticeship programs at Purdue University and pointed out that the union "spends more on its apprenticeship training programs than the U.S. government does in the field."

Meany drew a standing ovation when he concluded by describing Schoemann as "a fine individual, a fine trade unionist and primarily a fine American."

Other tributes were given by Louis Schmaus, a former officer of Local 75, Schoemann's home local, and now a successful contractor and sanitary engineer; Harold Vincent, Milwaukee superintendent of schools; Anthony J. King, business manager of Local 75; and Frank Bonadio, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The evening concluded with a number of presentations from the city of Milwaukee, the state of Wisconsin, Local 75 and the Plumbers executive board. The last was in the form of a perpetual trust scholarship fund to be established in Schoemann's name.

In his response, Schoemann reminisced briefly on the high spots of his career, giving credit to a number of friends, present and deceased, "who made possible my being here tonight."

'Return to 19th Century':

Goldwater's Economic Views Assailed as Threat to Nation

"The dangerous economics" of GOP Presidential Candidate Barry Goldwater "could rip the fabric of the nation's economic strength, lead to mass unemployment and endanger America's leadership in the struggle for peace and freedom," the AFL-CIO declared.

In an article in the federation's monthly magazine, The American Federationist, titled "The Dangerous Economics of Barry Goldwater," the Senator's economic philosophy was assailed as "an attempt to return to a mythical yesteryear that no longer exists."

The article, prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, asserts that if the economic views of the GOP candidates were to prevail there would be fewer government programs when more are needed to meet the challenge of automation and the nation's public service needs. Unemployment compensation would be restricted, the social security system "undermined" and there would be no hospital care for the aged under social security.

Goldwater's economic philosophy, the article continues, would curtail the role of the trade unions and "America would be pushed back toward the days when employers fired whomever they wished and dictated wage increases or wage cuts, without the check of strong trade unions or effective collective bargaining."

"In its early days when America was essentially a nation of farmers and small local businesses, it could have tolerated the economic philosophy of Sen. Goldwater," the article declares. "But as this country has become industrialized and powerful and nationwide corporation have emerged, the vast majority of the people are now living in urban areas and are dependent on paychecks. The responsibility of the national government to foster stable economic growth and protect the general welfare is now imperative."

Charging that the Goldwater forces "seemed to have learned little, if anything, from the history of America," AFL-CIO researchers point out that the dedication in the 1920s to the proposition that "that government is best that governs least" inevitably led to the "worst peacetime catastrophe in the nation's history. It took decisive federal action in the 1930s to prevent national economic disaster."

With almost 90 percent of the working population today dependent on employment by others for a livelihood, "the charge that Pres. Lyndon Johnson is destroying liberty through programs to increase jobs in an age of automation and provide assistance to the poor is a harsh distortion of America's needs in the 1960s and the government's responsibility to meet those needs," the article declares.

The choice today is not, as Senator Goldwater declares, a choice between individual responsibility or collective responsibility, the article says. The problem is "how to advance the common welfare and preserve individual freedom."

'Negative' Views

When it comes to a job at decent pay, education and health care, aid in the face of life's adversities, a decent home and community in which to live, the views of Goldwater and the GOP platform, the article charges, "are negative and critical of what the government has done for the past 30 years."

"The productive capacity of the American economy is potentially so great it holds promise of making life better for everyone. But this promise will not be achieved by an attempt to return to the economics of the 19th Century, which brought America to the brink of disaster in 1929."

Goldwater's "simple and tidy solution" for the complex economic problems of America in the 1960s has the familiar tone of a promise made over 60 years ago, the article says, when George F. Baer, who was president of the Reading Railroad, assured his striking workers:

"The rights and interests of the laboring man will be protected and cared for . . . not by the labor agitators, but by the Christian men whom God in His wisdom has given control of the property interests of the country."

2 Named to Head AFSCME Bodies

Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes has announced the appointment of directors of educational, political and legislative councils in Ohio and Michigan.

Named to head Ohio Public Employes Council 8 was William Lynn, who has been staff director of the union's Cincinnati District Council and previously was a business agent for the Stage Employes in that area. Headquarters for his new post are in Columbus.

Mrs. Nancy Pratt Vanderbeek of Birmingham, Mich., who was on the research staffs of the former AFL and the AFL-CIO from 1952 to 1957, was chosen director of the new Michigan Public Employes Council 68 in the Detroit area. For the past three years Mrs. Vanderbeek has lectured on consumer economics for the Labor Program Service of Michigan State University.

Biemiller Comments:

88th Congress Best Since New Deal Era

The legislative record of the 88th Congress to date is the best of any Congress "since the early days of the New Deal," AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said in a radio interview.

He noted that two of the "big three" items on labor's legislative program have already been enacted—a tax cut and the civil rights law—with the third, social security hospital care for the aged, under consideration.

In addition, he said, "this Congress has been very, very effective in the fields of education . . . health . . . conservation . . . and on many labor issues."

Biemiller was interviewed over the Mutual Broadcasting network on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs program.

President a Factor

While the legislative milestones are "not all" because of Pres. Johnson's prodding, he said, this has been a factor. The President, he added, has "no peer . . . as a man who understands Congress, who knows how to get it moving, who is tireless, full of energy, and who has urged Congress on" to a rapid pace.

Among the accomplishments of the 88th Congress, Biemiller said, are:

- College construction aid and expansion of vocational training.
- Aid to medical schools, the Mental Health Act, and major improvements in the Hill-Burton hospital construction program.
- In the conservation field, the Wilderness Act, which Biemiller commented "had been kicking around Congress ever since I can remember," and "the very important Land-Water Conservation Fund Act to establish and preserve more recreational resources."
- Fringe benefit amendments to the Davis-Bacon Act, which "have been before Congress for nine years—and are now law."
- The equal pay for women law enacted last year.
- The "very important" federal pay raise recently enacted.
- Establishment of the "landmark" Automation Commission.
- Passage of mass transit legislation, with "important worker protection" written into it.

"When you add them up," Biemiller commented, "you have quite a score."

Council Backs Foundation For Kefauver

A foundation established to carry forth the ideals to which the late Sen. Estes Kefauver devoted his life has received the endorsement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Pres. George Meany has announced.

Endorsed is the Estes Kefauver Memorial Foundation, which has among its objectives the construction of a memorial wing to the University of Tennessee Library and a program dedicated to advancement of human freedom and world peace.

Among these will be political science scholarships and awards to Americans who best exemplify the Kefauver characteristics of courage and freedom from prejudice, bigotry and extreme sectionalism.

Support for the foundation is the second labor recognition of the late Tennessee senator this year. In May, Mrs. Nancy Kefauver, his widow, was presented the 1963 Murray-Green Award and a check for $5,000 in honor of her late husband's service to the people of America.

The Philip Murray-William Green award was originated by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to honor those whose achievements in the areas of health and welfare inspired others to work for the common good.

At the time, Meany described Kefauver as "one of a rare handful of statesmen who emerge in each generation to fight for principle, regardless of political risk."

Gov. Peabody Upset In Primary Election

In one of the few upset elections of the primary season, Lieut. Gov. Francis X. Bellotti won nomination as Democratic candidate for governor in Massachusetts over incumbent Gov. Endicott Peabody. Bellotti will face Republican John A. Volpe, a one-term former governor beaten by Peabody in 1962, in the November election. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, seeking a full six-year term after serving the final two years of the unexpired Senate term of his brother, the late Pres. Kennedy, was renominated without opposition in the Sept. 10 Democratic primary.

Sen. Kennedy, who is recovering from a broken back suffered in an airplane crash last June, had endorsed Peabody for renomination. After a conference with Kennedy at New England Baptist Hospital, Bellotti said there would be "no problems" left over from the primary battle. Both Peabody and Sen. Kennedy gave him pledges of full support.

Seven Republicans running for Massachusetts statewide office were nominated without opposition, including the only GOP incumbent, Atty. Gen. Edward W. Brooke. Brooke, a Negro outranking any other member of his race in state office, supported New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton in their unsuccessful effort to liberalize the GOP platform approved by the dominant forces of Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Republican presidential nominee, at the party's San Francisco convention.

The GOP nominee for the Senate against Sen. Kennedy is Howard Whitmore, Jr., a political newcomer.

In Washington state primaries, Democrats renominated Sen. Henry (Scoop) Jackson and Gov. Albert Rosellini, each for a third term, against light opposition.

The Republican candidate against Jackson will be Lloyd A. Andrews, who four years ago lost to Rosellini by a slim 17,000 votes but may not prove so strong in the Senate race. A liberal Republican, Daniel J. Evans, for two terms GOP floor leader in the state House of Representatives, was chosen to run against Rosellini.

All incumbent members of the U.S. House, Republican and Democratic, were renominated. An acknowledged John Birch Society member, Sam Parks, admitted that his affiliation hurt his bid to oust GOP Rep. Walt Horan.

Apportionment Impasse Faces New Senate Test

ley Dirksen (Ill.) chief sponsor of the court-curbing amendment, tried to get the two-thirds vote necessary to limit debate. The vote went more than two-thirds the other way —63-30 against cloture.

- A majority of the Senate is not presently prepared to shelve all reapportionment resolutions, although that sentiment could change if other alternatives fail. A tabling motion on the Dirksen amendment, introduced by supporters of Dirksen as a tactical move, was rejected 49-38.
- The extreme House-passed bill which would permanently strip federal courts of all jurisdiction over apportionment of state legislatures has only negligible support in the Senate. Its provisions were offered as an amendment by Sen. Strom Thurmond, erstwhile Democrat from South Carolina, and rejected by a 56-21 vote.

The closeness of the vote on the sense of Congress resolution encouraged Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (D-Minn.) to a new try—on a day when absenteeism in the Senate would be less. The Democratic vice presidential candidate has played a leading role in trying to develop a solution.

Meanwhile the House Rules Committee bypassed the Judiciary Committee and cleared a proposed constitutional amendment which would allow one house of a legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population. There was no certainty, however, that the proposal would be called up for a vote.

Dirksen has said that his proposed moratorium on court reapportionment action is designed to gain time for approval of a constitutional amendment. In effect, malapportioned legislatures would then pass on the question of whether they would be allowed to avoid redistricting.

The constitutional amendment, however, requires two-thirds approval from each house of Congress.

Transit Union Backs Johnson

The executive board of the Amalgamated Transit Union, breaking the union's non-partisan tradition, has voted unanimously to endorse the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

The board's resolution urged all members and their families to register and vote and work for the Democratic slate, warning a Goldwater victory would mean policies which could bring a depression and "threaten the world with an atomic holocaust."

The statement pointed out that the Democratic platform fully recognized labor's program while the Republican platform threatens to turn back the clock, hobble unions and do nothing to create jobs and maintain world peace.

Unions, Public Urged to Back United Giving

Fort Worth, Tex.—More participation by labor and other civic groups in United Fund campaigns was urged here by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne.

Declaring that the one-campaign concept of the United Fund originated with the labor movement in Detroit, Beirne told two rallies that labor is committed to voluntary giving "because it's right" and because "the strength and health of the nation depend on the strength and health" of its communities.

The United Fund is one of the last outposts of voluntarism today, said Beirne, who is president of the Communications Workers and vice president of the United Funds & Community Councils of America. He spoke at a Tarrant County labor participation dinner and at a luncheon meeting of labor and civic leaders.

California Gets $1.30 Wage Floor

Sacramento — California has moved ahead of the federal government in minimum wage protection for women and minors, with a new $1.30-an-hour wage floor covering virtually all non-farm occupations.

The California State AFL-CIO hailed the re-establishment of a state minimum wage higher than the federal maximum for the first time since 1950.

GOP's Miller Scored On Immigration Stand

Unity House, Pa.—Republican Vice Presidential Candidate William G. Miller "is not only eager to perpetuate the insulting immigration quotas of the past but is now actively using it to stir up ethnic prejudice," Vice Pres. Luigi Antonini of the Ladies' Garment Workers charged.

Antonini expressed the "shock" of the Italian-American community in a broadcast marking the 30th anniversary of the Voice of Local 89, radio program of the ILGWU's big New York City Italian dressmakers' local. Pres. Johnson and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany joined thousands of union members in congratulating Local 89 on the anniversary of the program, which is heard on two stations in New York and one each in Philadelphia, Boston and New Haven, Conn.

"I suppose it is improper that I, an immigrant, should read a lesson in history to the vice presidential candidate of the Republican Party on the role of the immigrant in American life," said Antonini, who has been chief commentator on the Voice of Local 89 since its start.

"An immigrant named Columbus discovered this land. An immigrant named Amerigo Vespucci mapped it; another named Hudson explored it; and still others settled it, worked the land and built our great civilization. If the coming of the immigrants was the cause of unemployment, there ought to be 100 million unemployed today."

In a pre-taped address to the anniversary celebration at the ILGWU's Unity House here, Johnson took a viewpoint diametrically opposed to that of Miller.

America has been made a better and stronger land, he said, because of those who came "from many shores." What we have achieved together, he went on, "is the result of our unity" which "we are going to preserve" until the time comes when no one will ask "where did your father come from—the only question will be where are we going to go."

Meany thanked the Voice for 30 years "rich in service to truly progressive trade unionism and the advancement of Americanization in the best sense of the word" and for three decades of "call to constructive action." This "splendid program," he said, has "helped cement friendship and effective cooperation" between Americans and Italians in promoting freedom, justice and peace.

LBJ Keys Campaign To Jobs, Peace, Unity and budget programs, their inceasingly strident emphasis on the "violence in the streets" or "white backlash" issue.

His constant theme was "unity" of the people of the great tasks a unified nation must perform in strengthening the economy, building a more stable peace, harnessing the rivers, undergirding our institutions through greater opportunity and equal justice for all.

While Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, the President's running mate, toured his Midwestern and Rocky Mountain states homeland, hitting Goldwater as a "temporary" GOP leader with an itchy trigger finger, out of harmony with his own party on critical Senate issues, Johnson made his speeches nonpartisan in character.

He was met in Great Falls, Mont., by Canadian Prime Minister Lester Pearson, and the two heads of state flew in Pearson's plane to Vancouver, British Columbia, to complete the final documents in a remarkable two-nation Columbia River flood control and power project.

The President and prime minister motored for the actual signing to the peace arch on the U.S.-Canadian border at nearby Blaine, Wash., to celebrate the occasion.

Among the guests on the President's plane was Republican Sen. George D. Aiken (Vt.), a ranking spokesman on United States and Canadian affairs. Republican governors joined the Great Falls ceremonies.

The President spoke in Great Falls of the $6.5 million in federal funds allotted to Montana for relief from disastrous floods last spring, outlined the conservation and construction projects of the 88th Congress, declaring them "the achievement of farsighted men of every party and section."

'Minutes Away'

He took note of the defensive strength built in Montana's huge intercontinental missile-base complex, but warned that in Montana itself—once remote and isolated—"the people face more towering threats" than the perils the Lewis and Clark expedition faced in its wilderness 160 years ago. "You live in the midst of the power that could destroy the world . . . the missiles of our adversaries, only minutes away."

In Vancouver, British Columbia, where he and Pearson praised the joint dam-construction projects planned under the Columbia Basin Treaty, he acknowledged the common heritage of the U.S. and Canadian people in the defense of freedom. Under the treaty, it was noted, three Canadian storage dams built in British Columbia will make possible generation of 2.8 million kilowatts of power equally divided, and the Canadian province is selling its interest for 30 years to U.S. Pacific coast areas as far south as Los Angeles and Phoenix, Ariz.

The President in many references in his three-day journey proclaimed his support of programs that have been voted against or brought under attack during the campaign by Goldwater and Miller, the GOP candidates, but the references were urbane and expository.

"I believe, and I know that you believe, in the nuclear test ban treaty"—against which Goldwater voted—Johnson said in his speech earlier to the Machinists convention in Miami Beach. (See story, Page 4.)

Social Security Stressed

"I believe, and I know that you believe, in a social security strengthened and not weakened," he said. Goldwater has spoken variously of making the system "voluntary" or whittling it down otherwise.

At the great Cape Kennedy missile test range, which the President toured after his Machinists convention speech, he pledged that as long as he was President "the U.S. will never be second in space."

The President was clearly conscious of the political importance of the areas he traveled—the 14 electoral college votes of Florida, Montana's four, Oregon's six, the nine from Washington state, California's huge bloc of 40.

But his themes were peace, prosperity and unity—unity to build on what he sees as the foundation of the last four years and to do more toward building the better life.

Goldwater, Miller Concentrate Attack on Johnson, High Court

Sen. Barry Goldwater, Republican presidential nominee, and Rep. William E. Miller, his running-mate, turned the GOP campaign into an almost incessant drumbeat of charges about "crime on the streets," a widening assault on the U.S. Supreme Court, and a personal attack on Pres. Johnson's integrity and techniques as they moved into the third week of their White House drive.

The 25 percent five-year tax reduction program proposed by Goldwater on Labor Day in Los Angeles was dropped by the candidate at least for the next 10 days. Miller, after a single-shot attack on a pending immigration bill and an appeal for high protective tariffs that Democrats said misrepresented the facts, abandoned the issues.

Meanwhile Sen. Strom Thurmond, in a statewide television broadcast in South Carolina, announced he is quitting the Democratic Party to become a Goldwater Republican because, he said, the party "has abandoned the people" and is leading the nation to "socialistic dictatorship."

Goldwater welcomed Thurmond, who in 1948 ran for President on the Dixiecrat States Rights ticket, as "one of the great Americans" who had decided he has had "enough."

Goldwater moved into the South, supposedly his bastion of strength among former Democrats, flailing at "the failure of public officials to keep streets safe from bullies and marauders."

There is something wrong, a "moral decay, [that] seeps down from the highest offices," he said in St. Petersburg, Fla., as he opened a four day tour.

Crime is rising, the Arizona senator said, and "there is no place for the dealership of a clever compromiser, a scheming wire-puller."

In the West, Goldwater had attacked the Supreme Court as the most flagrant of all federal agencies in what he portrayed as a reach for power. He assailed the court in the South for its decisions upholding the right of suspected criminals to have legal counsel before the police obtain confessions. To cheering crowds in Winston-Salem, N. C., he said, "I believe in states' rights. I want to return power to the states."

In the West he had charged that the Civil Rights Act had fomented race riots, an echo of his allegation in the Senate that a "police state" would be required to enforce the law.

"I'm glad to be back where you can hear a real southern accent," he told an Atlanta Airport audience, and he praised both Georgia's Democratic Sen. Richard B. Russell—who is strongly supporting Johnson—and former Rep. James C. Davis, a Democratic segregationist beaten in the primary in 1962 by a moderate.

Miller went to Texas to assail the President's integrity on the civil rights issue, producing papers, which, he said, proved that Johnson in 1945 had attached anti-Negro racial covenants to the deed in a property sale.

He attributed the late Pres. Kennedy's confrontation with Soviet Premier Khrushchev over Cuban missile bases as "timed" for exploitation just before the 1962 congressional elections.

"Why doesn't the Administration tell the people what's going on in Vietnam?" Goldwater asked repeatedly. He said he suspected a "crisis" might be manufactured for political purposes before the election.

Interpreting what seemed an increasing stridency in the Goldwater-Miller assault, observers felt that the continuing Administration strength shown by public opinion polls left the GOP seeking some new opening for maneuver.

Goldwater himself has dropped apparent strength from already-losing ratios disclosed immediately after the GOP National Convention that nominated him last July.

The extraordinary gap shown in most polls—about two-thirds of the people saying they intend to vote for Johnson, only about one-quarter willing to state they prefer Goldwater—is unprecedented at this stage of a presidential campaign. Experienced political leaders nevertheless viewed the polls with some skepticism, suggesting that many pro-Goldwater voters prefer to keep their own counsel—as, in fact, many did during the period preceding the California Republican primary in which the senator beat New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller for the states' delegates.

President Takes Firm Stand on Nuclear Control

Seattle, Wash. — The direction and control of U.S. nuclear weapons must remain "solely" the responsibility of the nation's chief executive, "the highest and most responsible elected officer of government," Pres. Johnson said here.

Atomic weapons are "not simply bigger and more destructive" than conventional weapons, he warned, but a potential "terror and tragedy," which if unleashed will produce "unimaginable" conflict in which "unborn generations would be forever lamed."

Speaking at a dinner meeting sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce and the state and King County labor councils and three Seattle universities, the President said that a "single nuclear weapon" can kill more Americans than had died in all the wars the nation has fought.

A "full-scale nuclear exchange between the East and the West," he said, would kill "almost 300 million," and weapon after weapon would engulf a portion of mankind" and a cloud of "deadly radiation would drift and destroy."

Every U.S. chief executive for 19 years has held that control of our atomic weapons must be "centralized" in the President, Johnson said, and "this will continue to be the case as long as I am President."

The President's words, in his pause here during a trans-continental journey, were clearly aimed at Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Republican presidential nominee, who in various statements has demanded "victory" in world trouble spots and advocated "a little more leeway" for high-level military commanders to initiate nuclear decision.

Without naming the Arizona senator, the President said, "I say we must learn to live with each other or we will destroy each other."

The great powers themselves "can never again delude themselves into thinking that war will be painless or victory easy . . . and a change must come in the life of nations," he said.

The President used the occasion to spell out in detail, for the first time at the level of the White House, precautions used to prevent nuclear war at the same time we remain fully prepared to use all necessary weapons to defend ourselves.

Under his three predecessors—Presidents Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy—he pointed out, "we have never rattled our rockets to the edge of war. . . . I will never let slip the engines of destruction because of a reckless or rash miscalculation about our adversaries."

He listed steps we have taken:

- We have worked to avoid accident in our own strategic forces, through elaborate interlocks, two-men checks and counter-checks, ensuring that "neither a madman nor a malfunction could trigger nuclear war." We are protecting our nuclear weapons in underground or undersea sites to "give ourselves more time to confirm" reports of an attack by others.

"I do not want us to fight a war that no one meant to begin." the President said.

- "We have worked to limit the spread of nuclear weapons," recognizing that our allies have rights, that the "secrets of the atom are known to many," and that effective armaments control is necessary to forestall the day "when fearful weapons are in the hands of many . . . whose concern and capacity for control may be more limited than our own."
- We are now ready, by an increase in our conventional and tactical military strength, "to meet force with appropriate force," and "do not let our might make us muscle bound."
- "We have worked to damp down disputes and contain conflicts" when they flare, giving responses that are firm and measured in the light of our knowledge that "in an atomic world, any spark might ignite the bonfire."
- "We have worked toward arms control." Including the treaty banning "poisonous" nuclear air explosions and establishment of a "hot line for instant communication" in the event of a Soviet-U.S. "crisis."

We have submitted "major new proposals" to the Geneva disarmament conference, the President said, and he pointed out that he had ordered a cutback in production of "unnecessary" nuclear material.

A world at peace, with freedom secure, "must be the untiring pursuit of every man entrusted with the leadership of America," the President said.

Johnson, Meany Spell Out Labor's Stake in Campaign

Rails, Crafts Near Pact In Job Fight

Six railroad shopcraft unions, poised for a walkout Sept. 22, postponed the strike call and returned to the bargaining table when managements of 147 U.S. railroads agreed to tentative settlement of a two-year-long dispute over job "slaughter."

Agreement was reached in principle on four of the five issues in dispute, and settlement of the fifth issue seemed near as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Key to the end of the stalemate was the roads' change of heart on proposals by a presidential emergency board to provide more job security for shopworkers who had suffered a 60 percent drop in employment between 1945 and 1962.

Final task for the negotiators was to agree on language for four points at issue and to reach agreement on the fifth issue—an emergency board recommendation that shopmen who lose their jobs because of operational changes be guaranteed 60 per cent of pay for a five-year period.

Workers Notified

Notices of the strike postponement were sent to 150,000 shopcraft workers by Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes Dept., who said the tentative agreement indicates that "collective bargaining has been re-established" in the railroad industry.

The agreement was announced by Fox, chief management negotiator J. E. Wolfe, and Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board, who brought the parties back to the bargaining table after talks had broken down.

O'Neill said the issues on which tentative agreement was reached were the contracting-out of work normally done in the shop; assignment of supervisors

Meany Radio Talk Set for Oct. 12

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will broadcast a special message addressed to union members over the ABC radio network on Monday, Oct. 12.

The program will deal with election issues of key importance to workers. It will be broadcast at 7:15 p.m. eastern time and will follow the Edward P. Morgan newscast on ABC stations across the country.

LABOR HAS the membership and the COPE machinery to help elect its candidates but "having the votes doesn't mean anything unless you get them into the ballot box," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells delegates to 11th IUE convention in Washington, D. C.

Compromise Approved:

Redistricting Curbs Shelved by Senate

By David L. Perlman

The Senate shelved a labor-opposed attempt to block court-ordered reapportionment of state legislatures on a one man, one vote basis. It substituted a non-binding "sense of Congress" resolution asking the courts to give legislatures a final chance to reapportion before stepping in to do the job themselves.

The compromise was acceptable to Senate liberals who had waged a six-week filibuster against any legislative interference with federal court jurisdiction.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) sponsored the substitute resolution after withdrawing his support from the controversial court-curbing proposal initiated by Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.).

Time to Adjourn

Mansfield told the Senate that the time had come to end the stalemate and "bring down the curtain on the 88th Congress."

The compromise resolution—a substitute for Dirksen's proposed "rider" to the pending foreign aid bill—passed by a 44-38 vote. It was supported by 37 Democrats and 7 Republicans; opposed by 23 Republicans and 15 Democrats.

Its key provisions are a request that federal courts:

- Allow one session of a legislature plus 30 days—but not to exceed six months in all—to pass before courts take over the reapportionment of a legislature.
- Permit the next election of state legislators to be held in ac-

President Stresses 'Choice'

"The heart of our American way of life . . . is under attack—and those who love it must go forth now to save it," Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson told a group of union conventions by personal appearances and closed-circuit television.

"Americans are faced with a concerted bid for power by factions which oppose all that both parties have supported," the President said in what were rated as two of the strongest speeches of the election campaign.

"It is a choice between the center and the fringe—between the responsible mainstream of American experience and the reckless and rejected extremes."

Speaking before the Steelworkers' convention in Atlantic City, Johnson said "we stand firm to protect and preserve the principles of freedom for which our forefathers died.

"We can enter a new era of American greatness," he said to the USWA delegates, "because you are strong men of vision instead of frightened cry-babies; because you know it takes a man who loves his country to build a house instead of a raving, ranting demagogue who wants to tear down one."

"Americans are not presented with a choice of parties . . . a choice of liberalism and conservatism," he warned the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in a speech live-televised to five other union conventions meeting simultaneously.

Never mentioning the name of the Republican presidential nominee, Sen. Barry Goldwater, Johnson said bluntly:

'We Have A Job . . . a Crusade'

"All of labor's hopes, all of the things we have achieved, all of the progress we have made is laid on the line" in the race between Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Barry Goldwater, and "the trade union movement must shape up to its responsibilities."

This was the message of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as he traveled to conventions of the Steelworkers, the United Textile Workers and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers with the blunt warning that the Republican Party has been "captured by a lunatic fringe" of "right-wing extremists."

"We have got a job to do, a job for ourselves and for the American people . . . a crusade to make democracy stronger, a crusade to bring us a government that will allow us to move forward," he declared.

"On one side we have a man who knows government, who comes from the South if you please, but who over the years has become a national statesman without any regional affiliations of any kind," Meany said to the IUE convention in Washington.

Record Hailed

"The record that has been made by Lyndon Johnson in the 10 months since he assumed the presidency is as good a record as we have for labor since the days of Franklin Delano Roosevelt," the federation president declared.

On the other side, he said to the USWA in Atlantic City, "one of our major political parties has been captured lock, stock and barrel by

AFL-CIO Hits Use of Anti-Trust Law To Challenge Union's Pay Scales

The AFL-CIO has asked the Supreme Court to rule that federal anti-trust laws cannot be used to prevent a union from seeking to bring about uniform wages and working conditions in an industry.

Before the court for review is a jury verdict levying triple damages against the Mine Workers on the basis of a claim by a small coal company that the UMW's national contract with the Bituminous Coal Operators was designed to force small and less efficient firms out of business by requiring them to match the wages paid by larger companies.

Although the UMW is not an AFL-CIO affiliate, the federation filed a supporting brief arguing that the anti-trust verdict based on a wage equalization program "strikes at the very existence of a meaningful labor movement."

The contract with the operators' association included a provision prohibiting operators of a union mine from purchasing coal from mines which paid less than union rates or leasing coal property to operators paying substandard wages.

Under no conditions, the AFL-CIO asserted, can a union's efforts to secure uniform wages and working conditions and prevent competition based on wage-cutting be construed as unlawful restraint of trade.

The brief took sharp issue with the trial judge's charge that the jury should decide the "purpose" of the UMW—whether it was to get better contract protection for its members or to drive small companies out of business. In effect, the AFL-CIO declared, this invited the jury to sit in judgment on the union's bargaining policies and the propriety of the wage scale in the coal industry.

"The devastating practical implications of subjecting the institution of collective bargaining to the whims and speculations of local juries are alone enough to condemn it," the AFL-CIO said.

Of "paramount" importance in INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS representatives of AFL-CIO unions heard evaluations of latest developments in world affairs at a "working conference" held at the federation's headquarters. AFL-CIO Intl. Affairs Dir. Jay Lovestone is shown addressing the group. The program also included a report on the Chilean election by Andrew C. McLellan, AFL-CIO Inter-American representative, and an analysis of the Vietnam situation by Irving Brown, United Nations representative from the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

British Unions Urge Legislation To Strengthen Bargaining Rights

Blackpool, England—Amendments to British law which would restore organized labor's confidence in collective bargaining were demanded by the 96th annual conference here of the British Trades Union Congress.

Worried about the effect of recent court decisions which throw doubt on the trade unions' complete freedom to strike, the Congress asked for, and received, assurances of immediate legislation from the Labor Party leader, Harold Wilson, if he wins the British election.

The present Conservative government has refused to make the changes demanded by the TUC before holding an inquiry into the legal position of trade unions. The TUC general council's rejection of this inquiry was strongly supported by the Congress.

Woodcock Explains

But George Woodcock, TUC general secretary, did state that he would "in general" favor an inquiry into the position of unions in British society if the law was changed first.

Wilson, who opened the last round of his anti-Conservative campaign with a speech to the Congress, asked in return that the TUC support a Labor government's income policy if he wins the Oct. 15 election.

This policy is regarded as an essential part of Labor's economic planning, which has the enthusiastic support of the Congress. The Party's leader promised that any wage restraint by the unions in a Labor incomes policy would:

- Result in increased production and wages.
- Be applied with equity and social justice.
- Apply equally to profits, dividends, and rents.

Last year the Congress was split on the issue, and finally rejected wage restraint by a small majority. This year it decided to "wait and see" what Wilson has to offer when he takes office.

But it did unanimously call for the progressive reduction of the working week to 35 hours, and for the immediate introduction of three weeks annual holiday. (Most British workers still have a working week of more than 40 hours, and get two weeks annual holiday.)

Gen. Sec. Frank Cousins of the Transport & General Workers, largest union in Britain with 1.4 million of the TUC's 8.3 million members, asked the government to combat the effects of automation by improving standards of industrial training.

If this is done, there will be no need to fear automation, Cousins said. Drawing on American experience, he pointed out that if training is not improved, the semi-skilled or specialist worker will suffer from automation.

Progress Debated

Woodcock was able to report little progress in the TUC's efforts to reorganize the movement into fewer, larger unions, and to spell out the goals of the TUC.

On this, the only issue to disturb the unity of Congress this year, the Clerical Workers Union forced a debate on its motion criticizing the "self centered attitudes" of large unions, and the failure of the general council—the TUC executive body—to bring forward definite proposals for reform.

The Congress, however, rejected the motion by an overwhelming majority and left the job to the general council for another year.

International issues played only a small part in Congress business. And the motion demanding the removal of American Polaris bases from Britain, which has been passed by the Congress each year since the American Navy came to Scotland's Holy Loch, was quietly dropped by its proposer. Observers saw this as another move to avoid embarrassing the Labor Party.

Woodcock, who has previously tried to keep the TUC out of active party politics, said:

"I hope there will be a Labor government because I think if the present government were returned this time they would be insufferable."

Operating Engineers Hike Death Benefits

The executive board of the Operating Engineers has voted to increase death benefits for members of the union. The schedule is topped by increases from $400 to $500 for those with membership of 15 to 20 years, and from $500 to $750 for those who have been members 20 years or more.

'Mailmen's March' to Aid Eleanor Roosevelt Fund

America's postmen will ring twice in a nationwide tribute to Eleanor Roosevelt's 80th birthday on Oct. 11 and in support of the causes to which she devoted her life.

A "mailmen's march" of 175,000 letter carriers on Oct. 9 and 10 will deliver to 25 million American homes an appeal in behalf of the foundation bearing her name. Participating will be the AFL-CIO Letter Carriers, who helped formulate the special project.

Announcement of the unique commemoration was made by Adlai Stevenson, U. S. ambassador to the United Nations and chairman of the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation.

Letter Carriers Pres. Jerome Keating stated that the "march" was a voluntary tribute to Mrs. Roosevelt by the nation's postmen, made in a resolution passed unanimously at the union's convention in August.

The resolution pledged "all possible support to this one-time campaign" and called upon union members to give their assistance to the objectives of Mrs. Roosevelt, "a great humanitarian and a gallant lady."

The postmen will deliver envelopes inscribed "Your mailman rings in memory of Eleanor Roosevelt," and containing an appeal for support of the foundation's program of cancer research, world peace, human rights and underprivileged children.

Further tribute will be paid to the former first lady in dinners to be held throughout the nation during the week of her birthday.

In Washington, D. C., the commemorative dinner will also serve to honor, among others, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, both resident trustees of the foundation.

Arbitrators Unveil Portrait:

AAA Honors Meany At Room Dedication

New York—"Constant communication" between labor and management during the life of a collective bargaining agreement is the way to prevent industrial disputes, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said at special ceremonies at the American Arbitration Association, which formally dedicated a hearing room in his honor.

A portrait of the AFL-CIO president was unveiled before an audience of New York labor, industrial and public representatives, including Mayor Robert F. Wagner. It will hang in what will now be known as the George Meany room.

"Next to settling labor-management disputes," said Meany, "is their prevention. And the way to prevent them is constant communication at all times between both sides, not just at the time when the contract is going to expire. There must be communication between both parties at all times."

Lauds President's Committee

He described his two-and-a-half years of membership on the President's Committee on Labor-Management Policy as a demonstration of progress in the field of industrial relations. The committee consists of industry, labor and public members which meets to discuss labor-management problems.

"I am convinced," Meany said, "that labor and management have a tremendous area in which to work together not only for the people they represent but for all the people and the country as a whole. For I am convinced that no segment of American society can make progress at the expense of any other segment. Our economy couldn't function if one segment dominated all other segments of society."

He congratulated the AAA for helping to develop a body of arbitrators whose skill and integrity inspire the confidence of both unions and employers.

Meany endorsed the idea of the association's Labor - Management Institute, which is intended to develop guidelines for unions and employers who want to eliminate the crisis atmosphere in last-minute negotiations. Similar approval of the institute was bestowed by Wagner who said that the problems presented by automation and the technological revolution were creating new concepts of collective bargaining in which arbitration would play an increasing role.

Others participating in the dedication ceremonies were Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes, Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City AFL-CIO, and AAA Pres. Donald B. Straus.

Drivers Pick Transit Union At 2 Airports

Bus, limousine and cab drivers serving Washington National and Dulles airports chose the AFL-CIO's Transit Union over the unaffiliated Teamsters in a National Labor Relations Board election, 204-103.

After the election the employes of Airport Transport, Inc., were chartered as ATU Div. 1528, and negotiations on a new contract began as proposals were drafted. All but 12 of 405 eligible employes have been received into membership, the union said.

The move to the Transit Union started when transport employes heard that officers of their unaffiliated union were seeking to switch to the Teamsters and had received an IBT charter, an ATU spokesman said.

They notified ATU Pres. John Elliott and Vice Pres. Walter Bierwagen, who launched an organizing campaign. In spite of a few "roadblocks" at the airports, the AFL-CIO men distributed leaflets and won enough card-signers to petition for an election.

The winning union said leading roles in the whirlwind campaign were played by Sec.-Treas. Raymond C. Wallace of ATU Div. 13, Memphis, Tenn.; and Exec. Vice Pres. Henry B. Mann, who expressed thanks for the aid of AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization John Livingston, the Washington, D. C., District Council of the Laborers, and others who helped.

Typographical Union Subject to Sanctions

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has notified the federation's affiliates that the Intl. Typographical Union has been found to be in non-compliance with the decisions of the impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures. Sanctions have been imposed in accordance with the federation's constitution.

The finding of non-compliance was made by a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council consisting of Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne and James A. Suffridge. Meany said it followed the ITU's refusal "to withdraw from its efforts to supplant the American Newspaper Guild as the collective bargaining representative of the Elizabeth Daily Journal, Elizabeth, N. J." This was held to be a violation of Art. XXI of the AFL-CIO Constitution.

In his notice to affiliates, Meany said the ITU is now subject to the following provisions of Sec. 15 of Art. XXI:

"1—The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Section 16.

"2—The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article.

"3—The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution.

"4—No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

In addition to the ITU the following unions are currently in non-compliance with an impartial umpire's decision: the Switchmen's Union of North America, the National Maritime Union, the Journeymen Stonecutters Association and the Air Line Pilots Association.

Contract Cancelled:

Auto Negotiations Near GM Deadline

Detroit—The Auto Workers served a contract cancellation notice on General Motors, world's largest auto firm, to set the stage for a new agreement or a strike by 345,000 production, clerical and maintenance workers.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, negotiations were in a round-the-clock stage and UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther warned the largest of the auto industry's Big 3 that a strike was inevitable unless GM made more "meaningful progress" in non-economic contract areas such as relief time and production standards.

A strike at GM, Reuther told members of the union's Chrysler Council, could shut down some Chrysler and Ford plants because many General Motors divisions make key parts for the other two firms.

Council delegates overwhelmingly recommended ratification by local unions of the 54-cent three-year contract settlement reached with Chrysler early this month to set the pattern achieved Sept. 18 at Ford Motor. All local negotiations with Chrysler managements also have been "satisfactorily settled," the council reported.

At GM, Reuther and UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock notified local unions that a Sept. 25 deadline would be set for contract expiration and urged them not to strike unless a national walkout or strikes over local issues have been sanctioned as justifiable.

Local Deadline Set

The union also notified GM and UAW local officers that a local union strike deadline has been set for Oct. 2 at 10 a.m., EST, in the event there is no national GM strike.

GM on Sept. 21 submitted a new economic proposal to UAW negotiators with benefits "substantially similar" to those won at Ford and Chrysler.

The Ford settlement, reached Sept. 18, will give 125,000 workers benefits such as these:

- An improvement factor wage increase at 2.5 percent of a worker's base hourly rate, or at least 6 cents an hour, in September 1965 and another increase of 2.8 percent, or at least 7 cents an hour, a year later.
- An additional 2 cents an hour added to base hourly rates on Sept. 5, 1966.
- The equivalent of a 1 percent increase when the company begins paying full life and disability insurance premiums in October.
- Increased pension benefits for present and future retirees, plus paid insurance and more uniform coverage.
- Another week of paid vacation and two more paid holidays—Good Friday and half-days on Dec. 24 and Dec. 31.
- More relief time to a total of 36 minutes per day; a Christmas bonus fund; more supplemental jobless benefits, and a new educational program providing tuition refunds up to $250 a calendar year.

SHOP STEWARDS and union officers at the Navy's Hunter's Point shipyard in San Francisco took part in a three-day training institute sponsored by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. in cooperation with the federation's Dept. of Education. Here, Pres. B. A. Gritta of the Metal Trades Dept. and Capt. John W. Dolan, Jr., shipyard commander, welcome the group. The institute is the sixth in a series being held at major shipyards organized by metal trades councils.

N.Y. Orders Rails to Obey Full Crew Act

Albany, N. Y. — Railroads operating in New York State have been ordered to comply with a "full crew" law, which requires a five-man crew, including a locomotive-helper.

The ruling was issued by New York's Public Service Commission, which upheld a complaint by the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen that the New York Central Railroad illegally dropped a fireman from the run between the Niagara Falls freight yards and the Canadian border.

The test case centered on the railroad's contention that the 51-year-old full crew law was unconstitutional.

Holding that the state law must be deemed valid in the absence of court decisions to the contrary, the Public Service Commission said the evidence is clear that the law has been violated and ordered the railroad to resume using a five-man crew.

Montana Labor Seeks FCC Action On Right-Wing Broadcast Saturation

Helena, Mont.—A fruitless appeal to Montana radio and television stations to provide their audiences with alternatives to a mass of radical right programs has led the Montana State AFL-CIO to ask the Federal Communications Commission for assistance.

James S. Umber, executive secretary of the state federation, has asked the FCC to help obtain a balance to rightwing radio and television programs now carried throughout the state with "practically no opposing viewpoint presented."

Umber said his request was being made under the provisions of the FCC's "fairness doctrine," which requires broadcasters to maintain fairness and balance in their programming.

For nearly six months, Umber stated, attempts were made to discuss with radio and television stations the highly controversial views broadcast by right-wing extremists. The Montana State AFL-CIO received only "stalling and delaying" replies, he said.

"Stations which carry these programs without any programs presenting an opposing view do not provide a balanced viewpoint to their listeners," he stated.

5 Programs Cited

Umber said that in addition to unsuccessful correspondence and visits, some station managers even refused to disclose whether they carried radical right programs.

The appeal to the FCC included the names of five nationally-broadcast radical right programs which account for nearly 100 quarter hours each week over 18 of the state's 36 radio stations. These 18 stations are within the listening area of virtually the state's entire 700,000 population.

The radical right broadcasters cited were: 20th Century Reformation Hour with Carl McIntyre, Christian Crusade with Billy James Hargis; Lifelines; Manion Forum and America's Future with R. K. Scott.

Nationally, these programs account for much of the 6,000 radical right broadcasts made each week.

Umber told the FCC that the Montana AFL-CIO had unsuccessfully offered to stations "Montana Looks to the Future," a once-a-week, 15-minute public service program, produced in Missoula and featuring experts on such issues as the educational needs of the state, Indian affairs and government-participating health care programs.

Pointing out that the labor-offered programs would provide far fewer than the present outpourings of the radical right, Umber asked the FCC to help achieve "at least some dilution of these straight opinion programs."

At issue is not a particular attack on organized labor, though there are many, Umber told the FCC, but rather the extremely reactionary viewpoint on a broad range of issues regularly presented with no similar programming of a liberal viewpoint.

The FCC appeal by the State AFL-CIO has received the unanimous support of all local central bodies and was undertaken following a special meeting of all state labor affiliates during the state convention in August.

Rail Shopmen Reach Tentative Settlement

to do the work of journeymen; employment at outlying points not requiring a full-time force; and the right of carmen to couple and uncouple air and steam hoses.

The unions involved were the Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Railway Carmen and Firemen & Oilers. They had set a strike deadline and prepared for a walkout after two years of effort to win protection for members against job reductions which threatened their employment.

The unions announced Sept. 18 that they had "no other choice" but to prepare for a strike because managements had refused to comply in good faith with the recommendations of an emergency board headed by Arbiter Saul Wallen. Shortly afterwards, management negotiators returned to the bargaining table for a 36-hour bargaining stretch which brought the apparent settlement.

Recommendations Spelled Out

The emergency board had made these recommendations:

- On subcontracting, that the railroads do repair and maintenance work in their own shops to conserve employment.
- On supervisors, that the railroads should prohibit foremen from performing work normally assigned to shop crafts except at locations where no full-time men are available.
- Coupling—that Railway Carmen perform most of the work involved in coupling hoses when trains are made up in rail yards.
- Outlying points—the board proposed arbitration when agreement cannot be reached on the assignment of shopcrafts to small outlying points.

CREDIT UNION AUDIT

A complete verification of accounts of all members of the AFL-CIO Employes Federal Credit Union will be made as of the close of business Sept. 30. Members who do not receive statements by Oct. 31 are asked to notify the Chairman, Supervisory Committee, Room 711, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C.

Convention Pickets In Judy Bond Fight

Bridgeport, Conn. — Delegates to the Connecticut State AFL-CIO convention here passed a resolution supporting the Ladies' Garment Workers "don't buy" campaign against Judy Bond brand blouses. But they also did something more:

The following day, as the session ended, the convention moved as a body to a nearby department store where delegates took up picket signs, distributed shopping bags and leaflets and helped local ILGWU members bring their message to the city's shoppers.

Anti-Trust Verdict Held Threat to Bargaining

the case, the AFL-CIO said, is whether the Sherman Anti-Trust Act can be used to prevent the negotiation of uniform labor standards in an industry.

Not only has a union a "right" to do so, the federation said, but in many cases "the right is also a necessity. . . . A union cannot maintain labor standards in organized firms if those firms are constantly outbid by unorganized firms operating with cheap, non-union labor. If the union cannot equalize wages, its own employers may be forced out of business."

The AFL-CIO urged the Supreme Court to affirm the "controlling" principle that "agreements and demands for agreements on wages, hours, and working conditions fall totally outside the anti-trust laws, whatever may be their purpose."

NLRB Jurisdiction

The brief also argued that the National Labor Relations Board should have "exclusive primary jurisdiction" over union conduct covered by the National Labor Relations Act, even though an anti-trust violation is alleged.

It asked the Supreme Court also "to reexamine the continued appropriateness of any anti-trust regulation of union conduct," noting that both the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts "cover many types of union activity once controlled through the anti-trust laws."

The case before the Supreme Court involves a trial court judgment for $325,000 against the Mine Workers—triple damages plus attorney fees. In the same case, however, the company was ordered to pay $43,000 in royalties owed to the Mine Workers Welfare & Retirement Fund on coal mined from 1955 through 1958.

The UMW had sued the company for non-payment of royalties required by the union contract and the company responded with a counter-claim for anti-trust damages. The lower court action was subsequently upheld by the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals.

20-Cent Package Settles Zinc Strike

Jefferson City, Tenn.—Steelworkers at the zinc mine works of the U.S. Steel Corp. here have voted to end a strike of nearly two months' duration and to accept a new contract package valued by the union at 20 cents an hour.

The new pact provides that management shall pay the entire cost of an insurance program for all employes and their dependents. This is the first such provision won by a union in Tennessee, according to USWA Dist. Dir. Lorne Nelles.

The union also won a fourth week of vacation after 25 years of service; wage increases of 5 cents an hour in 1965 and again in 1966.

TEENAGE UNEMPLOYMENT REMAINS HIGH, but Negro youth have been especially hard hit, as this U.S. Labor Dept. chart shows. Worsening situation in past seven years is attributed to the entrance of 1.2 million teenagers into the labor force and a relative decline in unskilled and semi-skilled jobs, the kind they used to find first. Discrimination, less education and inferior education put an extra burden on Negro youth, pushing the jobless rate for boys to 24.4 percent and for girls to 33.6 percent.

Surge in Economy Fails to Dent Problem of High Unemployment

By Robert B. Cooney

The economy showed continued strength in August, the Labor Dept. has reported, even though the increase in non-farm jobs fell short and failed to dent the unemployment problem.

The paradox persisted of the factory workweek running at very high levels and overtime setting a record high even as 3.7 million unemployed sought work and could not find it.

This picture is causing the Labor Dept. to undertake a trial survey "to see if shortages exist in certain occupations," according to Harold Goldstein, the department's manpower expert.

In a separate report, the Labor Dept. said three major areas—Pittsburgh, Pa., San Juan, P.R., and Chattanooga, Tenn.—were removed from the list of major job centers with 6 percent or more jobless in August.

This drops the total areas with "substantial unemployment" to 32 out of 150 areas surveyed monthly, the lowest total since early 1960. It was the first time Pittsburgh has fallen below 6 percent jobless in nearly 7 years.

Non-Farm Jobs Set High

The detailed job report for August showed a rise of 240,000 non-farm jobs to a record high of 59.2 million. This total is 1.6 million higher than August 1963, with two-thirds of the expansion occurring in trade, services and state and local government.

The Labor Dept. described the July-to-August job increase as "close to seasonal expectations."

The biggest job increase over-the-month took place in manufacturing. This sector showed a rise of 174,000 to a total of 17.5 million.

The increase in manufacturing was held down by auto model changeover layoffs totaling 110,000. These have grown in recent years along with total auto industry employment, explained the Labor Dept. spokesman.

Other industry areas showed seasonal changes and better-than-seasonal advances.

"Continued strength in the economy," said the report, "was evident in the factory workweek, which rose 0.3 hour to 40.9 hours."

This rise of 18 minutes when a rise of only 6 minutes had been expected lifted the workweek off a months-long plateau ranging from 40.5 to 40.7 hours, the Labor Dept. said, and "reflects pressure on employers."

"Overtime hours also rose 0.3 hour (18 minutes) over the month," the report added. "At an August average of 3.3 hours, factory overtime was at the highest level recorded since the overtime series began in 1956."

Hourly Earnings Dip 1 Cent

The average hourly earnings of factory production workers fell by a penny to $2.52 in August. This drop was traced mainly to a shift in the job picture as more than 100,000 high-wage auto workers were temporarily laid off while lower-wage soft goods industries added 200,000 workers to their payrolls.

The longer workweek, however, pushed average weekly earnings back up to $103, the report noted.

Earlier, the Labor Dept.'s summary report had found that the seasonally-adjusted jobless rate moved up to 5.1 percent in August from the four and one-half year low of 4.9 percent in July.

The overall unemployment rate rose as teenagers failed to find work, with the teenage jobless rate rising to 15 percent from July's 13 percent. The adult jobless rates reflected job strength for them. Adult men had a rate of 3.7 percent and married men a rate of 2.6 percent.

The Labor Dept. report also focused attention on two "persistent unemployment problems" — the teenage rate and the stubborn long-term jobless total of nearly 1 million.

On teenagers, the report pointed out that the jobless rate of non-white teenagers is about double the white rate, "but the situation is especially serious among non-white girls."

In 1964, 1 of every 3 non-white girls age 14-19 in the labor force was jobless, two and a half times the rate for white girls. Among teenage boys, the non-white rate is 1 of 4 compared to 1 of 7 for white teenagers.

Non-White Teenagers Hurt

The jobless rates of non-white teenagers have "shot up" in the past decade, the report said.

The primary reasons, the report said, are the sizeable increase in teenagers entering the labor force and the relative decline in jobs available to them. In the past 7 years, there has been a decrease in unskilled jobs—the type through which many young people enter the labor force. Non-white teenagers in addition are handicapped by discrimination, less schooling and inferior schooling.

On the longterm unemployed, the report noted this group experienced an even worse fate than the total group of unemployed: a higher level after each recession.

In the 1957-63 period, the report noted, total unemployment rose by 50 percent. At the same time, the longterm jobless—those out of work 15 weeks or more—rose by 100 percent. The ranks of the very longterm jobless—those unemployed 27 weeks or more—swelled by 145 percent.

The longterm jobless now total nearly 1 million, about half of them in the very longterm jobless category.

NLRB Order Hits Teamster Official

A business agent of the expelled Teamsters has been ordered by the National Labor Relations Board personally to pay wages lost over a 13-month period by Calvin C. Clary of Teamster Local 5, Baton Rouge, La.

Clary charged Edward G. Partin, the business agent, refused to accept dues payments, refused to put his name on a dues deduction list at a truckline Clary worked for, and had the employer fire him for non-payment of dues. The real reason for Partin's conduct, the board ruled, was that Clary signed a petition calling for an investigation into Partin's handling of union funds and the way he treated members.

The Teamsters were expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt leadership.

Perlis Interviewed:

Easing Social Fears Seen Task of CSA

AFL-CIO Community Services Activities seek to ease the "four major fears" that afflict people around the country, CSA Dir. Leo Perlis declared in a nationwide broadcast.

"The first major fear is fear of loss of job," he explained. "The second, fear of loss of health. The third fear is fear of loss of youth and all that that entails. And the fourth is fear of loss of purpose in life."

Perlis was interviewed on "As We See It," AFL-CIO public service program heard over the American Broadcasting Co. radio network.

What AFL-CIO Community Services is trying to do, he said, "is to make our community more responsive to the people's needs." He pointed out that a trade union is a community organization as well as a union and that a union member is also a citizen. Community service, he added, "means serving people . . . not only trade union people and not only people of the AFL-CIO, but citizens generally."

"The community services program is designed to meet the needs of our people in the areas of health, welfare, recreation, etc.," Perlis said.

Quick Action Provided

"We feel it isn't enough to say to a person who needs housing today that tomorrow we are going to enact legislation for public housing; he needs housing today. It isn't enough for us to say to a person who is in need of food that tomorrow we are going to enact an anti-poverty program; he needs food right now. . . .

"So while we do the job in Congress and while we do the job at the ballot box and while we do the job in union organization and around the collective bargaining table, we also do the job on the social welfare front, helping to meet the immediate needs of our people.

"AFL-CIO Community Services has been devoting itself to serving the total community—largely, of course, our own members because this is our first responsibility. But through community service programs and through our relationship with various community agencies, we have helped to serve the health and welfare needs of every citizen in need."

Assistance for All

He briefly outlined AFL-CIO CSA assistance in disasters, such as the recent Nebraska floods and the Alaskan earthquake, which included direct services of union members to the victims as well as cash donations regardless of whether or not those aided were union members.

He recalled that the AFL-CIO had given four mobile units to the American Red Cross for use in disasters and two such units to the Travelers Aid Association so its representatives can travel the highways seeking out migrant workers and others who may need assistance.

Perlis also pointed out that 20 percent of all Boy Scout leaders are union members and that local unions have sponsored nearly 500 BSA troops. In addition, he said, "we have been working closely with the Girl Scouts, Camp Fire Girls, Catholic Youth Organization, YMCA, YWCA and the Boys Clubs." Members of building trades unions have donated thousands of hours of their free time to construct facilities for a wide range of community organizations.

Perlis was questioned by Harry W. Flannery, AFL-CIO radio coordinator.

6-Point Program Urged Against 'Runaway' Ships

A six-point action program against American-owned "runaway" ships flying foreign flags was urged by the Seafarers in a presentation to Pres. Johnson's Maritime Advisory Committee.

The 19-member advisory group includes two Cabinet members, Commerce Sec. Luther H. Hodges as chairman and Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, and representatives of employers, unions and the general public. SIU Pres. Paul Hall represents his union on the committee.

The SIU asked the committee to recommend:

- A presidential statement reaffirming the government's intent to foster development of an American-flag merchant marine and denouncing operation by American interests of ships registered in Panama, Liberia, Honduras and under other "flags of convenience" as detrimental to the nation's interests.
- A presidential directive ordering all government departments to abide by this policy statement.
- Specific abandonment by the Departments of State, Defense, Agriculture, Jutice and Commerce of policies and programs which have supported runaway shipping and "strict compliance with all provisions of the cargo preference laws."
- Congressional implementation of proposals made by the late Pres. Kennedy to eliminate "tax havens" used by runaway operators and require taxation of profits earned abroad by American firms operating through foreign subsidiaries. The SIU also urged that Congress amend the cargo preference laws to exclude American-owned runaways from carrying cargoes "generated by the American government and financed by the American taxpayer."
- A presidential directive that at least 25 percent of all foreign oil imported into the United States be carried in American ships.
- U.S. support for a stronger position by the United Nations that there must be a demonstrable connection between a ship and the country of its registry.

In its presentation, the SIU noted that the runaway-flag fleets of Panama, Liberia and Honduras are half again as large as the entire active, ocean-going American-flag fleet. American companies own 409 of these PanLibHon vessels, the SIU said.

The statement attacked "the runaway operator" as "a predatory parasite, roaming the seas in search of profligate profits, meanwhile preying upon the more poorly paid people of other lands in the worst traditions of old-fashioned dollar imperialism and economic colonialism."

Scholarship Winners Receive Honors

AT A LUNCHEON in Bridgeport, Conn., given by the State AFL-CIO, Kenneth August was congratulated by School Supt. Joseph B. Porter, as his mother, Mrs. Daniel August, smiled proudly.

PRESENTATION of certificate to Sandra Sweigman, Newark, N. J., was made by Pres. Irving Rosenberg (left) of Retail-Wholesale Local 108, to which her mother belongs, and State AFL-CIO Exec. Vice Pres. Victor Leonardis.

HEAD OF THE FAMILY at 16 is Swinton Roof, Memphis, Tenn., winner whose father died in 1961, his mother earlier this year. As his sisters looked on, he received his scholarship certificate from Victor G. Reuther of the Auto Workers.

COMMENCEMENT at Lead, S. D., High School was climaxed by presentation of scholarship to Kathy Jensen by State AFL-CIO Pres. Cliff W. Shrader. With them are the winner's father, Alvin Jensen, and grandfather, J. R. Dunmire (right).

The Jobs Puzzle

THE NUMBER of major job areas with unemployment of 6 percent or more dropped to the lowest total since early 1960 last month, indicating the continuing strength of the economy.

But with the economy moving ahead strongly there were still 3.7 million men and women seeking work in August who could not find it.

The paradox becomes even sharper when two other elements are introduced—the factory workweek running at higher than seasonally anticipated levels and the number of overtime hours setting a record high.

The persistence of high levels of joblessness in a generally booming economy focuses in two areas—the long-term unemployed, those out of work 15 weeks or more, and the teenagers. Long-term joblessness refuses to yield to the general improvement in economic conditions and the large number of teenagers entering the labor market simply cannot find employment.

This indicates that it will take more than stimulation of demand, more than merely accelerated growth rates to overcome the situation.

Many of the long-term jobless and the teenagers lack the skills, the training and the education required for employment in the 1960s. Among those out of work for long periods are many victims of technological change and automation who need special retraining programs.

The many programs shaped by the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations must be stepped up. Additional programs are needed that will place a higher penalty rate on overtime work and reduce the workweek as a means of creating the needed jobs that will finally reduce unemployment from its present high levels.

The Goldwater Theme

THE ONE THEME emerging from the Goldwater campaign wherever it goes to large audiences and small is the harping on crime—not in that it breaks any formal laws or statutes but that terpreted as an indirect attack on the Civil Rights Act and the forces supporting an end to discrimination.

This not-so-oblique appeal to passion and emotion is directed to the underlying currents of vague discontent abroad in the country as well as to those who would deny justice and equal rights for all. It is a calculated campaign that in a sense is a major political crime—not in that it breaks any formal laws or statutes but that it is an assault against the political morality of the country.

This crime is compounded by Goldwater's insistent attacks on the basic programs that are the key to America's progress and security.

To blast wildly at hospital care for the aged under social security, at the anti-poverty drive that is now national policy, at the Supreme Court's simple affirmation that democracy rests on the principle of "one man, one vote"—this indeed is an offense against the basic health and vitality and security of the country.

Crime in the Streets

'Shocked' at Miller Stand:

'Stigma' of Immigration Quotas Condemned by Sen. Humphrey

The following is excerpted from an address by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, Democratic vice presidential candidate, to the Polish-American Congress in Chicago, Sept. 19, 1964.

NINETEEN SIXTY-FOUR marks the beginning of the thousand year anniversary of the existence of Poland as an independent state and a Christian nation. Despite today's conditions of temporary subjugation, the fires of liberty have not been dimmed in Polish hearts. And Poland shall be free again.

We trust the Polish people. We understand well their bravery. As Pres. Johnson has said, "We know the unswerving dedication of the Polish people to the goals of liberty, equality, and independence. That is why our policy is designed to help the Polish people so that they may increasingly help themselves."

Let me make it clear right now that only a political charlatan can talk of instant victory over communism, or instant "liberation" of the captive peoples held in Communist subjugation.

We cannot imitate those of an earlier era who talked grandly of "liberation"—but when the Hungarian people rose in heroic revolt, stood mute on the sidelines.

No, the possibility of instant victory vanished with the coming of the era of instant annihilation.

We are convinced — unlike some narrow-visioned defeatists—that time is on the side of freedom. That is, if we put time to good use. We are completely confident that Poland and its people will be restored to the family of free nations.

And we intend to use time as a tool, not as a couch. We intend to build bridges to the Polish people—bridges which may now be obstructed at the other end but which will be there to be opened wide when the day of freedom dawns.

There is much more to be done. We must continue to open doors and windows in the Iron Curtain. The Polish people must never have reason to believe that we have forsaken them.

I was shocked to hear that Sen. Goldwater's runningmate—whose ancestral boat presumably came in only a few lengths behind the Mayflower—has recently condemned the Johnson Administration's proposal to revise the immigration laws. He says that he opposes "opening the floodgates"—but what an incredible distortion. What is really at issue is not floodgates at all. What is at issue is "fairgates"—gates which are fair, which do not open only at the knock of an Anglo-Saxon hand.

The Johnson proposal, which is similar to the proposal made earlier by John F. Kennedy and myself, is designed to end the stigma which was imposed by the Republican Administration and platform in 1924—that insulting statutory endorsement of the principle that Poles, Italians, and other Eastern European and non-European peoples somehow belong to inferior breeds.

In its 1960 platform, the Republican Party pledged to do something about it, too. But the Goldwater platform of 1964 purged this concession to decency, and now the temporary Republican leadership has added the insult of disdain to the injury of neglect.

SEN. GOLDWATER'S handpicked national chairman, Dean Burch, welcomed Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina to the Goldwater party with the statement: "The Democratic Party has forsaken the people to become the party of minority groups."

Now what would your grandfather have said of all this? You will recall, I am sure, that your grandfather belonged to that courageous group of men and women in Eastern Europe who dared to pull up their roots and move their families in search of justice and liberty in another land. They fled from tyranny to be welcomed to our shores in one of the great tides of immigration that invigorated our country in the middle of the 19th Century and the early 20th Century.

But I tell you this in astonishment and wonder: Your grandfather could not come to America under our present immigration laws. Your grandfather could not come to America under the legislation Barry Goldwater supports. Your grandfather would have found our gates barred to him and to his family—barred by Barry Goldwater and those who share his views on immigration.

And what would your grandfather have done? He would have had to remain in a Communist state in Eastern Europe, hoping and yearning for the light and air of liberty, his eyes turned toward America in quest of friendship and reassurance.

Pres. Johnson has stated the truly American position on the question of immigration. "In establishing preferences, a nation built by immigrants of all lands can ask those who seek admission: 'What can you do for our country?' But we should not be asking: 'In what country were you born?' "

Morgan Says:

Goldwater's 'Violence' Theme Ignores Some Pertinent Facts

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

IN DEVELOPING violence in the city streets as an issue in the presidential campaign, with pointed emphasis on the dangers to innocent citizens abroad in the national capital, Sen. Barry Goldwater has left out a couple of interesting facts.

Morgan

Fact one is that the crime rate in the senator's home town of Phoenix, Ariz., is fourth highest in the nation, according to official FBI figures. Fact two is that Washington, D. C., ranks thirteenth on this list. Presumably if the Republican candidate were to win the election one of his first official acts would be a law-enforcement campaign in Phoenix aimed at reducing crime at least down to the level of Washington.

This is not an attempt to becloud the seriousness of the problem of crime in American cities, which has risen 31 percent since 1958. It is an attempt to bring the subject into a somewhat truer perspective than the senator has managed to do by his broad and careless implications that the sins of the cities are somehow the exclusive property of the Democratic Party and indeed by his outright charges that the Kennedy-Johnson Administration has deliberately encouraged lawlessness, and particularly in the District of Columbia.

As the champion of local government should be first to recognize, law and order are first of all a local responsibility, though Goldwater doesn't seem inclined to take the next step and concede that it is not an isolated responsibility but one that involves social, economic and political factors of national concern.

Though they are not, of course, his responsibility, the crime figures for Phoenix and other cities are disturbing. According to 1963 FBI statistics, Phoenix had a rate of 2,408 index crimes per 100,000 population. An index crime is any one of the following: murder, manslaughter, rape, grand larceny, auto theft, robbery, aggravated assault or burglary. The city with the distinction of leading the country in crime by that measure is the prim and puritanlike community of Las Vegas, Nev., with a rate of 3,386; followed by Los Angeles with 2,935 and Miami with 2,466. On down the list are Chicago with 2,195 and New York with 1,688. Washington's rate last year was 1,621 crimes per 100,000 population.

Goldwater's allegation that the Democratic Administration is responsible for Washington's rising crime rate was devastatingly refuted by an article in the Washington Post by former crime reporter J. W. Anderson.

"There is no evidence whatever," Anderson reported, "of a relationship between crime rates and the tides of national politics. But there is a wealth of evidence demonstrating that crime rates are very closely tied to the number of very young men in the population."

Crime rates are directly linked with urban growth (including, of course, an attendant rise in the adolescent population) so it should be no surprise that the Southwestern United States (including Phoenix), growing faster than other sections, is afflicted with the highest incidence.

WASHINGTON IS a special case whose problems must in large measure be blamed on the shocking and calculated irresponsibility of the House and Senate District Committees which, in the end, govern—if that's the word—the nation's capital.

Washington is the first major city in the country whose Negro population outnumbers white. As if resentful, alarmed and at the same time determined to exploit this fact, southern chairmen dominating the District Committees of Congress have short-changed the capital on education, welfare, housing, foster homes and the like while Washington's teenage population has been soaring—hand in hand with trouble. What Anderson calls crimes of youth—robbery, housebreaking and car thefts—have nearly tripled since the mid-50s when the city's adolescent population was at its postwar low.

"The crime rate," Anderson wrote, "does not arise, it seems, from the city's promises of education and security to its young citizens, as Sen. Goldwater suggested. It arises, quite clearly from the city's failure to keep those promises."

Crime, unfortunately, does pay—or so the lawbreaker thinks—when a community's responsibilities are bankrupt. We are a nation of communities with common problems, yet the best approach one candidate for the Presidency can suggest to the problem of crime is to blame "big government," of which he is the sworn enemy, for not doing more to combat violence in the streets.

Washington Reports:

New Controls Urged to Solve Pollution of Nation's Waters

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE "should realize and be aroused about" the threat of water pollution to the future life of the nation, Rep. Alvin E. O'Konski (R-Wis.) declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) interviewed on the same program, said that water pollution today is due to "a series of complex industrial wastes which are going into our streams in thousands of tons," including radioactive wastes, run-off of agricultural pesticides and municipal sewage.

He noted that detergent manufacturers have evolved a new product which breaks down in streams and in sewage disposal plants and have agreed to substitute it for existing hard detergents. If they do not, he said, "we will pass legislation to force them to do so."

O'Konski termed the condition of the Potomac River in the national capital a "disgrace and a tragedy, because the federal government ought to set an example for the rest of the nation. This most historic river is probably the most polluted stream in the United States."

Dingell called the water pollution problem a health as well as an economic problem.

"You read of fish kills, both in fresh and salt water, and intestinal disorders, hepatitis outbreaks and so on that result from water pollution," he said. "Detroit water recently saw two major duck kills of about 20,000 each within less than six months. These were scarce species like canvasbacks and red heads."

REFERRING to recent reports that Lake Erie is becoming an American Dead Sea, O'Konski said that unless pollution is checked, other great lakes, like Michigan and Superior, will become useless and dangerous water wastes.

Dingell is sponsor of legislation that would set up a separate federal agency to administer the water pollution laws of the United States and fix standards for control of pollutants and contaminants.

Previous legislation, on a matching basis of $4.40 of local money to each $1 of federal funds, has stimulated action on the project, but some industries, Dingell declared, prefer to pay the nominal state fine rather than make needed corrections in their operations.

"However, industry is beginning to recognize that pollutants are corroding bridges and dams, eating up the bottoms of boats, and keeping needed waters from industry," he noted.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

AN ODD INTERIOR contradiction is observable in Sen. Goldwater's presidential campaign. It is a contradiction apparently based on where he is, on whether he is in North or South, although it has nothing to do with the familiar old trick of many candidates in talking civil rights in the North and "constitutionalism" in the South.

In his first national television show, in the Gettysburg "conversation" with Gen. Eisenhower that followed, the senator appeared particularly urgent to cleanse himself of the "warmonger" brand.

He denied it, he repudiated it, he sought and obtained clearance from Gen. Eisenhower. He is reliably represented by reporters on his tours as having discovered that his nuclear-bomb talk, his stridency about smashing through to "victory" right away quick in every confrontation, has scared the daylights out of many voters.

For national appearances, in his speeches in northern and western cities, he is urbane, careful in speech and phrase, and he talks little or not at all about the specific issues on which he built his reputation.

These are his votes—his votes against farm price supports, against social security improvements, against the civil rights act, against housing, unemployment compensation, minimum wage improvements, hospital care.

He hits exceedingly hard at Pres. Johnson, but much of it is "white backlash" stuff, "crime in the streets," supposed "cover-ups" of alleged corruption, and the newly strengthened theme that Mr. Johnson is "afraid" to face him in "debate."

IN THE SOUTH, however, the citizens are getting vintage Goldwater—the Goldwater who was absolutely certain he was right on every issue even when he got his pertinent facts twisted, even when four-fifths of the Republicans in Congress voted he was wrong on facts and principles.

He chose Orlando, Fla., where hundreds and thousands of low-income elderly people have retired, to assail social security hospital care, saying the country "isn't rich enough to afford that kind of program." ("The country" wouldn't have to; workers and their employers would finance it through a small additional social security tax.)

Republicans from the TVA country hoped he would straighten out his "sell-the-TVA" record when he spoke in Memphis. He didn't even mention the great authority.

In Altanta, Ga., where citizens have fought for 20 years against under-representation in the state legislature and malrepresentation in Congress, he attacked the Supreme Court's reapportionment decisions.

He went into Fort Worth, Tex., home of the General Dynamics complex that was awarded the disputed TFX contract, and labeled the award "political favoritism." (Of course, he did manage to say he wouldn't "move" the contract now to another company or city.)

The suspicion arises that the South is the section where the senator now feels most comfortably at home—and therefore the place where he reverts to type. He owes his nomination to the solid GOP delegates from the South, and he can slash at the Civil Rights Act with impunity.

The rest of the country is suddenly strange to him. He has been astounded at the widely reported revolt in normally Republican northern and western suburbs. He has had to assign four days to railroad "whistle-stopping" through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois; by the GOP's own calculations, he must win at least two to have any chance of winning the election.

His speeches grow bland, diffuse, and cover everything except the votes of which he was once so proud.

POLITICAL NOTES: Said Pres. Johnson to the Steelworkers convention in Atlantic City, "I am not here as a partisan. I am not going to make a political speech. I think you should support any candidate of any party who favors strong and progressive labor unions."

Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, who just jumped from the Democrats to the Republicans, admitted promptly that he wasn't wholly happy with his new party, either. Too many liberal GOP senators, he said.

Rivals Debate At Michigan Union Parley

Grand Rapids, Mich.—Michigan's gubernatorial campaign got off to a warm start when Republican Gov. George W. Romney met Congressman-at-Large Neil Staebler, the Democratic nominee, in debate before 900 delegates to the Michigan AFL-CIO convention.

Romney asserted Michigan made its greatest economic progress ever during his administration; Staebler countered that the state was riding the crest of the economic upturn produced by the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations.

Sharp Exchanges

State issues, however, soon were overshadowed by sharp exchanges between Romney and Staebler over the Republican incumbent's stand on Sen. Goldwater. Staebler accused his rival of ambivalence and of trying to "carry Goldwater on both shoulders." Romney said he "accepted" the Goldwater-Miller ticket, would not say he endorsed it and, asked if he would vote for Goldwater, replied that how he marked his ballot was a "personal privilege."

The debate was a highlight of a four-day session which focused sharply on legislation and political action. The convention's 900 delegates who represent more than 600,000 members endorsed an all-Democratic slate of national and state candidates and set in motion a campaign to defeat the so-called Massachusetts ballot whose adoption Romney secured in the Republican-dominated legislature.

A successful petition drive by the Michigan AFL-CIO and the Democratic Party produced 330,000 signatures to suspend application of the new ballot law and place it before the voters for a decision on Nov. 3.

Straight party votes would be impossible under the Romney plan, which groups candidates by office rather than by party.

The convention gave its support to full social security benefits at age 60, property tax exemptions for retirees, collective bargaining rights for public employes and federal standards for unemployment and workmen's compensation.

KING-SIZED pipe wrench being happily wielded by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey was a gift from a Chicago local of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters to the Democratic vice presidential candidate.

Vermont Labor Battles Goldwater, 'Work' Issue

Bennington, Vt.—Vermont labor prepared at the State AFL-CIO convention here for an election battle against Sen. Goldwater nationally and against "right-to-work" within the state.

Delegates voted an enthusiastic endorsement of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket and passed a resolution rejecting and denouncing extremism in American political life.

On the state level, the convention called for the re-election of Democratic Gov. Philip H. Hoff and his running mate for lieutenant governor, Rutland's Mayor John J. Daley.

Hoff, who two years ago became the first Democrat elected governor of Vermont in more than a century, is opposed by the incumbent Republican lieutenant governor, Ralph A. Foote.

The campaign for lieutenant governor this year took on more than usual importance when the Republicans—although rejecting "right-to-work" in their state platform—gave their nomination to Richard Snelling, a board member of the National Right to Work Committee.

In the 1959 legislature, Snelling sponsored an unsuccessful attempt to outlaw the union shop. He was defeated for re-election to the legislature the following year after a campaign in which "right-to-work" was a major issue.

Reapportionment Backed

The convention strongly supported legislative reapportionment in line with the Supreme Court's one man, one vote mandate. Vermont has one of the nation's largest—and most unbalanced—lower houses, with each town entitled to one member, regardless of population.

Top officers of the state federation were re-elected, including Pres. Ralph E. Williams, Sec.-Treas. Carroll P. Comstock, Jr., Exec. Vice Pres. Lena Brown, and Ruth Colombo, COPE and Women's Activities director.

Baldanzi Optimistic:

UTW Sees Gains In Southern Drive

New York—A prediction of rapid growth for the United Textile Workers, with newly-planted, firm roots in the South, was made here by its president, George Baldanzi, before some 400 delegates at the union's 16th convention.

Baldanzi noted that UTWA has been organizing new plants in the South in spite of the fact that general employment in the textile industry has shrunk from 1.25 million to 700,000 over the past two decades.

Despite the effects of foreign textile imports and automation, he told the delegates, industrialization in the South is producing a change in union organizing. He explained this apparent paradox by pointing out that unparalleled technological advance in industry throughout the South has caused such demand for labor that there is a better chance for organization of non-union workers.

Fierce competition in the textile industry has been responsible for UTWA local unions negotiating impressive improvements in wages, fringe benefits, profit sharing plans and working conditions, Baldanzi reported. He termed this "a measure of our union's worth."

The UTWA leader said the industry is witnessing a dramatic transformation in the form of growth of large companies.

"We are emerging from an industry that used to have thousands of small companies into one like steel, where a handful of giants control policy," he said. To keep pace with this change, he observed, unions face an unprecedented need for engineering, time study and other experts.

Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R. I.) delivered a ringing attack on the Republican presidential nominee, Sen. Barry Goldwater. Pastore noted that he himself during 14 years in the Senate had observed Goldwater and that "he never once voted right on anything involving the welfare of organized labor."

Issues Stressed

"God forbid that you let this man who favors the 'right-to-work' law, who would destroy the Civil Rights Act of 1964, who would trigger the world to destruction, take over the White House," he declared. "The time has come when the American worker must be made to understand this."

Pastore also asserted that the 1964 election "in the last analysis will be decided by candidates' positions on bread and butter issues, as well as on the questions of jobs, unemployment compensation and social security."

UTWA delegates unanimously adopted resolutions endorsing Pres. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey for President and Vice President, on repealing section 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act, on amending the Walsh-Healey Act, on enactment of adequate health and welfare legislation, and on a shorter workweek.

Vietnamese Unions Play Key Role in War Effort

South Vietnam's trade union movement was described by a veteran labor observer as that embattled nation's principal mass organization "that has discipline and is devoted to the objectives of winning the war against the Vietcong."

Irving Brown, the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions representative to the United Nations, was interviewed on Labor News Conference following his return from South Vietnam. The AFL-CIO public affairs program is heard over the Mutual radio network.

Brown, who was interviewed shortly before the brief general strike called by the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor, said it is imperative to give the democratic trade union movement an effective voice in molding national policy. The unions, he stressed, can make a major contribution "to involving the great masses of the Vietnamese people" in the struggle against Communist aggression.

While the largest group of organized workers is in Saigon, the unions also have an important role in the villages, Brown pointed out.

"Even in areas where the Vietcong is a serious menace, they have organized," he said. "They have organized what they call 'social centers,' where they have taken care of hundreds of children; where there are recreation centers for the children . . . where they are training people, giving them some form of adult education, especially literacy classes."

The trade union movement in Vietnam, Brown said, "knows more about what is going on in the minds of the people . . . than any other group in Vietnam, and that includes the army."

He noted that the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor has in leadership positions both Buddhists and Catholics and has avoided any involvement in the nation's religious controversies. Among the rank and file of people, he said, there is no real hostility on a religious basis.

American economic as well as military aid is needed to strengthen South Vietnam, Brown declared and he predicted that more will be done along these lines.

As an example of unmet areas of need, he cited the problems of Vietnam's railroad workers.

"Two hundred railroad workers have been killed by explosions, by sabotage," he pointed out. "What is being done about their families, their widows, their children? Remember, the railroad workers are still going day in and day out on their jobs, in spite of Communist terrorism. . . . Something should be done in terms of housing. This is just one group, but there are many like this."

Communist aggression can be defeated, Brown said, "if we move in the right direction to involve, mobilize and win the masses to this struggle."

Volunteer Summer in Mississippi 'Grim but Wonderful' for Teachers

New York—"We'd do it again," say more than 40 union teachers who are back in their classrooms after a summer of unpaid teaching in Mississippi.

Twenty free schools opened July 2 for six weeks of tutoring high school pupils and educationally deprived adults. They gave intensive courses in English, public speaking, typing, sewing, arts and crafts, foreign languages, science, math and similar subjects, along with citizenship, voter registration, and the history of the Negro in America.

"It was grim but wonderful," said AFT Vice Pres. Richard Parrish of the Bronx, who toured 11 of the 20 schools stretching from Holly Springs in the north to Gulfport in the south, from Greenville in the west to Meridian.

Parrish found the pupils eager to learn and the teachers not only willing to give up their summer but also to dig down in their pockets to help pay expenses. An example: Arthur Reese of the Detroit Teachers Union and his wife Carolyn had the biggest center in Mississippi, with 600 pupils for the first session at Hattiesburg, and more than 500 at the second session, taught in six separate churches by a volunteer staff.

Spent Own Money

The Reeses spent more than $700 of their own money—a "tremendous sacrifice typical of many other teachers," as Parrish put it.

The Teachers made only one promise to those who volunteered—that transportation would be provided. It was, but the cost ate up much of the $10,000 given by the United Federation of Teachers here—AFT Local 2.

"We had to hire cars—at $60 a week plus 6 cents a mile in one area, and at $212 a month plus 9.6 cents a mile in another location, Holly Springs—to transport our teachers from the homes where they were living to the schools, and back again," Parrish said.

That was more secure than riding in cars with New York plates, he said, during a period when feelings were aroused by the disappearance, and later discovery of the bodies, of three civil rights workers who had been helping get voters registered.

Security was "very strict," said the AFT official. Each town on the school "circuit" had to call the communications officer in Meridian every night for a final "all clear" report to the security officer in Jackson. Cost for the telephone hookup — $1,800 a month.

Said Parrish: "No one can understand the psychology of people who live in a police state unless he has lived there himself. It took tremendous courage for these teachers to keep on doing their job."

Wyoming Fireman Wins BLF&E Safety Award

Evanston, Wyo. — Everett E. Reed, locomotive helper who halted a Union Pacific passenger train when Engineer Robert J. Rowley died at his post, received the safety award of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen at a dinner here.

The train continued running until Reed moved the body of the engineer, which had kept the automatic "deadman control" inoperative, and then applied the brakes. He received a plaque and $250 from the union, which presents a monthy safety award to helpers (firemen) who prevent or minimize rail accidents.

Clothing Union Leaders At ILO Geneva Parley

Geneva—A tripartite technical meeting for the clothing industry, convened by the Intl. Labor Organization, is examining labor and social problems and working conditions at a two-week meeting here.

Workers in the United States are represented by Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers and Research Dir. Lazare Teper of the Ladies' Garment Workers. ACWA Research Dir. Milton Fried is their adviser.

At Union Conventions:

Johnson Lashes Out At Extremist Fringe

"The factions which bid for power—and control over your government—bear many names, wear many masks, espouse many causes.

"They are united . . . by one determination: that your country shall not provide for the general welfare."

They "despise the word 'democracy'—dislike the word 'equality'—distrust the word 'peace.' They would reduce the word 'compassion' to a whisper—and have us mention it only in apology," he continued.

"On this, I refuse to turn and run.

"I intend to honor the mandate of the Constitution. . . . I intend to see that this goverment, as the servant of this great people, 'provides for the general welfare.' "

The President headed from the union conventions to a weekend meeting at El Paso with Mexico's Pres. Adolfo Lopez Mateos and thence to appearances in New England, saying he would probably enter some 30 states during the remainder of the presidential campaign.

Humphrey on Tour

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, his vice presidential companion, traveled from the Midwest to Texas and to a joint appearance with former Atty. Gen. Robert E. Kennedy, candidate for the Senate in New York, in his wide-swinging campaign.

Sen. Goldwater and Rep. William E. Miller, the GOP vice-presidential candidate, kept up a running fire about a "breakdown of law and order." The senator joined former Pres. Eisenhower at the general's Gettysburg, Pa., farm for a half-hour filmed television appearance. (See story Page 12.)

A cheering crowd of 2,000 delegates and guests heard Johnson at the IUE convention, and the audiences gathered at the other five assemblies brought the total number of union members and friends to whom the President spoke that day to an estimated 25,000. The five conventions connected by television were the Rubber Workers in Chicago, the United Textile Workers in New York City, the Tobacco Workers in Miami Beach, the Minnesota State AFL-CIO and the Missouri State AFL-CIO.

An estimated 10,000 Steelworkers' delegates and guests gave Johnson a tumultuous welcome the previous day as he flew into Atlantic City to thank the convention for its endorsement and fling a challenge to backward-lookers who say, "Don't touch this," "Leave that alone," "Let's wipe this out."

"The gains of the past 30 years have not been easy gifts," the President said. "We fought for them . . . maintained and advanced them through an uneasy and perilous peace . . . [and] "we will never return to economic stagnation and national drift.

'We Will Keep Moving'

"We will keep moving toward a nation where every man can find work and a fair reward, where no man suffers from fear or hatred, where every man can seek fulfillment and hope.

"That has been the 30-year goal of this progressive union . . . and of all American labor," he acknowledged. "That is the goal toward which I hope to lead all America."

On the "factions" and "fringes" reaching for power in an attempt to repudiate the American past, the President said to the IUE and the TV network of other union conventions, "We have a duty—a clear and compelling duty—to make it clear that America has not fallen and will not fall into the hands of extremists of any stripe.

"They may offer slurs today and slanders tomorrow—and more than that in days to come. I ask responsible men and women everywhere to stand up and be counted for the character and conscience of their country."

A nation as strong as ours "can tolerate the widest diversity of opinion and belief . . . and be made stronger by full and responsible discussion," Johnson said.

"But there comes a time when men must turn and stand—or else turn and run for the rest of their lives."

Speaking in a low voice, tense with emphasis, he said, "This generation of Americans must not be deceived. The success of our system must not be mocked."

Time to Stand Firm

"A time has come when we must turn and stand against those factions and fractions who would lead the people to believe that the road to individual freedom is, in reality, a road to collective serfdom."

Before Vietnam or NATO, before the Congo was on the map, the President warned, the same factions fought against minimum wages, 40-hour weeks, social security, labor's rights, the TVA and rural electrification, slum clearance and public works.

"That is where the line is drawn this year," he declared.

"There is work for us to do—to build this good society better, to make this strong country the foundation of a great and compassionate civilization."

The country's destiny, he said with disdain, "must not be placed in the hands of those who would steer a callous, reckless course."

"We have no time for arrogance or belligerence—no time for callousness or contempt—either in policies of our nation or the hearts of our leaders."

"Our duty is to fulfill the rights of all men, not only because we are judged more by what we do than what we preach, but because it is right."

Meany Appointed To COMSAT Board

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has been named by Pres. Johnson as one of three public directors of COMSAT, the Communications Satellite Corp. chartered by Congress to exploit development of telecommunciations via satellites in orbit.

Also named were Pres. Clark Kerr of the University of California, and Frederic G. Donner, General Motors board chairman.

Six directors were originally named by the late Pres. Kennedy, six by the two business firms sharing in the exploitation. The three public members were required by Congress to protect the public interest arising from U.S. development of the satellite system.

HANDS WERE EXTENDED and voices were raised in warm congratulations to Pres. Johnson when he finished his speech to the Steelworkers convention in Atlantic City. At right, pointing out delegates, is USWA Pres. David J. McDonald.

McDonald Sees Election Choice Between Progress and 'Dark Ages'

By Gervase N. Love

Atlantic City, N. J.—The people of America must decide on Election Day if "we are to go forward" or "go back to the Dark Ages," Pres. David J. McDonald told 3,500 cheering delegates to the 12th convention of the Steelworkers in an appeal for support for the Democratic presidential candidates.

The convention answered his call by unanimously endorsing the Democratic standard-bearers on behalf of the 1.1 million members and giving Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson a tumultuous welcome when he spoke to them. (See story Page 1).

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey was to be heard in a telephoned address later in the convention.

Earlier the delegates had roared approval of McDonald's proposal that the union work for "a new concept of total job security" under which each steel worker "must be considered a permanent part of the industry in which he is employed . . . until he is honorably retired at a decent pension." The resolutions committee was charged with bringing a detailed proposal to the floor.

The delegates endorsed Johnson and Humphrey after hearing a point-by-point analysis of the respective platform planks most significant to working people and a comparison of the records of Johnson and Humphrey with those of their Republican rivals, Sen. Barry Goldwater and Rep. William E. Miller.

"We believe that the election of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey is vital to the protection of the labor movement, all the people of the United States, and the cause of peace and freedom-throughout the world," the resolution concluded.

Support Urged

"We endorse their candidacy.

"We urge every member of our union to give these candidates their loyal, generous and wholehearted support."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany also told why organized workers should back Johnson and Humphrey. (See story Page 1).

Dist. Dir. Joseph P. Molony, secretary of the resolutions committee, in supporting the endorsement declared "the choice is obvious."

Earlier McDonald had made the same point in his keynote speech.

"I do not need to point out the tremendous legislative record of Pres. Johnson and Sen. Humphrey," he said. "Neither do I need to study the horrible record of Sen. Goldwater and Rep. Miller.

"But I am not one of those who believes that this election is a push-over, that this is a sure thing for Johnson. I don't believe it."

He repeated earlier charges that the Goldwater forces would attempt to split the USWA by infiltration "in order to set Steelworker against Steelworker, rank-and-file against local leaders, local leaders against the staff, staff against the directors and the directors against the international officers."

Mao's Techniques

The techniques, he said, are laid down in the book, "How to Win an Election: The Art of Political Victory," by Stephen C. Shadegg, Goldwater campaign manager in 11 western states, who followed the infiltration methods spelled out by Mao Tse-Tung, the Chinese Communist leader.

McDonald also cited Goldwater's longstanding opposition to industrywide bargaining, declaring it would have been impossible for the union to achieve the benefits it has if it had to negotiate plant by plant.

"I say to you, quite frankly, Lyndon Johnson's fight is our fight," he continued.

"I say to you that our jobs are at stake. I say to you that peace and paychecks are at stake. I say to you that we must go forward to the great society in which Lyndon Johnson believes.

"But in order to do this, there must be no complacency. We have to work, we have to work! We have to fight and we have to fight and we have to fight! If we do this, we will win—I guarantee you, we will win."

In another major resolution the delegates denounced attempts in Congress "to nullify the reapportionment decisions," declaring such efforts "are not being carried out for the benefit of the people."

"Quite clearly," it charged, "the battle is being waged by politicians who see the basis of their power crumbling. We have always thought that a congressman's job is to represent the people of his district, not his own personal and political ambitions.

"We therefore condemn those who would sell our citizens short to keep their hold on power. We condemn all efforts, of whatever nature, to undermine or delay the effectiveness of the reapportionment decisions of the Supreme Court and we urge Congress and the people to reject any and all such proposals."

The convention passed two amendments to the union constitution. One made members who are 68 years or older ineligible for nomination or election to international office. The other raised the salaries of the 29 district directors and the Canadian national director from $16,000 to $20,000 a year.

IMF Speaker

Gen. Sec. Adolphe Graedel of the Intl. Metalworkers Federation hailed the USWA for its work in the international labor field and said the IMF has mounted a drive to help unions in underdeveloped nations "carry on the work you have been doing here of raising living standards."

"You have shown other trade unions what a real trade union program is," he said. "Other trade unions are following your example and are profiting by what you have done in the United States."

Harry Jackson, acting on behalf of Mayor Joseph Altman in welcoming the convention to Atlantic City, made McDonald an honorary lifeguard. Other speakers were Archbishop Paul J. Hallinan of Atlanta, Ga., who is recovering from an illness that has kept him from attending the Vatican Council, and Rev. Henry J. Whiting, associate executive director of the Dept. of Social Welfare of the National Council of Churches.

Addresses URW:

Wirtz Sees Workers Alert to Key Issues

Chicago—Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz predicted that rank and file union members would overwhelmingly support the Johnson-Humphrey Democratic ticket in the Nov. 3 presidential election.

Following an address to the 24th convention of the Rubber Workers, Wirtz said at a news conference that nearly all working men and women regard the issues in this election campaign as vital to themselves.

Among these issues, he said, are improved minimum wage rates and coverage, the anti-poverty program, the tax cut and other measures aimed at creating more jobs. He said that Sen. Barry M. Goldwater's position on these issues over the years put the Arizonian clearly against the position of wage earners.

The labor secretary, who early in his labor-management relations career was an arbitrator for the URW and the U.S. Rubber Co., told the more than 700 delegates here that the nation, the Kennedy-Johnson Administration and the labor movement can be proud of the economic record of the past 43 months.

"We have learned how to make our system work," Wirtz said as he compared gains made in employment and earnings and progress made in reducing unemployment. He cited the record of the 43 months prior to Jan. 1, 1961, and the 43 months since, noting the measures initiated by the Kennedy-Johnson Administration.

Wirtz praised the Rubber Workers' leadership in civil rights, declaring that "backlash" has no place in the labor movement and calling the term a "libel" and a "slander."

"Free collective bargaining is working," he said. "To make bargaining work better we need strong, responsible parties on both sides. This depends on repeal of section 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act."

Wirtz said hope for the future rests with the leadership supplied to America by the late Pres. John F. Kennedy and Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson.

URW Pres. George Burdon, in his opening day address, attacked the Goldwater record as anti-labor and said he hoped the convention would vote endorsement of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket. Burdon devoted a large part of his remarks to the growth and dangers of radical right-wing groups.

'Great Society' Near

"The great society is at our fingertips," Burdon said, but added that victory for the right-wing extremists would put this great society out of reach.

He said the goal of the civil rights movement is the same labor fought for years ago—human dignity. "Only the battlefield has changed in the war for this human dignity," he declared.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the delegates that the GOP is the "captured party"—captured by the extremists. He urged the election of Johnson and Humphrey and declared:

"For 12 years in the Senate, Goldwater voted against labor. He said 'no' to working people. Now it is time for working people to say 'no' to Goldwater."

Oregon Unions Press Job Injury Initiative

Roseburg, Ore.—"Number 3 November 3" is the Oregon labor movement's special campaign slogan this year. It drew even more attention than the presidential election as the State AFL-CIO concluded its 9th annual convention here.

Ballot Measure No. 3 is a labor-sponsored initiative to improve and modernize Oregon's workmen's compensation (job injury) law. If approved by the voters Nov. 3 it will provide an 18.5 percent increase in present benefits and coverage for virtually all employed persons under a fund administered by the state.

The State AFL-CIO and unaffiliated unions joined forces to take their case directly to the voters after years of inaction by the Oregon Legislature on improvements sought by labor as urgently needed for the protection of injured workmen and their families.

"The history of this initiative has been like the 'Perils of Pauline,'" Exec. Sec. James T. Marr told the convention. He reviewed the pressures of the petition drive that obtained 58,000 voters' signatures to put the measure on the ballot, and legal maneuvers by its opponents in the state's highest courts.

Well-financed foes of the measure, led by insurance interests, have raised a cry of "monopoly" because it would place the job-injury fund under the exclusive supervision of the State Industrial Accident Commission.

'Monopoly' Cry Derided

The Oregon AFL-CIO's legislative director, George Brown, pointed out that social security and unemployment insurance also can be called monopolies—"and both programs would be failures if they were operated for profit by private insurance interests."

Lawrence Smedley, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, congratulated the Oregon labor movement for putting the initiative measure on the November ballot and declared that "Oregon voters now have an opportunity to enact the best workmen's compensation law in the nation."

Discussing labor's stake in the presidential election, Oil Workers Pres. O. A. Knight told the 390 delegates:

"Sen. Goldwater has proved time and again, by his votes and by his sponsorship of legislation, that he wants to turn back the clock and to stop the labor movement. His election would be a national and international disaster."

Knight, an AFL-CIO vice president, attended the convention as the personal representative of Federation Pres. George Meany.

Many Volunteers

Oregon labor has never before had so large a staff of volunteers and full-time field representatives working on its register-and-vote campaign, Brown reported. The results, he said, are "spectacular both in numbers of voters registered and in what they reveal about Johnson vs. Goldwater sentiment. In some counties, new registrations are running more than 8 to 1 Democratic."

A record 390 delegates attended the five-day convention here. It was the largest number since Oregon's AFL-CIO merger in 1956.

Alaska Labor Opens Drive For Johnson

Anchorage — Speakers at the Alaska AFL-CIO convention here ripped into Republican Candidate Barry Goldwater and his record as labor mobilized to bring the state back into the Democratic column in November's presidential election.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan warned that the Goldwater program calls for drastic legislation to curb unions and weaken labor's position at the bargaining table.

Another principal speaker, Alaska's Rep. Ralph J. Rivers (D), branded Goldwater a "reckless, muddled reactionary."

Governor Present

The convention opened with 100 delegates and an equal number of guests, including persons prominent in government, education and business. Gov. William A. Egan (D) welcomed the delegates.

In the 1960 presidential election, the Republicans captured the state's three electoral votes by a slim 1,000 majority. The state's trade union movement has already begun an all-out drive to prevent it from happening again, Pres. R. E. McFarland reported.

Stereotypers Launch Job-Saving Program

Albany, N. Y.—The Stereotypers & Electrotypers voted at their 61st convention here to spend up to $50,000 to help private employers willing to experiment in the development of letterpress processes designed to spread employment in the printing industry.

The vote climaxed reports from delegates that new methods and substitute processes are reducing job opportunities in commercial shops, though work opportunities in newspaper shops remain "excellent."

Pres. James H. Sampson and Sec.-Treas. Frank G. Creamer said the convention authorized the union to give direct assistance to employers seeking to experiment with new processes in the letterpress end of the graphic arts industry.

The 117 delegates also:

- Voted to send 16 constitutional changes to membership referendum in December.
- Approved a resolution calling on the AFL-CIO to encourage use of the Allied Printing Trades label on all union printing materials.
- Heard more appeals than ever before from rulings by union tribunals.

The officers reported that union finances are strong and that the defense fund is at the highest level since the founding of the Stereotypers in 1902.

In the forthcoming referendum, changes involving union funds require a two-thirds favorable vote, other propositions need a simple majority for passage, Creamer said.

William C. Scanlan, IATSE Trustee, Dies

Lynn, Mass.—William C. Scanlan, an international trustee of the Theatrical Stage Employes since 1924, died here at 88 and was buried after services in St. Pius Church.

Scanlan helped form Lynn Stage Employes Local 73 in 1900, and was its business agent for 63 years. He was a New England field staff man for the IATSE from 1921 until his final illness.

Missouri Labor Urged To Shun Complacency

Kansas City—The undecided vote in Missouri requires redoubled efforts for registration and getting out Johnson-Humphrey voters on election day, delegates to the biennial convention of the Missouri AFL-CIO were warned here this week.

Polls in the rural areas of the state show Pres. Johnson leading Sen. Goldwater substantially, but the polls also show an unusually high percentage of undecided voters. State AFL-CIO Pres. John I. Rollings reminded the delegates that it was only the tremendous efforts by unions in the cities which carried the state for John F. Kennedy in 1960.

"As great as was the need then for effective political efforts," he said, "the dangers from defeat would be much greater this year. We must not yield to complacency bred by optimistic polls, for many things could happen between now and election day."

James A. Davis, secretary-treasurer of the state organization, who had traveled through the state sounding out political sentiment, said there was an alarming degree of apathy among voters. He, too, warned against over-confidence in view of the undecided vote which, he said, might be swung either way by some development in the campaign.

Fortunately, he noted, at this point in the campaign the polls and surveys were indicating a considerably greater number of undecided votes among Republicans than among Democrats, and also that a greater number of Republicans are switching to Johnson than Democrats to Goldwater.

The convention gave a rousing response to a closed circuit television address by Pres. Johnson. The more than 700 delegates, many accompanied by wives at the convention banquet, heard Interior Sec. Stewart L. Udall blister his fellow Arizonian, Barry Goldwater, as a "shallow, ignorant and impulsive" man, lacking a sense of history.

"I will tell you where his nostalgia lies," Udall said, "back to the heart of his youth in the 20s. This is the America he yearns for and would return to."

Udall pointed out, however, that it was in the 20s that the seeds of a depression and a second World War were sown. Since then, he said, we have turned to laws and organization for the benefit of the people. He cited the great accomplishments in Congress under Johnson.

Walter Gray, area director of COPE, cited the record of Goldwater in voting 53 times wrong on issues selected by AFL-CIO as important to the welfare of unions, citizens and the country. He contrasted that with 56 right votes by Sen. Stuart Symington, Missouri Democrat. Gray credited the efforts of labor in 1960 with the carrying of Missouri for Kennedy.

The convention also heard addresses by Pres. L. M. Raftery of the Painters and Pres. William D. Buck of the Fire Fighters.

The convention gave an enthusiastic reception and endorsement to Warren E. Hearnes, Democratic candidate for governor, who has expressed strong support for reapportionment of the state legislature and opposition to any so-called "right-to-work" legislation.

Election Seen Key to Labor's Future

Meany Urges Drive To Get Out the Vote

the right-wing extremists who look upon Barry Goldwater as a hero."

"I refuse to take any comfort out of the polls," Meany said. Goldwater "is opposed to the Communists" but he "has refused to take a position on the John Birch Society . . . he refuses to see any evil or threat in the John Birch Society."

The John Birch Society in its "printed documents" has called the late John Foster Dulles a "paid agent" of the Communist Party and former Pres. Eisenhower a "dedicated Communist," he continued.

Meany ran the record of Goldwater's Senate votes across 12 years:

"He voted against higher wages for postal employes, he voted against raising unemployment insurance benefits. . . .

"He voted against [social security] pensions at 50 years of age for persons totally disabled . . . voted approval of the Dixon-Yates power gouge against the American people. . . .

Against Workers

"He voted against the protection of workers' interests by trying to exclude employer-operated pension plans from the requirements and penalties of federal law . . . against the Davis-Bacon provisions in public works contracts . . . against federal aid to education . . . against health care for the aged, against the union protections inserted in the mass transit bill, against President Johnson's anti-poverty act, against the Civil Rights Act of 1964."

"He voted for higher interest rates on GI mortgages," Meany continued. "He voted to clamp unfair limits on new minimum wage coverage . . . he voted to cut down the federal program for training the jobless."

"He had a bill in his pocket" when he entered the Senate in 1953 —"a national right-to-work law, a federal law against nationwide bargaining or even area-wide bargaining."

"The big issues in this election are peace and prosperity, which go together," the federation president said to the UTWA.

"We look at Lyndon Johnson's record and then we look at this man who finds it so difficult to explain today what he said yesterday, who makes all sorts of statements and contradicts them," he said to the IUE delegates.

Finger On The Button

"We think whose finger is going to be on the atomic button."

"The President of the United States is, by the Constitution, the Commander-in-Chief of our armed forces. Do we want to put this power into the hands of a man who spends one half of each day explaining what he meant . . . a man who has so definitely committed himself to political extremism?"

We look at the Goldwater running-mate, William E. Miller, "whom the Republicans call their Number One dirty fighter, and I agree with them, and we look at his record, and then we look at this outspoken, wonderful human being who is on the Democratic ticket for Vice President, Hubert Humphrey."

"There is no question of where we belong."

"The first order of business for the American trade union movement" is to make sure that we have in Washington "an administration under which we can progress, under which we can face the very difficult international and domestic problems that are before us," Meany said to the Steelworkers.

"We must bear the burden of responsibility by showing that we want a man of stature, a man who knows what is best for all Americans."

"We have the members and we have the votes, but having the members and having the votes doesn't mean anything unless you get those votes in the ballot box."

At every convention, speaking directly to delegates representing America's union members, the federation president said, "I appeal to you for 100 percent cooperation, at every level, right down to the last precinct, so that on the 4th of November we can look forward, with comfort, to the future."

IUE Convention Shapes Program For 'Job and Income Assurance'

By Eugene A. Kelly

A new "job and income assurance plan"—including a guaranteed annual wage and the 35-hour workweek for those who have jobs, supplemental benefits or severance pay for those who haven't, and earlier retirement on a "decent" income—will be sought by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in all future collective bargaining agreements.

That was agreed on by delegates to the union's 11th biennial convention as a giant step toward the "great society" envisioned by Pres. Johnson. They also, in the opening days of their Washington, D. C., conclave:

- Endorsed the Johnson-Humphrey Democratic ticket while rejecting the Goldwater-Miller slate of the Republicans and promising to "exert our best efforts" to help the President and Sen. Humphrey "win an overwhelming victory" in November.

- Nominated Pres. James B. Carey for another term and, for the first time since Carey took office, provided an opponent for the top spot in an October referendum—Sec.-Treas. Paul Jennings of the union's New York-New Jersey district, largest in the IUE.

- Elected Sec.-Treas. George Collins by unanimous rising vote of the nearly 800 delegates from 367 local unions, IUE conference boards and district councils.

The convention, after preliminary skirmishing on a proposal to change the per capita dues structure to provide more money for organizing, gave an enthusiastic welcome to a series of speakers—Pres. Johnson, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, federation Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Gen. Sec. George Woodcock of the British Trades Union Congress, and others.

The delegates recessed one afternoon to inspect the union's enlarged Philip Murray building and warmly greeted Mrs. Ethel Kennedy, wife of Robert F. Kennedy, brother of the late President, as she dedicated the John F. Kennedy memorial room in the headquarters building.

Johnson, Humphrey Endorsed

Johnson spoke to the convention a day after it endorsed his candidacy and got a rousing greeting from delegates, their wives and children in a packed hotel ballroom. Carey pinned on the President a badge depicting the Philip Murray building, the initials LBJ—which Carey said were short for Labor Backs Johnson—and the inscription "Deep in the heart of the American people."

Carey reported the presence of a delegate who had been a Johnson classmate in a San Antonio grammar school—Paul Keller of IUE Local 780.

Later the delegates adopted a resolution on the domestic economy warning that a "trigger-happy" Republican presidential candidate could "touch off a national economic disaster as easily as an international nuclear war."

The IUE's new "job and income assurance plan" declared "all employes shall be put on weekly salary and guaranteed 52 weekly paychecks per year and, until this guaranteed salary basis is achieved, a pooled fund provided by employers shall be used during periods of unemployment to provide unemployment compensation of 75 percent of gross weekly pay plus $2 a week for each dependent, with supplemental pay when work drops below 40 hours" a week.

Bargaining Goals

The convention also endorsed these other features:

- A planned reduction of hours to average 35 per week with no reduction in weekly pay.

- Severance pay on complete separation to provide not less than 1 week's pay for each year of service up to 10 years, 1.5 weeks' pay per year beyond that.

- Restrictions on overtime until all employes are recalled from layoff; lump sum payments in money or early retirement; plantwide employment "pools" for displaced workers; retraining of displaced workers on the basis of seniority; and restrictions on "contracting-out" of plant work.

The delegates endorsed a call for a minimum wage boost of 3.5 percent a year with a floor of 7 cents an hour, cost-of-living escalators in all IUE contracts, and an end to wage erosion involving discrimination for sex, age or color.

Other goals, the convention agreed, should be 10 or more paid holidays a year; 5 weeks' vacation after 20 years' service; long-service vacations of 13 weeks at age 64, and 15 weeks at 65 after 20 or more years.

Maso Wins Full Term As Lathers' President

New York—Pres. Sal Maso of the Lathers won election to a full three-year term at the union's convention here and carried with him most of a slate of candidates for other executive board posts.

Maso, named last January to fill out the term of the late Lloyd A. Mashburn, was opposed for re-election by the union's secretary-treasurer, Harold Mills. He defeated Mills 180-145.

J. Earl Ferguson of Cleveland, who ran with Maso, defeated William Ward for secretary-treasurer, 182-144.

Vice presidents elected included two incumbents, C. J. Haggerty, who is president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Michael Rizzo of New York. Newcomers elected were Russ Baldwin of St. Louis, Creighton White of Houston, Tex., Robert Hamilton of Chicago, A. H. Burton of Ottawa, Ont., and Henry Sheerin of Boston.

There was no political division, however, on the delegates' choice for President of the United States. The convention voted a unanimous endorsement of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.), in an address urged union members individual Republican candidates if "to keep an open mind" regarding they have "good" labor records.

"It is just as much to the interest of the Democratic Party as it is to the interest of the Republican Party that the moderate and progressive stand should be maintained in the Republican Party," he said.

Delegates approved a per capita increase and backed Maso's recommendation by rejecting a proposed jurisdiction agreement with the Carpenters which had been drawn up more than a year ago.

Catholic Action Group Elects Kircher to Board

William L. Kircher, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, has been elected to membership on the executive board of the National Catholic Social Action Conference.

Political Endorsement Tobacco Union's First

Miami Beach—For the first time in its history, the Tobacco Workers went on record as supporting a national ticket by unanimously endorsing Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey.

The 33,000-member union thus joined a growing list of labor organizations that are breaking with their own traditions to endorse the Democratic candidates.

The action was taken after the 169 delegates to the union's 13th convention heard the President address the session and several other union meetings through closed-circuit television.

TWIU Sec.-Treas. Robert J. Petree said the resolution supporting the Johnson-Humphrey ticket "is urgently necessary because of the extreme views" expressed by the Republican candidate. He emphasized that the action constitutes the first time TWIU ever endorsed any candidate in its history and declared, "we did it unanimously."

Automation also was a major topic at the week-long meetings, with the delegates passing a series of resolutions offering solutions to that biggest of problems in the tobacco industry.

In an effort to stem job losses, TWIU asked in resolutions, that a "strict limitation be enforced against overtime" and that double pay for overtime be made mandatory.

It also passed a resolution seeking the formation of Union Label & Service Trades Councils around the country. A central council should be set up, the resolution stated, as "a clearing house for national and local promotion of labor's problems," and to "harness the buying power of the trade union movement." Councils would be established in each area in which the union is active.

Compromise Approved:

cordance with existing laws. (In most states, legislators will be chosen in November.)

● Reapportion legislatures through court order in accordance with constitutional standards where malapportioned legislatures have not acted within the time limits.

Dirksen told the Senate he could not go along with the "sense of Congress" resolution "because it does not have the force of law."

The compromise did not, however, shut the door on further reapportionment controversy at this session. Pending in the House is a proposed constitutional amendment which would permit states to apportion one house of a legislature on a basis other than population. The Rules Committee took the unusual step of taking the proposal away from the Judiciary Committee and sending it to the floor.

Two votes would be needed for it to clear the House—a majority vote approving the rule allowing its consideration, and a subsequent two-thirds vote to adopt the constitutional amendment proposal. If passed, it would also require a two-thirds approval in the Senate to be submitted for ratification by three-fourths of the states.

Dirksen, in pressing for a mandatory delay in court reapportionment actions, made it clear that his desire is to win time for adoption of a constitutional amendment that would forestall one man, one vote reapportionment.

Heavy absenteeism, as the congressional session encroached further on the election campaign season, made it increasingly difficult to predict votes on close issues. Two Senate sessions were forced to adjourn for lack of a quorum and leaders sent out emergency telegrams to summon absent members back to Washington for the apportionment showdown.

In other major action, the House voted $750 million in first-year appropriations to launch the anti-poverty program, beating down a Republican attempt to cut back the amount.

The funds are earmarked for youth job training in cities and conservation camps, federal grants to community-originated projects, basic education for adults, part-time jobs for needy college students and a variety of other measures to help America's poor.

In the same $999 million supplemental appropriations bill, the House provided funds to carry out the Civil Rights Act, to launch the mass transit program for relief of traffic-clogged metropolitan areas, to set up a large-scale food stamp program, and finance a major automation study.

An effort was expected to get the Senate to restore some funds cut by the House Appropriations Committee—including financing of the new Automation Commission, mass transit, and urban renewal.

There was still no sign of a break, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, in the House-Senate impasse over hospital care for the aged. Conferees were faced with the job of reconciling a House-passed bill boosting cash social security benefits 5 per cent and a Senate version combining a $7 monthly increase in benefits with a labor- and Administration-supported hospital and nursing home program for the elderly.

Goldwater Sets Midwestern Tour As Polls Reveal GOP Defections

Fresh from his second week of campaigning in the South, Sen. Barry Goldwater got set for a four-day "whistlestop" train journey beginning Sept. 28 to cities in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

For the Republican presidential nominee, the "whistlestop" approach was a radical change from his originally announced campaign strategy. It was interpreted by political reporters as arising from unfavorable voter surveys in the three big midwestern states once claimed as Goldwater "heartland."

Preference polls sponsored by Republican state leaders have revealed a substantial prospective defection from the Arizona senator in normally Republican areas and the survey results are paralleled by local newspaper polls with a history of accuracy.

Charles H. Percy, GOP candidate for governor, is rated as running far ahead of Goldwater in Illinois, although not necessarily far enough to defeat incumbent Democratic Gov. Otto Kerner.

Ohio Republicans are concentrating heavily on an effort to elect Rep. Robert Taft, Jr., son of the late senator, against incumbent Democratic Sen. Stephen Young. Goldwater's running-mate, Rep. William E. Miller, appeared before the recent one-day GOP state convention in Columbus, but neither he nor the senator was mentioned by name in Gov. John A. Rhodes' speech exhorting Republican troops to get busy.

High point in the Goldwater campaign was a filmed "conversation" with former Pres. Eisenhower at the latter's Gettysburg farm, which appeared on home television as a half-hour commercial paid for by the Republican Party.

'Tommyrot'

The senator won from Eisenhower a comment that it was "tommyrot" for the GOP candidates to be labeled as "warmongers." Replying to a question directly raised by Goldwater, the general observed that the senator had "been through one war" and "no man is going to be reckless about this."

Eisenhower also agreed with Goldwater that "moral leadership" was significant in the presidency. At no time did he directly or indirectly criticize Pres. Johnson or directly endorse Sen. Goldwater's candidacy.

Stumping in Texas and other southern states, the senator drew substantial crowds, and in a major speech to the American Legion convention in Dallas, he charged that Johnson defense policies were an invitation to "national suicide."

Smashing hardest at Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, he charged "mistake after mistake" in the Vietnam war and a "massive misevaluation" of Soviet intentions in Cuba.

Warns of 'Handouts'

The Administration proposes military spending cuts, the senator said, "to provide funds for sticking the government's fingers in a still-larger mess of pies—for handouts here, subsidies there."

In Charlotte, N. C., he accused the President of fearing to debate him. "He will not face the issues—he will not face me—he will not face you."

In a west Texas tour he accused the President of misusing tax files to get campaign contributors, saying he was "investigating" an alleged letter containing threats.

In a major Boston, Mass., speech he talked about the "breakdown of law and order."

"Our women are no longer safe in their homes, on our streets, in our parks," the senator said, and spoke an added sentence about "the bombing of churches and schools."

The President's spokesmen, he said, are "socialistic radicals . . . bosses of big cities, big unions, big business . . . bureaucratic lackeys." The Administration "is sick" and "refuses to see corruption when it stares them in the face."

"We can only conclude that scandal lurks everywhere in the darkened halls of the White House."

Miller, the candidate for vice president, heading west across the country, assured Idaho farmers that Goldwater would not "abolish farm programs," as the GOP candidate indicated in the past he recommended.

He left behind a charge of conflict of interest involving his directorship in Lockport Felt Co., drawing $7,500 a year, while fighting from the House floor legislation that the company opposed.

His reply was that he had never been a stockholder in Lockport Felt Co., although he did not deny that he had been assistant secretary and director of the firm.

Employ Handicap Week Started 20 Years Ago

The 20th anniversary of the first National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week is being observed in the first week of October, with organized labor playing the same major role it has carried out during two decades of active participation.

The original observance was the outgrowth of a joint congressional resolution, passed three years earlier, setting aside one week each year to pay tribute to the abilities of the physically handicapped. Its promoter was Paul A. Strachan, deaf representative of the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped.

Three years later, in the wartime summer of 1945, Senate and House unanimously passed a resolution calling on the President to issue a suitable proclamation each year naming the first week in October as National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week and urging leaders of all groups, including labor and management, to participate in its observance.

The former AFL and the former CIO joined wholeheartedly in the effort to make the first week the success it was, as did many other labor leaders. The first beneficial effect was a sharp jump in the number of job placements of workers who had suffered physical handicaps, including newly returned veterans, reversing a decline that had persisted for 13 months.

In 1947 Pres. Truman determined that a coordinating body could best direct a year-round informational and educational campaign, and established the volunteer President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

When the AFL-CIO merger was consummated in 1955, a feeling grew that organized labor should be represented at top levels of the committee. The White House then appointed Pres. Gordon Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers as its vice chairman.

A Labor Committee on which AFL-CIO staff members serve directs activities with respect to labor matters.

The AFL-CIO has contributed to the work of the committee many pamphlets and booklets for use as promotional material and, recently, the educational film, "They Have What It Takes."

Each year most state central bodies sponsor high school essay contests on problems of handicapped workers.

Rep. Norblad Dies After Heart Attack

Rep. Walter Norblad, 56, for 18 years a Republican member of the House from Oregon, died of a heart attack in Washington. As second-ranking GOP member of the Armed Services Committee he had been a critic of what he termed "waste" in the defense establishment.

With the recent death of Rep. John B. Bennett (R-Mich.), the House party lineup as adjourment neared was left at 254 Democrats, 176 Republicans and five vacancies.

Beverage Unions Give Flag to Boys Home

Cincinnati, O.—A flag that flew from the Capitol during the mourning period for the late Pres. John F. Kennedy is flying from a new flagpole at Sky Ranch for Boys, S. D.

The flag and the pole were gifts from unions affiliated with the National Coordinating Committee for the Beverage Industry, including the Hotel & Restaurant Workers, Brewery Workers, Plasterers and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Union Backing Mounts for LBJ Ticket

Executive boards of two more unions have voted unanimously to support the presidential ticket of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey.

The Operating Engineers board praised the endorsement of Johnson and Humphrey by the AFL-CIO General Board as best serving "the interests not only of the workers of America but of all Americans."

The Office Employes board made its first presidential endorsement in voting support for Johnson and Humphrey. OEIU Pres. Howard Coughlin termed Johnson "the only possible choice this year."

The election of Goldwater, he charged, "would extinguish the light of hope for every American who at some time may need disability or retirement benefits."

Still another declaration of support for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket came from the Indiana State AFL-CIO's COPE committee.

Campaign Sparked by 1-Day Tour

By John M. Barry

En Route with Johnson—New England gave a roaring welcome to Pres. Johnson as crowds in the hundreds of thousands lined streets and highways and packed city squares to hear the President stress his themes of "unity" and "responsibility" and hammer at his opposition as "reckless" and "heartless."

In a breathtaking one-day barnstorming tour of the six-state region, the President gave five scheduled addresses plus scores of impromptu speeches from an open limousine at crowded intersections.

Rhode Island State Police estimated that nearly half a million persons—well over half the state's population—greeted the President during his visit to address Brown University's bicentennial convocation at Providence. It took the President's motorcade an hour and a half to traverse the seven miles from the airport to the University, inching its way over the last mile through streets covered wall-to-wall with cheering people.

At his next stop, Hartford, Conn., Johnson spoke from the steps of the Hartford Times building to the largest crowd in the state's history, according to local officials.

The President was greeted by crowds of 15,000 to 20,000 at the Burlington, Vt., airport, and by upwards of 25,000 in Portland, Me.

Weather No Bar

Thousands of people waited nearly four hours in 48-degree weather on the streets of Manchester, N.H., to see the President, delayed by the enthusiasm of well-wishers at his previous stops. Johnson delivered a major foreign policy address to the New Hampshire Weekly Newspaper Association. (See story, Page 11.)

Johnson climaxed the whirlwind tour with an unscheduled stop at Boston for a midnight visit with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, at New England Baptist Hospital, where the youngest brother of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy is recovering from injuries suffered in a plane crash last June.

Finally, at 1:45 a.m., after leaving the hospital, he climbed to the top of his limousine to speak to several hundred Bostonians who had learned of his unexpected visit and gathered to see him.

'64 Job Gains Hold Firm, Figures Shift Seasonally

Joblessness Rate Stays At 5.2%

By Robert B. Cooney

The improved job picture of 1964 held steady in September as teenagers flocked back to school and caused about the expected decline in both employment and unemployment, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The key seasonally adjusted jobless rate, altered by a one-hundredth of 1 percent change, was rounded off at 5.2 percent—up from 5.1 percent in August. The actual change, considered insignificant by the experts, was from 5.14 percent to 5.15 percent.

The total unemployed dropped by 350,000 to 3.3 million, the lowest September total since 1959. So far in 1964, unemployment has averaged some 250,000 below the comparable period in 1963. Of the August-to-September decline, some 200,000 were jobless teenagers who returned to school.

Total employment fell as expected by 1.3 million to 70.8 million in September. About 1.7 million teenagers left summer jobs to return to school, counterbalanced in part by a job rise of nearly 500,000 among adult women, most of them teachers and other school employes.

McCarthyism Revived:

Personal Assault on Johnson Marks Goldwater Whistlestop

By Willard Shelton

En Route with Goldwater—Stung by unbroken reports that his campaign is lagging, Sen. Barry Goldwater added a direct "soft-on-communism" charge against Pres. Johnson as he whistle-stopped via railroad train through big midwestern states that before his nomination last July were among his centers of power.

At waystop after waystop through Ohio and Indiana, he hammered at his old charges about "crime in the streets" . . . the "arm-twisting, power-hungry President" . . . the "curious crew of camp followers" he attributes to Johnson, describing them as "socialistic radicals like Hubert Humphrey, bosses of big cities, big unions, big business," all of which he wrapped up as "leftists."

As he headed into normally Republican Illinois "downstate" areas, the "soft-on-communism" charge was his only new theme, but it came in the context of his most savage personal assaults of the campaign on the President's character.

The stepped-up intensity of fire was considered, speculatively, as a reaction by the Arizona senator to failure to sting Pres. Johnson into a partisan type of campaign. Johnson has ignored Goldwater's charges, making his speeches an appeal to reason and national unity rather than to "fear" and "division."

'Debate' Theme

Goldwater previously began hitting a "why won't the President debate?" theme, which also emerged when he found Johnson disdaining accusations.

The country has a new policy of "lie and lie, elect and elect," the GOP candidate said in Dayton, O. . . . "Do you want Lyndon's cronies appointed" to the Supreme Court? he asked in Chillicothe.

The President won't tell us anything, he said in Toledo and at half the whistle-stops, about why "youth festers in the streets." . . . Why federal power "increases" but the streets are not safe for "law and order."

The Cincinnati speech carrying the "soft-on-communism" charge—a reversion to the era of the late Sen. Joseph A. McCarthy of Wisconsin—was so brutally personal that the Republican presidential candidate refrained from using, before a roaring capacity crowd of 16,000, a sentence and a phrase appearing in the advance text, including an accusation involving

Meany Sees Goldwater Appealing to Discontent

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned it would be a "grave mistake" to assume that the outcome of the election is "inevitable" and attacked Sen. Barry Goldwater's appeal to "what he believes are underlying currents of disquiet among the American people" on the cold war, economic insecurity and civil rights.

In an editorial in the October issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine, Meany charged that Goldwater is seeking to "mobilize an army of discontent large enough to make him President."

This appeal will not work, the federation president affirmed in the editorial titled "A Truly Pivotal Election." (Partial text page 6.) He added:

"I have absolute confidence in the common sense of the American people. They know that problems cannot be wished away. They know that problems must be solved. And they also know that the present Administration and the program of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket intend to solve them."

America's workers will go to the polls on Nov. 3, he said, "in the greatest outpouring of voters in our history, to register their choice for leaders they trust and their disgust for politicians who would make this a fearful nation unwilling and unable to keep its rendezvous with destiny."

The trade union movement has

ILA Job Security Strike Draws Injunction Move

New York—Nearly 80,000 dockworkers struck over the issue of job security in U.S. ports from Maine to Texas as Pres. Johnson named an inquiry board to determine if the strike should be halted by an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction.

Refusal of shipping employers here to offer the kind of contract protection the men require against job-destroying automation was blamed for the walkout by Pres. Thomas W. "Teddy" Gleason of the Longshoremen.

"If they want automation, let them pay for it," Gleason said of the employers' insistence on cutting the size of work gangs without specific contract provisions spelling out workers' rights to protection against layoffs caused by the use of automated machinery on the docks.

The strike came when ILA contracts expired at midnight Sept. 30 without agreement on new terms. Named by Johnson to the inquiry board into the dispute was substantially the same three-man panel which has tried to settle the manpower dispute since the ILA's 1962-63 walkout over the same issue.

Herbert Schmertz, former general counsel of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, is panel chairman. The other members are Prof. James J. Healy of Harvard University's School of Business Administration and Theodore W. Kheel, professional arbiter, who had served on the mediating board wtih Assistant Labor Sec.

FIRST POLITICAL endorsement in the 75-year history of the Pressmen was made at the union's Washington convention after AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urged support for Pres. Johnson and Sen. Humphrey. Meany, left, is shown receiving an honorary delegate's badge from Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade.

Meany Asks All-Out Effort:

Pressmen Back LBJ-Humphrey In First Political Endorsement

By Gervase N. Love

If organized labor gets the votes it has into the ballot box on Election Day, "there will be no doubt as to the result," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the 75th anniversary convention of the Pressmen in Washington.

Shortly after Meany presented an appeal for support for the Democratic slate of Pres. Johnson and Sen. Humphrey, the Pressmen for the first time in the union's three-quarters of a century of existence, took a political stand and endorsed the two candidates with only two or three dissenting votes.

"Every single member of organized labor, every trade union official, every person in this room who believes in the forward progress of the American people has to get in this fight between now and election day," Meany declared.

He praised the record of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration, pointing out that the late Pres. Kennedy's inaugural pledge to move to an America stronger militarily, socially and economically "has been kept and we are on the move." In the 10 months Johnson has been in office, he added, "we can say that he is doing everything in his power to bring the Kennedy dream to reality."

The trade union movement today, he said, "is stronger than it has ever been in my lifetime and to my memory."

Advances Listed

"Our contracts are good," he detailed. "Pension and welfare plans have advanced. The people get more vacations, more holidays. More and more we have achieved the shorter workweek at the bargaining table.

"Legislatively we have seen a great deal of progress. . . . We haven't reached the millennium by any means, but we feel that the legislative record of this session of Congress drawing to a close is the best from the standpoint of labor since the days of Franklin Delano Roosevelt."

There is still one major problem —unemployment, he said.

Now the country faces an election, Meany went on, in which "we face the prospect for the first time of fighting off what you might term a real conservative threat."

"The people who are opposed to the things we represent now have one of America's major political parties," he said. "They have their candidate heading it up.

"Everything that we have achieved over the years and everything we hope to achieve in the future is at stake in this election. There can be no doubt what the election of Barry Goldwater would mean to the working men and women of this country. His record speaks for itself."

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz attacked Goldwater's record on three specific issues—employment, social security and education — using quotations from speeches and Goldwater's book, "The Conscience of a Conservative," to point up the great differences between the thinking of the rival candidates for the Presidency.

Of Goldwater's book he said:

"There is some question about the use of 'conscience' in this particular case. It's dangerous when you train your conscience to kiss you when it ought to bite you."

The GOP candidate's attitude toward jobs, social security and education, Wirtz said, give the voter a choice "between the whole meaning of freedom and the opposite of freedom."

"I don't understand why it is that everything proposed should be reversed," he added, "but I can only say if Mr. Goldwater wants to stop the world so that he can get off, he'd better jump, because we're not going to stop it."

Changing Status Cited

Pressmen's Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade in his keynote speech called upon the union, on its 75th anniversary, "to accept the challenge of the future with the same firm resolve as did our pioneer members." He compared the status of the union member today with what it was three-quarters of a century ago and declared that most of the gains were made by organized labor.

He reported 1,475 delegates representing 757 locals with a total membership of about 115,000.

DeAndrade, Sec.-Treas. Alexander J. Rohan and other international officers, elected by referendum vote several months ago, were installed for their new terms. Less than an hour later the union constitution was amended to provide that newly-elected international officers henceforth assume their posts on the first Monday in the June following the referendum.

Four veteran officers who retired recently were presented with plaques. They were former Vice Presidents Fred W. Maxted of Hamilton, Ont., a member of the union for 63 years, and Walter J. Turner of San Francisco; Sec.-Treas. John L. (Lou) McFadden of New York Local 2, a former trustee of the Pressmen's Home; and E. Curtis White of Phoenix, Ariz., whose 44 years as a trustee of the Technical Trade School constituted the longest service of any international officer in the union's history. A plaque was ordered sent to Walter E. Curran of New York, also a former trustee of the school, who was unable to attend the convention.

The delegates, after a full morning of discussion, adopted a recommendation of the board of directors discontinuing the Pension Trust Fund after January 1965 and directing that the $3.35 monthly payment become the property of the local. Applications for benefits will be terminated Jan. 1, and monthly benefits of $28.50 will be continued until the fund is exhausted.

URW Supports Johnson, Re-Elects Top Officers

Chicago—The Rubber Workers endorsed Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey for election, re-elected their top officers and voted down a 50-cents-a-month dues increase in the closing days of the URW's 24th convention here.

The resolution of support for the Democratic ticket was adopted unanimously by the 726 delegates. In backing the Johnson-Humphrey team, the union said both the candidates and the Democratic platform recognize and support the goals of organized labor.

URW Pres. George Burdon defeated Edward Hester of Denver, 1,309 to 325, for a third two-year term.

Vice Pres. Peter Bommarito and Sec.-Treas. Ike Gold were re-elected without opposition and the convention chose 16 international executive board members.

The delegates spent a large part of the convention discussing and voting on the dues increase, which was rejected by a vote of 879 to 744. To pass, the proposal needed 1,092 votes. Both the election of officers and voting on the dues raise was by secret ballot.

Half of the dues hike was to go back to local unions. Fifteen cents was slated for the strike and defense fund. Ten cents was to go into the international operating fund.

Salaries of the three executive officers, seven district directors and 72 field representatives were increased by voice vote. Burdon will now receive $18,060. Bommarito and Gold will receive $15,060 a year.

The convention directed the executive board and subordinate bodies to shun so-called "right-to-work" states when choosing sites for conventions and meetings. In other resolutions the delegates:

- Voiced strong opposition to extremists from the right and left.
- Pledged full support to implementation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.
- Urged Congress to support the "one man, one vote" ruling on state legislative apportionment.
- Called for passage of improved social security benefits and health care for the aged under the social security system.
- Supported expansion of the Accelerated Public Works program to create more jobs.
- Voted strong backing of the President's "war on poverty."

The convention also supported measures to protect consumer interests, called for repeal of Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act (which permits state "right-to-work" laws), urged Congress and the Administration to take action to reduce unemployment, and called on all local unions to activate strong political action committees.

Delegates dedicated a bronze plaque to Sherman Dalrymple, founding president of the URW, who died in 1962. The plaque will be placed in international headquarters in Akron, O.

A resolution paying tribute to the late Pres. John F. Kennedy said:

". . . We pause to reflect on the gift which John Fitzgerald Kennedy has bequeathed to us, vowing to pick up the banner which was so tragically wrested from his hands—and vowing that his vision, his compassion, his grace, his devotion to family and his understanding of the objectives of organized labor may light our way as trade unionists, as citizens, and as human beings."

Bricklayers Vote Fund Use For Organizing

Las Vegas, Nev.—Delegates to the 68th convention of the Bricklayers at their final session here authorized the international executive board to use up to $1 million from the defense fund to help locals organize non-union journeymen and contractors.

They acted after appeals for organizational efforts in the traditional non-union home building field by Pres. John J. Murphy and by Roger Whitlock, chairman of the Structural Clay Products Institute.

Murphy called on the delegates to "make the suburbs a part of our union-condition area and not festering areas of cut-throat competition."

Whitlock, spokesman for the country's 500 manufacturers of brick, noted that 66 percent of all brick made in the United States goes into home building.

Murphy, Sec. Thomas F. Murphy, Treas. George W. King and Vice Presidents William R. Conners, E. J. Gill, James F. McHugh, John Lodge, Dave Parks, Edgar E. Baker, Frank Smith, Robert Shepherd and John F. Tracy were unanimously re-elected.

In the only contest Vice Pres. Samuel Sasso of Windsor, Ont., turned back a challenge by Don Williams of Toronto, by a vote of 715 to 254. Pres. Emeritus Harry C. Bates, a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, administered the oath of obligation.

The major constitutional change the convention adopted was an increase in the maximum death benefit from $1,750 to $2,000.

Minnesota Convention Endorses Democrats

St. Paul, Minn.—Delegates to the Minnesota State AFL-CIO convention here listened politely to Republican congressional and senatorial candidates—and then voted by acclamation to endorse their Democratic opponents.

The convention also heard Pres. Johnson—by closed circuit television from Washington—and Minnesota's Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, and gave them cheering ovations and unanimous endorsements. Delegates applauded vigorously references to Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey as speakers voiced pride in the selection of Minnesota's senior senator as Johnson's running mate.

The GOP candidates were invited to speak in accordance with the traditional "equal time" policy of the state federation. But both the Republican candidates and their party's position on major issues were rejected as delegates adopted a program supporting AFL-CIO legislative goals nationally and urging state action to improve both unemployment and workmen's compensation.

The three top officers of the state federation—who have held office since the merged organization was established in 1956—were all re-elected.

Pres. Robert A. Olson won a new two-year term by defeating Bernie Simmer, Pulp-Sulphite Workers, by 545-170.

Exec. Vice Pres. Robert E. Hess and Sec.-Treas. Neil Sherburne were re-elected without opposition.

McCarthy, seeking a second term in the Senate, gave the convention a rousing keynote speech, contrasting the Democratic record in Congress and the accomplishments of the party's national candidates with the GOP platform and candidates.

Endorsed for re-election also were the four incumbent Democratic-Farmer-Labor congressmen: Joseph E. Karth, Donald M. Fraser, Alec G. Olson and John A. Blatnik. The convention also backed the candidacies of George P. Daley, Charles V. Simpson, Richard J. Parish and Ben M. Wichterman.

Meany Pledges Vietnam Labor Full Support

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has pledged the "active support" of the AFL-CIO to the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor in meeting the needs and objectives of Vietnamese workers.

The federation president cabled Tran-Quoc-Buu, president of the CVT, in reply to a request for AFL-CIO support for a CVT strike in Saigon Sept. 22. Meany's cable said he hoped the reported strike settlement "meets basic demands of workers" and that the employers will loyally carry out the agreement.

The CVT actions, Meany said respond to the needs of the Vietnamese workers "now struggling against totalitarian aggressors, misery and exploitation" and the action of the trade union group "demonstrates dedication to fight for democracy and against poverty."

The total involvement of the labor movement in South Vietnam "will assure mobilization of workers for active participation in leadership and responsibility for democratic society," Meany said. Such participation, he added, provides the best guarantee for "eventual victory over Communist aggressors."

The AFL-CIO president pledged to continue the federation's efforts to persuade the American and Vietnamese governments to support "this democratic policy" in the interests of victory.

UAW 'Vindicated':

NLRB Shift Orders Kohler to Rehire 57

The National Labor Relations Board, reconsidering a 1960 decision by order of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, has ruled that the Kohler Co. unlawfully forced the Auto Workers to strike the Wisconsin plumbing supplies firm in 1954 and must reinstate some 57 strike leaders with lost pay covering a period of nearly three years.

By a 4-1 vote the board ruled that Kohler brought on the 6.5-year strike by refusing to bargain in good faith with UAW Local 833. Altering a 1960 finding that 77 strike leaders were not entitled to reinstatement because of misconduct, the board ordered 57 reinstated but ruled against 17 others. Three more have died within the 10-year period.

In Detroit, UAW Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey said the order "completely vindicates" the union's position. The UAW, now negotiating a third contract with Kohler, hopes the decision will "further clear the air" and result in more harmonious relations with management, he declared.

The original NLRB decision was that the strike started as an economic strike but was converted by Kohler into an unfair labor practice strike when the firm on June 1, 1954, granted an unlawful wage increase to nonstrikers. Kohler originally was ordered to reinstate all 1,800 strikers who applied for reinstatement except 77 who were held responsible for misconduct.

In 1962 the D. C. Appeals Court enforced all the remedies ordered by the board and the Supreme Court refused Kohler's request for review. But the appeals judges remanded the case to the board for a balancing of the record of the 77 strike leaders against management's conduct.

In its study of the record, the board found Kohler had fought organizing attempts by any "outside" union for 20 years "with an unremitting union animus." Even when the UAW won an election and the firm signed a contract, Kohler "administered the contract in such a way as to deny its employes the benefits they had negotiated," the board said.

Failed to Bargain

In summary, the NLRB majority said the "totality of all the evidence" shows Kohler "failed and refused to bargain collectively with the union in good faith at all times" and that Kohler's unfair labor practices caused and prolonged the strike.

The walkout "came as no surprise" to the company, said the majority, because the firm had "persevered in a course of conduct calculated ultimately to destroy the union and had openly prepared watch towers and armed itself with an arsenal" for which there was "no possible justification."

Even after the strike began, the firm "continued to provoke the strikers by maintaining its blatantly illegal course of repeated violations" of the law, the majority concluded.

Member John H. Fanning concurred in and Member Boyd Leedom dissented from the majority opinion. Only Fanning and Leedom were members when the 1960 order was issued.

85-MEMBER Swedish trade union delegation, in the United States at its own expense to study American institutions first-hand, is welcomed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to an all-day program at the federation's headquarters. Seated at Meany's right is Arne Geijer, president of the Swedish trade union federation and of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

UTWA Urged To Redouble Drive in South

New York—Redoubled efforts to organize workers in the South, coupled with measures to resolve the effects of automation, are the only hope for saving the U.S. textile industry and stimulating its future growth, Pres. George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers told delegates at the closing session of the union's convention here.

The convention heard what Baldanzi termed "highly encouraging reports" on organizational gains in the South.

The UTWA approved some 20 resolutions, one of which called for the "unequivocal" endorsement of Lyndon B. Johnson for President.

The resolution noted that the union was supporting the Johnson ticket "in view of the stand the Republican standard bearers — Barry Goldwater and William Miller—have consistently adopted in the Senate and the House of Representatives, in unalterable opposition to welfare legislation and human rights, as well as their total disregard for the workers, the jobless, the poor, and the elderly, and in view of the dire peril" their election could pose to organized labor.

A resolution on automation called for creation of a technological clearing house, urged measures to promote economic growth, improvements in employment compensation, efforts to match workers and jobs, strenuous collective bargaining efforts.

UTWA delegates re-elected Baldanzi to a new four-year term as president and Francis Schaufenbil as secretary-treasurer.

Swedish Union Group Sees U.S. First-Hand

Eighty-five Swedish union leaders—including the top officers of the Swedish Confederation of Trade Unions and presidents of 12 of its major affiliates—are taking a searching look at America's labor movement, economy and politics.

Sweden's unions are financing the program, which bypasses governmental channels in a unique union-to-union visit. Although the delegation includes veteran observers of the American scene such as Arne Geijer, president of the Swedish labor federation and of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, most of its members are on their first visit to the United States.

In New York, first stop on the 18-day itinerary, the delegates saw the United Nations in action—and the World's Fair. They visited the Electchester housing project of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, saw a Broadway show—and talked about civil rights at the headquarters of the Sleeping Car Porters.

En route to Washington, they stopped off in Delaware to see the site of the first Swedish colonists in America.

AFL-CIO Program

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, and Intl. Affairs Dir. Jay Lovestone welcomed them to an all-day program at the federation's headquarters—a two-way exchange covering U.S. labor's goals and programs in legislation, political action and organizing, as well as international affairs.

Meany told the group of the double reason for the AFL-CIO's active role in working to strengthen the free trade union movement in every part of the world. It is "morally right," he said, and it is in the "self-interest" of American workers, because "any threat to free trade unions anywhere in the world is a threat to free trade unions everywhere."

Welcomed by Wirtz

At the Dept. of Labor, the delegates were welcomed and briefed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; Ass't Sec. Esther F. Peterson, the President's consumer affairs advisor, and top department officials in the employment, manpower and training fields.

The delegation then broke into 11 sub-groups for the direct union-to-union visitations which will bring participants to union halls, conventions, headquarters, factories and shops in various parts of the nation. So far as practicable, counterpart unions in the United States will be hosts to delegates from the same trade or industry.

On Oct. 5, from their scattered travels, the delegation will be reunited in Detroit, where a three-day program includes tours of auto plants and union halls, a lunch at Wayne University and a dinner at Solidarity House, the Auto Workers headquarters.

And then back to Sweden.

Trainmen Back LBJ, Eye New Pension Gains

Miami Beach—A supplementary pension to encourage early retirement of long-service employes will be a major goal of the Railroad Trainmen in the coming years, BRT Pres. Charles Luna assured 1,100 delegates at the opening of the brotherhood's 32d convention here.

Luna recommended an eight-point action program to the convention, which referred it to committee for later discussion. Then the delegates approved a motion to endorse the candidacy of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert Humphrey, his running-mate, and to urge all BRT members to work for their election in November.

The delegates, here from 49 states and Canada for a period of four to six weeks, also voted to contribute a day's delegate pay for the relief of members idled since January 1963 by a strike of other rail unionists against the Florida East Coast Railway.

The agenda includes election of 35 officers for four-year terms; constitutional revision to provide for changes required by the passage of a four-year accumulation since the last convention; appeals from decisions of lower union tribunals, and union policy in the fields of economics, political action and membership welfare.

Luna has been president since W. P. Kennedy, whose assistant he was, retired last year. At the opening session Sept. 28 he asked the convention to support these major union objectives:

- An adequate wage increase for all classes of service represented by the BRT.
- Longer vacations and improved holidays.
- Improvement of the expense-away-from-home rule.
- Establishment of "safe and adequate crew consist rules for road and yard service" immediately upon expiration of the two-year work rules settlement.
- Amendments to the Railway Labor Act for better protection of the rights of rail workers.

Luna recommended that the BRT intensify its program to counteract the effect of railroad managements' campaign to convince the public that rail workers are loafers and parasites "featherbedding" at the expense of the roads.

Praising Pres. Johnson for his role in the dispute over work rules, Luna said "the next chapter in the book belongs to us." He declared: "We will win improved contracts, wages and conditions. We will continue our efforts to modernize collective bargaining by conferences and by innovations of our own. We shall continue with an improved public relations program" to inform leaders of opinion about the real contributions of rail workers.

Union Rights Pledged in Connecticut Hospitals

Waterbury, Conn.—Gov. John N. Dempsey (D) has promised the Building Service Employes that he will urge the next session of the Connecticut Legislature to extend collective bargaining rights to hospital employes.

With this assurance in a telegram from the governor, BSEIU Local 531-A agreed to defer a scheduled strike at the state's Waterbury hospital.

Year-Long Job Gains Hold Steady, Jobless Rate Unchanged at 5.2%

risen about 1.3 million since September a year ago. Employment of men and women each rose a half million over the year, while teenage jobholders rose by 300,000.

Counted among the employed in September are some 2 million nonfarm workers on part-time for economic reasons. This is a drop of 250,000 since a year ago and the lowest figure for September since 1959—an improvement since these part-timers are classified as preferring full-time work.

At 5.2 percent, the September jobless rate is the lowest for the month since 1957, prior to the past two recessions. The jobless rate has ranged between 4.9 and 5.3 percent for the past 5 months —below the 5.7 and 5.6 percent annual averages for 1963 and 1962.

On selected jobless rates, the report showed the rate for adult men edging up over the month to 3.9 percent, still lower than a year earlier. The rate for adult men has averaged 3.8 percent since last March, lower than any time since the summer of 1957, the report noted.

The rate for married men—the key breadwinner group—also rose over the month to 2.9 percent. Since the married men's rate was up close to the 3 percent level of a year ago, it was regarded by Labor Dept. experts as "something to watch."

Teenage Jobless Down

The teenage jobless rate dropped from 15 percent in August to 14.2 percent in September. So far in 1964, the teenage rate has averaged 14.7 percent, down from the 15.5 percent for the same period last year.

The jobless rate for adult women was 5 percent, virtually unchanged from its level of the past 4 months, the report said. It was at its lowest point since the third quarter of 1960, the report added.

The longterm unemployed—those out of work 15 weeks or longer—was little changed from August. At 750,000, this group was down by 100,000 over the year. The report observed that this improvement was mainly among the long longterm jobless —those out of work 6 months or longer. This group totaled 400,000 in September.

The total labor force dropped by 1.6 million over the month to 76.9 million for September. This was viewed as about the normal change for this season.

On a more valid scale for measuring labor force changes, the 9-month average change shows a labor force gain of 1.3 million compared to the same period in 1963. The Labor Dept. said this is about 200,000 more than expected on the basis of its long-term projections.

CONFERENCE ROOM in the enlarged Philip Murray building, Washington headquarters of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, is dedicated to former Pres. John F. Kennedy by Mrs. Robert F. Kennedy, wife of the late President's brother. Mrs. Kennedy, shown with IUE Pres. James B. Carey hailed IUE members as "old friends of the President" who, she said, "believed strongly in the international labor movement."

IUE Convention Backs Trade with Safeguards

Support for the foreign trade policies of the organized labor movement and the reciprocal trade program of the U.S. government was reaffirmed by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in one of the final actions of the union's Washington, D. C. convention.

Delegates to the 11th IUE convention voiced their concern over the loss of jobs because of imports, particularly goods made in overseas plants by subsidiaries of U.S. electrical manufacturers. The assembly adopted a resolution declaring "clearly the export trade of the United States provides tens of thousands more jobs than imports eliminate."

Among the remedies recommended were steps to make the adjustment assistance program of the 1962 Trade Expansion Act work more effectively, and labor efforts to "bring the relief provisions of the act . . . into line with the needs" of workers affected by increasing imports.

The convention adjourned after five days of debate in which the delegates:

- Approved a four-point program to strengthen existing union units and a parallel program for volunteer organizing.
- Set new objectives in collective bargaining including an end to discrimination between hourly and salaried employes; expansion of employment to replace jobs lost through automation; training and job opportunities for workers; adequate leisure and income, and earlier retirement "on a decent income."
- "Enthusiastically endorsed" the Johnson-Humphrey "team" and pledged "our best efforts to help them win an overwhelming victory at the polls" Nov. 3.

Dues Change Defeated

The IUE constitution remained unchanged when the delegates in a rollcall vote defeated a proposal to change the dues structure by giving locals a choice — a percentage of gross weekly pay, or a per capita increase from 35 cents per member per month to $1 a month. The vote came on a motion to send the changes to membership referendum.

The convention sent to referendum an election contest between Pres. James B. Carey and Sec.-Treas. Paul Jennings of IUE Dist. 3, New York and New Jersey. Balloting will start after 40 days in the first contested race for the top office since the IUE's founding.

The election will be supervised and the ballots counted by five trustees, elected in a field of seven. The winners,, running as the "Carey slate," were Leo Smith of Jersey City, N. J., later elected chairman; Joseph Kelley, Philadelphia, Pa.; Thomas Flood, Mansfield, O.; Al Giordano, Camden, N. J., and M. V. Pinney, Oakville, Ontario.

All trustees but Pinney are incumbents. The losers, called the "Jennings slate," were William Lieberman, Springfield, Mass., and Vincent Vingle, Fairmont, W. Va.

Alaska Urges Drive to Build State Economy

Anchorage — Delegates to the Alaska State AFL-CIO convention here adopted a program calling for continued national progress under the Johnson Administration and a massive state effort to complete the rehabilitation of earthquake-torn communities and expand the state's economy.

On the political front, the convention pledged active support for the election of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket and for the re-election of Alaska's Rep. Ralph J. Rivers (D). Rivers is being opposed in the congressional race by Lowell Thomas, Jr., son of the newscaster.

The state federation re-elected its top officers, Pres. R. E. McFarland and Sec.-Treas. Lorena Showers. Henry Hedberg was reappointed legislative representative and COPE coordinator.

Delegates urged extension of the state public school system to include the first two years of college. They called for improvements in workmen's compensation to bring about speedier payment of claims, asked strengthening of the state's little Davis-Bacon Act to conform to improvements made in the federal law, reiterated opposition to "right-to-work" and to a state sales tax, and strongly endorsed hospital care under social security.

In Convention Resolution:

Steelworkers Ask Program For 'Total Job Security'

Atlantic City, N. J.—The broad outline of a new concept of "total job security" for workers making their careers in the steel industry was adopted by the Steelworkers convention here.

The 3,500 delegates unanimously approved a resolution laying down the principle that "when a Steelworker has invested his mind and body in the industry for a sufficient period of time to establish the fact that he is a permanent part of that industry, he is entitled to be fully protected for so long as he chooses to remain in it."

"We must establish that once a Steelworker has demonstrated his permanent attachment to the work force by investing himself in it," the resolution went on, "he is a career worker and that this entitles him to a permanent status and security not measured in hours, weeks or years.

"A Steelworker permanently attached to the work force has earned, through the years in which he has contributed his labor, his skills and his ability, assurance of an appropriate employment opportunity and income for the balance of his career, and an appropriate pension and medical care for the remainder of his life when that career is over."

A worker should have a permanent opportunity to work "to improve and apply his skills" so he may "reach his full potential" in his industry, the resolution declared. If advancing technology, slack periods, accident or disability interferes with his working, it maintained, he "has earned, through the contribution of his work, the right to a continuance of income."

Human Investments

Success—which Pres. David J. McDonald in his earlier keynote speech had warned would not come easily or quickly—will enable the union to "achieve completely," the resolution said, "the principle that industry has the responsibility for protecting and preserving its investments in human beings as well as its investments in machinery and equipment."

The delegates placed achievement of total job security "at the top of the union's bargaining agenda" and said they expected industry "to measure up to its responsibilities in this respect and join" in developing and implementing "a security program which will convert employment into a lifetime career opportunity for every member of our union."

An 11-page economic policy resolution geared to effectuate full employment and to meet the problems posed by automation rejected government attempts to tie wage increases to rises in productivity for the nation as a whole. It said:

"The effort to restrain wages by a single-factor formula of productivity growth holds a lid on purchasing power which is vitally needed to stimulate demand and encourage greater investment by expenditures by businessmen. Wages are an important source of consumer income, and consumer expenditures are a vital component of total spending."

The union called for a program of "investment in America" that included more federal housing programs, urban renewal developments, roads, hospitals and schools; double time for overtime and a cut in the workweek without a cut in pay; increased funds for area redevelopment; relocation allowances for workers and their families forced to move to new jobs; larger training allowances and more training programs for the unemployed, and federal unemployment compensation standards.

Some points in the economic program were duplicated in a 25-point federal legislative program highlighted by a demand for repeal of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts and a return to the principles of the Wagner Act, and a call for an "adequate medical aid" plan for the aged through social security.

Shorter Worktime Asked

Other elements included a shorter workweek with no reduction in take-home pay, federal aid to education, changes in procedures so the National Labor Relations Board can cut its backlog, surplus food for the needy, inclusion of fringe benefits in Walsh-Healey Act wage determinations and repeal of the Fulbright amendment to the act, expanded flood control and river valley programs on the TVA model, elimination of tax loopholes, federal unemployment compensation standards, a stand-by public works program to cope with recessions, compulsory disclosure of true interest rates, an attack on illiteracy, repeal of Senate Rule 22 permitting filibusters, renewal of the area redevelopment program and enactment of the Appalachia program.

A 16-point state legislative program included repeal of all so-called "right-to-work" laws, improved factory and mine safety laws, higher workmen's compensation and unemployment compensation benefits, repeal of restrictions on organizing and bargaining and prohibition of injunctions in labor disputes, enactment of state job bias bans, revision of tax laws so the burden "will not continue to fall unfairly" upon the lower income group, and extension and improvement of minimum wage laws.

A social welfare program calling for improved pensions and higher social security payments, with a lowering of the social security age to 60, also won convention approval.

Proposals from local unions for the next round of bargaining in basic steel, which begin early in 1965, were referred to the union's Wage Policy Committee and the executive board.

Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters in a speech declared that Sen. Goldwater, the Republican candidate for President, is appealing to bigotry and fishing for votes "in the white backlash waters of lawlessness in the streets."

'Backlash' Analyzed

He condemned the violence, but asserted that the "white backlash monster" had been conjured up to frighten white liberals and moderates. The backlash, he claimed, is "about as much fiction as fact." The problem in November is not so much to elect Pres. Johnson, he said, as to elect him "by such an avalanche of votes . . . as to bury Goldwaterism in the graveyard of political oblivion."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, Democratic vice presidential candidate, in a telephoned address, declared most Americans, Republicans and Democrats alike, favor "the goals of better paychecks and of sure and enduring peace.

"But not Sen. Goldwater," he added.

Administrator William L. Batt, Jr., of the Area Redevelopment Administration presented McDonald with a letter of recognition for his services and those of other USWA members in making the ARA program a success.

He also described some of the program's accomplishments, but warned that "we still have a war on poverty to win."

ILA Job Security Strike Draws Injunction Move

James J. Reynolds after Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) resigned because of his senatorial duties.

This was the sequence of events that brought the walkout, according to union sources:

ILA members voted down an employers' proposal for final and binding arbitration of the manpower issue, and authorized a walkout if one seemed necessary.

Kheel Plan Favored

The Reynolds panel, with Kheel making a minority report, then recommended a compromise settlement. Management offered to accept it but the union leaders said they preferred the Kheel proposal.

The majority recommendation was for wage increases of 10 cents in the first year of a four-year contract; raises of 12 cents in the third and fourth years, with 20 cents an hour going into pensions in the second contract year.

For those whose jobs were abolished by machinery, the majority suggested indemnity at 75 percent of the previous two years' earnings.

Kheel proposed a guarantee of 1,600 hours of work per year and other benefits, the ILA said.

"The employers wanted the right to put in automation that would have cut back even the production jobs," said Gleason. "They wanted the discretionary power to elminate jobs and even to force a cut in wages by leaving jobs open to competitive bidding."

The proposal of the employers, represented by the New York Shipping Association, was first rejected by union members because "they wouldn't tell us exactly what they wanted, and they didn't give us the security they promised us," Gleason said. He added:

"We won't sell the jobs of our members down the river. Being Longshoremen, we want to know where the i's are dotted and the t's are crossed."

No settlement of contract issues can be made, he declared, until the union negotiators know exactly what the employers are proposing and can offer it to ILA members as worth accepting.

Before the inquiry board here the union opposed the proposal for a court injunction, declaring the dispute would have to be settled by the process of collective bargaining.

The contract in dispute affects the port of New York directly but indirectly involves all ILA members in ports on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, from Searsport, Me., to Brownsville, Tex. The strike was joined by workers from all those ports. It did not involve Great Lakes or West Coast ports.

In Transportation Industry:

Apprentice Program Expansion Urged

New York—Representatives of labor and management gathered here at the first National Transportation Apprenticeship Conference to explore the problems, objectives and methods of apprenticeship training in the transportation industry.

Participants in the three-day meeting, coordinated by the U.S. Dept. of Labor, were welcomed at the opening session by James J. McFadden, acting commissioner of labor of New York City, and John P. Lomenzo, secretary of state for the State of New York.

John Harmon, director of manpower training for the U. S. Chamber of Commerce, and Vice Pres. George Watkins of the Machinists were the principal speakers at the session. Harmon urged a concentrated effort by labor and management to determine the needs which the apprenticeship program could best serve in each of the segments of the transportation industry.

Watkins told the conferees that to date no effective overall apprenticeship program has been evolved. He pointed out the necessity for an expanded and accelerated apprenticeship program as being in the national interest. Above all, he said, "there should be no discrimination in any apprenticeship program."

As part of the first day's program the conferees toured the Port of New York Authority's training facilities.

Panel discussions on the second day were devoted to training and apprenticeship problems peculiar to the transportation industry.

In a message to the conference, Pres. Johnson said the cooperation between labor and management the meeting demonstrated "the type of mutual effort in a common interest which has made and kept our country strong and progressive."

The President said the nation "is requiring increasingly greater numbers of highly trained men to keep pace with our rapidly expanding economy and changing technology. Apprenticeship is an excellent means for a young man to develop skills. As such, it makes a major contribution to our nation's industrial growth."

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, in another message, also called attention to the "rising need today for an expanded concept of apprenticeship in the United States."

"We must attract more of the talented young people of the nation to train for the skills that will help this nation to continue to grow," he said.

Chairman of the labor division of the conference is Vice Pres. J. W. Ramsey of the Machinists; the management division chairman is T. J. Riley, supervisor of maintenance skills training for the Port of New York Authority.

150,000 Workers Covered:

6 Rail Unions Win Job Security Pact

Six railroad shopcraft unions have won a two-year battle to gain a substantial measure of job protection for 150,000 workers on 147 major U.S. railroads.

The agreement, based on recommendations of a White House panel, was reached with the aid of the National Mediation Service. It cancels a strike call issued by the officers of the unions involved—the Boilermakers, Firemen & Oilers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Railway Carmen and Sheet Metal Workers.

Acting through the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept., union negotiators served a strike notice when 30 days of effort failed to produce an agreement in line with the recommendations of the presidential panel. Further negotiations resulted in settlement.

The parties agreed on a series of protective benefits for employes displaced or laid off under these circumstances: Changes due to automation or the contracting-out of work; abandonment or consolidation of rail services; transfer of work; lease or purchase of equipment to be operated by other than shopcraft workers; contract discontinuance.

The pact lists nine conditions under which workers may be terminated or transferred, but the railroad must give 60 days' advance notice if a job is to be abolished, 90 days if a worker is required to move his home. In either case, changes must be made in order of seniority.

Other provisions include:

- An employe shifted to a lesser job shall be given a displacement allowance to make up the loss in salary for a five-year period. If a worker is terminated, he will be entitled to 60 percent of his last year's pay for a period up to 60 months, depending on length of service after one year; or he may resign and take three months to a year's pay.
- An employe required to move by a change in railroad operations must be paid moving expenses, traveling and living expenses for himself and family, loss of wages or loss due to sale of his house below fair value, and loss due to lease cancellation.

The agreement also spells out conditions under which foremen may do mechanics' work; rules for work at outlying points, and performance of the work of coupling, inspecting and testing of air, signal and steam hose.

The parties agreed to set up a special board to adjust and decide disputes over job protection and subcontracting. Also they agreed on the term of the pact—Nov. 1, 1964, to Jan. 1, 1966.

COPE CAMPAIGN LITERATURE contrasting the positions of Pres. Johnson and Sen. Barry Goldwater on the key issues of the 1964 elections is now available in quantity free of charge from AFL-CIO state and city central bodies. COPE has prepared 11 new leaflets for the campaign, eight of which are pictured above. They deal with peace, jobs, "right-to-work," unions, Johnson-Goldwater quotes on 20 important issues, Goldwater's anti-union program, control of nuclear arms and other aspects of the pivotal 1964 elections. Not pictured are leaflets on the GOP candidate's voting record in the Senate and on the peace issue.

The Constitution Wins

A TREMENDOUSLY significant victory for constitutional government was won in the Senate after a six-week battle over reapportionment of state legislatures, a victory that will strengthen the nation's democratic roots.

The issue in the Senate was far greater than how and on what basis a state legislature is apportioned. When all the verbiage and arguments were pushed aside the issue was simply whether the Congress could in any way curb or interfere with or remove the U.S. Supreme Court's right to rule on whether a citizen's constitutional rights had been violated.

In its decision that the state legislatures must be apportioned on the principle of "one man, one vote" the court had ruled that any other basis of apportioning seats violated the rights of American citizens.

This decision was challenged in Congress in various forms, including the House-passed Tuck bill that would bar the court from handling reapportionment cases—in other words the right to fair representation that could not be tested in the courts.

In the Senate a proposal by Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.) would have interfered with the judicial process by requiring a mandatory delay of the reapportionment decision.

A group of liberals from both parties led the battle to defeat any legislation that would impair or interfere with the courts.

They won a resounding victory when the Senate finally voted for a "sense of Congress" resolution that asks the courts to give state legislatures a final opportunity to reapportion on equitable lines before stepping in to do the job in cases of recalcitrant legislative bodies.

The country owes a debt to the initially small band in the Senate that fought valiantly and successfully to protect and preserve the American system of full constitutional rights for all citizens.

No Greater Duty

THE 1964 presidential contest is, as AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany stresses in the adjoining columns "a truly pivotal election," and it may see for the first time in the nation's history two-thirds of persons of voting age casting ballots.

Participation in American elections has always been on the low side in comparison with other democratic nations. It was in 1928 that the percentage of persons of voting age casting ballots topped 50 percent. Since then the trend has been irregularly upward—in 1952 the figure was 62.2 percent, dropping to 59.9 in 1956 and moving up sharply to 63.8 in 1960.

There are of course millions of Americans who are barred from voting because of movement from one area to another, disqualification for a number of legal reasons, discrimination, and the inadequacy of ease in registration in many states. But the single largest problem is apathy, or a "let-George-do-it" attitude.

The 1964 election is a truly pivotal election and if the choice is to be meaningful to the future of the nation it must be made by the largest possible number of voters.

There is no greater obligation any working man, any trade union member, any American can have on Nov. 3 than casting a ballot.

Meany Looks at the Issues:

Clear-Cut Choice Faces Voters In 'Pivotal' Presidential Election

The following is excerpted from an editorial by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany appearing in the October 1964 issue of the American Federationist entitled "A Truly Pivotal Election."

AMERICANS WILL GO to the polls on Nov. 3 to choose a President and a Vice President, in what will be one of the few truly pivotal elections in the nation's history.

It will be pivotal because it does indeed offer a choice. The candidates of one party propose to continue and strengthen the 32-year partnership between the people and their government, a partnership dedicated to the ultimate achievement of the American dream of peace, freedom, prosperity and equal opportunity for all. The candidates of the other party call for a dissolution of that partnership, for a return to what they call "individualism" but which means the abdication by the federal government of its constitutional mandate to promote the general welfare.

But this election goes beyond domestic economic policy—far beyond it. The Republican convention, controlled by the backers of its eventual candidate, howled down the efforts of men like Governors Rockefeller and Scranton to inject a note of moderation into its platform. It refused to denounce extremists of the left and right—Communists and John Birchers. It refused to endorse continued control of atomic weapons by the President alone. It refused to call for enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the guarantee of American equality which a majority of Republicans in Congress helped to make possible.

Obviously this Republican convention paid little heed to the proposals offered by the AFL-CIO to both parties, in identical form. For the mood of this convention, and of its candidate, was not to build on the present, but rather to destroy it.

IN STRIKING CONTRAST, the Democratic convention took the opposite view, not only on the key issues just cited, but on virtually every other plank in the AFL-CIO legislative program.

Moreover, the Democratic candidates—Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey—have proved that they mean what their party platform says. They have proved it by their performance.

There is Lyndon Johnson's magnificent record of accomplishments in the 10 months since that horrible hour when an assassin's bullet thrust upon him the responsibilities of the Presidency. And there is Hubert Humphrey's outstanding 16-year career in the Senate, not only as a brilliant exponent of liberalism, but also as a leader with solid proposals to meet the nation's problems.

On the surface it would appear that the outcome of this election is inevitable.

Yet it would be a grave mistake to rely upon surface indications. Sen. Goldwater has based his campaign on what he believes are underlying currents of disquiet among the American people. They might be stated this way:

- The United States is the most powerful military force on earth; yet the cold war continues and American troops are engaged in deadly—and indecisive—combat half-way around the globe.
- America is the most prosperous nation the world has ever known; yet many of its people live in poverty and many more fear a tomorrow in which their skills may be obsolete and their security destroyed.
- Our country was founded on the principles of equality and justice; yet it has tolerated massive discrimination and injustice for millions of its citizens. Now, at long last, sensible safeguards for the rights of all have been written into law; but the law has left in its wake uneasiness and fear, as unreasoning as the prejudices which made the law mandatory.

It is to these sources of discontent that Sen. Goldwater has addressed his appeal.

He promises no solutions. He offers no program. He says only: I share your fears, your discontent, your unhappiness. Elect me, he says, and all will be well. The problems will vanish overnight and life will be simple and serene.

Will this appeal work? Can Sen. Goldwater mobilize an army of discontent large enough to make him President?

I think not, for I have absolute confidence in the common sense of the American people. They know that problems cannot be wished away. They know that problems must be solved. And they also know that the present Administration, and the program of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket, intends to solve them.

Yes, this election does indeed offer a choice, a clear and unmistakable choice.

Americans can choose men who stand for freedom, progress, decency, a continued drive for universal prosperity—men who pledge to the free world a mature leadership, neither fear-ridden nor trigger-happy.

Or they can choose men who preach only fear, who court the support of political extremists, who would return to the law of the jungle and who promise the free world neither help nor leadership.

The men and women of the trade union movement have made their choice—Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey.

They stand for freedom and progress. They approach the future determined, unafraid, confident in the true spirit of America.

And America's workers will go to the polls on Nov. 3, in the greatest outpouring of voters in our history, to register their choice for leaders they trust and their disgust for politicians who would make this a fearful nation, unwilling and unable to keep its rendezvous with destiny.

Morgan Says:

Warren Commission Unravels Twisted Life of Kennedy's Slayer

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

THE WARREN COMMISSION report is a mighty and invaluable document. Its sharp facts will not cut down all doubts, particularly of those still clinging, out of prejudice, calculation or innocent ignorance, to the theories of conspiracy. But it proves as clearly and completely as any investigation under the circumstances could that the conclusion most logical from the beginning was the correct one.

Morgan

There was no international plot. Pres. Kennedy was the victim of one man. The only conspiracy lurked in Lee Harvey Oswald's own dark mind. Unsurprisingly, not every single question could be answered. There were a few fuzzy areas. Not everything is known about Oswald's brief trip to Mexico, less than two months before the assassination. Not everything is known about his life during a little less than three unhappy years in the Soviet Union. But the astonishing wealth of material that the commission was able to produce in detail should down all major doubts of fair-minded persons. One of the most revealing sections of the report is an appendix which spends some 30 pages disposing of speculations and rumors.

On the positive side, the entire chapter devoted to Oswald's life, background and possible motives carefully develops a picture of a rejected, hostile individual capable of violence, thereby answering—as adequately as possible—the most critical question of all, once he was identified as the assassin: Why did he do it?

Because, in effect, this young man had declared war on society—every society in which he had lived, Communist or free, though he was still pursuing some Marxist Utopia of his own. The key conclusion of the commission's study of him was that "Oswald was profoundly alienated from the world in which he lived. His life was characterized by isolation, frustration and failure. . . . He was never satisfied with anything." His young Russian wife, Marina, thought he would not be happy anywhere, only, perhaps "on the moon."

WHAT HELPED TWIST his life? Where did danger signals show? His father died before Lee was born. His mother, with deep emotional and economic problems of her own, put him in an orphanage at age three for a year. His mother remarried, Lee became attached to his stepfather, then there was a stormy divorce. The boy was moved from city to city. His mother took him to New York when he was 12. Schoolmates in the Bronx teased him for his "western" clothes and Texas accent. The Oswalds lived for a time with Lee's half brother, John Pic. Once Lee allegedly threatened Pic's wife with a pocket knife. The incident obliged Oswald and his mother to move out. She worked. The boy shifted for himself in an empty house. He began to develop disciplinary, grade and truancy problems. The chief psychiatrist at a youth adjustment center found he had a "personality pattern disturbance with schizoid features," recommended treatment. His mother said he didn't need it. Lee told a doctor: "I don't want a friend . . . I don't like to talk to people . . . I dislike everybody."

Mother and son moved back to New Orleans, his birthplace, in 1954. There he was teased for his northern accent. He finished ninth grade, went to work, kept to himself, began to read Communist literature, finally was able to join the Marines—a cherished ambition—in 1956 as he turned 17. One Marine described him as the "frail puppy in the litter." He earned the nickname Ozzie Rabbit. But he resented authority, baited his superiors, was twice court-martialed, once for possessing an unauthorized pistol, then for an altercation with a sergeant. Oswald was a "loner," though another marine said he seemed "always striving for a relationship, but whenever he did . . . his general personality would alienate the group against him."

OSWALD DEMONSTRATED failure to adjust to any society. He hated his native land. He dreamed of the Marines as an escape, came to despise the service. In one of the great decisions of his life he tried to throw himself into the arms of communism, cut his wrist when Moscow refused to accept him. Even then he wrote his brother, "In the event of war I would kill any American who put on a uniform in defense of the American government." Later in bitterness he wrote, "The Soviets have committed crimes unsurpassed even by their capitalist counterparts. . . ."

Later he once contemplated hijacking an airplane to get to an imagined refuge in Cuba; came back from Mexico dejected over the Cubans' failure to give him instant welcome. On the very eve of Nov. 22 his wife rejected his plea to come live with him in Dallas.

Next day the 24-year-old man who seven months earlier had shot at rightwinger Gen. Walker, assassinated the President, murdered a policeman, tried to kill another while resisting arrest, gained NOT the immortality he had so pathetically sought but a place in infamy that history can never forget.

Washington Reports:

Military Effort Just One Aspect Of U. S. Assistance to Vietnam

THE UNITED STATES carries out many important tasks in Vietnam beyond its military activities, Under Sec. of State George W. Ball noted in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

Ball pointed out that U.S. economic assistance "to improve the level of life for the South Vietnamese people" has exceeded $2 billion in the last 10 years, and that U.S. Special Forces not only advise South Vietnamese troops and construct protected villages, but provide the people in these villages with civic, educational, sanitary and medical assistance.

He said that Australia, New Zealand, and other nations in the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO) are helping in various ways in Vietnam, but the United States is obliged to carry the bulk of the burden to help the South Vietnamese people keep their freedom and hold Communist aggression in check.

Ball said the United States welcomes French Pres. Charles de Gaulle's visit to Latin America. He recalled that French relations with that part of the world were once very close and said: "We think it can be very useful to have Europe, not only France, take an interest in Latin America."

He said that the U.S. intends to insist that the Soviet Union and other nations now in default in the United Nations carry out their obligations to share the cost of peace-keeping operations in the Near East and the Congo.

"This is not a fight, not a quarrel; it is a question of whether nations are going to abide by the charter," Ball asserted.

The problem will be faced by the UN when the assembly meets in November. The charter provides and the assembly has ruled that nations in default lose their membership.

ON THE CYPRUS DISPUTE, Ball maintained that "we have made an enormous and intense diplomatic effort to bring the governments and peoples involved to some kind of negotiated understanding."

He warned, however, that the situation threatens to blow up into a quarrel that could inflame the world beyond current involvement of Turkey and Greece—two U.S. allies "that together form the right flank, so to speak, of our NATO defense."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

EN ROUTE WITH GOLDWATER—On a Tuesday morning, five weeks before Election Day, Sen. Barry Goldwater plunged into the rich industrial and farm states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois hoping to bolster his fortunes with a five-day "whistle-stop" train tour.

It was a curious "whistle-stopper," an 18-car train winding up and down across the countryside, the Republican candidate resting himself between rather infrequent pauses for rear-platform speeches.

Only five times the first day, six times the second, did the "whistler" come to a halt to let the candidate address his supporters and enemies, both of them usually being present. Harry S. Truman used to make more speeches than that in a hard 14-hour day as he fought his way uphill in the 1948 battle with Thomas E. Dewey by carrying his message directly to the people, at crossroads and in market towns.

The Arizona senator in major set speeches added savage new phrases to his personal assault on Pres. Johnson, filing a "soft-on-communism" charge as he stepped up imputations of moral unfitness for leadership. In the rear-platform appearances he often seemed on the defensive, arguing that no one could possibly believe he was "against" social security or would endanger the peace.

He assured audiences that he had voted "for" every social security amendment that would "help" the system and "against" every one that would "hurt" it—a devious way of stating a record of voting against every expansion of the program to meet broader needs. He has children and grandchildren, and one war was enough for him, so certainly he wanted peace, he affirmed.

He had an answer, a quarter of a century late, on how we could have prevented World War II—by "staying strong" and warning Hitler that we would be on him if he touched "one square inch" of the territory of our "allies." We had no "allies" in 1939, being "neutralist" and "isolationist" instead and the isolationism being deeply ingrained in his Republican Party, which changed during and after the war.

It took policy fought for in the heat of events, even as late as 1941 when the war was two years old, to get Congress to continue a last-second Army buildup, and it carried by the margin of a single vote in the House. The past is not explained by oversimplifications uttered in a climate of opinion vastly changed by the war and the postwar period themselves.

THE CAMPAIGN TRAIN has one major advantage over the swift jet airplane Goldwater had previously used: he can get more state and local GOP dignitaries aboard hoping to spur enthusiasm for the top of the ticket.

In the Midwest as elsewhere, the statewide candidates are running ahead of Goldwater in the polls.

The candidates climbed aboard, but Gov. James A. Rhodes of Ohio introduced him at Chillicothe merely by saying Republicans were "loyal" and "support the man I now introduce to you." From the camp of Rep. Robert Taft, Jr., running for the Senate against Democratic incumbent Stephen M. Young, came the candid comment that Taft was sure he was doing better than Goldwater.

At some of the "whistle-stops" the trainside crowds seemed warmly receptive, at others there were savagely hostile signs and placards as well as friendly ones. The hostile ones hit the theme of nuclear war.

The general impression conveyed was that the GOP state organizations were intensely concerned to prevent a Goldwater defeat from dragging down other candidates. A veteran political reporter, long acquainted with Ohio's Gov. Rhodes, remarked that the governor didn't use a single adjective to praise the Arizona senator, not even a restrained adjective such as "sincere," "fearless," "fighting," or "candid." Rhodes is normally "not noted for reticence," he added.

THE U.S. IS IN VIETNAM because it has to be there to stop Communist attempts to control all Southeast Asia, Under Sec. of State George Ball (left) told Harry W. Flannery in an interview for the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Careful Shopping Can Produce Savings on Property Insurance

By Sidney Margolius

RECENTLY A FAMILY bought a house and arranged for property insurance from the company that had provided the mortgage. Later the family discovered it could buy the same insurance from another large company for 35 percent less. But with one pretext or another the mortgage company refused to accept the other firm's insurance. Finally it did agree to accept a policy from a third company that gave at least a discount of 10 percent from standard rates.

Many homeowners are in this position. They took out fire or other property insurance through a mortgage lender or real estate dealer without comparing rates. Sometimes they even bought insurance this way in the mistaken belief that they had to do so to get the mortgage. And because insurance payments often are lumped in with mortgage and tax payments, in a single monthly payment, families sometimes may not realize the full cost. Thus, many families pay more than necessary.

There are three major ways to save on property insurance. For one, many mutual companies and other rate-deviating insurors offer rebates or discounts. Another important saving is provided by the "homeowner" policies now available in most states.

There are several kinds of homeowner policies, but they usually combine a number of different types of coverage, formerly provided by separate policies, into one policy. Basically, fire, windstorm and other "extended coverage" is combined with burglary insurance and comprehensive personal liability insurance.

By combining these several kinds of insurance into one policy, the homeowner's policy provides broader protection at less cost than if you bought these policies separately. A number of insurance companies now also offer a "tenant's policy," similar to the homeowner policy but without the insurance on the dwelling itself.

There are several types of homeowner policies, called "A," "B" or "C," or as they are called in some states and by some companies, "1," "2" or "3." In the "Homeowner's A" policy, usually the contents of your home are insured at 40 percent of the insurance on the house itself. For example, if you carry $14,000 of insurance on your house, the contents automatically are insured for $5,600. The insurance covering "off-the-premises" losses is set at 5 percent; or, in this example, $700. The comprehensive personal liability insurance is set at $10,000 for damages arising from lawsuits because of injuries, and $250 for medical payments. Other coverages similarly are set at percentages of the insurance on the house.

THE THIRD important way to save is to take the largest "deductible" provision you feel safe with, and that your state laws permit. For example, various companies may permit you to buy a homeowner's policy in which you pay the first $50 or $100 of damage, or even the first $250.

For example, taking a $100-deductible policy instead of a full coverage can save as much as 25 percent of the cost of the homeowner insurance.

Most homeowner policies are bought for a three-year term. However, some companies now offer a "continuous" policy which is automatically renewed every year. This sometimes is less expensive than the three-year policy. But do not confuse the continuous policy with one-year policies which require the issuance of a new policy every year, and are the costliest way to buy property insurance.

Be careful about changing to another company before the end of your policy term. If you cancel, you don't get back a full rebate for the unexpired term, but only what is called a "short-rate" rebate.

While property values have risen in recent years, some homeowners may not have increased their insurance in proportion. A safe yardstick is to keep your home insured for at least 80 percent of its replacement value (not including the land).

Economy 'Dampened':

Joblessness' Impact Exceeds Its Numbers

LOS ANGELES—Unemployment has a dampening effect on the American economy far greater than the actual numbers of people out of work would indicate, a University of Michigan economist explained here.

Dr. Eva L. Mueller pointed out that national concern about work opportunities causes consumers to be cautious about spending and thus retards income and employment growth. She spoke to a section of the American Psychological Association.

Dr. Mueller, who participates in continuous studies of the national economy as a study director with the Survey Research Center of the U-M Institute for Social Research, said in summary:

"There is evidence of widespread concern about work opportunities among the American people. Worries stemming from the high unemployment rate are reinforced by reports and notions about the impact of automation. Analysis indicates that awareness of unsatisfactory employment conditions affects economic expectations. It also appears that the unfavorable impact on expectations is not limited to the relatively small group who have suffered unemployment or income declines in the past year."

She explained that whereas some 20 percent of family heads who are wage and salary earners have been unemployed at least once since 1960, a much larger group has expressed concern about job security or has had direct contact with the unemployed. Among families who have not had unemployment experience since 1960, more than one-fourth report such experience during the last few years among friends, neighbors, or relatives.

Economic expectations, which have been shown to exert a strong influence on the level of consumer demand, also depend on a large number of other environmental factors which are more or less important at different times, she pointed out. The cold war for example, in recent years has loomed large in the minds of consumers.

The effect of employment conditions on expectations is of major interest because of the demonstrated impact of consumers' expectations regarding business conditions on large discretionary expenditures, she said.

DR. MUELLER said that unemployment in America is seldom associated with real poverty, pointing out that in 1963 the average income of families with some unemployment experience was over $4,000. This figure even today in Europe would place a family in the middle or upper-middle income group.

"If there are any fears or uncertainties regarding one's economic status in this affluent society," she continued, "they concern primarily the adequacy of work opportunities. It is not difficult to understand that, whenever these uncertainties grow, many consumers, even those who are not unemployed, spend more cautiously and delay some postponable purchases.

"The dampening of consumer optimism as a result of our high level of unemployment imposes some cautions and restraint on consumer spending which, in turn, reduces the demand for labor.

"Perhaps we need a 'war on unemployment,' which is not the same thing as the President's 'war on poverty,' to overcome this impasse."

Significant Change Noted:

Plant Workers Closing 'Gap' On Number of Paid Holidays

Plant workers protected by union contracts are rapidly closing the paid holiday gap that once separated them from office workers, according to an analysis of the Labor Dept.'s recent Occupational Wage Survey.

They now average 7.1 paid holidays a year compared to 7.9 for office workers, the study showed. Paid holidays for hourly-rated workers were "quite rare" before World War II.

In a Collective Bargaining Report prepared for the current issue of the American Federationist by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, another study by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics also is analyzed and shows that of 1,698 collective bargaining agreements covering 1,000 or more workers, 1,513 pacts provide paid holidays.

Holiday clauses have undergone "significant changes in recent years," the article states as it notes these trends:

● "The number of paid holidays is increasing. In place of the six holidays with pay typical 10 years ago, most union agreements now provide at least seven. In addition, clauses calling for eight or more are now contained in about 40 percent of the major contracts.

● "New concepts on holiday provisions are emerging. They include paid holidays to provide long weekends in conjunction with traditional holidays, floating holidays and personal holidays such as birthdays.

● "Premium pay for work on holidays is being raised to triple time (holiday pay plus doubletime for hours worked)."

The major exception to the paid holiday practice is in the construction industry, the article notes — principally because employment is often seasonal and casual with workers shifting from one employer to another. But to meet the needs of the workers, it adds, unions and management have developed a "holiday fund."

Six holidays are almost universally recognized and paid for—New Year's Day, Memorial Day (except in the South), Independence Day, Labor Day, Thanksgiving and Christmas. Other holidays most often paid for, the studies show, are Washington's Birthday, Veterans' Day and Good Friday. Right behind them in popularity are Columbus Day and Lincoln's Birthday. Designated half-holidays most often are Election Day and the eve of either Christmas or New Year's Day. Other religious or regional holidays also are observed in some contracts.

"In selecting additional holidays," the article says, "some unions and employers have been choosing not another historic day but a day before or after a major traditional holiday so as to lengthen the traditional holiday period into a longer break from work. In other cases, additional holidays are being provided to celebrate dates of special personal value for the worker."

"Floating" holidays, another innovation still in the experimental stage, are not spelled out in a contract but are determined at the start of each calendar year—usually to provide a long holiday weekend, but often during a slack season or to mark a local or non-recurring occasion for celebration, AFL-CIO researchers point out.

More Ahead

"Improvements in holiday practice will continue to be a feature of collective bargaining in coming years," the article predicts.

"As automation makes it increasingly possible to produce more and more goods and services with fewer and fewer workers, the working lives of Americans will be shortened through a reduction in the standard workweek, longer vacations, earlier retirement—and more holidays.

"And along with the increase in the number of holidays there will undoubtedly be a further liberalization of pay for holidays worked, the choice of holidays and other related matters."

Schoemann On Vocational Advisory Unit

Peter T. Schoemann, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, has been named to a 15-man national advisory committee set up under the Vocational Education Act of 1963.

Anthony J. Celebrezze, secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare, announced the appointment along with the other members of the group, headed by Francis Keppel, U.S. Commissioner of Education. Also named from labor was Nelson Jack Edwards, international representative of the Auto Workers.

The committee represents labor, management, education, the general public and the Departments of Labor, Agriculture and Commerce. The committee is charged with advising Keppel in the preparation of general regulations and on policy matters.

Schoemann, an AFL-CIO vice president and chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee on Education, played a leading role in the studies and research that led to the formulation of the new act, which authorizes nearly $900 million for programs through 1968.

Social Security Benefits To Hit $16 Billion in '64

The social security system will pay out this year more than $16 billion in cash benefits to some 20 million elderly or disabled persons and their dependents and to the survivors of covered workers who have died, Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Anthony J. Celebrezze told the opening session of the Intl. Social Security Association's triennial meeting in Washington.

The meeting, held in the Intl. Conference Suite of the State Dept., drew more than 400 delegates from 89 countries. Most of them represented branches of government, the remainder private organizations including a number of trade union pension funds in other countries.

The association, which was founded in 1927 to promote the technical and administrative development of social security throughout the world, reported that 112 countries had social security programs of one kind or another at the start of 1964.

Celebrezze in his welcoming speech called the U.S. social security system "the mightiest bulwark of all against economic privation." It is being backstopped, he said, by a continuing effort to identify and remove the causes of dependency.

Harlan Cleveland, assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs, said that for most Americans "social security is settled policy and the problem is where do we go from here." This generation has in it within its power to "satisfy the basic material needs of all our people—for the first time in the history of mankind," he said, adding a prediction that the war on poverty will be won.

A feature was the dedication of the issuance of a Social Security Commemorative Postal Card by Postmaster-Gen. John A. Gronouski on Sept. 26, the 30th anniversary of Pres. Roosevelt's request to Congress for social security legislation, called "equal in import to the original Social Security Act."

Ray Munts, AFL-CIO assistant director of social security, was an observer at the meeting for the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Delegates were guests of the AFL-CIO on a boat trip down the Potomac River from Washington to Mt. Vernon.

NLRB Examiner Rules Ward Stores Unfair

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has ruled, after seven months of hearings in 30 U.S. cities, that Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc., instigated and carried out a premeditated program to force the Retail Clerks to accept an employe "benefit" plan or to have the union decertified as bargaining agent where it resisted.

The 800-store chain was successful in getting employes to accept its plan, called the "Three Giant Steps," at most RCIA union locations, but in the process it committed numerous unfair labor practices, said Examiner Thomas A. Ricci in recommending that the NLRB order the firm to stop its unlawful conduct and bargain with the union.

Ricci, summarizing 40,000 pages of testimony in a 102-page report, found that Ward "sold" its benefit plan to RCIA-represented employes by telling them, via a 40-page script prepared by the company labor relations office in Chicago, that only the RCIA had refused to accept it.

When an employe at meetings held on company time asked the obvious question: "How can we get the benefits?" the reply came, also from a prepared script, that they could have them by voting for them at "secret ballot" elections held subsequently in most RCIA stores.

Company Had Manual

The examiner ruled that Ward not only encouraged employes to drop out of the union but also told them how they could get the RCIA decertified and provided them with a "decertification brochure" prepared by Ward Labor Relations Dir. Richard Scheidt.

The unlawful conduct described in the report followed a top-level Ward decision to put a new employe-benefit plan into effect on June 1, 1963. The plan—a revised pension, insurance and stock-purchase program—was put into effect on the "target" date after a "teaser" campaign at non-union stores and stores where the unaffiliated Teamsters represented workers, Ricci declared.

But when the Retail Clerks failed to fall into line, Ward management then went over the heads of the RCIA by telling employes how they could get the benefits and also how they could get rid of the RCIA, the examiner found.

38 Stores Cited

He ruled that Ward broke the federal labor law by:

● Refusing to bargain collectively with RCIA local unions at 34 stores, and by "improperly coercing" employes to abandon the RCIA at four other stores.

● By offering and granting improved benefits to store employes to induce them to reject the RCIA as their bargaining agent.

● By polling and interrogating employes about their preference for or against union representation.

● By encouraging and assisting employes to circulate and file union decertification petitions, to discontinue paying union dues and to resign from the RCIA.

● By temporary layoffs of six employes who refused to reveal whether they had given statements to board agents, or to tell what the contents of such statements were.

The big retail chain not only broke the law by smashing the union at a number of locations, but unlawfully threatened witnesses and interfered with NLRB processes in defiance of the rights of the union and their employes, said the examiner in naming Scheidt and four other company lawyers as responsible for "pressuring" NLRB witnesses.

The ruling was hailed by the Retail Clerks as one which upheld the unfair practice charges filed July 12, 1963, by the RCIA on behalf of its Local 300 in LaGrange, Ill., and since that time by other complaining locals. The stores involved in the dispute were in Alaska, California, Colorado, Illinois, Kansas, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, New Mexico, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania and Washington.

7 CWA Pacts Give 62,000 Wage Hikes

The Communications Workers have won weekly pay raises ranging from $2 to $5 for some 62,000 employes of seven major Bell Telephone companies in contract wage reopeners. For several thousand members, upgradings will add up to $3 additional.

CWA spokesmen said the settlements followed the pattern set early in September for 15,000 workers at the Michigan Bell Telephone Co., usual pace-setter for the system.

The wage agreement includes an additional dollar-a-week added to the top pay scale of telephone operators in specific recognition, the union said, of job changes resulting from automation and technological developments.

Companies where wage agreements have been negotiated include Northwestern Bell, with 17,000 employes; Ohio Bell, with more than 15,000, and Illinois Bell, Wisconsin Bell, Chesapeake & Potomac of the District of Columbia, Chesapeake & Potomac of West Virginia, and Cincinnati & Suburban Bell.

Negotiations are currently under way in several other companies in what the union terms its "first cluster" of negotiations. Other series of contract reopeners will run through the winter.

Meany Warns On Election Complacency

made its choice, Meany continued —"Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey."

Comparing the approach of the two parties, Meany wrote:

"The candidates of one party propose to continue and strengthen the 32-year partnership between the people and their government, a partnership dedicated to the ultimate achievement of the American dream of peace, freedom, prosperity and equal opportunity for all. The candidates of the other party call for a dissolution of that partnership, for a return to what they call 'individualism' but which means the abdication by the federal government of its constitutional mandate to promote the general welfare."

The November election presents a clear and unmistakable choice, Meany wrote. "Americans can choose men who stand for freedom, progress, decency, a continued drive for universal prosperity—men who pledge to the free world a mature leadership, neither fear-ridden nor trigger-happy.

"Or they can choose men who preach only fear, who court the support of political extremists, who would return to the law of the jungle and who promise the free world neither help nor leadership."

BEST WISHES to the Teachers' organizing drive in the District of Columbia is extended by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey. The Democratic vice presidential nominee, a former teacher, is a member of the union. Goldwater's Tax Plan Seen Aiding Wealthy

The tax cut proposed by Sen. Barry Goldwater in a campaign speech would provide "great benefits for the wealthy and tiny benefits for those in the lower and middle income brackets," according to AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger.

Goldfinger said in a radio interview—on Labor News Conference—that he finds it hard to view the Republican nominee's plan to cut taxes 5 percent a year for five years as "a serious economic proposal."

It appeared to him, Goldfinger commented, more like "the proposal of a man who is running hard for the presidency against great odds."

Adding force to this impression, the AFL-CIO economic expert said, is the fact that Goldwater voted against the tax cut enacted last February. If a Democrat had proposed cutting taxes each year for the next five years, Goldfinger suggested, the proposal would certainly have been "very strongly denounced" by the Republicans.

Labor's view, he said, is that there should be greater government investment in such fields as education, housing and urban renewal "if we are going to improve public services and reduce joblessness."

It still may be possible, within that framework, he said, to reduce taxes next year or in 1966 but "in so doing, we think that excise taxes should be given first priority."

$40,000 Windfall

The first stage of Goldwater's tax proposal, the AFL-CIO spokesman observed, would mean a cut averaging about $10 a year for 40 percent of the nation's families—and a reduction of $40,000 a year for some 500 taxpayers with incomes over a million dollars.

Noting that the GOP nominee has proposed a large-scale cutback or abolition of federal programs in many areas, Goldfinger commented:

"If Sen. Goldwater's proposals were put into effect . . . there would be a substantial drop in purchasing power, a substantial drop in employment, and a very substantial rise in unemployment, spreading actual misery among thousands—perhaps hundreds of thousands — of American families."

In answer to other questions, Goldfinger said:

- Unemployment remains "America's Number One problem . . . despite the improvements of the past year." It's root, he said, has been a combination of spreading automation, a rising workforce, and an economy in which the level of production and sales has been inadequate.
- The recent auto industry contract settlements are not inflationary because "the auto companies have had fabulous profits" and "the rate of productivity increase in the auto industry is very sharp."
- The United States should not be satisfied with a small dip in unemployment. "The Europeans have achieved levels of unemployment of 1 and 2 percent. We certainly should be able to achieve full employment here in the United States."

AMA Drive 'Shocking,' Meany Tells Doctors

The current campaign of the American Medical Association against the King-Anderson bill to provide hospital care for the elderly under social security is "shocking," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the St. Luke's Physicians Guild of Washington.

Meany addressed the guild, an organization of Catholic physicians, on "American Labor and Its Relation to the Medical Profession." He made a clearcut distinction between the profession and the AMA.

"What is most distressful," he said, "is that in its campaign the AMA has shown a woeful disregard for the facts. . . .

"Organized labor has no objection to the AMA getting into any battles it wants. But is it asking too much that it fight these battles with hands as clean as a doctor's should be?"

The AFL-CIO president cited statements by AMA officials accusing labor leaders who support the King-Anderson bill of "wanting to sell out their members" and seeking to "protect gigantic union welfare funds." He pointed out that union welfare funds are protected by federal legislation for which organized labor worked.

"In this rather unfortunate dispute," he added, "we have shown patience. . . . "We have fought back fairly, and we will continue to do so."

'Best Way'

Meany told the physicians that labor became interested in hospitalization for senior citizens under the Social Security Act because of the concern expressed by union members. Hospital care for older people is an economic matter, he said, which is a problem not only to the elderly themselves but to their children or other relatives who might have to meet a financial burden.

"We feel the best way to meet this problem is through the social security system," he said. "It is an insurance system and we see no reason why it would not work with a small addition to the tax."

During a later question period Meany said he did not consider medical care insurance "properly an area of private enterprise." It is "something that should not be farmed out for private profit," he declared.

The AFL-CIO's support of the King-Anderson bill and the principle it includes, he said, is only one manifestation of a concern for workers beyond wages and working conditions that goes back to the time pioneer trade unions campaigned for free public schools. Many of the laws the country now takes for granted, he recalled, were put on the statute books over the vigorous opposition of some business and other groups—including the AMA's opposition to the original Social Security Act.

He urged the doctors to take a more active part in politics.

"If you try this," he concluded, "you'll see that life isn't quite what the AMA makes it seem to be."

L. A. Unionist Joins Job Equality Group

Pres. Johnson has appointed Exec. Sec. J. J. Rodriguez of Butchers Local 563, which covers Los Angeles County, as a member of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

Rodriguez, who lives in Monterey Park, has been executive secretary of the 3,000-member local since 1961 and has been active in labor and civic affairs, especially in the Mexican-American community. Other union officials on the President's Committee are AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers.

Lagging Campaign Reported:

Goldwater Smashes At LBJ Personally

Johnson's alleged use of power to acquire "a TV monopoly so that he may build a private fortune."

The language Goldwater spoke over statewide television nevertheless indicated the President as one who "doesn't understand the job," who "is not suited for the job."

Running a country means to the President, the Arizona senator charged, "twisting arms and banging heads . . . buying and bludgeoning votes . . . turning people into numbers and manipulating them with computers . . . craving and grasping for power" and "surrounding himself" with unsavory companions—socialists, bosses, crooks or alleged crooks.

A torrent of invective erupted again 36 hours later in Indianapolis, Ind., when Goldwater repeated the "soft on communism" theme, this time attributing it to both the President '(and his curious crew."

The President "shrinks", the GOP candidate charged, has has "no principles" for a domestic program or foreign policy.

'Golden Rule'

Moving out of Washington, Goldwater began slowly in his "whistle-stop" drive, appearing to like the people who greeted him, capable of rebuking and quieting somewhat hostile college students who carried anti-Goldwater signs.

He showed himself capable of combining a curiously blended speech on both domestic jobs and foreign aid with a last-minute appeal for living by the Golden Rule.

In exhortative moments at Marietta and Middletown, O., he said we ought to help people the "right way" and specifically he added regretfully that in 1956 we "unfortunately" did not go through with what he described as a "helping hand we had offered" the Hungarians, apparently a reference to failure by former Pres. Eisenhower to intervene in the Hungarian revolution in a way Goldwater left undescribed.

The mild moments were relatively few as he used his journey to reiterate charges that the Administration doesn't "understand" communism, "is losing" the cause of peace by "drift, deception, deceit."

Tax Cut Reiterated

He reverted in Toledo for the first time since Sept. 7 to his first specific economic proposal—a five-year total 25 percent tax cut which, he said, he could manage by "putting a ceiling" on spending.

This proposal, substantially one plugged for years by the National Association of Manufacturers, was long embodied in bills sponsored by Rep. A. Sydney Herlong (D-Fla.) and the late Rep. Howard Baker (R-Tenn.). It has never been seriously considered by the tax-writing committees of either Senate or House.

While Sen. Goldwater whistle-stopped, his vice-presidential running-mate, Rep. William E. Miller of New York, went into the prairie and mountain country before heading into Texas.

The Goldwater train experiment was to end when the candidate traveled by plane from East Coast to West Coast and back to Dallas the week beginning Oct. 3.

'Soft' Charge Laid To Nixon, Hoover

En Route with Goldwater —Former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon and the octogenarian former Pres. Herbert Hoover were revealed by Republican presidential candidate Barry M. Goldwater as advisers who counseled him to label Pres. Lyndon Johnson "soft on communism."

Goldwater at a press conference at Lima, O., indicated that he delayed repetition of the phrase for more than a day after using it in Ohio until he had a reading on the public reaction.

Shipbuilders Endorse Democratic Candidates

Miami Beach, Fla.—Delegates to the 22nd convention of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers were brought cheering to their feet when Pres. John J. Grogan read a letter from Pres. Johnson extending greetings and asking for "your continued support as we carry the battle to all fronts to guarantee all Americans of the opportunity to achieve their full potential in our changing society."

The delegates then saw an earlier filmed speech by the President in which Johnson declared that his Administration's immediate domestic goal "is jobs . . . five million more jobs, 75 million good, steady sure jobs in a strong, growing, thriving, bustling economy."

Formal unanimous endorsement by the convention of the President and his running mate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, immediately followed his address, and was greeted by roaring salvos of applause.

"A major factor in economic growth and in maintaining our national security at its present level is the strength of America's merchant fleet," the President said in his letter. "We want full employment in a full fleet that is fully competitive."

In a keynote speech, Grogan said the work famine which stalks the depressed private shipyard industry had been recently responsible for forever clanging shut the gates of five more facilities.

"At least 20 yards have been permanently closed since the end of the war. Only nine shipyards remain that are capable of building oceangoing vessels. This can only mean a disaster of the first magnitude to our country — now challenged by the vast Soviet Russian fleet expansion."

To keep the shipyards open, provide immediate job opportunities and insure retention of facilities and skilled personnel in the event of even a limited emergency, the convention urged:

- Replacement of the present merchant fleet at the rate of 60 ships per year.
- Allotment of sufficient Navy repair work to private repair yards to keep them in operation.
- Transportation of all government-aid cargoes on American flag ships.
- Strengthening of coastwise and intercoastal shipping and restoration of the American tramp fleet by means of government construction subsidies.
- Institution of a broader policy of constructing the advanced-design vessels in American yards to keep the technology of shipyard workers at peak.

Hits Dangerous Illusions:

President Outlines 4 Pillars of Peace

Manchester, N. H.—Pres. Johnson outlined "four great pillars of policy on which the house of peace must rest" as he delivered a major address on foreign relations to weekly newspaper editors here.

Against these principles, he said, are three "illusions" that form the philosophy of those "who seek to substitute a new structure . . . a dangerous, shaky and unsafe place."

U.S. foreign policy over the past 20 years, the President declared, "through change after change and crisis after crisis and convulsion after convulsion" has been based on its efforts to:

- "Persuade our adversaries that any attack upon us would immediately bring their own destruction . . . [through] the most powerful military force" in history.
- "Strengthen the independence of others . . . by helping others resist direct aggression, from Berlin to the island of Formosa . . . by working with others to fight indirect aggression from Vietnam to Venezuela," through the Peace Corps, the Alliance for Progress in Latin America and other aid.
- "Establish the rule of peaceful settlement in world affairs," through respect for the rule of law and wholehearted support of the United Nations.
- "Lessen the danger that nuclear weapons will destroy all mankind."

On the last point, the President cited the Baruch plan of former Pres. Truman, the "open skies" proposal of former Pres. Eisenhower, the test ban treaty and the "hot" line establishing immediate communications between the White House and the Kremlin.

"As long as I am your President," he declared, "I will propose new initiatives for effective arms control. I will try to reverse the arms race. I will try to lessen the tensions that endanger and imperil the world."

Johnson at this point made no mention of his Republican opponent, Sen. Barry Goldwater, but he charged that those who attack these policies hold illusions which, "if believed and followed, would put our freedom and the peace of the world in mortal peril."

The first of these illusions, he continued, is "that force or the threat of force can solve any problem."

Force could not rebuild Europe after World War II, the President said; "it took the vision and the statesmanship of the Marshall Plan." Force, he continued, will not take the place of the long-term Alliance for Progress in bringing economic gains to Latin America, nor will it end the arms race.

"We cannot coerce others to negotiate," he said. "We can't even compel them to be reasonable and wise. It takes skill and it takes patience, and it takes determination, and it takes a search for areas of common interest."

The second illusion, the President said, is "that the United States can demand resolution of all the world's problems and mash a button and get the job done." He cited the dispute between India and Pakistan, two friendly nations, and declared that while the United States is always ready to help and a peaceful solution would mean much to the freedom of Asia, "the responsibility of settlement must remain and should remain with these two nations involved."

The third illusion, Johnson went on, is "that we could, if only we tried hard enough, put an end to all difficulty and danger and then retire from the world."

"In the world, as in life itself," the President said, "there is really no escape from problems. You can't run away from them. . . . We can't abandon those who will not do exactly as we wish. . . . To do this, or to withdraw from the United Nations—and they have prevented almost 20 wars from getting started—to cast aside our commitments, would endanger freedom everywhere, and I think it would end the hope for peace, and it would certainly revive the fast fading communist hopes for world empire."

While the future will not be simple, he continued, "we are going to have victory."

"But," he said, "it is not going to be a swift victory. It is not going to be the victory of arms, and it is not going to be victory of the grave. Our victory will come over many years as people choose freedom, as nations grow up and become mature, and as they learn independence."

In his only mention of Sen. Goldwater by name thus far in the campaign, the President observed that certain persons have at various times suggested that the war in Vietnam be carried to North Vietnam. Among these he listed "Mr. Nixon, Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Scranton and Mr. Goldwater."

Johnson said he intended to exercise great caution before taking any step that might involve "American boys in a war in Asia with 700 million Chinese."

"So we are not going north and we are not going south," he declared. Instead, he said, the United States will continue to encourage the South Vietnamese "to save their own freedom with their own men, with our leadership and our officer direction and such equipment as we can furnish them."

Noting that 190 Americans so far have lost their lives in the Vietnamese fighting, the President said the casualties easily could reach 190,000 in the first month if the war were escalated.

Vast Crowds in New England Roar Enthusiastic Welcome to Johnson

Everywhere the President's party appeared, Mrs. Johnson, who joined her husband for the New England swing before taking off on a campaign tour of her own in the South, was acclaimed with the same enthusiasm accorded the President. Also in the Johnson party was AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan.

Meanwhile, Johnson's running mate as the vice presidential candidate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey (Minn.) was carrying the campaign into parts of the South considered strongly pro-Goldwater, defending his civil rights record but at the same time emphasizing economic and social issues important to the South which the Arizona senator opposes.

The President's speech at Brown University, which had conferred an honorary Doctor of Laws degree on him in 1959, was non-political, stressing the "partnership" of government and the universities and the goal of opening the doors of education beyond high school "to all young Americans, regardless of station. . . ."

From there on, however, the tone swiftly changed as Johnson turned to the political campaign with enthusiasm.

"Responsibility is the issue" in the campaign, he declared at Hartford. "Responsibility is the choice."

"The American people can choose," he continued, "to keep government that is responsible, like the kind of government you have had three and one-half years under Jack Kennedy and 10 months under Lyndon Johnson, or the American people can choose to change the government to a government that is reckless abroad and heartless at home."

'Captured' by a Faction

At Burlington, Johnson charged that the Republican Party has been "captured" by a faction of men "who stand outside the whole range of common agreement and common principles which have brought us to the summit of success."

These men, he charged without specifically naming his opponent, Sen. Barry Goldwater, "have not just marched out of step with American progress . . . They have refused and now refuse to march at all."

In an obvious reference to a Goldwater statement, the President observed:

"They have already said that their aim is not to pass laws, but to repeal them. Which laws do they mean? Do they mean the REA that has brought electricity to all the farm homes of America? Well, they will never repeal that, will they?"

The throng of Vermonters, many of whom rely on the Rural Electrification Administration to supply power for their farms and light for their homes, filled the air with a resounding "No."

Record Cited

Johnson then ran the list of major legislation opposed by Goldwater—minimum wage improvements, aid to higher education, the nuclear test ban treaty, the tax cut, old-age social security hospital care, and the war on poverty.

At Portland, he pledged:

- A "responsible" Administration that makes sure "you get full value for every dollar your government spends."
- A government "which will meet the challenges of the future without deserting the traditions of the past" and which will preserve the prosperity built "on a broad national agreement about the great goals and the great principles" of the nation.
- A government "devoted to equal opportunity for every section" of the country.

Throughout the tour, Johnson stressed repeatedly his striving to be "a President of all the people," not bound by narrow partisanship or sectionalism.

In the traditional GOP strongholds of Maine and Vermont, he made an open appeal for the votes of "responsible" Republicans.

He urged the election of the Democratic slates in each state, appearing on the platforms with Senators John O. Pastore and Claiborne Pell in Rhode Island, Thomas J. Dodd and Abraham A. Ribicoff in Connecticut, Edmund S. Muskie in Maine, Gov. John W. King and Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre in New Hampshire, Gov. Philip H. Hoff and Senate candidate Frederick J. Fayette in Vermont.

But he also had high praise for such New England Republicans as Sen. George D. Aiken and the late Sen. Warren Austin of Vermont and Sen. Margaret Chase Smith of Maine.

"I believe deeply in the Democratic Party," he declared, "but throughout my career I have worked closely and gained inspiration" from such Republicans.

Sees America Challenged

"There is a time for party and there is a place for partisanship," he said at Hartford. "But there are times in the history of a nation when higher values matter more than party, and there are greater issues than partisanship. . . . I believe that today is such a time in our national life. All that America is, and all that you want America to be, is challenged today by those who stand on the fringe."

He spoke of a "deep and abiding commitment to peace" within the American character and, in an oblique reference to the "crime in the streets" theme of Sen. Goldwater, observed that the Federal Bureau of Investigation is available to help state and local law enforcement authorities keep the peace.

But, he emphasized, it is not a "national police force . . . a gestapo that we can send into your town overnight."

He pledged his Administration's assistance to help "make our streets and our cities safer," but declared, "what we really want to do is to make all the streets in the world safer for all people."

Consumer Price Index Shows Drop in August

The Consumer Price Index declined by one-tenth of 1 percent in August, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Lower prices for fruits and vegetables were mainly responsible for the drop, the department said. Prices of women's apparel and autos also fell. But costs of homeownership went up.

The August decline—less than usual for that month—put the CPI at 108.2. This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $10.82.

At 108.2, the August CPI stands 1.0 percent higher than a year ago. The August decline thus held down the index to the lowest over-the-year increase so far this year.

In a companion report, the Labor Dept. said both the net spendable earnings or "take-home" pay and the purchasing power of factory workers had gained between July and August. Earnings were pushed up by a rise in the factory workweek while purchasing power was improved by the small drop in consumer prices.

Compared to August 1963, the take-home pay of factory production workers was up by 7 percent and their purchasing power was up by over 5.5 percent.

But the outlook for prices is upward.

"Chances are the index will go up again in September," according to Arnold Chase, Assistant Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

He said the prices of food, apparel and gasoline were expected to increase in September. New car prices are expected to continue to decline as inventories are cleared out.

In the August CPI, the seasonal increases in supplies of fruits and vegetables dropped that particular index by 4.1 percent, causing a three-tenths of 1 percent decline in the food category.

There were fluctuations in other items, but medical care costs continued to rise, mostly on the basis of further increases in doctors' and dentists' fees, the report noted.

The report on earnings said that the take-home pay—gross earnings minus federal income and social security deductions—averaged $92.26 a week for the production worker with three dependents and $84.48 for the worker without dependents.

In both cases, this was slightly up over July and 7 percent above August a year ago. The increase of $5.50 over the year reflected a 9-cent rise in hourly earnings, a slightly longer workweek and the cut in federal income taxes, the report added.

Pulp Vote Won By Splinter Group

Portland—A newly-formed unaffiliated union won bargaining rights for 21,000 workers at pulp and paper mills in Oregon, Washington and California, the National Labor Relations Board reported. The tally was 10,653 for the Association of Western Pulp & Paper Workers to 8,130 for the affiliated Pulp-Sulphite and Papermakers & Paperworkers unions. The dissident group, which broke away in a dispute over contract negotiations, won bargaining rights by 254 to 34 at the Ketchikan, Alaska, Pulp Co.

250,000 Out at GM:

Human Dignity Held Issue in Auto Strike

Detroit—More than 250,000 General Motors workers are on strike because GM "refuses to meet the minimum standards of human dignity and decency to which workers are entitled at their work place," the Auto Workers declared here.

"We shall work diligently to end the strike as quickly as possible," said UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther and Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock. But it will not be ended, they asserted, until the workers have assurances "they will be treated as human beings are entitled to be treated during the large part of their lives they spend in the corporation's plants."

The GM walkout, which started Sept. 25 at all plants except those making parts for other carmakers, is not about money. Committees representing 345,000 GM employes had reached agreement on wages and other economic benefits in line with those accepted earlier at Ford Motor and Chrysler Corp.

But failure of management to agree on working conditions and other non-economic issues triggered the walkout at the deadline set by the union after several extensions, the UAW reported.

The strike, said Reuther and Woodcock, "is about the use of human beings. It is a strike for decency and dignity on the job. It is the culmination of a long pent-up rebellion against the oppressive prison-like atmosphere that pervades many GM plants."

The reason for it is best illustrated, they continued, by the fact that the UAW found it necessary to propose, and the corporation almost immediately rejected, an amendment to the "management rights" section of the contract.

The amendment provided that both union and management "subscribe to the moral principle that the dignity and worth of the individual human person transcend all other values" and GM will "exercise its managerial authority in the light of that principle." Any failure to do so could be taken up by the union as a grievance, with the umpire obligated to consider whether the actions of the worker were "those that might reasonably be expected of normal human beings faced with" similar circumstances.

The UAW, its leaders said, "did everything possible to avoid this strike." It proposed both arbitration and mediation by Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. GM rejected both proposals, the UAW said.

In display ads printed Sept. 29 and 30 in 59 daily newspapers, the UAW said GM offered to meet contract terms which "contain the most attractive economic gains ever won by auto workers in a single set of negotiations," but workers rebelled against the "lack of human treatment" at GM. It listed these strike issues:

"Minimum safeguards of humane and decent working conditions; fair and reasonable production standards; sensible and enlightened disciplinary procedures; relief from excessive and arbitrary overtime work; adequate representation to insure enforcement of GM's contract obligations; improved job security."

Healthy Economy Termed Key To More Jobs for Nation's Youth

Programs to help prepare teen-agers for jobs can be fully successful only if there are more jobs to go around, AFL-CIO participants warned at a symposium sponsored by the National Committee on Employment of Youth.

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger termed the high rate of youth unemployment a "socially-dangerous aspect of the general high level of joblessness"—but a "symptom" of an economic illness rather than the ailment itself.

A similar point was made by Marvin Friedman, a federation economist, who said that school dropouts and other poorly-educated workers can be trained for a variety of semi-skilled occupations, "but because of economic slack there's not enough demand for such workers to absorb many of the unemployed."

In today's "loose" labor market, he said, employers are able to hire high school graduates and persons with qualifications above those actually needed to do the job simply because they are available.

Goldfinger and Friedman warned against moves to exempt teen-agers from minimum wage laws which might provide additional jobs for youth, but only at the expense of adult employment.

Federal Role Stressed

No "single-shot panacea" will provide the jobs the nation's economy needs, Goldfinger told the conference. But in the absence of a "vast" expansion in private industry, he said, "the cornerstone of job-creating economic expansion must be a sustained rise in government investment."

Public works, he pointed out, use relatively large amounts of materials and employ unskilled and semi-skilled workers. Thus "a massive effort in this area of improving public services could quickly reduce joblessness."

Along with job-creating public and private investment, Goldfinger said, there is a need to spread employment through "reduction of the amount of working time during a person's life—reduction of the standard workweek, later entry into the labor force through an extended period of education and vocational training, the opportunity for early retirement with adequate pensions, expanded vacations and sabbatical leaves."

A third labor representative among the symposium's panelists—Ben B. Seligman, education and research director of the Retail Clerks—said the "modest" rise in labor costs if a 35-hour week became the standard "could be absorbed quite easily" just as the economy took in stride all previous cuts in working hours.

Despite the stimulation of the economy by the tax cut, Seligman pointed out, the impact hasn't reached "footloose miners, unemployed packinghouse workers, displaced auto workers, laid-off railroad workers and all the others whose skills have suddenly become unnecessary and unwanted."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, in a major address to the conference, termed the nation's indifference to its youth "democracy's single most serious default."

"It is hard to understand how a nation gets so concerned about a hurricane hitting a coastal area, and then contemplates calmly a tidal wave of unprepared, untrained boys and girls sweeping into the labor market," Wirtz declared.

He suggested that "the surest single step that could be taken toward full employment . . . would be to provide more years of really free education to the boys and girls in this country who want and would use it."

Better Opportunity

They would have better opportunities, he pointed out, and would be removed, during their additional years in school, "from competition in a presently too loose labor market."

The estimated cost of building the school rooms the nation presently needs, Wirtz said, "is almost exactly the same as what we now spend each year for unemployment insurance benefits."

The future, the secretary of labor declared, may require a smaller portion of people's lives to be devoted to work and "a continuation of the historic trend" toward shorter hours and a shortened work life.

Conferees in Aged Care Deadlock, Appalachia Aid Bill Passes Senate

House and Senate conferees remained deadlocked—apparently hopelessly so—on the issue of hospital care for the aged through social security. Meanwhile adjournment pressures grew as a restive Congress longed openly for the campaign trail.

After a series of futile meetings, the conferees on social security legislation adjourned "subject to call."

The Senate-passed bill includes a hospital care plan as well as an increase in cash benefits, and Senate conferees refused to abandon it. The House bill has no hospital provision, and a majority of House conferees were unwilling to agree to one.

For a brief spell, hopes for a hospital care compromise had burned brightly. The chairman of the House conferees, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), dropped hints in a speech at Little Rock that he would not be averse to a contributory insurance fund—similar to but separate from the social security fund—which would provide hospital benefits at age 65. Such a plan was discussed by the conferees, but was apparently blocked by House rules prohibiting a conference report from including legislation not first passed by either the House or Senate.

Apart from hospital care, the biggest unresolved issue was the Administration's high-priority $1 billion program for relief and redevelopment of the 11-state Appalachia region. The Senate approved the program by an impressive 45-13 margin. House leaders, however, were hesitant to bring it up until they could count the votes for passage—and heavy election-season absenteeism made vote counting difficult.

After disposing of attempts to curb court powers to reapportion state legislatures on a one man, one vote basis, the Senate quickly approved a $3.3 billion foreign aid authorization bill. Completion of foreign aid action is expected quickly.

The Senate, on the heels of the Warren Commission report on the assassination of Pres. Kennedy, passed by a unanimous 65-0 vote a proposed constitutional amendment providing for the selection of a Vice President if the office were vacant. It would also authorize the Vice President to serve as Acting President if the President were unable to carry out the duties of the office.

To fill a vice presidential vacancy, the President would nominate a Vice President who would take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both houses of Congress.

The House, which has not held hearings on the issue, is not expected to act on the proposed amendment at this session.

In another area of proposed constitutional amendment — an attempt to void the one man, one vote principle by allowing one house of a legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population, the situation was this:

Supporters of the amendment had succeeded in getting it taken away from the Judiciary Committee and cleared for the floor by the Rules Committee. They could, if they wish, bring about a vote in the House—but passage would require a two-thirds majority. Thus far they have not moved to force a vote, which some observers regard as evidence that they lack the necessary two-thirds margin.

House and Senate conferees reached agreement on a bill continuing and expanding the National Defense Education Act and the aid to federally-impacted school districts program.

Major improvements, strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, included the following:

- The NDEA program, previously confined to science, mathematics and foreign languages, was enlarged to permit federal grants to improve the teaching of English, history, geography and civics.
- Impacted aid, based on grants to school districts where a significant number of students come from families of military or federal civilian employes, was extended for the first time to the District of Columbia.

A Republican move to recommit the bill, made by Rep. Charles E. Goodell (N. Y.), was beaten, 237-107. Final passage of the legislation appeared certain.

'LBJ-Humphrey Congress' Key '64 Issue, Says Meany

SEN. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democratic vice-presidential nominee, closes out a four-day California campaign tour by addressing a crowd of nearly 12,000 in the University of California's Greek Theater at Berkeley. The senator headed back into the Midwest for intensive campaigning.

Hails 'Impressive' Record of 88th

Election of a "Johnson-Humphrey Congress" in November to continue and expand the "remarkable" and "impressive" record of the 88th Congress has been given a top priority by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

"The 89th Congress must be a Johnson-Humphrey Congress in the sense that it shares the ideals and objectives of the presidential team," Meany wrote all AFL-CIO affiliates and state and city central bodies, stressing that its "unprecedented" record can be "attributed to the wise, prudent but forceful leadership exercised by Pres. Kennedy and Pres. Johnson."

This same strong executive leadership can be expected from the AFL-CIO-endorsed Johnson-Humphrey ticket which symbolizes "the partnership between the executive and legislative departments that made the record of the 88th Congress possible," he said.

If Johnson and Humphrey are to carry out their program, "the program we support, they must have a responsible Congress," Meany emphasized, "a Congress not only as good as the 88th, but better."

Check Record, Members Urged

The AFL-CIO president called on union members to check the record of the 88th Congress against the voting records of its members, distributed by COPE, and the record of unfinished business against the pledges of the candidates for the 89th Congress to make sure "that the candidates you support for Congress are on the side of peace and freedom, prosperity and progress."

Meany hailed the 88th Congress for its "unusual and historic contributions to the goal of a better society in America and to the cause of peace and freedom on earth."

The just-concluded Congress is "even more remarkable" than the Congresses during the first term

President Sees Vote As Pivotal

By Willard Shelton

The "solid structure" of American life "created by forward-looking men of both parties over 30 years" is at stake in this election, Pres. Johnson told the nation as he set the themes for the final weeks of his campaign.

"Few elections have presented —as this one does—a basic choice that involves fundamental principles," the President observed in a taped television appearance and in direct campaign speeches in Iowa, Illinois and Indiana.

The issue, he said, is "whether we will move forward by building" on the solid base created by both parties, or "will begin to tear down this structure and move in a radically different and—I believe—a deeply dangerous direction."

These were the issues, he said, that he would carry to "every section of the country" in the next few weeks.

The Administration, as it moved its campaign into high gear, was cheered by reports that the Republican nominee, Sen. Barry Goldwater, was trailing badly in most states, including both city and farm areas, but warned constantly

Goldwater 'Turns to Brass':

Johnson Gains Lead In Mountain States

Denver—The "golden glow for Goldwater" that one GOP Rocky Mountain senatorial aspirant hoped he saw developing in the early summer has turned into brass almost all along the Continental Divide a month before the election.

That's the consensus of polls, political reporters and those identified only as "longtime political observers" in this heartland of Barry Goldwater's pre-convention strength.

In the six states of New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Montana and Idaho the support of right-wing elements was converted into nearly solid Goldwater GOP convention ballots as delegation after delegation was bound irrevocably to the senator in San Francisco. Many such binding resolutions were won over the opposition of complacent regular Republican leaders whose party organizations were virtually taken over by the rightists.

'The Bomb' Scares Voters

In many instances both the scars of those intra-party GOP fights and the fact that the Goldwater supporters are more noisy than numerous are leaving great gaps in the senator's voting strength. Along the ridge of the Rockies there are two chief reasons why this is so.

First is the overriding issue of "the bomb." However much former Pres. Eisenhower says use of nuclear weapons should not be an issue in the campaign, in the minds of most people, particularly women, it is an issue of paramount significance.

Second is that despite the conservative voting history of these six Rocky Mountain states, or perhaps because of it, the radical nature of Goldwater's views is repugnant to many people of the area. He seems too impetuous, too precipitous to wary westerners whose own experience of a lifetime makes them chew over

COPE Rounds Out Campaign Leaflets

Two additional COPE pamphlets for the 1964 election campaign are now available from state and local central bodies, rounding out the 11 pamphlets prepared by the committee.

The new pamphlets, available free of charge, are "Goldwater vs. the People," the GOP candidate's voting record on key issues, and "What Do You Think?" a contrast on Goldwater and Johnson stands on three critical issues in the campaign—health care for the elderly, the poverty program and the test ban treaty.

Local Issues Stall Return In GM Plants

By Eugene A. Kelly

Detroit—General Motors Corp. has "vastly improved" its contract offer to the Auto Workers since a strike of UAW members began Sept. 25 but the 250,000 strikers will stay out until negotiations are completed on local plant issues, the union said here.

The parties reached tentative agreement on national contract terms Oct. 5 but only 19 of 130 local plant managements had come to terms with union bargaining committees in the first 13 days of the shutdown.

Working conditions were listed as the chief bone of contention—issues of "human dignity and decency," the union called them.

Chief feature of the national agreement is a $17 million fund to correct certain wage inequities at an early date. The fund is based on a payment of 2.5 cents an hour by GM, an offer made after the strike began, according to the UAW.

Key Benefits Won

The union listed these other newly won benefits:

- Eleven specific improvements in production standards terms—more than in the union's entire previous bargaining relationship with GM, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther declared.
- Rules for applying 36 minutes of relief time won for production-line workers in GM, Ford and Chrysler contracts — Ford and Chrysler settled in September but

Miller Strikebreaking Recalled by Workers

Buffalo, N. Y.—Rep. William E. Miller, the Republican vice presidential candidate, may be an utter stranger to most of the voters he meets on his campaign tours, but Auto Workers in the Buffalo area know him well.

UAW members at the Bell Aircraft plant here have lasting memories of Miller from the time he was getting his political start as Niagara County district attorney.

They remember him for carrying out a threat during a 1949 strike at Bell to jail pickets in wholesale lots under bail so high it would drain the union's treasury.

In 1949 the Taft-Hartley Act was just two years old and already a number of manufacturers were exploiting its provisions in efforts to oust the unions representing their employes. The formula followed by these managements was to provoke a strike by their workers, start a back-to-work movement, hire strikebreakers, then petition the National Labor Relations Board for a new election in which at that time—under Taft-Hartley—only the strikebreakers

Follow Armour Pattern:

2 Meat Unions Win Gains for 40,000

Chicago—Major gains in wages, working conditions and job protection have been won by two AFL-CIO unions for more than 40,000 meat industry workers in negotiations that are still continuing for other workers.

Terms paralleling the "master agreement" reached Sept. 2 by the Meat Cutters and Packinghouse Workers for 12,000 workers in 29 Armour & Co. plants have been won from several major firms.

A stalemate in negotiations at the Rath Packing Co. resulted in a strike by 4,000 UPWA members at five plants—the first in the current contract series.

The UPWA reported recent settlements with Swift & Co., Cudahy Packing Co. and Hygrade Food Products Co. The Meat Cutters have reached agreement at Swift's and John Morrell & Co., the latter in separate negotiations involving the former Peyton Packing Co. plant at El Paso, Tex.

The 1964 pattern settlements were for three-year agreements featuring wage boosts of 34 cents an hour, with almost 15 cents effective this year; improvements in pension, health and welfare benefits; maintenance of rates on changed jobs, and contract coverage for several new units.

Settlement with Swift was reached by the UPWA in a contract covering 10,000 workers at 17 full-line plants and at seven branch houses, the latter included under the master agreement for the first time. An additional 3,000 workers had been covered earlier.

More than 500 workers whose seniority had been endangered by long layoffs had their full rights restored, the UPWA said, when Swift management agreed to drop a "table of allowable breaks" in an employe's service record for computation of seniority.

A key issue in the negotiations, which proceeded to the edge of a strike deadline, involved the Swift plant at Wilson, N. C., where the base rate had been $1.52 an hour. Under the new pact the base rate goes immediately to $1.80 and then by steps to $2.11 an hour in March 1967. Workers there also won 30 cents an hour in fringe benefits never before experienced.

A new contract for 2,800 Cudahy employes provides the benefits won in the industry pattern settlement, plus a $1.25 weekly clothes allowance which UPWA Pres. Ralph Helstein said was the highest in the industry. Cudahy plants are at Omaha, Neb.; Wichita, Kan.; Denver; Salt Lake City; Los Angeles and Atlanta, Ga.

A pattern-type settlement with some local improvements also was negotiated by UPWA with Hygrade Packing for 2,500 workers.

The strike at Rath Packing affects plants in Waterloo, Ia., the largest single packing plant in the nation; and at Birmingham, Ala., Houston, Dallas, Tex., and Decatur, Ill. Issues in dispute include the contracting-out of work, the right to transfer to new company plants, and the right to strike over job loads.

Farm Machine Pacts Follow Auto Pattern

Chicago—Wage and pension improvements similar to those in auto industry contracts have been won by the Auto Workers for 58,000 employes of two big farm implement firms, Intl. Harvester Co. and Deere & Co.

Negotiations are continuing at other firms for the balance of the industry's 100,000 workers. UAW pacts with Caterpillar Tractor Co. and one plant of Oliver Corp., a White Motor Co. division, have been extended on a day-to-day basis. Some 22,000 workers are represented by the union at Caterpillar.

A UAW contract covering 13,000 Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co. workers has a Nov. 1 expiration date and talks there have not reached the critical stage, the union said.

Under the Harvester agreement, subject to membership vote, all affected workers—production, maintenance, office and clerical—will get wage hikes of at least 15 cents an hour over a three-year period; an extra week's vacation or time off for "compelling personal reasons"; company payment of medical service covering all "reasonable" bills; two additional paid holidays; pensions at $4.25 a month times years of service, with a supplemental allowance for those who retire after age 62 and before 65.

The Deere contract has similar wage and pension benefits and calls for supplemental pension payments for employes retiring at age 60. Other provisions call for improved life insurance coverage, higher pensions for dependents of employes, and fully-paid hospital and surgical insurance for retirees.

Labor Backs LBJ Ticket In Nebraska

Norfolk, Neb. — The Nebraska AFL-CIO at its state convention here warmly endorsed the Democratic slate of Pres. Johnson for re-election and Sen. Humphrey for vice president.

The vote came after Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state central bodies, urged a strong program of political education with emphasis on getting the vote to the polls on Election Day.

Other Endorsements

In other endorsements the delegates gave labor support to Gov. Frank B. Morrison (D) for re-election; William Sorenson (D), brother of former White House Aide Theodore C. Sorenson, for lieutenant-governor; Raymond W. Arndt (D) to run against incumbent Sen. Roman L. Hruska (R), and the Democratic candidates for the three congressional seats—Clair Callan in the 1st District; Richard Swenson, 2nd District, and William E. Colwell, 3rd District.

Fred Sorenson (D) was backed for state treasurer, with endorsement given Republican incumbents for three other state posts —Frank Marsh for secretary of state; Clarence Meyer for attorney-general and Raymond C. Johnson for auditor.

The convention voted an increase of 1.5 cents per month in the per capita tax, raising the total to 13 cents.

The delegates overwhelmingly supported national AFL-CIO policy on civil rights and considered some 35 additional resolutions, most of them dealing with state matters.

Assistant Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare James M. Quigley discussed the Social Security System at the convention banquet.

Rail Patrolmen Charter 3 Locals

New York—The Railway Patrolmen, meeting here at their 19th convention, approved the chartering of three new local unions in the Minneapolis area and reported on membership gains in two other areas.

Pres. William J. Ryan said the union has been certified as bargaining agent for members at the Portland, Ore., freight terminal, and on the Northern Pacific Railway.

Delegates from 35 local unions re-elected Ryan and Sec.-Treas. Cecil Smithson for another two-year term without opposition, and voted to hold the next convention in Cleveland.

At ILO Parley:

Worldwide Goals Set In Clothing Industry

Geneva—Elimination of home work and establishment of standard three-week paid vacations were among the goals fixed for clothing workers the world over at a conference held here by the Intl. Labor Organization.

Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers hailed the two-week session for the "spirit of compromise" shown by the government, labor and employer delegates of 20 countries.

Lazare Teper, research director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and Milton Fried, who holds the same post with the ACWA, rounded out the American labor delegation.

Commenting on the conference's accomplishments, Potofsky praised the unprecedented "co-operative response" shown by employers. This spirit, he said, demonstrated that the "clothing industry has emerged from the sweat shop into a civilized activity conscious of its social responsibilities."

The need to strike a balance between helping poorer countries to find export markets and preventing their exports from tearing down social gains in the industrialized nations was recognized by the conference.

Markets Held Necessary

Markets for their manufactured goods, including those of the clothing industry, are necessary for the developing countries in order to speed the improvement of their living standards, the conference noted.

The conference also stressed in its agreed conclusions that "every effort" should be made through accords between governments to prevent "disruptive effects of imports and exports of clothing on employment, conditions of work and production."

The American labor delegation pressed the adoption of a resolution denouncing the "unfair competition" from employers who use home work to evade decent standards for workers.

The conference recorded its desire to see home work in the clothing industry abolished "as a matter of principle."

It recognized, however, that some countries have not yet reached the stage of development where home work can be eliminated entirely at this time.

In such cases, the conference said, such work should be strictly regulated by governments in an effort to assure that the "labor conditions and social security standards of industrial home workers are, to the maximum possible extent, identical with those of factory workers."

The conference also called for the "progressive reduction" of the workweek to 40 hours wherever it was now at 48 hours or less. But "immediate steps" should be taken to fix the normal workweek at 48 hours wherever this figure was presently exceeded in the clothing industry, it was stated.

The conference said an annual vacation of three weeks "minimum" at regular pay rates "should be achieved in the near future." At the same time, however, it demanded that two weeks be accorded "immediately" wherever the annual vacation was less.

The conference prefaced its recommendations by stressing that it had no intention of excluding in any way the possibility of workers enjoying better standards than those it set.

Vancouver IBEW Sets Breakthrough in Hours

Vancouver, B. C.—Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 213 here has scored a first in the Canadian construction industry by negotiating a 37.5-hour workweek for about 800 members.

On top of this, the union negotiating team, led by Business Manager Art O'Keeffe, won pay boosts that will make the 800 wiremen the highest paid workmen in British Columbia's construction industry.

The shorter workweek is part of a new four-year agreement between Local 213 and the Electrical Contractors' Association, which represents 50 companies.

The wiremen employed by the association's member companies will work a 7.5-hour day beginning on Apr. 1, 1967. All other construction unions in Canada have an eight-hour day and a 40-hour workweek, according to O'Keeffe.

The contract provides for a 99-cent an hour pay boost in six steps over four years.

Pay Steps Listed

The pay steps are: July 15, 27 cents an hour plus 1 cent an hour paid by the employers into an industry promotion fund; Apr. 1, 1965, 17 cents an hour; Oct. 1, 1965, 10 cents an hour; Apr. 1, 1966, 17 cents an hour; Oct. 1, 1966, 10 cents an hour, and Apr. 1, 1967, 18 cents an hour.

The increases will boost the journeyman rate from the present $3.53 an hour to $4.52 in the fiscal year of the contract. General foremen, who are in the highest category, will rise from their present $4.28 an hour to $5.52. Cable splicer rises to $4.89 in the last year; cable splicing foreman goes to $5.47 an hour; a "B" foreman to $4.77 an hour and an "A" foreman to $5.02.

Wages for apprentices will range from $1.81 an hour for those in their first six months of apprenticeship to $3.84 for apprentices in their fourth and final year.

In addition, the wiremen's vacation pay will be increased to 6 percent and statutory holiday pay boosted to 4 percent on Apr. 1, 1967.

O'Keeffe described the settlement as "a major breakthrough" which will pave the way for other unions in the construction industry to duplicate and improve upon.

He commended the employers' association for an "enlightened and visionary approach" in accepting reduced working hours as inevitable in industry.

20-Year Drive Ends In Union Victory

Oklahoma City—Persistency paid off for the Packinghouse Workers here when employes of the big Wilson & Co. packing plant voted 518 to 397 to be represented by UPWA. Sixteen votes were challenged.

The plant had been a holdout against organization for nearly 20 years. UPWA and other unions were voted down in previous tries to organize the workers. The NLRB election here was the largest in which UPWA had been involved for several years.

Following Endorsement:

Johnson 'Drops In' To Thank Pressmen

By Gervase N. Love

Pres. Johnson paid a surprise visit to the 38th convention of the Pressmen in Washington to thank the delegates for having endorsed him and his running-mate, Sen. Humphrey.

"You have made me very proud, and I just wanted to come over here and thank you," he said after receiving a tumultuous greeting.

"I understand this is the first time you have endorsed a political candidate, and I hope you are endorsing a President. What the United States really needs is people who do something for the first time. Your action is more than a personal matter—it shows you realize that all the progress we've made over the years is at stake in November.

Full-Time President

"The Presidency is a full-time job and it doesn't leave much time to campaign. But it gives me great confidence to know that the members of this union stand for the same things I stand for."

He pledged to continue his fight for "a better U.S., for a better world, for peace on earth and good will toward men."

Earlier the delegates had heard Roy A. Roberts, chairman of the board of the Kansas City Star, tell why that staunchly Republican newspaper had endorsed Johnson—the first Democrat it has backed in a presidential election since it supported Pres. Grover Cleveland.

The reason, he said, was that "we felt our responsibility" based on three points. They were:

Peace: "You don't get peace and keep peace by being negative all the time. . . . You have to work for it. You can't get peace by saying 'no'."

Civil rights: If Sen. Goldwater were elected, "you would start right out with . . . chief support for the people who have been fighting integration. . . . You start with a wall of hatred."

Johnson: ". . . the record he had made [since Pres. Kennedy's assassination] . . . has been a most impressive one, an amazing one. . . . And if a man does a good job, he deserves a chance to carry on."

Pres. Paul L. Phillips of the Papermakers & Paperworkers, urging support for the Democratic candidates, warned that "there are some ideas in this presidential race that, if put into effect, not only would destroy unions and destroy jobs, but they would destroy people."

A resolution instructing the board of directors to continue exploration of merger possibilities with other unions in the paper and printing industries was endorsed.

The convention voted to retain $1 of the monthly per capita tax, allocated to the defense fund until the fund reaches a total of $2 million and to reinstate it whenever the fund drops below $1 million. Previously the determining points were $1 million and $500,000, respectively.

A proposal to give the printing specialty and paper products sector of the union a second vice president was approved after considerable discussion. A move to cut strike benefits from $50 weekly to $25 after the eighth week was beaten, with delegates in opposition citing long strikes such as those at the Kingsport, Tenn., Press, which started in March 1963, and on the Detroit newspapers, in its 14th week, as justification for continuing the full payment.

Union Label Speaker

Other speakers included Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Carl L. Geisler, vice president of the Marathon Corp., Menasha, Wis.; Miles P. Patrone, chairman of the Labor Relations Committee of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, and George Sheer, president of the Union Employers Section of the Printing Industry of America.

PRES. JOHNSON dropped in on the Pressmen's convention in Washington to thank the delegates for endorsing him and his running mate, Sen. Humphrey. Here he is being welcomed by Sec.-Treas. Alexander J. Rohan.

Income, Job Security Shipbuilders '65 Goals

Miami Beach, Fla.—The 22nd biennial convention of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers mandated union officers to chart a course in coming contract bargaining to assure the greatest possible income security and stabilized employment conditions for the membership.

The policy calls upon the officers—Pres. John J. Grogan, Vice Pres. Andrew A. Pettis and Sec.-Treas. Ross D. Blood—to work fo substantial increases in pension payments and earlier retirement, longer paid vacations, guaranteed annual wage plans or supplemental unemployment benefits as well as other improvements.

Since World War II, shipyard workers have suffered "wide fluctuations in the work load or joblessness from no work," a comprehensive 20-page report to the union delegates stated. The report charged both government agencies and Congress with scuttling the American merchant marine and abdicating responsibility in failing to build a modern naval fleet.

The delegates condemned government policy in giving licenses to American ship owners to transfer vessels to "runaway" dummy registry, under the "effective control" principle, to escape U.S. taxes, safety standards, working conditions and wages. They also decried the near-demise of the American coastal and intercoastal fleets.

They saw a growing menace in a Soviet Russian ship-construction crash program. Only immediate action to build 70 merchantmen annually and sufficient appropriations to rebuild the battlefleet, the delegates affirmed, could stave off a potential disaster, re-employ tens of thousands of jobless skilled shipworkers and utilize the 58 percent of privately owned shipyard capacity now idle.

Despite the state of the industry, the officers reported success in winning more adequate wages, improvement of fringe and welfare provisions and tighter job security in recent contracts.

They also voiced the conviction that the capture of Republican machinery by Sen. Barry Goldwater and the radical right presented organized labor with a threat of "emasculation and eventual destruction."

In unanimously adopted resolutions the delegates dedicated the union to vigorous efforts to elect Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and his running mate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, pledged all-out backing to the AFL-CIO's COPE program, and memorialized the late Pres. John F. Kennedy.

The convention endorsed social security hospital care, wider coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act, $2 an hour wage base, and a uniform minimum federal unemployment insurance benefit system. A statutory 35-hour workweek, double overtime pay and an accelerated federal state and local public works program were also urged on Congress to help solve chronic unemployment and to "overtake the nation's critical public service" shortages.

In other resolutions the delegates pledged support of the Civil Rights Act, urged legislation to outlaw interstate traffic in professional strikebreakers and condemned pernicious provisions of the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts.

President Calls on Illinois Labor For All-Out Effort on Nov. 3

Peoria, Ill.—Pres. Johnson asked 3,000 cheering delegates and visitors to the Illinois State AFL-CIO convention to "do it up brown" when they returned to their homes by putting the "Land of Lincoln" overwhelmingly behind the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

After drawing 25,000 to a rousing courthouse rally in downtown Peoria, the President had the representatives of 1 million Illinois AFL-CIO members roaring approval of his 13-minute defense of the liberal legislative record of his Administration.

He reminded the delegates that enthusiasm in the convention hall and the optimistic note of the polls were not enough to assure victory on Nov. 3. He recalled the 1948 election when the polls showed Gov. Thomas E. Dewey of New York far ahead in the campaign.

"Dewey thought he had everything 'done up brown' then," the President said. He recalled the "Dewey Defeats Truman" headline in the Chicago Tribune the morning after the 1948 election as one of his treasured memories of a long political career.

The delegates roared unanimous approval of a resolution to endorse the Democratic candidates for national office. Liberals in the area were given a lift by the sight of buttons and banners boosting Johnson in traditionally Republican territory.

Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom of the State AFL-CIO sounded the convention keynote in these terms: "Our best bet is to go to the polls on Nov. 3 and elect Lyndon B. Johnson as President of the United States."

Soderstrom called for the election of all liberals now in the House of Representatives. There are 12 Republicans and 11 Democrats in the Illinois delegation, with one vacancy.

Registration in Chicago closed Tuesday with an estimated net gain of over 250,000 new voters in a drive led by the AFL-CIO's COPE. Largest gains were in Negro wards. Chicago COPE has full-time offices operating in all 12 of the Cook County congressional districts.

Gov. Kerner Heard

Gov. Otto Kerner, seeking reelection, led the list of Democratic candidates for state office addressing the convention. All linked their campaigns to the Johnson-Humphrey slate, charging a "yes and no" aloofness to Charles Percy, Republican gubernatorial candidate, in his approach to the campaign of Sen. Barry Goldwater.

Kerner described the vain fight for a state minimum wage law, which was twice killed by the rural-dominated state senate and noted that Percy is opposed to a state minimum wage law. Illinois is the only northern industrial state without legal floors to wages and ceilings on hours for those workers not covered by the federal Fair Labor Standards Act, he said.

Kerner announced the appointment of Thomas Jackson of Peoria, sub-regional director of the Auto Workers, to head up the state's anti-poverty campaign.

Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), a delegate to the convention from Local 1 of the Teachers, called the past 13 months of congressional activity the most productive legislative period since the first term of Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

He said the nuclear test ban treaty, tax cut, Civil Rights Act, mass transit legislation, manpower development and training program and the anti-poverty program were the major gains on the legislative front during the Kennedy-Johnson Administration. The senator observed that these measures were approved with no help from his colleague from Arizona—Sen. Goldwater.

Wisconsin Labor Plans Election Role

Green Bay, Wis.—The largest convention in the history of the Wisconsin AFL-CIO convened here with 1,000 delegates participating in an all-out political program aimed at carrying the state for COPE-endorsed candidates in the November election.

Gov. John Reynolds, principal speaker at the opening session, lauded the delegates for what he termed the outstanding job being done by labor in Wisconsin and across the country. He predicted the state will go for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket and that state candidates will benefit greatly from labor's efforts.

Survival Doubted

"I honestly believe America could not survive four years of Barry Goldwater," Reynolds said. "His policies and principles are diametrically opposed to everything labor stands for."

In contrast, Reynolds recounted the accomplishments of Pres. Johnson in his 10 months in office and said:

"This most knowledgeable man will continue to work for programs and legislation which will benefit all who work for a living and certainly should be returned to office to accomplish this goal."

The convention adopted the report of its COPE committee and endorsed the following candidates: For governor, Reynolds (D); for lieutenant governor, Patrick Lucey (D); for attorney general, Bronson La Follette (D); for the House of Representatives, 1st District, Lynn Stalbaum (D); 2nd District, Robert Kastenmeir (D); 3rd District, Harold Ristow (D); 4th District, Henry Reuss (D); 5th District, Clement Zablocki (D); 6th District, John Race (D); 7th District, Thomas Martin (D); 8th District, Cletus J. Johnson (D); 9th District, James Buckley (D); 10th District, Alvin O'Konski (R).

Iowa AFL-CIO Cheers Speech By Humphrey

Davenport, Ia.—The Democratic Party is still the party of responsibility, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, Democratic candidate for vice president, told the Iowa AFL-CIO convention here.

Humphrey, who spoke on a nationwide radio and television hookup, stressed in his speech the long fight of labor and the Democrats for federal aid to education. The delegates gave him a long ovation.

Per Caps Raised

The convention, attended by 337 delegates, took no political action, as endorsements for Humphrey and Pres. Johnson for reelection were made at a recent State Committee on Political Education meeting.

The convention, after considerable debate, voted to raise the per capita tax from 10 cents to 15 cents per member per month. Salary increases of $500 each were approved for Pres. Charles L. Davis and Sec.-Treas. A. Jack Lewis, with further $500 raises on Oct. 1, 1965.

The convention banquet celebrated the raising of the final $30,000 for a swimming pool at the Des Moines camp of the Society for Crippled Children & Adults. Union members first raised $50,000 to buy the materials, then building tradesmen donated their spare time to do the actual work. The final $30,000 is for a cover. The completed project represents the equivalent of a $300,000 expenditure.

High Court Urged to Uphold NLRB On Rehiring of Darlington Workers

The Deering-Milliken textile chain had no right to liquidate the Darlington Mfg. Co. plant to avoid bargaining with a union or to punish its employes for voting union, the National Labor Relations Board said in a brief filed in the Supreme Court.

"It is difficult," the brief argued, "to think of any plainer—or harsher—form of coercion and restraint than closing down and dismissing all the employes in a unit" because they have "ventured to select a labor organization" as their bargaining representative.

The board asked the high court to reverse a ruling by the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at Richmond, Va., and to uphold a board order against Darlington, part of the vast Deering-Milliken chain owned by textile tycoon Roger Milliken and his family.

The 4th Circuit ruled 3-2 that an employer has an "absolute prerogative" to go out of business permanently and no court may tell him he cannot. This ruling, the AFL-CIO said in a "friend of the court" brief filed in August, "emasculates the language and policy" of the National Labor Relations Act.

It would be absurd, the federation said, to hold that a threat to close a plant if the union won an election is a law violation but that the actual closing is not. That's what Darlington did, said the labor brief, when it first threatened to close the Darlington, S. C., plant if the workers voted for the Textile Workers Union of America, and then ceased operations just before Christmas 1956, throwing 500 workers out of their jobs.

The NLRB brief, meeting a point cited by the appeals judges, said Darlington did not actually go out of business but simply liquidated one plant and transferred managerial employes to other plants, or put them on a preferential hiring list.

'No Obstacle' to Remedy

Whatever the facts may be where an employer liquidates his entire business, at Darlington there is "no serious obstacle to framing a fair and effective remedy where the same employer continues to operate other major units of the business," the NLRB said.

There is nothing in the law or its administration over 30 years, it continued, to justify the suggestion that an employer may "engage in anti-union discrimination, coercion and restraint."

The question here, it declared, is whether an employer commits an unfair labor practice if he liquidates one plant to frustrate union organization in that plant. Such action, it said, "conveys to the remaining employes in the other plants that they too" may lose their employment.

The board said its proposed remedy was a reasonable one under the circumstances. It directed Deering-Milliken to rehire the Darlington employes at its other mills or to put them on a preferential hiring list at those mills; to bargain with the union about the rehiring, and to reimburse Darlington workers for the wages they lost because of the firm's unlawful practices.

The 4th Circuit refused to enforce the board's order as to rehiring, bargaining and lost wages.

Farm Leader, Builder Hit 'Work' Law Threat

Two prominent Pennsylvanians have warned businessmen, workers and farmers that they have a common foe in right-wing extremists who are advocating enactment of so-called "right-to-work" laws.

John B. Kelly, Jr., Philadelphia builder, declared that such laws create "chaos" in industry, jeopardize quality and threaten safety.

Robert W. Harwood of Wattsburg, president of the Pennsylvania Dairyman's League and of the Pennsylvania Potato Growers' Association, charged that attempts by ultra-conservatives to destroy labor-management relations are directed by the same propaganda groups that are attacking farmers' co-ops and rural electrification.

The statements of both were released through the National Council for Industrial Peace, the citizens' group set up to oppose legislation forbidding union shop agreements.

Brother of Princess

Kelly, who is the brother of Princess Grace of Monaco, said his firm has agreements with a great many "reasonable and responsible" unions throughout the eastern states. So-called "right-to-work" laws, he stressed, would undermine these unions—to the disadvantage of all concerned.

"We occasionally have to compete against non-union contractors," Kelly said, "where very few, if any, benefits go to the workers. The contractors who do this type of work observe very few safety regulations and cut every possible corner.

"I feel that if non-union work in this area, or any other area, becomes prevalent, it will create chaos and force union contractors to compromise their standards"

Harwood, who also is president of the Erie County (Pa.) Farmers Union, declared that family farmers and wage-earners in industry "are being assaulted by the same special interest groups" directed by or allied with reactionary elements of big business.

Joint Defense Urged

He urged both workers and farmers to defend their rights in the presidential election if they are to preserve their collective bargaining structure and their farm co-ops against "highly-organized and continuous assaults." They have "a common interest in protecting each other against a common enemy," he said.

Sen. Goldwater, Republican candidate for President, has backed enactment of so-called "right-to-work" laws, abolition of the Rural Electrification Administration and sale of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The extremists really are mounting two attacks against the farmer, Harwood charged. Not only are they attempting to wreck rural electrification and "trying to lobby Congress into taxing farmer cooperatives to death," he said, but "they want to cut the purchasing power of the farmers' best customer — the city wage earner."

"They want to destroy collective bargaining so they can slash wages and hire cheap labor," he declared. "If the city worker gets less, so will the farmer."

Parley Sets Goals:

Bottle Blowers Bid For Job Protection

Pittsburgh—A guarantee of 26 to 48 weeks of work a year and other job-strengthening measures will be sought by the Glass Bottle Blowers in forthcoming negotiations affecting nearly 70,000 workers in the glass container, fiber glass and blown plastics industries.

Key goals of the union were targeted at a recent meeting of 236 local union presidents, called by GBBA Pres. Lee W. Minton to sit as a contract policy conference during negotiations.

The conference, Minton said, authorized the top officers to seek an early start of negotiations with a 25-company employers' group, and to present proposals seeking:

- A substantial increase in hourly pay.
- A $2 minimum wage per hour in the industry.
- Addition of incentive pay, now ranging from 15 to 25 percent of base pay, to the permanent base.
- A stronger transfer clause to permit a laid-off worker to qualify for a job elsewhere in the industry with no loss of pension benefits.
- A raise in pension benefits from the current $2.50 a month, times years of service, to $5 a month for those retiring at 60 and $4 when the retiree becomes eligible for social security benefits.

The union wants guarantees of work weeks based on a worker's seniority in order to spread work more equitably and avoid unnecessary overtime. Also it will ask that employer contributions to life insurance and major medical benefits be increased from 1.5 cents an hour for retirees to 3 cents, with one industrywide fund instead of separate company funds.

The conference agreed, Minton said, on the need for strengthened job security in the face of job-displacing machinery, plant mergers and closings, and the increasing threat of absentee ownership.

The Pittsburgh conference was the first gathering of all local union officers since industrywide agreements were signed early in 1962, said Minton. He added:

"Union conferees thought there was a clear understanding in 1962 that a joint fund would be set up to administer life and medical insurance for retirees.

Disappointment on Insurance

"We have set up a joint fund with one firm, not covered by the industrywide contract. But the fund with firms represented by the Glass Container Manufacturers' Institute has not materialized, due to the position of management. Many local union leaders expressed concern over that issue."

The policy conference adopted its goals in full knowledge that the glass container industry is "enjoying one of its best years," as Minton put it.

Employers in the institute produce 95 percent of all glass containers in the nation. Contracts covering their 38,000 workers expire Jan. 31. Another pact covering about 8,000 machine operators and others expires Feb. 28. Contracts covering an additional 30,000 workers usually follow the pattern set by the major firms, the union said.

Local Disputes Stall Return at GM Plants

all the terms were not as specific, the union said.

- An earlier effective date for improvements in hospital, medical and surgical insurance.
- A provision that a disciplined worker shall be notified in writing of the reason for discipline before he leaves the plant.

Reuther said the new contract contains "meaningful improvement" in working conditions. Among them are these:

- Committemen will be allowed 12,000 additional hours of time a week to police the contract and prevent violations. An additional 20,000 hours a week may be used by district committeemen for specific functions not previously provided.
- Management has agreed to consider an individual worker's request for relief from overtime. Once approved, the permission cannot be withdrawn.
- Premium pay will be given for the sixth and seventh workday in a workweek.
- Procedures governing apprentices and skilled trades are improved.
- Better vacation pay allowances and vacation time off procedures are provided for.
- Higher jury duty pay and protection against contracting-out of specified work were agreed to

Other features of the agreement are similar, the UAW said, to those at Ford and Chrysler—wage boosts, two more paid holidays, pension improvements and early retirement with supplemental pay.

Dir. Douglas A. Fraser of the union's Chrysler Dept. meanwhile notified Chrysler that the agreement reached Sept. 9 has been ratified by 36 of the 40 affected locals, with two rejecting the agreement and two still to vote.

The national Ford agreement has been approved by some locals but a number have not completed local agreements.

Contracts talks with American Motors were broken off but were expected to be resumed soon. The union said management did not offer to meet the industry "pattern" and has proposed that many fringe benefits be paid for out of the UAW-AMC "profit-sharing" plan. This may "overload" the plan and endanger it, the UAW fears.

IUE Wins Gains For 25,000 at GM

Detroit—Gains won by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in a new national contract covering 25,000 General Motors workers represent a "creative breakthrough," IUE Pres. James B. Carey said after initialing a tentative agreement with GM Vice Pres. Louis G. Seaton.

The new pact parallels the auto industry agreements in wage, pension and working condition improvements. It includes relief time for production workers, more paid time for union committeemen, and an extra 2 cents an hour in wages above the "Big 3" pacts, the IUE said. One IUE local—Dayton Frigidaire—reached a tentative settlement on local issues and four others reported progress.

TV Campaign Stepped Up:

Goldwater Attacks 'Minority Groups'

Sen. Barry Goldwater, Republican presidential nominee, hit the television trail hard as the campaign approached its final three weeks, repeating now-familiar themes that Administration policies are fostering "socialism," over-centralization and weakness.

As the Arizona senator prepared for another concentrated campaign in the Midwest the week beginning Oct. 10, he also charged that "minority groups" have been running the country "except during the Eisenhower years."

He added an Oct. 9 taped question-and-answer TV show to four others previously announced, said in the Philadelphia suburbs that the "minority groups" were the ones "benefiting from government handouts," mentioned "the Bobby Baker case," and spoke in New Jersey of crime rates, "divorce, school dropouts, mobs in the streets, and many other symptoms of a sickness in our society."

The GOP candidate had the advantage of a public endorsement, for the first time, of New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller, and Pennsylvania's Gov. William W. Scranton campaigned for him in New England following a midwestern tour.

Signs continued to pile up, however, that state and local GOP candidates were still backing off from too close an identification with his campaign.

Despite Rockefeller's endorsement, which was moderate, Goldwater leaders in New York were reported as feeling they had to "go around" GOP state officials to push their campaign, and Republican State Chairman Fred A. Young acknowledged that relations had become "kind of rough."

Keating Runs Alone

Sen. Kenneth B. Keating, running for re-election against former Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, is operating absolutely independently. The GOP state campaign director, Michael N. Scelsi, said he doubted that either Keating or Rockefeller would attend a scheduled Madison Square Garden rally Oct. 26—Goldwater's only known appearance in the state.

Goldwater scheduled a revisit to Ohio, which he acknowledges is "vital" to his election hopes, for mid-October after his earlier two days of intensive whistle-stopping in western Republican areas. Here, too, the state ticket is at best tentative in support.

Rep. Robert Taft, Jr., running for the Senate against incumbent Democratic Sen. Stephen Young, traveled with Goldwater through the state, but his organization is being built on appeals to independent groups the Arizona senator is expected to lose. Gov. James A. Rhodes has practically pulled himself out of the presidential campaign.

A failure of communications—or perhaps of clearance—blurred the effect of Goldwater attempts to hitch himself to the coattails of former Pres. Eisenhower and former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon.

He announced he would, if elected, ask Eisenhower to "go to Vietnam" to advise him on U.S. difficulties in checking aggressive Communist-inspired guerrilla warfare. A spokesman for the general said the former President had not been consulted and that he refused comment.

A "task force" headed by former Sec. of Defense Neil H. McElroy issued a report "urging" Pres. Johnson to give public assurances that the NATO field commander, at his own initiative, could use "tactical" nuclear weapons in some circumstances.

Eisenhower attended the news conference at which the McElroy report was issued, but at once rejected a request that he discuss the powers of field commanders during his own 1953-61 years.

This information was "part of the secret security arrangements," he said, adding:

"I don't think we should reach conclusions telling the President what he should do or what he should say. I don't think the use of nuclear weapons should be a campaign issue."

Eisenhower had originally praised the McElroy group but issued a clarifying statement the next day that he meant to express neither support nor non-support of its recommendations.

White House Report

The White House said in a statement it was advised that McElroy, as well as Eisenhower, had declined to support the advisory panel's specific recommendations.

Goldwater got entangled with Nixon after he had said in Lima, O., that he used the "soft-on-communism" charge against Pres. Johnson because "Dick Nixon and Herbert Hoover, Sr." had advised him to do so.

Nixon is beating the bushes for the Republicans in a 36-state campaign trip, but he denied the Goldwater statement. He could not "imagine" what the senator had in mind, he said, adding that he couldn't recall any conversations advising Goldwater on campaign tactics.

The Republican vice presidential nominee, Rep. William E. Miller, moving into the Midwest, also hit the "Bobby Baker case" theme.

He denied there was any irregularity in having on his congressional staff payroll one of his private law-firm partners, John H. Stenger. He also agreed with Goldwater that "socialism" was the principal campaign issue.

New NLRB Office Opens in Peoria

The National Labor Relations Board has opened a subregional office in Peoria, Ill. It will handle cases originating in the northern half of the state except for Lake, Kane, DuPage, Will and Cook Counties, which will continue to be served by the Chicago office.

PRES. LYNDON B. JOHNSON spotted this little girl, Kathie Swartz, in the audience after delivering a major address at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, and lifted her up for a greeting. The President spoke at Johns Hopkins at the invitation of Milton Eisenhower, brother of former Pres. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

30 Years of Progress at Stake In '64 Election, Johnson Says

against over-confidence, against carelessness.

The President covered North Carolina, Iowa, Illinois and Indiana in a three-day sweep, and headed toward major speeches in Cleveland and New Orleans before a scheduled California appearance Oct. 12.

'Lady Bird Special'

Mrs. Johnson, aboard the colorful "Lady Bird Special" campaign train, whistle-stopped through eight South Atlantic and Gulf states, appealing to voters in the onetime Solid South—now shaky and a battleground for Goldwater—to back her husband's national leadership.

There was no doubt of the importance of Mrs. Johnson's trip: It is one of the major Democratic efforts in the South, and the First Lady urged disaffected southern voters to think again, to move with the "unity" of the nation, to rise above recent sectional resentments, to support the social and economic gains of Democratic policies.

Rep. Hale Boggs (La.), the party whip in the House, also aboard the train, hit a harder line, challenging southern voters not "to turn their backs on the first southern President in 100 years."

Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, the vice presidential nominee, moved from the West Coast back to the Midwest charging that Goldwater was a candidate foreign to Republican traditions, lashing out at "forces of hatred" which, he said, managed at the Republican convention to "gain a respectable platform."

The President warned farmers in the South and Midwest that Goldwater's farm policies would wreck their economy. He visited steel communities and farm-area cities, pointing to workers' gains, to economic upsurge, to lessening world tensions because American policy has been both "strong" and "responsible."

He spelled out his meaning in warning that the "solid structure" of the country's life is imperiled.

Not 'Just Good Luck'

The social security system for more than 30 years has been "supported by every President of both parties," he emphasized. Our prosperity "is not just good luck" but rests on "basic beliefs which a generation of leaders has carefully woven into the fabric of American people."

These include "public and private investment in education, fair collective bargaining, agricultural programs . . keeping farmers from suffering the neglect and despair of only a few decades ago," he said.

"We are told that we the people acting through government should withdraw from education, from public power, from agriculture, from urban renewal," he said.

"We are told that we should end social security as we know it, sell TVA, strip labor unions of gains, terminate all farm subsidies.

"We are told that the object of leadership is not to pass laws but to repeal them."

In a clear reference to Goldwater's Senate votes, he said that "these views" are supported "by a consistent record of opposition to every progressive proposal of both parties."

"This is a radical departure from the historic current" of national life and would "shatter the foundation" on which future hopes rest, the President said.

"I propose to build on the basic beliefs of the past," he told the country, but "the choice is yours."

On war and peace, again, Johnson pointed out, "our country has been the guardian at the gate of freedom," and our leadership "has come from the fact that every President, and the leaders of both parties, have followed the same basic principles of foreign policy."

All of them have helped build our strength, he continued, all have "met Communist aggression" in Greece and Turkey, in the Formosa Straits, in Cuba, in "the waters around Vietnam."

Guns Don't Bring Peace

"But each of these Presidents has known that guns and rockets alone do not bring peace . . . They have used our great power with restraint . . . have patiently tried to build bridges of understanding . . . have never been afraid to sit down at the council table," he observed.

Now "all these established policies are under the severest attack" in the election campaign, the President said,

This kind of attack, he declared, "contradicts the course of America and if we should follow this course, the peace of the world will be in grave danger."

"I will not discard" the postwar policies previously followed, he continued. "I will continue them. I will match firmness to strength. And I will continue, with all the skill at my command, the patient search for lasting peace."

"Here again," he told the nation, "the choice is yours."

A 19-CAR CAMPAIGN TRAIN, painted red, white and blue and nicknamed the "Lady Bird Special," moved out of Alexandria, Va., with Mrs. Johnson, the President's wife, scheduled for scores of speeches in eight southern states urging voters to back up her husband's leadership and help return him to the White House in the Nov. 3 election. The President joined her twice for speeches in Raleigh, N. C., and New Orleans before heading to the West Coast and Midwest in his own campaign drive.

New York CSC To Widen Scope

New York — The Community Services Committee of the New York City AFL-CIO will expand its activities to include the mental health of workers and their families, and will extend its job placement work in behalf of displaced and rehabilitated workers.

The committee also announced at its 1964-65 "kickoff" luncheon that a grant is being sought from the National Mental Health Institute, Bethesda, Md., to support its labor rehabilitation liaison project.

Some 80 representatives of unions and social agencies in Greater New York who attended the luncheon heard reports of gains made by the CSC during the past year in channeling troubled or handicapped workers and members of their families to the agencies prepared to serve them.

The Future on the Line

WORKING MEN and women, like all citizens of this great country, can see their futures on the line in the coming national election.

As wage-earners, they know that their hard-won rights and freedoms, their jobs, their security against the common hazards of life and work, the opportunities open to them and to their children, hang in the balance during the next few weeks.

They know only too well that those hopes and values can vanish if political power should fall into the hands of union-hating extremists, racial bigots, or woolly-minded seekers after visions of times long past.

As responsible and thoughtful citizens of America, they know that the safety of our nation and the lives of its people are far too precious to risk in rash, ill-considered military adventures.

They know that loose talk about giving every field general a finger on the trigger of atomic warfare can only bring closer to reality the nightmare of nuclear disaster.

They know that vicious partisan attacks upon the position and policies of the United States where freedom stands embattled overseas serves only to divide our strength, discourage our allies, and comfort our foes.

The American worker has too much plain good sense to be moved by sermons of hate and fear. He has heard the same message from anti-union employers for too many years. He is insulted by the proposition, upon which one party's campaign is based, that appeals to blind prejudice can induce him to act against his own best interests and those of his country.

The Republican candidate, Sen. Goldwater, offers a radical departure from the "mainstream" of American life. He would lead us down a path which points in diametric opposition to every goal of free American labor.

What we have labored to build, he would tear down. What we have sought to join together, he would rip apart. . . .

But, as trade unionists, we are not just concerned with our own survival. We are more concerned with the survival and continued progress of this free nation and all of its people in a dangerous world where total destruction hangs poised on a hair trigger.

We cannot afford the luxury of a leadership governed by impulse, by ignorance and indifference to public needs, or by a warped and distorted view of what the world is really like. When that big trigger has been pulled, it will be too late for a change of mind, and too late to ask if that was what he really meant.

In short, we cannot afford a Goldwater in the White House. Fortunately, we do have a choice, not an echo.

Pres. Lyndon Johnson has . . . earned the confidence of the American people and the respect of the world abroad. He has enunciated the goal of a Great Society, as "a challenge constantly renewed, beckoning us toward a destiny where the meaning of our lives matches the marvelous products of our labor."

That is the kind of society that the working people of America want, for themselves and all Americans. That is why they will make their choice without reservation and with the conviction that it will serve the best interests of peace and continued progress, here and abroad. And that is why we are confident that, on Nov. 3, the choice of the American people will be Lyndon Johnson and Hubert Humphrey as President and Vice President.

Schoemann Declares:

Presidential Election Poses Issue of Union Preservation

The following is excerpted from the report of Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters to the members of the union in the September issue of its United Association Journal, the official monthly magazine.

IN PAST national elections, general officers of the United Association have sometimes publicly stated their endorsement of a particular ticket or particular candidates. It has never amounted to more than an expression of preference—a statement of what we believe would be best for the economic welfare of our membership.

That's not the case this year.

This year, we are going all out for Lyndon Johnson and Hubert Humphrey, and we're urging officers and members of local unions in the United States to work at the project as though their union lives depended on it.

Before this election is over, you may hear a lot of screaming about union "bosses" trying to coerce people into voting a certain way.

Well, let them scream.

The fact is that we have a secret ballot in this country, and when you're all alone in the secrecy of the voting booth, nobody can tell you which circle to put your X in, or which lever to pull. And our enemies know it. When they accuse us of trying to coerce members into voting one way or another, what they mean is they don't want us to stand up courageously and tell our membership which side—literally—their bread is buttered on.

This is not an election where we have chosen to support the Democratic candidates for the sake of engaging in politics. It is well known of course, that the trade union movement has generally thrown its weight on the Democratic side. At the same time, it has supported Republican candidates in some instances. There are some presidents of international unions who adhere to the Republican Party. I want to repudiate any notion that a Republican cannot be a loyal, faithful and effective member of the United Association. But for the life of me, I cannot see how a member of the United Association can support Barry Goldwater in this election.

This is not purely a question of union loyalty, it is a question of valuing your source of income. Maybe the love of money is the root of all evil, but it's also a very large root of everything you can have and do in life in the material sense. And it seems to me that even the indifferent member—the member whose only connection with the union is to send in his dues check once a month for the sake of working under union conditions—ought to value his source of income.

So we're for Lyndon Johnson in this election.

The Johnson-Goldwater contest doesn't quite amount to a question of union self-preservation, but it comes close. It's hard to imagine that a 20th Century American presidential election could come any closer.

BARRY GOLDWATER has been a United States senator for 12 years. During that time, he has voted on 53 issues considered of key importance to the trade union movement by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. His score is perfect: 53 wrong, 0 right.

If Barry Goldwater should be elected, he can be depended upon to veto just about every major piece of legislation sought by the labor movement.

If he should be elected with a Congress favorable to his programs—which means not necessarily a Republican Congress, but a Congress dominated by conservatives—and if he does the things he has tried to do, or said he would like to do, the trade union movement is going to come upon some very hard times, to put it mildly.

It simply isn't true that unions and politics should never mix. Unions are part of society, the body politic, call it whatever you will. And people in a society govern themselves, that is, they organize themselves and their common life, through governments at all levels. Governments can put labor unions out of existence. And even if they don't go that far, they can legislate and administrate and adjudicate unions into such a state of harmless ineffectiveness that they might as well go out of existence.

I do not consider that I was entrusted with my office, or that your other general officers were elected to theirs, in order to wave the flag for any political party or any presidential candidate. But I also consider that I was not elected to sit on my hands whenever the welfare of our members is endangered from any source, including any political source and including the Presidency of the United States.

Morgan Says:

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

NEW YORK—Groups of the radical right have been less prominent in the presidential campaign than had been anticipated but they are working hard behind the scenes.

Their efforts appear to be concentrated more on attacking Lyndon Johnson and the Democratic Administration than in positive support for Barry Goldwater and his bid for the Presidency, despite the purported enthusiasm of some extremist outfits originally reported for the Republican candidate.

Morgan

But while the ultra-conservatism of some of the Arizona senator's positions has become an issue and the radical right itself has not, the phenomenon of extremism in American politics remains and it will be there whether Johnson wins in November as expected or whether Goldwater stages the upset of the century.

Obviously a Johnson landslide would discredit the reactionary fringe while a Goldwater victory would not necessarily catapult it into a position of influence. In either case its strident voice or voices will not be stilled. Can this hysterical hubbub be unscrambled? Is there a message in this noise? The answers to these questions are important if the country is to maintain its historical balance of political moderation before, during and after the election climax.

Clues in on what the radical right is and what it is up to are crammed into an invaluable book. Entitled "The Strange Tactics of Extremism," it was written by that eminent husband-and-wife team of social psychologists, Harry and Bonaro Overstreet, whose best-selling study, "What We Must Know About Communism," so impressed both the late John Foster Dulles and ex-Pres. Eisenhower.

One of the things the Overstreets want us to know about radical rightism is its striking similarity to the radical left, not in terms of subversion or organized conspiracy but in a mood and purpose dedicated to the destruction of existing institutions in an atmosphere of fear, innuendo and half-truth.

The Overstreets, in a detailed analysis occupying a third of the book, find totalitarian tendencies in the John Birch Society and its leader, Robert Welch, who demands disciplined loyalty to authority applied secretly from the top down.

"All extremists," the Overstreets report, ". . . whether on the left or the right, would rather demolish than reform." They detect something of the anarchist in the rightist rebels and indeed, with a jaw-breaking label, catalog the radical right as a kind of "anarchic totalitarianism."

More vividly penetrating is the book's observation that the extreme rightist's view of the world is "doom-shaped," that for him "nothing can be worse than for things to get better." In another related passage the Overstreets shrewdly note that "the extremist of left or right gives himself a kind of absolute license to derogate those with whom he disagrees, but he turns into a martyr as soon as he is himself criticized."

But if this quivering fringe is a disorganized collection of maladjusted specimens and troubled, dedicated but unenlightened followers, why dignify the group or groups with thoughtful attention? The answer is that their capacity for damage in dissension and discord is great. Where the Communist revolutionaries have aimed at control of communications and transportation systems at critical stages of their reach for power, the American evangelists of anarchy at this juncture aim at the PTA, the school system, the public library, and mental health.

IN AN ELECTION YEAR, the authors might have added, there is another target: Any political candidate who dares to disagree with their rigidly and pathetically negative philosophy. Significantly, these extremists are attacking the vital elements of our society which have to do "with the individual's right to grow and the mind's right to explore the complexities of life in search of truth."

Happily but unsurprisingly because the Overstreets rejoice in their discoveries of the miracles of the human mind more than they are alarmed by its shadows, they have some sound suggestions on how to cope with the din of dissension from the far right.

Their key phrase: "Don't be afraid." "Don't be afraid of controversy. It is the stuff of freedom. . . . Don't be afraid to say that some types of action (the savagery of racists against the Negroes' reach for civil rights for example) are outside the pale."

"Don't be afraid," the Overstreets counsel, "of the American public. It has its share of the world's timid souls and . . . of the world's misguided and uninformed. But it has far more than its share of those who have learned to come to grips with problems . . . (with) a taste for facts and fairness. . . . Finally, don't be afraid of the concept of democracy"—derided by Communists and radical rightists alike.

If Goldwater will pardon the phrase, more than moderate attention in pursuit of "The Strange Tactics of Extremism" is no vice.

Washington Reports:

'Solid' Gains of 88th Congress Praised by Mansfield, Dirksen

THE RECORD of Congress for 1964 "will stand up with that of any one years since the republic was founded," Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.) declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on 700 radio stations.

Mansfield added that "the four years of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration, in my opinion, will rank with any of the four years" in the nation's history.

Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.), minority leader, also praised the work of the Congress, saying it had many "solid accomplishments." He listed the test ban treaty, the Civil Rights Act, water and air pollution controls, the Wilderness Act, the anti-poverty program and other measures.

Mansfield stressed also the $11.5 billion tax cut, "which has done much to revive business and create more employment," the many education measures, those on conservation, foreign aid, and defense.

The Civil Rights Act is the most important legislation enacted by the 88th Congress in Dirksen's opinion.

Mansfield said much of the credit for the accomplishments of the last two years must go to Republicans, "because on many occasions, four, five, seven, eight, nine or 10 Republicans come over and joined the Democrats. And they were the difference between defeat and victory on certain legislation."

Dirksen gave Republican support credit for the Civil Rights Act, the test ban treaty, and "the UN bond issue which kept the United Nations afloat."

ITEMIZING programs that have to do with health, the majority leader recalled that "under the guidance of Pres. Kennedy, Congress passed a measure to aid in treatment of the mentally ill and mentally retarded. These people, given no previous federal consideration, number some 10 million and occupy half our hospital beds."

Asked whether Congress, in session all of last year and more than nine months this year, might arrange in the future for a summer recess, Dirksen said he didn't see how that can be done.

The longer sessions, he asserted, are necessary because of the growth of the country and its increased problems.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

IN THE LAST SEVERAL WEEKS of his campaign Sen. Goldwater has been reaching anxiously for the coattails, the embracing arms, the effulgent joint television appearance, the open endorsement of Dwight David Eisenhower, 34th President of the United States, the only Republican to be elected to the White House since 1928.

He had one joint television appearance, taped at the general's farm, which was remarkable for its low-calorie political content, and another is apparently in the works, but is not announced for certain.

In recent speeches the Arizona senator has repeatedly suggested that the national policies of disaster, of wrack and ruin he sees in the Democratic years, were interrupted only by the "eight years of Eisenhower."

He announced that if elected he would ask the former President to head a group to "go to Vietnam" and return with advice about what to do. He—or one of his helpers—arranged for Gen. Eisenhower to attend the press release of the McElroy advisory panel report, the one telling Pres. Johnson to tell the country—and all the world—exactly what he has secretly instructed a few key figures, if any, to do in the last-desperation event of an incredible teetering on the brink of nuclear war.

He has paid tribute to the leadership of Eisenhower and the late John Foster Dulles in foreign affairs, stressing a difference he says he sees in the Johnson-Kennedy conduct of policy.

ALL OF THIS WOULD HAVE SEEMED ODD only a few years ago, for Sen. Goldwater was by no means a devoted admirer of the General during his two terms in office. (He was elected the first time the same year as Eisenhower, riding the latter's huge Arizona plurality into a squeaker of a victory for himself.)

On Apr. 8, 1957, after Ike's re-election, he assailed Eisenhower's budget proposals, totaling $71.8 billion, as "a betrayal of the people's trust," a spendthriftism "subverting" the economy. He spoke of Eisenhower's "modern Republicanism," a brand name used at the time, as "a breach of confidence," and suggested there would be only a "brief tenure" for this "splinterized concept of Republican philosophy."

This was no one-shot salvo from Goldwater's arsenal. On July 2, 1962, in a letter to his present vice presidential candidate, William E. Miller, he protested the formation of a GOP Citizens Committee with Eisenhower as honorary chairman.

Eisenhower policies, he charged, had run "counter to the traditional principles" of the GOP. The citizen's committee leaders were the "same people" causing "most of our present party troubles."

It was "unthinkable," he said, that "they should be given another opportunity to lead us down the path to political destruction."

And on May 24, 1963, he remarked—in his breezy hipshooting style—"one Eisenhower every century is enough."

BUT THAT WAS THEN AND NOW IS NOW—and the senator would quite naturally rejoice if he could get Eisenhower out on the stump, fighting with fervency and enthusiasm for a Goldwater triumph.

Up until now things have not turned out that way. The General sharply rejected the idea that Goldwater's advisory panel should put itself into the public position of telling the President what to tell on nuclear weapon safeguards and potential uses. He first seemed to express mild approval of the panel report, then said he had expressed no endorsement either way.

He hasn't publicly responded to the Vietnam proposal or acknowledged that he had been consulted about it. He wasn't very noticeably enthusiastic about Goldwater's candidacy before the convention or at the convention.

As for the campaign itself, the General observed, it was all somewhat "confusing," and he didn't understand it. One got the impression he couldn't quite comprehend what the senator himself was saying the issues were.

THE 88TH CONGRESS' record is one of the best in U.S. history, Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D-Mont.), left, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. Everett Dirksen (R-Ill.), minority leader, agreed that the Congress has "some solid accomplishments" as he was interviewed on the same program.

How to Buy:

Businessmen Getting Worried By Consumer Complaint Trend

By Sidney Margolius

HOUSEWIVES, wage-earners and representatives of community organizations have had an unusual opportunity at a series of conferences to tell businessmen their complaints and buying problems. The conferences have been sponsored by Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, Pres. Johnson's consumer assistant, in conjunction with local organizations at St. Louis, Salt Lake City and Detroit, with one in Atlanta also scheduled.

These conferences have been useful in showing the wide extent of consumer problems, and that businessmen are beginning to regard them as serious and widespread. There has been a long and still sometimes persistent tendency among businessmen to belittle consumer complaints as stirred up by a handful of "professional consumers," or confined to just fringe rackets.

But now the businessmen are getting worried. At the Great Lakes consumer conference, co-sponsored by the Michigan Credit Union League, we counted four representatives from the National Association of Manufacturers; two from national and local chambers of commerce; three from the largest soap and toiletries manufacturer, who is also the largest national advertiser; three from the local utility company, as well as actually hundreds of others from grocery chains, loan companies, food manufacturers and distributors, advertising agencies and other businesses.

The ordinary consumers among the 1,500 people in attendance were backed up by well-informed and articulate representatives of labor unions, credit unions, consumer co-ops, family service agencies and other community organizations. The representatives of the Michigan and Ohio state AFL-CIO federations proved to be powerhouses of facts and figures in stating their determination to secure a redress of the high installment fees and other overcharges.

The price of food proved to be a subject of controversy. People from the food industry tried to answer this complaint by quoting the Agriculture Dept. to the effect that "food is a bargain," which is a worn-out promotional slogan.

But consumer representatives pointed out that food prices actually have gone up more than other non-food commodities such as appliances and clothing, and the reasons food takes a smaller percentage of income today than in earlier years is that wage-earners have managed to win income increases and farmers have helped restrain prices from further advances through higher production per acre by means of mechanization, improved fertilization techniques, etc.

DOES ADVERTISING ADD TO COSTS? Advertising men said no; the $12 billion a year spent on all advertising adds only $25-$30 a year to each family's costs. But consumer representatives pointed out that the real answer is not just the cost of the advertising. In the hands of large companies which can dominate the home television screen, advertising has become the means of dominating the market and getting a higher price in many categories of products. It was pointed out that in the case of many products, even though they may be exactly the same, the most-advertised brand sells the best even though it is the highest priced.

Trading stamps were criticized by most consumers, although a few women said they found this was an easy way to get birthday gifts. One session voted overwhelming preference for reduced prices rather than the stamps. One supermarket operator reported that stamps do add to food prices.

One interesting phenomenon was that some of the business people, presumably there to answer consumer complaints, began to voice complaints about some problems they themselves encountered as family shoppers.

For example, the marketing specialist for an Ohio manufacturer complained that a facial-tissue manufacturer was packing tissues in such odd amounts as 402 in a box, so that she had trouble comparing prices. She said she had become convinced that many lower-priced products are "non-brand" name products of larger companies which manufacture the advertised brands, and that the product is the same but not the label.

Stepped-Up Hiring Urged:

Handicapped Week Marks 20th Year

The following is excerpted from an article by Gordon M. Freeman, president of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and vice chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped.

THIS YEAR, 1964, marks a significant anniversary throughout our nation. Oct. 4-10 marks the 20th time that National Employ the Physically Handicapped Week has been observed throughout our country. For the 20th time, a concerted effort has been made for one week of the year at least, to point out to citizens of the United States and employers especially, that it is ability after all, that counts most in a job, and that hundreds of thousands of handicapped persons have skills and abilities which make them excellent workers, in spite of a physical deficiency.

The organized labor movement in this nation has always been in the forefront working earnestly for any humanitarian program that would aid the working people of our country and the economy of that country.

However, union people are practical people as well as humanitarians. From the purely practical standpoint, why is employment of the handicapped a good idea?

Experience has proved that handicapped persons, hired on the basis of their ability—what they can do and not what they cannot—make excellent employes with good work records.

In labor's goal for employment for all—this means all who can work. The handicapped have proved over and over that in employment suited to their skills, they work as efficiently as the workers without handicaps. In addition, those earning a living are not a drain on the economy. They support themselves, pay taxes and support the government, instead of becoming wards of that government, supported by the taxes of the rest of us.

FROM THE STRICTLY labor union point of view, the handicapped make excellent members.

Their needs make them desirous of union protection and the friendship of other union members, and their appreciation of union help makes them extremely loyal to their local unions and their fellow members.

Many AFL-CIO affiliates have done an excellent job of promoting hiring of handicapped workers and we are pleased. However, we are far from satisfied. As long as there is one qualified worker who is barred from employment because he has lost an eye or a limb or has a bad back, our job is not done.

It is my sincere hope that NEPH Week, 1964, will mark the start of a concerted effort on the part of all unions to encourage more hiring of the handicapped. As vice chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, I have assured Pres. Johnson of the continued support of organized labor for this important work. That is a promise which I know union officers and members in all sectors will help me to keep.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Away with Lavender and Lace; Grandma's Now an Ash Blond

By Jane Goodsell

WHAT IN THE WORLD ever became of Grandma? Where is she? You just don't see her around anymore—not so's you'd recognize her, anyway. The grandmas I see nowadays strike me as imposters. They have about as much resemblance to my concept of a grandmother as the Mustang has to the old Pierce Arrow touring car. The Pierce Arrow was low in horsepower, and it didn't have much pizzazz. But it was substantially built and comfortable and impressive, in its way.

So was Grandma. She was soft and billowy, pink-cheeked and powdery, and she had a special smell. What was it, I wonder? A mixture of lavender and lemon verbena and smelling salts and powder and nutmeg, maybe. She had snowy white hair, piled on top of her head with lots of hairpins, and she brushed it with a hairbrush which was part of her monogrammed silver dresser set. She had an ample lap to curl up on.

And her cooking! She made big, snowy, shaggy coconut cakes and raspberry trifles, streaked with custard and whipped cream and served in huge cut glass bowls.

That's how I remember Grandma. Was she really like that? Or have I made her up? Have I constructed a memory from bits of movies and old, sentimental songs and pictures of Whistler's mother? I don't know.

Modern grandmothers are a different species. They're as old as grandmothers used to be—or almost. They must be. Even in the jet age of early marriages, it takes a while to become a grandmother. But grandmothers today look and act so young. Oh, they're not ashamed of being grandmothers. They adore their grandchildren, and they're eager to talk about them and show off their pictures. But grandmothers have lost their professionalism. Grandmotherliness used to be an aura, a mystique, that settled about a lady like her lace shawl.

TODAY IT'S JUST an incidental part of life, like being a Democrat or a bridge player, and it has no visible effect. Grandmothers look and act just like anybody else.

It could be true, I suppose, that my memory is playing tricks, that grandmothers never were as cozy and old-fashioned as I remember.

Still, much as I miss the really, truly, genuine type of grandmother I remember, I suppose her disappearance is all for the best. Now that I'm approaching the age when I could become one myself, I view Grandma like the purple cow: I'd rather see than be one.

25 Electoral Votes at Stake:

Johnson Leading Goldwater In Rocky Mountain States

a problem carefully before spitting out an answer.

These generalizations have some holes in them, as a look at the individual states makes apparent. In these six states there are 25 electoral votes, 13 congressional seats, 4 senatorial races and 3 governorships at stake in the Nov. 3 balloting.

It is in these essentially state races, along with the local county and legislative races, that the real temper of the electorate tends to show up. There is no question that another kind of backlash exists in these states. No one can predict the extent of it with any certainty and it varies from state to state. That backwash has relatively little to do with the civil rights fight, but is a general feeling among responsible Republicans and swing independent voters that having decided for Pres. Johnson and against Goldwater maybe they'd better vote Republican for local and state offices to keep a check rein on things.

'Hate' Sheets Effective

Just as Goldwater frightens many voters in the Rocky Mountains, Johnson leaves them with a feeling of ill-defined uneasiness, due in large measure to circulation, through GOP sources in some instances and local right-wing organizations in others, of considerable anti-Johnson hate literature.

Most political observers would give Johnson 22 of the 25 electoral votes in the six states, reserving as a horse race only Wyoming's 3 electoral votes. Although Johnson seems to be ahead, Goldwater seems to be gaining.

Wyoming is a state where you can still see grizzled sheepherders and lone cowpunchers tossing down their whiskey neat in the biggest towns after weeks or months on the lonely reaches of a ranch.

It is also in Wyoming that one of the four senatorial races in the region seems in doubt. If incumbent Gale McGee wins, it will be as close a squeak as his first race in 1958.

Wyoming's lone state-wide congressional seat at this point looks as though it would remain in the hands of the son and grandson of two Presidents, William Henry Harrison, the GOP incumbent.

Chief reason for Wyoming's variance from the rest of the region is that the anti-Goldwater, anti-right-wing issue has been dulled by the victory in the Republican senatorial primary of a moderate candidate, John Wold.

R-T-W Law 'Sleeper'

The so-called "right-to-work" law passed by the 1963 legislature is a subsurface issue that could upset all predictions, however.

The other senatorial race that looks touchy in the region is in New Mexico, where Democratic Rep. Joseph Montoya is seeking to unseat self-appointed Sen. and ex-Governor Ed Mecham. Despite the fact that Goldwater and Mecham have almost identical voting records—including the fact that Mecham was one of six GOP senators to vote against cloture and against the Civil Rights Act—the issue has not been fully exploited in a state which has a large Spanish-speaking population.

A recent swing of prominent Republicans to public support of Montoya could make the decisive difference on what has to be called a tossup race. Pres. Johnson looks certain to carry the state, even though the east side so-called Little Texas counties qualify as Dixiecrat-Goldwater country.

The governorship seems certain to remain with incumbent Jack Campbell, who has spent the past two years talking anywhere two or more New Mexicans would hold still.

New Mexico Races

Both congressional seats are at-large races. Incumbent Democrat Tom Morris is practically home free, but former Land Commissioner E. S. Johnny Walker, seeking to replace Montoya, has a serious challenge from an Albuquerque physician who is a personable campaigner and states bitter opposition to hospital care for the aged.

Utah is clearly in the LBJ camp, with newspaper polls showing the President with a commanding lead and relatively few undecided voters. Incumbent Democratic Sen. Ted Moss, running against a spokesman of the right wing, former Brigham Young University Pres. Ernest Wilkinson, seems to be leading by a narrow margin. With incumbent GOP Gov. George Clyde not seeking re-election, Democrat Calvin Rampton seems clearly ahead on the basis of a school crisis on teacher pay and the failure of 16 years of Republican state administrations to develop significant new industry.

The two congressional seats seem to be split, with Democrat Dave King ahead in the 2nd District and incumbent Republican Lawrence Burton ahead in the 1st.

Montana's senior senator, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, poses only one problem for pollsters—by how big a margin will he win?

Rep. Olsen Favored

Democratic incumbent Arnold Olsen seems certain to win a closer-than-normal race in the western congressional district while the eastern congressional district remains a tossup between incumbent GOP Rep. James Battin and his cattleman challenger, Jack Toole.

Key race in Montana is the governorship, where former Montana State College Pres. Roland Renne is challenging incumbent GOP Gov. Tim Babcock, who succeeded to office when Don Nutter was killed in a plane accident in 1962. Renne is still trailing but coming up as charges of conflict-of-interest surround Babcock and his Trucking firm. If Renne wins it will be close.

The only race of consequence in Idaho, with no statewide contest, is in the southern congressional district, where incumbent Democrat Ralph Harding faces a tough challenge from George Hansen, who beat the GOP organization to win the primary. One key issue is Harding's attacks on Ezra Taft Benson, former Eisenhower agriculture secretary, charging that Taft has used a high position in the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints for political purposes in support of the John Birch Society

Idaho for Johnson

Idaho has clearly turned for Johnson in the presidential contest.

Colorado with no statewide races finds its governor, who supported Scranton in San Francisco, campaigning in every state but his own for Goldwater. The Democrats seem a fair bet to pick up a net gain of one congressional seat, but House Interior Committee Chairman Wayne Aspinall could be in trouble because of redistricting. Johnson is leading by a wide margin in most polls.

$1.25 Pay Floor Urged In Canadian Labor Code

Ottawa, Ont.—A national labor code keyed to a $1.25 an hour minimum wage has been introduced in Parliament by the Liberal government.

If enacted, it would become effective next year and apply to about 550,000 workers in industries under federal jurisdiction—interprovincial shipping, communications, chartered banks, pipelines, radio and television, and airport services. It would affect less than 10,000 workers in these industries because, aside from chartered banks, they are highly organized and have negotiated standards higher than those proposed.

Other main features of the code are the standard 8-hour day and 40-hour week, two weeks' paid vacation after one year and eight paid holidays.

The $1.25 basic wage would not apply immediately to all parts of the country or to all industries, as allowances are made for areas and industries that might have difficulty in meeting the standards at once. However, it was hoped that it would apply throughout Canada by 1967.

The code, it is expected, would serve as a model for provincial labor codes covering the bulk of Canada's workers—more than 5 million. Most provinces now have a $1 minimum wage, with some dropping as low as 90 cents for specified industries. Ontario recently set a $1.25 minimum for construction workers in the Toronto-Hamilton district and expects to extend it gradually to the rest of the provinces.

The government hopes to have the code enacted at this session of Parliament. Preliminary debate in the House of Commons will probably be followed by referral to the Labor Relations Committee for hearings at which the Canadian Labor Congress, individual unions, provincial labor departments and organized business would be heard. Changes are possible as the result of such testimony and suggestions from members of Parliament.

Meany Backs ALEA In Teamsters' Raid

The Air Line Employes, fighting off a raid at National Airlines by the Teamsters, have been pledged AFL-CIO support by Pres. George Meany.

"This raid is typical of the disruptive tactics employed by the Teamsters' leaders in the effort to offset the effects of their bad reputation," he said in a wire to Pres. Victor J. Herbert of the ALEA, an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots.

"The interest of the affected employes on National Airlines will, of course, best be served by continued adherence to the Air Line Employes. You have the full support and best wishes of the AFL-CIO in this campaign."

Manufacturing Profits Up 22% for First Half

Profits after taxes for manufacturing corporations were 22 percent higher in the first six months of 1964 than in the same period of 1963, the government reported.

The skyrocketing profits picture was underscored in the report of the Securities & Exchange Commission and Federal Trade Commission with figures showing that in the second quarter of the year the annual after-tax profit rate on stockholders' equity registered 12.3 percent—the highest such rate since the second quarter of 1959.

The return on stockholders' equity is the actual amount of profit on an invested dollar and is held by economists to be the most meaningful measure of profits.

The second quarter profits gain, the government reported, was 17 percent higher than in the same quarter of 1963, with durable goods firms showing a 20 percent increase in profits for the period and non-durable goods averaging about a 15 percent rise.

The report said that a majority of the durable goods industry groups showed increases of more than 25 percent for the first half of 1964 and a large number of non-durable firms also reported gains of 25 percent or more for the half year.

Three Kingsport Unions Win NLRB Election

Kingsport, Tenn.—Objections by the management of the struck Kingsport Press plant here to representation elections should be overruled and unions which won bargaining rights should be certified by the National Labor Relations Board, the NLRB's regional director has recommended.

Dir. Walter C. Phillips of Atlanta said three groups of workers at the nation's largest hardcover book printing plant have voted for union representation: pressmen and assistants, bindery workers, and electrotypers.

The votes were cast Mar. 10 but were not counted until all appeals and objections had been disposed of by the labor board and the courts. Phillips listed these results:

Bookbinders, with 1,504 workers eligible: 863 for, 640 against, 13 for another union, 6 void, some votes challenged but not enough to change the result; Electrotypers, 335 eligible: 44 in favor, 25 opposed, 15 challenged (others voted in the Bookbinders' unit); Pressmen, 513 eligible: 242 for, 219 against, 8 not counted.

The Allied Kingsport Press Unions, representing 1,300 union workers, have been picketing the plant since Mar. 11, 1963, for better wages and working conditions. The NLRB permitted strikers and non-strikers to vote on the last day of the one-year period after the strike started, but impounded the ballots until all appeals had been disposed of, a procedure the board said was unusual but in keeping with the intent of Congress.

The effect of the NLRB aide's ruling is that Kingsport Press "has a legal duty now to bargain with the unions," a labor spokesman said.

AFSCME Starts Study Of Automation's Effects

An in-depth survey of the impact of automation on state and local government workers has been undertaken by the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Detailed questionnaires have been sent personnel directors of large state and local agencies and the directors of union councils for distribution to locals with members in agencies where automatic data processing equipment has been installed.

The questions are designed to determine the extent of automation and what safeguards have been effectuated through legislation, civil service regulations or union contract to protect workers whose jobs are wiped out or reduced in grade.

AFSCME Pres. Jerry Wurf said the results of the survey may indicate a need for legislative proposals, for increased organizing among workers displaced by technological advances and not given comparable jobs, or for retraining in cooperation with the Office of Manpower, Automation & Training in the Labor Dept.

The union must be concerned with problems of employe adjustment as the use of automated machinery becomes more widespread, Wurf said. He noted that in private industry, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has estimated that 2 million workers are being displaced annually as the result of the installation of automated equipment.

Trainmen Seek Johnson's Aid In FEC Strike

Miami Beach — Pres. Johnson was urged by the Railroad Trainmen, meeting here in convention, to help terminate the long-standing labor dispute on the Florida East Coast Railway and restore service to the level existing before Jan. 23, 1963.

The 1,100 delegates authorized Pres. Charles Luna to request Johnson's "personal intervention" with all dispatch and "the full use of the power at his command."

Luna sent a message to Johnson noting that Florida East Coast counties have been deprived of railway passenger, mail and express service by rail management's refusal to come to terms with employes. Nearly 2,000 union workers have been unemployed since the dispute started.

Only "strong action" by the head of our government can bring about a change, the delegates said.

88th Congress Gets 'America Moving'

By David L. Perlman

THE 88TH CONGRESS carried out Pres. Kennedy's campaign pledge to "get America moving again."

It rejuvenated a sluggish economy with an $11.5 billion tax cut which prevented an incomplete recovery from the 1960-61 recession from toppling backwards because it had run out of gas.

It confounded the cynics by enacting a strong, meaningful civil rights bill—and crushing a supposedly unbreakable filibuster to do so.

Prodded by Pres. Johnson, it turned its attention to the hidden fifth of the nation whose poverty had gone almost unnoticed in an era of supposed affluence. For the first time since the Roosevelt era, bold new programs were launched to salvage the out-of-school, out-of-work youth and lower a ladder of hope to the poor of all ages.

It made its mark as "the Education Congress" by enacting a $1.2 billion program of federal aid to colleges, providing money and impetus to upgrade vocational education, and enlarging the areas of government assistance to elementary and high schools.

It broke new ground in the health field with a pioneering program to combat mental illness and retardation, with aid to medical education and with grants to help modernize old hospitals as well as build new institutions.

In what historians may some day consider its greatest achievement, the 88th Congress ratified the treaty banning nuclear tests in the atmosphere—and the strontium 90 content of the nation's milk supply dropped back to normal levels.

It plugged the fringe benefit loophole in the Davis-Bacon Act. Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. hailed this as "the greatest legislative victory for the building trades in the past decade." And it enacted another long-pending labor goal—a federal equal pay for women law.

Little noticed, but of signal importance to the labor movement, were the unprecedented strong safeguards for workers' rights which were written into the mass transit bill.

The 88th Congress made advances also in housing, in manpower training, in controlling air pollution, in conserving natural resources and wilderness areas.

No improvements were made in the Wage-Hour Act, despite recommendations for extended coverage and labor's urging of a higher minimum wage. Shorter hours and double time for overtime work were explored in committees—and dropped. No steps were taken toward repeal of the "right-to-work" section of the Taft-Hartley Act. Federal standards of unemployment benefits were left untouched. A needed public works expansion died with adjournment.

There were, of course, some disappointments. Not even Pres. Johnson's persuasive efforts could push hospital care for the aged the final step to enactment or round up the extra handful of votes needed to pass the Appalachia development bill in the House.

But the record certainly comes close to justifying the end-of-the-session superlatives used by congressional leaders.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (Mont.) said the Congress was "the most productive in my personal memory" and had written a record "of which the nation could be proud."

House Democratic Leader Carl Albert (Okla.) termed it "the immortal 88th Congress."

There were dissents. To South Carolina's new Goldwater Republican, Sen. Strom Thurmond, this Congress "broke all records in its great leap forward toward socialism, centralized government and fiscal irresponsibility."

Pres. Johnson, on the other hand, gave the 88th this accolade:

"This session of Congress has enacted more major legislation, met more national needs, disposed of more national issues than any other session of this century or the last."

Here, then, is a summary of the two-year record of the 88th Congress:

The National Economy

TAX CUT: The largest tax cut in the nation's history had a perilous year-long journey through Congress, but the measure finally enacted was one the AFL-CIO supported as a meaningful contribution to economic growth—and jobs. For the average union member, the tax cut amounted to $3-a-week more in take-home pay. For the economy, it added up to a job-creating $11.5 billion shot-in-the-arm.

Most Republicans fought the tax cut as an abdication of "fiscal responsibility" and mocked the sophisticated reasoning of Administration supporters that a deliberately-incurred budget deficit would be more than made up in future years through the increased rate of economic growth.

On a key vote in the House, a Republican attempt to make the tax cut conditional on a reduced federal budget was narrowly beaten, 226-199. The bill then passed, 271-155.

The bill closed one loophole for wealthy stockholders—a 4 percent tax credit on dividend income. A Senate amendment to restore the dividend loophole was defeated 47-44, with all 47 votes coming from Democratic ranks.

ANTI-POVERTY PROGRAM: Pres. Johnson's first State of the Union message called for an "unconditional war on poverty in America." On Mar. 16, 1964, the President sent Congress the draft of his Economic Opportunity bill. Five months later, it was sent to the White House to be signed into law. Its closest call was in the House, where at one stage an attempt to kill the entire bill was defeated only 225-197.

The main provisions include:

- A new Job Corps to give unemployed youngsters basic education, training and work experience on conservation projects.
- Home-town work training for school dropouts.
- Part-time jobs for college students from low income families.
- Adult basic education in reading, writing and arithmetic.
- Assistance to the rural poor, including migrant farm worker families.
- A volunteer "domestic peace corps" to serve in areas of special need.
- Federal grants to community-developed projects to overcome poverty and improve living standards.

MANPOWER TRAINING: The 1962 Manpower Development & Training Act faced a crisis as a result of failure by most states to provide 50-50 matching funds for the year beginning July 1, 1964. The 88th Congress waived this requirement for the current fiscal year and changed the law to require only one-third matching by the states after July 1, 1965. An additional $527 million was authorized for the program, training benefits were liberalized, an additional 20 weeks of training was authorized to provide basic education for those who couldn't read, write or figure well enough to qualify for job training courses.

FOOD STAMPS: The pilot food stamp program established by Pres. Kennedy through an executive order in 43 local communities was made nationwide and permanent by the 88th Congress. Under the plan, needy families buy food stamps worth nearly twice as much when exchanged for food at local stores. In a delicate bit of horse-trading, southern votes were won for the bill in the House in exchange for northern votes for the wheat-cotton bill. On the key rollcall, a Republican amendment to cripple the program was beaten 223-195, even though only six Republicans joined with the Democratic majority.

AUTOMATION COMMISSION: A 14-member National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress was set up to study the problems of worker displacement by machines and computers and to make "specific" recommendations to alleviate the impact.

INTEREST EQUALIZATION: A tax was imposed on investments in foreign securities by U. S. citizens to cut down the export of American capital and slash the nation's balance of payments deficit.

Labor Legislation

DAVIS-BACON AMENDMENT: Since 1931, contractors on federally-financed construction projects have been required to match prevailing area wage rates. But in recent years, as union construction workers took a growing share of pay raises in the form of health, welfare and pension benefits, the non-union contractor has had a built-in advantage. By not matching fringe benefits, he could keep his labor cost down and underbid fair contractors. Since 1955, labor has sought legislation to correct this. In 1964, success was achieved. With strong bipartisan support, the 88th Congress voted to include fringe benefits in prevailing wage determinations.

MASS TRANSIT AID: The AFL-CIO strongly supported the Administration's program of federal grants and loans to help metropolitan areas expand and improve commuter transit facilities—but only on condition that the legislation firmly protect the job, pension and bargaining rights of transit workers affected. The protection for workers and their unions was written into the bill by a 52-41 vote in the Senate and a 233-171 vote in the House.

EQUAL PAY FOR WOMEN: An 18-year campaign for a federal equal pay for equal work law was won in the 88th Congress. The labor-supported measure prohibits wage differentials based on sex—specifically bars employers from reducing wages of male workers in order to achieve "equality."

FEDERAL PAY RAISE: Congress carried out the principle of "comparability" with private industry by voting pay raises averaging about 5 percent to more than a million federal employes. Long-deferred increases were also voted Cabinet members, federal judges, top-level administrators, members of Congress and military personnel.

FARM WORKERS: Congress passed a migrant crew leaders registration bill aimed at preventing such abuses as overcharging workers for transportation, abandoning a crew, failing to return workers to their homes, and underpaying workers.

The anti-poverty legislation includes funds to help provide education, sanitation, housing and day care for children of migrant workers. And the omnibus housing bill earmarks an additional $10 million for low-rental housing for migrants.

Civil Rights

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT: Few observers would have dared to predict in the spring of 1963 that the far-ranging civil rights proposals submitted by Pres. Kennedy would be enacted not only intact but strengthened in some areas—or that the labor-supported fair employment section would be included in the final bill. Even if it survived the House Rules Committee and was not amended to death on the House floor, the reasoning went, it would surely be drastically compromised in the face of a southern filibuster.

Putting partisanship aside, a broad two-party coalition patiently overcame all obstacles and by votes of 289 to 126 in the House and 73 to 27 in the Senate wrote into law:

- A ban on discrimination in hotels, eating places and theaters serving the public.
- A prohibition against discrimination in employment—by employers, unions and employment agencies—because of race, religion, sex or national origin. It applies in July 1965 to establishments with 100 or more workers, extending in three annual steps to businesses with 25 or more employes. The law clearly states that it does not require the hiring of a certain quota of minority group workers to achieve racial balance, nor does it interfere with normal senority rights.
- Stronger safeguards and more effective enforcement of the right of Negroes to register and vote.
- New powers to the attorney general to take legal action to desegregate schools and public facilities.

Education

COLLEGE AID: After a number of near-misses, Congress late in 1963 finally enacted a large-scale program of federal grants and loans to construct college classrooms, laboratories, libraries and other academic facilities. Aid went to public and private colleges and universities and to public junior colleges and technical institutes—with an authorization of $1.2 billion for the first three years of a five-year program. Pres. Johnson termed it "the most significant education bill in history."

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION: A new five-year program of federal aid to vocational education was enacted, with the emphasis shifted to the training of young people in skills needed now and in the future, rather than in farm skills and other outmoded courses. The $731 million program, encompassing many of the recommendations made by the AFL-CIO, also set up a new work-study program designed to keep needy students from becoming high school dropouts. A Republican attempt in the House to delete the work-study program was beaten, 193-180.

NATIONAL DEFENSE EDUCATION ACT: The NDEA program of federal aid to improve the teaching of science and mathematics was expanded to include teacher training in such subjects as history, geography, English and foreign languages.

IMPACTED AREAS: The impacted areas program of federal grants to school districts attended by large numbers of government civilian and military employes of Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt, he wrote, because it was "not faced with a nation prostrated by depressions" but a nation in which 80 percent of the people enjoyed the highest living standards they had ever known.

When the 88th Congress convened two years ago the three major issues were civil rights, a tax cut and hospital insurance for the aged under social security. Meany pointed out that the first two were enacted and that the civil rights law is certain of a "special place in history." He added:

"As union members we are proud of the part we played in its enactment; as Americans we are proud that an overwhelming majority in both parties joined in making it possible."

The tax cut, he declared, "represented the nation's first approach to the use of federal tax policy as a true economic stabilizer, and it has worked."

Of hospital care of the aged, Meany wrote that "we won a clear-cut victory in the Senate for the first time and prevented efforts to bury the measure for years to come in the conference sessions."

Meany reviewed briefly the congressional record on labor legislation, citing the mass transit bill's provision protecting the rights and economic gains for workers, "an unprecedented step," the fringe benefits added to wage standards under Davis-Bacon, the equal pay for women law and the wage increases for federal employes.

He hailed the "vast amount of progress on education, the National Defense Education Act, expansion of vocational education."

He praised the anti-poverty bill as "a ground-breaking first step" in putting the federal government behind a policy to "bring about a fair standard of living for everyone."

In foreign affairs, Meany stressed the ratification of the nuclear test ban treaty, the maintenance of foreign aid and continuance of the "broad general policies the nation has followed since the end of World War II."

The list is impressive, he said, and should be emphasized for three reasons:

- It underscores the importance of strong executive leadership.
- It makes clear that there is more involved in the coming election than a victory for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket—that 435 House seats and one-third of the Senate are at stake.
- Despite all the accomplishments there is a long list of unfinished business.

Unfinished Business

This list includes hospital care for the aged, the Appalachia program, job-creating measures of all kinds, general aid to education, broadened coverage of the wage-hour law and an increase in the minimum wage to $2 an hour, reduction in the workweek to 35 hours and double time for overtime.

Meany singled out the need to repeal the "most iniquitous" part of the Taft-Hartley Act—Sec. 14b—which opens the door to so-called "right-to-work" laws, and stressed the continuing need also for strengthened consumer protection and federal standards for unemployment compensation. He continued:

"And as important as any of these, congressional procedures must be reformed to prevent the will of the Congress from being frustrated by its own rules."

Meany said he hoped the review of the record and the unfinished business "will inspire you to even greater efforts in the few remaining weeks before the people make their decision."

Board Hears Rail Firemen Wage Case

Chicago—An emergency board named by Pres. Johnson has begun hearings here into a wage dispute between the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen and major U.S. railroads.

The board chose Ronald W. Haughton of Detroit as chairman and agreed to report back to the White House with recommendations by Nov. 5. Haughton is a Wayne State University professor. Other board members are Louis A. Crane, Detroit attorney-arbiter, and Jacob Seidenberg of the Washington, D. C., area.

The panel was named to head off a strike authorized by a 99 percent vote of BLF&E members who participated. The union asked for a wage increase of up to 25 percent for 30,000 workers. They received their last increase Mar. 1, 1961.

BLF&E Pres. H. E. Gilbert said railroad management "did not offer one cent during negotiations and has not offered anything since" but did give raises of $3.25 a day to members of an unaffiliated union.

BY PERSONALLY COLLECTING $140 in voluntary contributions to COPE, Bruce Casler won an all-expense trip to Washington in a contest sponsored by the Transport Workers. A member of Local 514 in Tulsa, Okla., he is shown with Mrs. Casler on a visit to National COPE Dir. Alexander E. Barkan (right) at AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington.

Upholsterers, Transport Unions Endorse LBJ

Two more international unions, acting through their executive bodies, have backed national AFL-CIO support of Pres. Johnson for re-election and Sen. Humphrey for vice president by giving formal endorsements to the Democratic candidates.

The executive council of the Transport Workers, at a meeting in New York, called the Democratic standardbearers "candidates in the great tradition of Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman and John F. Kennedy."

The executive board of the Upholsterers, at a special meeting in Philadelphia, endorsed presidential candidates for only the fourth time in its 82-year history.

The UIU resolution recalled that past endorsements were given by the board only to Sen. Robert M. La Follette, running as a Progressive in 1924; to Roosevelt in 1940; and to Truman in 1948. Kennedy was endorsed in 1960 by the international convention.

"We now ask our constituency to work and vote for the defeat of the Goldwater Republican candidacy," the resolution said. ". . . We declare our confidence in the Johnson-Humphrey election because the American people in their hearts know it is both right and necessary."

The TWU resolution praised Johnson and Humphrey as "men of proved abilities in the art of government" who have manifested during "years of dedicated service" their "sincere conviction that governments exist for the good of the governed." It continued:

"Pres. Johnson and Sen. Humphrey have recorded themselves unequivocally . . . for the humane and great society in which we believe and for which we are certain they will continue to work."

Tax Cut, Rights, Anti-Poverty Highlight Record

was broadened to include the District of Columbia for the first time.

Peace

NUCLEAR TEST BAN TREATY: More than 100 nations have now signed the treaty negotiated by the United States, the Soviet Union and Great Britain banning nuclear tests in the atmosphere. With strong bipartisan support, this historic agreement was ratified by the Senate, 80-19.

VIETNAM RESOLUTION: Congress declared its support of Pres. Johnson's actions in repelling any armed attack against U.S. forces in Southeast Asia by the Communist regime in North Vietnam.

EL CHAMIZAL TREATY: A long-standing dispute with Mexico was ended when Congress ratified a treaty ceding 366 acres of Texas land to Mexico and providing for an additional exchange of acreage. An international arbitration tribunal had awarded the disputed borderland to Mexico in 1911—but the United States had refused to abide by the award.

Health Programs

MENTAL HEALTH: Congress approved a pioneering $329 million program to help build community mental health centers, to help build research and treatment centers for mental retardation, and to help train teachers of mentally handicapped children.

HILL-BURTON EXPANSION: The highly-successful Hill-Burton Act program of federal construction grants for hospitals and nursing homes was extended with this important addition: funds were allocated for the first time to modernize obsolete hospitals and other health facilities, primarily in city areas. The 1964 law also removed the previous "separate but equal" provision of the act and said the hospitals must be open to all people in the area.

MEDICAL EDUCATION: Congress voted a three-year $175 million program of federal matching grants for construction of teaching facilities for medical, dental and related health profession schools. It also included a low-cost loan program for medical and dental students. An attempt by Sen. Barry Goldwater to kill the loan program was rejected, 63-18.

NURSE TRAINING: To meet a critical shortage of nurses, Congress voted funds for nursing school construction and loans for student nurses.

Conservation

WILDERNESS SYSTEM: To protect large sections of America's wilderness areas for the recreational needs of future generations, Congress established a National Wilderness Preservation System, with an initial reserve of 9 million acres. It also established a number of new national parks and seashores.

LAND-WATER FUND: A new Land & Water Conservation Fund is earmarked to finance federal and state planning and acquisition of outdoor recreation areas.

CLEAN AIR: With air pollution an increasingly serious national problem, Congress inaugurated a $90 million, three-year air pollution control program similar to the existing water pollution control program.

Housing

OMNIBUS HOUSING ACT: Congress approved a $1.1 billion extension of low-rent public housing programs, including a new $50 million program aimed at stimulating rehabilitation of slum properties, thus avoiding the need for demolishing neighborhoods for urban renewal. It also approved a program of low-rent housing for migrant farm workers. In its first session, Congress raised the authorization for low-cost rental housing for the elderly and extended mortgage insurance on low and moderate income housing.

Congressional Reform

HOUSE: The Administration firmed up its 1961 expansion of the powerful Rules Committee at the start of the 88th Congress, when the House voted 235-196 to expand permanently the size of the committee from 12 to 15 members. This gave a shaky, not-always solid 8-7 majority for the Administration over the Republican-Dixiecrat coalition. The control was not solid enough to prevent Chairman Howard W. Smith (D-Va.) from sitting on legislation he opposed or, conversely, taking bills he favored away from a legislative committee and clearing them for the floor. This he did with both legislation and a proposed constitutional amendment barring federal court interference with apportionment of state legislatures. The court-curbing bill was passed by the House, but died in the Senate. The constitutional amendment never reached a vote, but is expected to be an issue in the new Congress.

SENATE: Early in the 88th Congress, Senate liberals sought to change the Senate's cloture rule to make it easier to cut off debate. Although a majority of the Senate supported the change, a filibuster blocked a vote on the change in the filibuster rules. The vote to cut off the filibuster against the rules change was 54-42, short of the required two-thirds margin.

Despite the failure to amend the filibuster rule, a major victory for majority rule was achieved when the Senate, for the first time in history, mustered the two-thirds margin necessary to limit debate on a civil rights bill.

In a small concession, the Senate voted to require that debate on pending legislation be "germane" or pertinent to the subject for a three-hour period every day.

Consumer Legislation

FOOD MARKETING: A bipartisan National Commission on Food Marketing was established to study the food industry and pricing policies from the farm to the consumer.

In other areas, there was a significant negative victory when the price-fixing "quality stabilization" bill was pigeonholed in both Senate and House committees. However there was no action, despite Administration endorsement, on labor-backed "truth-in-lending" and "truth-in-packaging" bills.

Meany in Broadcast:

Goldwater Opposed To All Labor's Goals

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared on a network radio program that the United States stands "at a parting of the ways in the course of our nation's history."

Speaking over the National Broadcasting Co. network on a program sponsored by the Ladies' Garment Workers, Meany charged that Sen. Goldwater would "lead us down a path which points in dramatic opposition to every goal of free American labor."

"What we have labored to build, he would tear down. What we have sought to join together, he would rip apart."

In contrast, the AFL-CIO leader said, "Pres. Lyndon Johnson . . . has earned the confidence of the American people and the respect of the world abroad. He has enunciated the goal of a great society, as 'a challenge constantly renewed, beckoning us toward a destiny where the meaning of our lives matches the marvelous products of our labor.'

What the Workers Want

"That is the kind of society that the working people of America want."

Meany attacked Goldwater's legislative record — which by AFL-CIO standards shows no "right" votes on 53 issues—and denounced in particular the GOP candidate's imputation that Pres. Johnson is "soft on communism."

"This is perhaps not too surprising for one whose most violent support comes from an extremist group whose leader once described former Pres. Eisenhower as a conscious, dedicated agent of the Communist conspiracy," Meany said.

As for Goldwater's attitude toward labor, the federation president listed this record:

"He voted:

"Against improvements in social security.

"Against equal rights legislation.

"Against better schools.

"Against slum clearance and better housing.

"Against aid for depressed areas.

"Against anti-poverty legislation.

"Against retraining programs for jobless workers.

"Against hospital insurance for the aged.

"Against minimum wage improvements.

"Against, against and against—name any constructive proposal for economic and social progress in this country, and Sen. Goldwater has voted or spoken against it.

"This is a man who is capable of saying in one breath, as he did: 'The child has no right to an education. In most cases, the children will get along very well without it'; while in the next breath he can say, as he did: 'The fact is that most people who have no skills have no education for the same reason—low intelligence or low ambition.' "

Threats to Survival Dominant

But Goldwater's apparent desire to destroy the trade union movement is less important to workers, Meany said, than his threat to the survival of the nation and the world.

"We cannot afford the luxury of a leadership governed by impulse, by ignorance and indifference to human needs, or by a warped and distorted view of what the world is really like," he went on. "When that big trigger has been pulled, it will be too late for a change of mind, and too late to ask if that was what he really meant."

Others who will be heard on the ILGWU radio series are former Pres. Harry S. Truman, Oct. 14; Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, Oct. 21; and Pres. Johnson, Oct. 28.

ON-THE-SPOT REVIEW of decline in jobs at Brooklyn Navy Yard has been promised by Pres. Johnson and will be made by Sec. of the Navy Paul H. Nitze, Mayor Robert F. Wagner (center) of New York announced at a rally of yard employes in Madison Square Garden, New York. Other speakers included, from left, Senators Jacob K. Javits (R) and Kenneth B. Keating (R); Robert F. Kennedy, Democratic Senate candidate, and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the Greater New York AFL-CIO.

GOP's Miller Used Public Office To Break Strike, UAW Charges

could vote.

When these tactics proved successful at a number of other firms, Bell followed suit, according to UAW officials. The company forced a walkout, obtained an injunction, and launched a back-to-work campaign.

The union held firm and the strike succeeded in bringing Bell production to a virtual standstill.

Miller's Role Described

It was then that District Attorney Miller entered the scene. Edward F. Gray, then UAW area director in Niagara County, in a report on the strike, described Miller's role as follows:

"On the afternoon of Sept. 18, District Attorney Miller flew into the Bell plant by company helicopter. Company officials called a meeting of all office workers, scabs and supervisory employes in the plant. Corporation Vice Pres. Ray Whitman made a short speech condemning the strikers and then introduced District Attorney Miller. Mr. Miller stated that he wanted to urge all those present to continue to come in to work and to support the company. He condemned the union for violence on the picket lines and said the union's leaders would be arrested.

"Mr. Miller further promised that those persons arrested would be kept in jail as long as possible before bail was set and that his office would seek to have bail set so high that it would require more money than the union had in its treasury."

Until that point, only minor incidents resulting in no serious injuries had occurred on the picket lines, Gray reported. On the evening of Sept. 28, however, he said the union received reports, but placed no credence in them, that an attack on the strikers was planned the following day.

When the pickets assembled for duty the following morning, 15 were assigned to Gate 1—including several women—and lesser numbers to other gates; at one gate there were no pickets.

Gray reported that club-swinging deputy sheriffs started an attack when they waded into a group of women who were trying to persuade two men not to enter the plant. Men and women alike, he said, were beaten and dragged to a waiting patrol wagon, brought to the plant that day for the first time in the strike.

Ten minutes later, Gray said, a convoy of cars and buses escorted by deputy sheriffs approached the plant from the direction of Niagara Falls. This signaled a new assault on the strikers, he went on, with tear gas bombs dropped from a helicopter and thrown by a company guard. The deputies chased the strikers and spectators scattered by the gas and arrested a number of them, the UAW official reported.

Evidence that the attack and the arrests were premeditated, Gray said, was found inside the jails where the arrested women learned that matrons the day before had been told to prepare cells.

$500,000 in Bail Posted

The arrests continued for days following the tear gas attack, and true to Miller's reported promise to Bell company officials, bail was fixed at rates as high as $15,000 cash or $30,000 property. All told, the UAW reported, it posted $500,000 bail for 90 arrested union members, including some charged with "rioting and conspiracy" at times when they were ill and confined to their homes or in hospitals.

The alleged conspiracy, according to Gray, was actually a meeting of some 800 union members with police and newspaper reporters present. UAW regional 9 Dir. Martin Gerber was among those arrested on the charge although he was 400 miles away at his home at the time.

Gray commented on the trials in these terms:

"Miller was a willing tool of Bell company attorneys who were at his side every moment in the courtroom, aiding and abetting his efforts to send local union leaders to jail.

"Rural juries listened to their district attorney and voted convictions which were promptly thrown out by higher courts upon appeal. Miller's efforts failed to break the union or to send leaders to jail, but during the strike, as a result of Miller's activities, civil rights and union rights disappeared in Niagara County."

Goldwater Stand on Education Held To Repudiate Historic GOP View

The presidential election offers as clear a choice in education as it does in most other issues, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education concludes after analyzing the respective stands of the candidates and the parties.

"Sen. Goldwater would condemn millions of American children to an inadequate education," Jack Sessions of the department writes in an Education News and Views feature in the current issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

"Pres. Johnson, on the other hand, would make it a national policy, as he stated in his acceptance speech, to 'give every child education of the highest quality that he can take'.

"This is the goal to which American trade unions have dedicated themselves for almost 150 years."

Sessions points out that had the Republicans nominated Rutherford B. Hayes or Ulysses S. Grant for President, "they would have had a more liberal spokesman on education than they have found in Barry Goldwater."

Support for federal aid to education has been a Republican tradition dating back to the early days of the party and embracing GOP Presidents James A. Garfield, Chester A. Arthur and Benjamin Harrison as well as Grant and Hayes in the past Century, Session notes. Abraham Lincoln, the first Republican President, signed the Morrill Land Grant Act, he recalls, pointing out that Goldwater has expressed doubt as to the law's constitutionality.

"In contrast to the Republican platform," Sessions writes, "the Democratic platform sets forth a program for education which is bold, realistic and necessary."

Goals Similar to Labor's

The goals the Democratic convention set, he continues, are "almost identical" to the ones the 1963 AFL-CIO convention adopted.

The GOP convention's solution to the education crisis, he goes on, is " 'a transfer to the state of excise and other federal tax sources to reinforce the fiscal strength of state and local governments'."

"The Goldwater Republicans would evidently seize the opportunity to encourage a rash of new state consumer taxes as a way to relieve their wealth supporters of carrying their fair share of educational expenditure," Session writes.

"The need for federal support of education is greater today than it was in past years when Republican platforms recognized that need."

But the Democratic platform, he says, "shows an intelligent concern for education at all levels."

"It proposes increased attention to pre-school training on the one hand and assistance for college students on the other, including scholarships, loans and work-study programs," he continues.

"All in all, the Democratic platform includes the most thoughtful plank in education ever to appear in any party platform. Past Democratic platforms have supported federal aid for education, but they have usually included only cursory references to the need for more classrooms and better salaries for teachers.

"The 1964 platform goes far beyond this to deal intelligently with the relationship between education and the economic and political life of America and to propose bold approaches to some of the most important educational problems of our time."

Layoff Rate Drops More Than Seasonally

The factory hiring rate rose from 44 to 49 per 1,000 workers, less than seasonally, between July and August while the layoff rate dropped more than seasonally, from 21 to 14 per 1,000 workers, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

New hirings failed to live up to expectations in most of the nondurable goods industries, particularly in food and kindred products, the report showed.

ILA Ready To Resume Contract Talks

New York—Longshoremen here are ready to resume bargaining on terms of a new contract but have not been asked by employers to set a meeting date, the union said.

Members of ILA locals from Maine to Texas stopped work Oct. 1, when contract terms expired but returned a day later under a preliminary 10-day Taft-Hartley injunction. The union complied with the order but argued in U.S. District Court here Oct. 8, that a 70-day extension of the order is not necessary.

The contract dispute involves refusal of New York Shipping Association employers to accept union terms for protection against automation, ILA Pres. T. W. Gleason said.

Meany Assails Goldwater For Campaign 'Hypocrisy'

As Campaign Intensifies:

Johnson Stresses World Challenges

By Willard Shelton

En Route with Johnson—Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson headed into his final two campaign weeks calling on the people to back wisdom and responsibility in foreign policy and warning that the next few decades "can set the course of the world for a thousand years."

Campaigning hard in three populous Mid-Atlantic states for three Democratic candidates for the Senate, the President also delivered his most specific warning against oversimplified concepts of foreign policy.

"Almost all general statements about the world are wrong," he told a blue-ribbon audience of 2,500 people at New York City's prestige-packed annual Alfred E. Smith Memorial Dinner. "They are not necessarily false; they seem to me just to be inadequate."

Without mentioning by name his Republican presidential challenger, Sen. Barry Goldwater, he spoke in deadly seriousness of our "confrontation" with communism, which the GOP nominee has incessantly called "the enemy" without differentiating between Communist-led nations.

"There is no longer one cold war; there are many," the President declared, and although "communism is a deadly danger" the Soviet Union is a "different kind of danger" than Yugoslavia and a "small Communist Party in Africa" is "different" from the threat represented by Red China.

The cold wars "differ in temperature, intensity and danger," he said,

CBS to Air Hospital Care Need Oct. 25

"RX for a Nightmare," a half-hour television program stressing the need for enactment of hospital insurance for the aged under social security, will be broadcast Sunday, Oct. 25 at 5 P. M., EST over the Columbia Broadcasting System network.

CBS has offered free time to both the proponents and opponents of the hospital insurance program "in the interest of fairness" after the American Medical Association ordered time for a network program as part of its multimillion dollar pre-election campaign denouncing the widely backed plan.

The network offered the free time to the National Council of Senior Citizens to state the case of hospital care for the aged. NCSC Pres. John E. Edelman said the program will feature real people in real situations to show the overriding need for passage of the legislation.

LABOR'S SUPPORT for the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation was hailed at a Washington, D. C., dinner marking the 80th birthday anniversary of the former First Lady. Adlai E. Stevenson, chairman of the foundation's board of trustees, presents special copies of the book Mrs. Roosevelt was working on at the time of her death to AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan and Pres. George Meany. (See story Page 11.)

Hits Stands On Crime, 'Freedom'

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, has charged Sen. Barry M. Goldwater with hypocrisy in his two major campaign appeals—that he stands for individual freedom and that he is against crime in the streets.

In a 15-minute nationwide radio broadcast, Meany said "both questions are of vital concern . . .

Text of Meany's address appears on Page 8. Copies may be obtained from the AFL-CIO.

But on neither score does the record of Sen. Goldwater serve to inspire confidence."

The federation president, whose remarks over the American Broadcasting Co. network were addressed primarily to union members, said the GOP presidential candidate does not believe that unions should be free.

"The institution of free collective bargaining . . . has no worse enemy in public life than Sen. Goldwater," he asserted. "To the underprivileged . . . he offers only the freedom to do without.

"To the low-income family, he offers the freedom of the slum. . . .

"To the elderly and infirm, he offers the freedom to seek private charity. . . .

"To the exploited worker, he offers the freedom to work at the lowest wage the worst employer chooses to offer. . . .

"To the jobless worker, he offers the freedom to starve. . . .

If Trend Continues:

New England Sweep Seen by Democrats

By John M. Barry

Boston—New England Democrats are pointing toward a six-state sweep of the region's 37 electoral college votes by Pres. Johnson and Sen. Humphrey.

If it happens, it will be the first time in history that a Democratic presidential slate has been able to turn the trick.

If it happens—and if the President scores big—it could mean important gains for the Democratic Party in the area, in terms of House and Senate seats and at least one governorship, plus the preservation of startling inroads made two years ago in the normally Republican northern side of the region.

But whether it happens depends in itself on a few other "ifs."

- If, for example, the current outlook does not lead city and state party leadership into such a mood of complacency and overconfidence that it neglects basic precinct-level tasks involved in getting out the vote.
- If the current popularity of Pres. Johnson and the antipathy toward the views of Sen. Goldwater prevail through Nov. 3 over century-old Republican voting tradi-

Reader's Digest Refuted On Job Agency Smear

An article in the October issue of Reader's Digest attacking the U.S. Employment Service is a compilation of fractured facts and distorted statistics that result in a wholly false picture of the federal employment service.

That's what emerges from a close examination of the magazine's third attack in four years on the U.S. Dept. of Labor in general and on aids to the jobless in particular.

The current attack denounces the U.S. Employment Service as an extravagant, incompetent and power-hungry bureaucracy that is seeking to dictate the job assignment of every American.

The article is signed by Rep. Frank T. Bow (R-O.), a long-time apologist for private, fee-charging employment. agencies, but members of the Digest staff, it was learned, have been working on the story since last July at least.

There is no doubt, however, that the article reflects Bow's general philosophy. During his eight congressional terms, according to COPE records, he has voted wrong 54 times in 58 chances.

The piece is entitled "The Great

5 Mid-Atlantic States Seen Solid for Johnson

By David L. Perlman

The mid-Atlantic states of New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware and West Virginia appear at this stage of the campaign to be as solidly for Pres. Johnson as they were for John F. Kennedy in 1960 and Dwight D. Eisenhower four years earlier. To this bloc of states, with its 80 electoral votes, add the District of Columbia, voting for a President for the first time and considered certain to cast its three electoral votes for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

Below the presidential column, there is likely to be ticket-splitting in all five states, although Democrats have hopes that the carryover from the expected Johnson vote will bring in at least one new senator and several additional congressmen. Some Republicans are inclined, in private conversation, to agree.

At stake on Nov. 3 are 38 congressional seats now held by Democrats and 32 held by Republicans. Three Republican sen-

Quincy Workers Vote 18-1 for Shipbuilders

Quincy, Mass.—A landslide victory by the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers in a National Labor Relations Board election nailed down the union's bargaining rights at the big Quincy shipyard of the General Dynamics Corp.'s Electric Boat Division.

Results of the all-day balloting by production, maintenance and salaried workers were for Local 5, 2,098; for no union, 99; for Local 90, 317; for no union 39.

"We are deeply gratified by this emphatic assertion of abiding confidence by the Quincy shipyard workers," declared union Pres. John J. Grogan, who headed the election drive.

"Their refusal to give credence to the company's urgings to vote 'no union' is undeniable evidence of their unflinching resolution to stand united to safeguard their hard-won gains and win their just rights," he declared.

"Union negotiators will immediately undertake contract bargaining with management to reinstate the fair pay rates, decent working conditions and welfare benefits enjoyed by our members with the former owners, Bethlehem Steel Co., for more than 20 years."

The yard had been sold by Bethlehem Dec. 31, 1963, and the next day the new owner closed down the installation for an indefinite period, dismissing 1,000 skilled workers with from 25 to 30 years of seniority. The union filed unfair labor practice charges against General Dynamics, which are still pending.

Prior to and during the shutdown, the union had sought in conferences to gain recognition as bargaining agent and continuance of the existing Bethlehem agreement. Union representatives based their position on a score of NLRB and court decisions, but the new owners refused to talk officially.

Labor Aids Peace Corps Recruitment

A high-level AFL-CIO committee met with officials of the Peace Corps to begin work on a cooperative program for recruitment of skilled workers for Peace Corps assignments abroad.

The committee, named by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, is headed by Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers. Other members are Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks, Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. Federation staff officials working with the committee include Education Dir. Lawrence Rogin and Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger.

The group met with Peace Corps officials including Deputy Dir. George Nicolau to discuss a program of recruitment of volunteers for self-help construction and repair assistance and teaching in underdeveloped countries.

Steel Union Opens Gaspe Mines Drive

Quebec, Que.—The Steelworkers have launched a new effort to win bargaining rights for employes of the Gaspe Mines, Murdochville, Que., a wholly-owned subsidiary of Noranda Mines where the company smashed a bitter strike that started in 1957.

An application for certification was filed with the Quebec Labor Relations Board following a 290-30 USWA victory in a representation election at Noranda's new $18 million electrolytic zinc smelter at Valleyfield, Que.

18,000 Sign Cards:

Organizing Campaign Gaining Support of N.Y. Taxi Drivers

New York—The taxicab drivers of this metropolis are organizing themselves into a genuine and legitimate union with the aid of the New York City AFL-CIO.

Well over 18,000 have signed membership cards in a campaign that is a joint effort of the labor center and the drivers themselves. An estimated 35,000 working hackers have been issued licenses by the city.

Some of the city's top labor leaders are actively serving on the Taxi Drivers Organizing Committee, set up by the local AFL-CIO and headed by Pres. Jack Townsend of Bartenders Local 15.

Pres. Harry S. Van Arsdale, Jr., of the city labor council has thrown the full facilities of the central body into the drive. Reg. Dir. Michael Mann has given it full AFL-CIO support.

Organizing committees have been set up in all major garages, including those of the 30-odd largest fleet operators. At the same time, special appeals are being made to independent operators, estimated to number about 6,000, on the ground that their interests lie with the drivers rather than the big employers.

The entire operation is being financed by the city central body and its affiliates. No dues are being collected and none will be, Mann said, until the fledgling union wins representation rights.

5,000 at Rally

The organizing committee staged a rally recently at Manhattan Center that jammed the auditorium and overflowed into 34th Street.

The more than 5,000 drivers crowded into the hall passed a resolution urging City Council not to enact any ordinance "that will prevent the organization of a strong, militant union of taxi drivers."

Mayor Robert F. Wagner's encouragement of the unionizing drive was criticized in an editorial in the New York Times, to which Mann replied in a letter to the editor pointing out that the objection "is not at all in keeping with the times we live in."

"The mayor has the right to do so and he has some mighty impressive precedents to go by," Mann wrote. "The laws of our land, the Wagner Act sponsored by the Mayor's illustrious father, [Sen.] Robert F. Wagner, and all the Presidents of the U.S. since the passage of the Wagner Act have encouraged workers to join unions."

Mann wrote that "these forgotten men" by organizing "hope to achieve some degree of equity and economic justice."

"The New York taxi driver is tired of being pushed from pillar to post," he continued, "subject to the whiplash of petty officialdom, exploited by powerful political forces, and working under vicious anti-labor conditions. He is 'kept in line' through coercion, prejudged guilty of alleged infraction of rules and supspended from work without a fair hearing. . . .

"The efforts of these cab drivers to build a responsible trade union and make theirs a better way of life will receive our fullest support, along with that of the New York City AFL-CIO."

At the Manhattan Center rally, Van Arsdale expressed the view that there are enough "modern-thinking fleet owners" whose "wise judgment" will "make it possible for you to achieve your goal without resorting to a strike."

"We are serving notice," he said, "that the taxi drivers in New York City are closing ranks and will not any longer be subjected to harassment or intimidation by fleet owners. The fleet owners should be able, without resorting to strife, to make it possible for the men who built their industry to share in the benefits."

Teachers Win Pact In Pawtucket Strike

Pawtucket, R. I.—A court order to the Pawtucket School Alliance to stop picketing the public schools set off a chain reaction that won a new contract and a pay increase for members of the Alliance—Local 930 of the AFL-CIO Teachers.

The injunction sidelined Teacher pickets, but members of other unions replaced them on the picket lines.

That intensified efforts by Dr. William P. Robinson, Jr., state commissioner of education, to get the Pawtucket School Committee to give the teachers the contract they had been unable to win since their last one expired in 1962.

When that effort got nowhere, Gov. John H. Chafee (R) tried his hand. He summoned State Labor Dir. John J. Hall, State Board of Education Chairman Edwin C. Brown and Robinson to the capitol for another try. The School Committee saw the light, and settlement followed promptly.

Brown is secretary-treasurer of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO. He said the union, consisting of 400 out of Pawtucket's 500 teachers and administrators, won a school committee agreement providing:

- A $150 wage increase this year with a top salary of $7,250 now and $7,400 next year.
- A promise of negotiations next year with the $7,400 salary as a starting point.
- Appointment of a committee named by the governor to oversee negotiations and make reports.

The union had been trying since 1962 to resume negotiations but school committeemen resisted. The walkout started Oct. 5 and affected most of the school system's 11,500 pupils and 18 buildings.

State central body Pres. Thomas F. Policastro said 250 leaders of AFL-CIO unions turned out to picket after voting full support of the strike.

AFT Pres. Charles Cogen had urged that the schools be closed and that negotiations be resumed. He sent David Selden, his assistant, to sit in on contract talks. Others who participated were James Munday and Joseph Cascella of the Teachers' staff, and Local 930 Pres. Gregory Coughlin.

Victories at Three Hospitals Spark Organizing Drive in New Jersey

Newark, N. J.—A massive statewide organizing crusade to wipe out poverty wages and substandard working conditions in every New Jersey hospital and nursing home is sweeping through the state.

Led by Local 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, the campaign has already resulted in union election victories at Clara Maass Hospital, Bellville; St. Barnabas Hospital, Newark, and Beth Israel Hospital, Newark. It is rolling ahead at the Hospital Center of Orange, where a vote is scheduled on Oct. 21, and picking up momentum at scores of other New Jersey hospitals and nursing homes.

The first victory came at Clara Maass where service and maintenance workers voted 161-73 in the first hospital representation election in New Jersey, Sept. 10. On Sept. 21, St. Barnabas workers were compelled to conduct a 14-hour strike when the management rejected the union's request for an election.

The strike settlement, reached with the aid of Newark Mayor Hugh J. Addonizio and RWDSU Pres. Max Greenberg, provided for a representation election Sept. 28. The workers voted 138 to 22 for Local 1199 in the election conducted by the State Mediation Board.

Some 900 workers at a rally here cheered Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., when, a few days before he was designated as winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, he said:

"I urge every hospital and nursing home employe in New Jersey to join Local 1199."

He said that "your great organizing crusade to win union and human rights is part and parcel of the struggle we are conducting in the Deep South." He congratulated the local "for charting a road for all of labor to follow—dedication to the cause of the underpaid and exploited workers in our nation."

Wages are as low as $1.15 an hour in New Jersey hospitals, 70 to 75 cents an hour in nursing homes, and hundreds of workers are compelled to seek supplementary relief assistance in order to support themselves and their families, according to the RWDSU. The workers are predominantly Negroes.

"Our drive is mushrooming everywhere in New Jersey," said Local 1199 Pres. Leon J. Davis. "We get hundreds of membership cards in the mail every week and our switchboard has been flooded with calls from workers all over the state asking us to help them organize."

Davis said that union membership meetings have been attended by close to 90 percent of the workers who signed cards. At each of the four hospitals, mass delegations visited the management and refused to leave until they received a pledge that the hospitals would agree to abide by the results of secret ballot representation votes.

At Beth Israel, a mass demonstration of 200 workers came to the defense of Jane Aronowitz, a technician fired for union activity earlier that day. The workers insisted that unless Mrs. Aronowitz was reinstated, they would refuse to work. She was put back on the job immediately.

This example of Negro workers defending the rights of a white coworker spread through other hospitals. As a result, the local said, it is winning additional support from hospital workers and community groups.

The organizing drive was stimulated by an historic court ruling upholding the right of New Jersey hospital workers to organize and bargain collectively. The ruling, handed down on July 27 by Superior Court Judge Robert A. Matthews, involved Local 1199 and Christ Hospital, Jersey City.

The same local represents 14,000 other hospital workers in the New York region.

Fair Housing Unit Elects Unionists

New York—Trade union participation in top policy levels of the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing was increased as the organization announced the start of a nationwide effort to break down racial ghettoes and achieve open housing.

Named vice presidents were Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee; Exec. Dir. Jack T. Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and William H. Oliver, co-director of the Auto Workers Fair Practices & Anti-Discrimination Dept.

Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights was added to the board of directors.

Iron Workers Hear Meany:

Complacency Seen Peril to Election

San Francisco—The 32nd convention of the Iron Workers heard Sen. Hubert Humphrey and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany urge all-out efforts to get out the vote Nov. 3 to elect Pres. Johnson and defeat the Goldwater threat.

Meany, who spoke in person, and Humphrey, who addressed the convention on a phone hookup from Washington, warned against complacency based on polls.

Some 1,000 delegates representing 139,000 workers unanimously endorsed the Johnson-Humphrey ticket. They were to set policy later on organization, health-welfare, political action and other matters outlined by Pres. John H. Lyons.

Turn Clock Back

Meany characterized Goldwater as the leader of those "who want to take us back into the last century."

"The John Birchers, the anti-labor 'right to work' forces now own a political party," he said. "They captured it over a period of two years and they completed that capture in the city of San Francisco in the week of July 13 this year."

Goldwater's "extremism" statement in his GOP convention acceptance speech parallels Communist and Fascist philosophy that any means are justified to attain ends, Meany said.

"This is what political extremism means and this is what Barry Goldwater had in mind," he added. "You make your own definition of what is good. You make your own definition of what kind of society you want for the people and then you go out and fight for it—and any method is justified.

"This is the philosophy of the candidate of the John Birchers, the candidate of the group that has captured control of the Republican Party."

At issue in the election, Meany said, is who will lead America "in this very difficult world, a world where space travel is becoming almost commonplace, a world where the marvels of science are just unfolding, a world where more and more things are going to be done by machine, a world with unlimited possibilities to do good for humanity."

Pres. Johnson, he said, "has really amazed the world in the last 10 months since he took over carrying out the Kennedy program." It would have been easy for the President to talk about prosperity in his compaign but "he pushed through an anti-poverty bill, a bill to do something about the minority who live in poverty in this country."

The important thing is it is a recognition by the national government that poverty menaces not only those who suffer from it, but it menaces the rest of the people," Meany continued.

"This is the type of campaign Lvndon Johnson is carrying on all during the 10 months, fighting for legislation for the benefit of the people, fighting for hospital care. He has pledged openly—it is in the platform—to eliminate Sec. 14B of the Taft-Hartley Act."

Noting Goldwater's 54 bad votes out of 54—"he never even voted for us once by mistake," Meany listed anti-poverty, minimum wage and social security improvements, equal rights, hospital care, jobless retraining, slum clearance and better housing among them.

'A Mistake'

"Yesterday he was opposed to social security," he added. "He had a plan that would destroy it. Today he says 'that's a mistake.' He didn't say that yesterday."

Lambasting Goldwater's advocacy of nuclear decision by field commanders and Vietnam "defoliation," Meany warned of "great harm that can come to the world if through poor leadership, we plunge the world into thermonuclear war."

Humphrey hailed Johnson's anti-poverty plan as the "cornerstone of a just and fair society." He cited the Democratic platform pledge to eliminate Sec. 14B as evidence of Johnson's determination to strengthen free collective bargaining.

"I might add that the group that met out in San Francisco at the Cow Palace in July was notably silent on the subject of collective bargaining," Humphrey said. "They had nothing to say."

Rail Firemen Fight Repeal Of Crew Law

Cleveland, O.—Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen has charged railroad interests backing repeal of "safe crew" laws in western states with trying to mislead the public.

Pictures of three U.S. presidents have been used on pamphlets aimed at persuading California and Arizona voters to repeal the safe crew statutes, and their names also have been used on billboards, said Gilbert.

The BLF&E head reported to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz that the railroads have "misused" the names of Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson. Wirtz reported that Johnson has not commented on the laws and he is unaware that either Eisenhower or the late Pres. Kennedy "ever took a position regarding safe crew laws" in any state.

In California, a citizens committee has started a vigorous campaign to defeat Proposition 17, a repealer of the state's safe crew law. A similar committee of Arizona citizens is working to defeat Proposition 200 in that state.

North Dakota citizens not only are working to defeat Proposition No. 3—repeal of the safe crew law—but have initiated two propositions of their own. North Dakotans can vote for minimum rail passenger service and for extending safe crew protection to track machines and motor cars, the BLF&E said.

Election Drive Charted By Wisconsin Unions

Green Bay, Wis.—The 1964 biennial convention of the Wisconsin State AFL-CIO closed with the delegates united for an all-out campaign to elect labor's endorsed candidates in the November election.

The principal theme was the common agreement that this could be labor's year, from the presidency of the U.S. down to the smallest office.

Of major interest was the re-election of State AFL-CIO Pres. George A. Haberman to his fourth straight two-year term. Haberman was opposed by John Heidenreich, directing business representative of Machinists Dist. 10. The final tally was 106,068 votes for the incumbent with 82,698 votes for Heidenreich.

Vice Pres. John W. Schmitt and Sec.-Treas. George Hall were re-elected without opposition.

Representing AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the convention, Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters said the most essential reason why labor must engage in politics is to preserve its own existence and its own effectiveness.

"With organizations, as with individuals," he declared, "the first law of life is self-preservation. A Goldwater victory this November might not quite mean the end of our existence, but it is hard to imagine that a 20th century American presidential campaign could come any closer."

Gov. John Reynolds (D) expressed appreciation for the endorsement of his candidacy for re-election by COPE "because it symbolizes the trust of labor's representatives that I share their interest in the well-being of working men and women in Wisconsin."

The State COPE also endorsed other Democratic candidates for state office and Sen. William Proxmire, who is seeking re-election.

Among other speakers were Esther Murray, eastern director of COPE's Women's Activities Division; Charles Heymanns, AFL-CIO regional director; Clarence Greiber, director of the state vocational program; Mathias F. Schimenz, chairman of the state industrial commission; and Robert Ozanne, director of the University of Wisconsin School for Workers.

American Motors Talks Near Strike Deadline

Detroit—Negotiations on a new contract for 26,000 Auto Workers at four American Motors Corp. plants headed for a midnight strike deadline here Oct. 15 with union bargainers determined to preserve the unique profit-sharing plan in the expiring contract or stop work.

The 52-member union bargaining committee voted a day before the contract expiration date to make profit-sharing a strikeable issue. Dir. Douglas Fraser of the UAW's American Motors Dept. said the strike deadline would not be extended.

AMC management made a contract offer which would have paid for new benefits, similar to those won by the union from the Big 3 of the auto industry, largely out of the "progress-sharing" fund set up in the 1961 contract. The union rejected it, but made a counter-offer.

"We're close," said a UAW source as the AFL-CIO News went to press, "but not on progress-sharing, working conditions, or Kelvinator." The union says the contract covering 2,500 Kelvinator division workers at Grand Rapids, Mich., is inferior to other AMC contracts at plants in Kenosha and Milwaukee, Wis., and Detroit.

Meanwhile the union's strike over local issues went into its fourth week at General Motors Corp., where 250,000 workers are out.

Local working conditions are a major issue at GM, where less than 50 of the 130 local agreements have been settled. The strike will continue, the union said, until a majority of UAW units at GM have come to terms on plant-level agreements.

Meany Hails King On Nobel Prize

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, "on behalf of the American labor movement" has congratulated Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., as the recipient of this year's Nobel Peace Prize.

Meany wired King: "This recognition of your valuable contribution to the cause of freedom and human dignity has highlighted today's struggle to bring about equality of opportunity for all of our citizens."

U. S.-Mexican Unionists Expand Joint Program

El Paso, Tex.—The Presidents of the United States and Mexico were hailed for their "historic" meeting here in connection with the transfer of the Chamizal in a resolution passed unanimously by the Joint United States-Mexico Trade Union Committee.

The committee met alternately in the office of the El Paso AFL-CIO and in the Mexican Confederation of Labor building in neighboring Juarez, Mexico.

"When the enemies of freedom and peace try to destroy unity among democratic peoples," the resolution said, "we can point to the action of two great Presidents, Lyndon B. Johnson and Adolfo Lopez Mateos, as an example of true friendship between our nations..

"For that reason we, as representatives of the free and democratic trade unions, express our congratulations to both Presidents and through them to their respective peoples."

The Chamizal is a once-disputed area here retained until recently by the U.S. is spite of an international arbitration award, dating from 1911, to Mexico. Johnson came to El Paso for the transfer.

The U.S.-Mexico committee took steps to set up a greatly expanded program of cooperation between workers in both nations and called for expansion of worker education programs in cities along the border.

The committee was organized in 1952 and represents the AFL-CIO, brotherhoods affiliated with the Railway Labor Executives' Association, the Mine Workers and, in Mexico, unions representing 80 percent of the members of free, democratic trade unions.

ENTHUSIASTIC CHEERS greet Pres. Johnson at the Illinois State AFL-CIO convention as he gives the victory sign to delegates. At right are State AFL-CIO Pres. Reuben G. Soderstrom and Sec.-Treas. Robert G. Gibson.

Illinois Labor Backs State, National Slates

Peoria, Ill.—Fired up by the visit of Pres. Johnson, delegates to the 7th annual convention of the Illinois State AFL-CIO here put finishing touches to their state legislative program for 1965 and pinned a union label on the Democratic ticket.

The convention formally endorsed all Democratic candidates for Congress, Gov. Otto Kerner and his administration, and 118 Democrats and 31 Republicans for the Illinois General Assembly.

The State Committee on Political Education had announced endorsements before the convention. Support for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket was voiced before the President appeared here.

Illinois labor urged all unions to work hard for supported candidates and stressed that victory Nov. 3 is vital to the success of the legislative program drafted through passage of some 135 resolutions. All candidates for the General Assembly are running at-large through failure of the legislature to reapportion districts for the state House of Representatives.

At stake are 177 seats. Each party has nominated 118 candidates. State COPE backed 118 Democrats and 31 Republicans on the basis of voting records and interviews. All 236 names will be on a special orange ballot.

A resolution blasting labor policies of Sen. Barry Goldwater put the Illinois AFL-CIO on record as condemning his public record "with respect to his opposition to any and all public policies looking to the protection and improvement of employment conditions for America's working citizens."

Rep. Roman C. Pucinski (D-Ill.) said while the President, the majority of Congress and the majority of the people were for such measures as the tax cut, nuclear test ban treaty, Civil Rights bill, War on Poverty, aid to education, decent minimum wage and hospital care for the elderly under social security, Goldwater was opposed to all. Pucinski said Johnson has given meaning to the dreams of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Walsh a Speaker

Richard F. Walsh, an AFL-CIO vice president and head of the Theatrical Stage Employes, urged the delegates to study the candidates and the issues, make their decision and then work hard for their election. Walsh, who represented AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, said the candidates who go to Washington and Springfield "enact the kind of laws which are to our benefits."

Resolutions adopted by the convention call for a state minimum wage of $1.50 an hour with a 40-hour week, 75 percent of weekly wages in benefits under the workman's compensation law, and extended limitation on job injury claims and unemployment benefit rights.

Other measures supported the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the program of the national AFL-CIO for implementing the law, and the national legislative program of the AFL-CIO. Bargaining rights for unions of public employes, more pay and benefits for firemen and policemen and abolishment of use or enforcement of any form of wage assignment were urged by the parley.

Delegates also asked for a "safe crew" law for railroad workers, a Sunday closing law and a lien on the property of any contractor if he fails to make contributions to union health and welfare funds, pension funds or vacation funds called for in union contracts.

The delegates chose Springfield as the convention city for 1965 and Chicago for 1966.

Deck Officers Slate Runoff In Election

New York—Members of the Masters, Mates & Pilots have until Dec. 21 to ballot on officers in a runoff of a national referendum supervised by the American Arbitration Association. No candidate won a majority in a previous vote.

Running for president are Lloyd W. Sheldon of New York and Patrick J. King of Boston; for vice president, Charles M. Crooks, San Francisco, and Robert L. Jones of Galveston, Tex.; and Intl. Sec.-Treas. John M. Bishop of St. Louis against Thomas F. O'Callaghan of Baltimore.

King is president of Boston Local 11 and also vice president of the International. Sheldon heads New York Local 88. Crooks is running for an unpaid office after four years as MM&P president. Jones is president of Galveston Local 20. Bishop has held his present post since 1952. O'Callaghan is secretary-treasurer of Local 14.

Florida Labor Votes Support For Johnson

Jacksonville — Unanimous endorsement of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey for Vice President was voted by the Florida AFL-CIO at its annual convention here.

Interest in political action brought a near-record turnout of 335 delegates who voted to back the Democratic ticket after hearing AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne call for a "mighty effort" to thwart the threat to labor posed by Sen. Barry Goldwater, the GOP candidates for President, and his "radical right" supporters.

The convention voted unanimously to support Hayden Burns, mayor of this city, for governor of Florida, and to oppose two amendments to the state constitution—one seeking a 25-year extension of the present discriminatory gasoline tax formula; the other designed to circumvent the recent Supreme Court decision calling for the "one man, one vote" formula in the elections.

State Pres. Charlie Harris read a letter from Pres. Johnson regretting his absence from the convention but Johnson sent a filmed message exhorting the delegates to help him "keep America moving" in the manner called for by the late Pres. John F. Kennedy.

For the first time the convention tried the device of suspending general sessions to give its committees time to meet. Delegates chose Miami as the site of the 1965 convention. Other officers besides Harris are Sec.-Treas. William E. Allen of Tampa and Vice Pres. Arthur Hallgren, Miami.

Hospital Care Need to Be Aired

"This program will tell the truth —and it will be a powerful answer to the AMA's deliberate and costly campaign seeking to confuse the public," Edelman said.

The program will feature young workers and retirees as well as doctors, businessmen, the clergy, social workers and lawmakers. Among those taking part are Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.), co-author of the King-Anderson bill, and internationally known pediatrician Dr. Benjamin Spock.

Peabody Award-winning writer Millard Lampell and TV Director Lee Polk are putting the program together for the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Royal Commission Urged:

Ontario Labor Asks Anti-Poverty Drive

North Bay, Ont.—The 500,000-member Ontario Federation of Labor at its 8th annual convention challenged the federal and Ontario governments to wage war on poverty.

Armed with a 50-page study showing one-third of the nation living below a decent subsistence level, delegates demanded a royal commission into the whole question of poverty in Canada and endorsed an eight-point program for dealing with the situation.

The study, prepared by the OFL Research Dept. under Dir. John Eleen, stressed that the numbers of the poor are growing in an age of plenty and at a time when the problem of poverty can be solved.

The report noted that a growing section of the population is getting less and less of its share in an expanding economy. In the ranks of those living on the borderline of poverty are older workers, pensioners, the underemployed and the unemployed, school dropouts and the under-educated, widows and fatherless families, the disabled and sick, the retarded and mentally ill, small farmers, migrant workers, Indians and new immigrants.

The study estimated that nearly 2.5 million persons, or more than 13 percent of the total population, are living in actual destitution—families with incomes of $2,000 a year or less and single persons with incomes of $1,000 or less.

Another 1.6 million are living in poverty with total family incomes of $3,000 or less or single-person incomes of $1,500 or less—a total of more than 22 percent living in either poverty or destitution.

The study listed another 2,340,000 persons whose incomes were under $4,000 a year for families or $2,000 for single persons—persons lacking the comforts and some of the necessities of life. Of the 6.5 million in the three categories, almost 2 million live in Ontario.

Apart from the need for research at both federal and provincial levels to analyze the extent of poverty, the OFL demanded action on minimum wages, education, economic development to create jobs, housing and welfare legislation.

The new Ontario minimum wage of $1 an hour was called far too low to remove poverty and excludes too many who should be covered. In a separate resolution, the convention called for a $1.50-an-hour minimum now with periodic adjustments and inclusion of those in farming, domestic service, tourist operations and hotel and restaurant service currently omitted from coverage.

The statement said more resources should be devoted to education with cost no bar at any level of the system. Adult education should be assisted.

Long-Range Planning Urged

The federation called for long-range economic planning coupled with short-term measures such as tax cuts to low-income groups, an overhaul of the unemployment insurance fund to provide for at least a 30 percent increase in benefits, stepped-up government spending in housing, hospital and road construction and the encouragement of new industry.

It also suggested a complete revamping of the present antiquated welfare system in Ontario where no over-all standards are observed and administration at the local level is generally inefficient.

Pres. David Archer and Sec.-Treas. Douglas Hamilton were reelected by acclamation. Archer has held his post since 1959, Hamilton since the merger in 1956.

Chemical Workers Vote To Endorse Democrats

Miami Beach—In a loud and sustained unanimous voice vote, the Chemical Workers endorsed Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and his running mate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, at the union's 19th convention here. It was the first endorsement of a national political ticket in the union's history.

More than 500 delegates at the convention also doubled strike benefits by authorizing payments of $4 per day and $20 per week. As of press time, the delegates were considering a per capita tax hike from $2 to $2.55.

Top Officers Re-Elected

Top officers were re-elected and four of nine vice presidential positions were contested. The convention also heard Sen. Humphrey, via a radio hookup, appeal for their votes and assistance.

Some excitement was added to the proceedings by Hurricane Isbell, which passed close to Miami Beach. Heavy rains and high winds resulted.

The convention also heard Sen. Humphrey, via a radio hook-up, appeal for their assistance.

In a report to delegates, ICWU's executive board initially brought forth the suggestion that the convention endorse the Johnson-Humphery ticket by stating "it is the deep conviction of the board that the best interests of ICWU members demand full support" for the pair. They termed the Goldwater-Miller team "hip-shooting reactionaires" who are "so viciously anti-union that we must urge their total defeat."

Union Pres. Walter L. Mitchell continued the appeal in his keynote address, saying Pres. Johnson took the nation from its state of shock during last November, "and with a firm hand began to get programs and policies favorable to our people through the Congress." Speaking of the threat of communism, Mitchell then reverted to a theme of the New Frontier of John F. Kennedy by stating:

"The most important race is the one to capture man's imagination, to capture the hearts and minds of men everywhere so that there can be freedom all over the world."

The 55-cent per capita tax increase was described by Mitchell vitally needed to realize several important ICWU goals. They include, he said, making permanent those persons presently in temporary positions in organizing programs, and attempting to organize "the number one giant of the chemical industry—du Pont."

He said ICWU has devised a program of cooperation with other unions in the organizing attempt at du Pont.

The convention also heard from Canadian speakers, including Canadian Labor Congress Pres. Claude Jodoin and New Democratic Party Leader T. C. Douglas, and from National COPE Dir. Al Barkan and Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.).

Facts, Statistics Distorted:

Reader's Digest Refuted on Employment Agency Smear

Manpower Grab," and carries a subtitle reading "Almost unnoticed, the U.S. Employment Service is undermining one of our basic freedoms —the right to choose one's life work."

That, like others in the article, charge is utterly without foundation, according to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Here are the major charges in the Digest article, compared in each instance to the truth:

Budget Rise

Digest: The USES budget "is around $200 million—double what it was in fiscal 1959." This is festooned with rhetoric about "skyrocketing expenditures," designed to suggest a ballooning bureaucracy.

In actual fact, the budget increase since 1959 has been 62 percent. More than half of this is accounted for by higher salaries and office costs in the 1,900 employment offices—items that are basically determined by the 50 states. The increase in personnel since 1959 has amounted to 30 percent.

Even more relevant, 1959 was the low point of a 10-year period in which USES suffered a steady decline in resources—a total cut of 14 percent, while the nation's work-force was growing 20 percent. From 1959 on, Congress awoke to the fact that mounting manpower problems — automation, faster expansion of the work-force, greater demand for youth services and many more—required a bigger and stronger employment service.

With all this, the USES in 1963 was actually smaller in relation to the size of the national economy than was the USES in 1948.

'Monopoly' Charged

Digest: "If it (USES) succeeds, every working man and woman in America will one day be forced to seek work through government employment offices."

This is the magazine's basic theme. Some of its supposed "proof" is cited below. But in general, the fact is that USES—now 31 years old—accounts for only 16 percent of job placements today. If its goal is a "monopoly" (which of course it is not) the USES has been highly unsuccessful.

Moreover, contrary to the article's innuendos, no one is forced to use USES services. Those who apply for unemployment insurance benefits automatically are listed as job applicants and avail themselves of the free guidance, counselling and placement services USES offers. No employer, no college, no high school, no union is obliged to use USES services.

For employers and unions, USES can screen out potential applicants who are clearly unfitted for the jobs available. This saves time and money for all concerned—employer, union and applicant alike. For colleges and high schools, local USES experts can provide senior students with facts about the number and nature of job opportunities in the area; can administer standard aptitude tests, and can generally be helpful in guiding the new graduate toward a line of work.

What must be understood, above all, is that employers, unions, colleges, high schools, workers and students are wholly free to disregard whatever USES may suggest.

The employer who has a so-called "exclusive agreement" with USES may do all his hiring from among workers who show up at the gate. And the union which has dropped its hiring hall in favor of USES screening will in the same way accept as members those who are hired.

The college and high school graduates whose USES tests suggest that they should be scientists may well become bus drivers, and vice versa. No one—least of all USES—claims that test results are absolute. And no one—least of all USES—proposes that the results should be binding on the individual.

Digest: "Walter Reuther has gone so far as to suggest a form of fiscal pressure to whip recalcitrant employers into line."

What Walter Reuther suggested, as chairman of the AFL-CIO Economic Policy Committee, was a financial inducement for employers who listed their unfilled jobs with USES. This would not impose any obligation on employers to hire through USES; it would simply help the agency to learn how many and what kind of jobs are available. Inasmuch as unemployed workers must register with USES to get benefits, it seems reasonable to ask employers to list the help they need.

Digest: "The USES has turned its back on the unemployed. Instead of concentrating on helping our jobless, the agency is expanding more and more into fields where it is neither needed or wanted."

Not a Welfare Agency

This refers to the fact that USES services are available to employed workers who want better jobs, or jobs more in keeping with their skills or preferences. The law that established USES in 1933 specifically provided for this sort of service, and rightly so; the graduate engineer who is scrubbing floors to keep himself off the unemployment rolls is surely entitled to apply for something better. And the employer, when he turns to an agency he helps to finance through his taxes, should be able to ask for an accountant as well as a dishwasher. USES is not and should not be a welfare agency.

Yet in fact, 97 percent of USES placements are unemployed persons. How can this be described as turning the back on the jobless? In view of the national need for an upgrading of skills, the USES might better be criticized because only 3 percent of its placements could be placed in that category.

Digest: "USES is now finding new jobs for more than a quarter million professional and managerial personnel each year."

To the Digest, to Bow and to the fee-charging employment agencies, this is the rub. For if USES places a $70 a week stenographer, the agencies will lose only $140; but if USES places a $300 a week engineer, the agencies will lose at least $1,000 and maybe more.

Miscast Hero

Finally, of course, the Digest insists that USES cannot possibly be doing what it says it is doing—that there must be hanky-panky.

Digest: "One state administrator, Willard P. Dudley, employment director of the Ohio Bureau of Unemployment Compensation, has courageously stood up to USES' ambitious bureaucrats."

The gist of this is that the Cleveland office was padding its placement figures and that Dudley heroically published an expose. What really happened was that Dudley was repeatedly prodded by USES to investigate a charge that the Cleveland figures were phony. Finally he reluctantly complied, and then told the press that federal people had "begged me not to release" the results. A day later he retracted that statement.

In essence, the Digest hero was in reality the villain. And so it goes throughout the article. Yes, there are incompetents in USES, as there are in every walk of life. Yes, there are shortcomings in USES, just as there are in the editorial offices of the Reader's Digest and everywhere else..

But it is clear that the USES has infinitely less interest in controlling the job choices of American workers than the Reader's Digest has in controlling the political choices of American voters.

The AFL-CIO is not entirely happy with USES. It ought to be stronger. The AFL-CIO regrets that workers paid over $100 million last year to private, fee-charging employment agencies, that ths kind of tribute, exacted from the jobless, represents a failure by our public employment service. There is a place for the private agencies, but they cannot and should not substitute for USES.

The the undeniable facts of life —a rapidly-growing labor force and an unprecedented technological revolution—demand the utmost public and private efforts to promote full employment; and further, the needs of the time require the fullest utilization of the nation's skills.

The AFL-CIO does not call for abolition of private employment agencies. They, too, can help fill the nation's needs. The statement of principle adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council still stands:

"American workers, whether they work for wages or salaries, whether they are unemployed or employed, whether they are physically well or partially disabled, and whether they have had job experience or are just getting out of school, all should be able to choose counseling, guidance and placement help when they need it without having to commit their future earnings for the privilege.

"The nation has an obvious interest in the best training, placement and utilization of its manpower in an age of rapid technological development. The services of a well-equipped and staffed public employment service are indispensable to meeting that objective."

Rightists Financed By Reader's Digest

The Reader's Digest and its publishers, DeWitt and Lila Wallace, have been leading financial "angels" to several right-wing organizations.

The Wallaces are listed as having given $10,350 to Americans for Constitutional Action. The Reader's Digest Foundation reported grants totaling $10,500 to the American Economic Foundation during the 1959-61 period, and smaller amounts to such conservative causes as Freedoms Foundation, Liebman's American Afro-Asian Educational Exchange, Harding College—a center of right-wing propaganda—and the Foundation for Economic Education.

Cigarmakers Hail Gains On 100th Anniversary

New York—Increased cigar sales as a result of changes in smoking habits is causing a growth in membership of the Cigarmakers, Pres. Mario Azpeitia told delegates to the union's 33rd convention here, which coincided observance of its 100th anniversary.

Although the cigar industry hit bottom a few years ago due to the impact of automation and the embargo on Cuban tobacco, Azpeitia reported conditions are now on the upswing. He estimated today some 30,000 workers employed in the entire industry turn out annually around 7 billion cigars compared with a half century ago, when approximately 125,000 workers produced about 4 billion cigars a year.

Pointing to the union's pioneer efforts in behalf of working people under the leadership of men like Samuel Gompers and Adolph Strasser, Azpeitia warned delegates against being lulled into complacency about the problems of today.

"As one of the nation's oldest unions we know only too well that we cannot afford to take anything for granted," he declared. "Seventy-five years ago Cigarmakers helped lead the fight for the eight hour day, for abolition of child labor, sanitary working conditions in shops and the union label. In 1964 we have to fight equally hard to win things like a realistic minimum wage law, hospital care for the aged, equality of opportunity in employment and elimination of restrictive legislation under which unions have to function."

Johnson, Humphrey Backed

Convention delegates unanimously adopted a resolution endorsing Lyndon B. Johnson for President and Hubert H. Humphrey for Vice President. They responded enthusiastically when COPE Dir. Al Barkan told them that if unionists can elect the right congressmen in the 1964 election "we can wipe out the open shop laws in the 20 states that now have them."

A message from Johnson congratulated the CMIU on its 100th anniversary and noted that the union over the past century has contributed much to the development of the free trade union movement in the United States. Another message from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany also hailed the achievements of the union over its 100-year history.

Azpeitia was reelected to a fourth 4-year term. Two new vice presidents were elected to the union's executive board, Elmina Crews of Jacksonville, Fla., and Mrs. Leona Wolford of Waycross, Ga. Other board members re-elected included Helen G. Milberger of Scranton, Mary Barber of Jacksonville, Frank Diez of West Tampa, Mauricio Torre of Tampa, Maude Lenz of Richmond and Louise M. Diaz of Tampa.

2 Unions Add Endorsements Of LBJ Ticket

Two more AFL-CIO unions have endorsed Pres. Johnson for reelection and Sen. Humphrey for vice president—the Lithographers & Photoengravers, the newest affiliate, and the Bookbinders.

The LPIU endorsement, announced by Pres. Kenneth J. Brown, pointed out that neither of the predecessor unions had ever endorsed political candidates.

However, he added, "the issues in this election are of such great significance for labor" that the union's international council felt it a duty "to take their stand with the AFL-CIO" and back the Democratic candidates. Brown called the position of Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Republican presidential aspirant, "contrary to everything that labor had stood for."

Johnson was notified of the council's action in a message that added a pledge of active support.

The Bookbinders' endorsement was made by top officers in accordance with instructions from the recent convention, held just before the Democratic national convention, to give approval to the candidates endorsed by the AFL-CIO. They urged all members to help elect the two Democrats.

C. J. Foehn Dies, IBEW Leader

San Francisco—Vice Pres. Charles J. Foehn of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers died at the University of California Hospital here after an illness of several months. He was 60.

A member of Local 6 since 1923 who served as its business agent from 1938 to 1960, he was named to the IBEW international executive board in 1942 and had been vice president in charge of West Coast activities since 1960.

A National Consensus

AS THE 1964 presidential campaign turns into the home stretch, a national consensus appears to be forming that the best interests of the country call for the election of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey by an overwhelming margin.

Unions that have never previously taken a position in a presidential campaign have broken long-standing precedents and endorsed the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

Business leaders and an astonishingly growing number of newspapers and magazines, completely identified with the Republican Party in past elections, are publicly backing the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

Scientists, educators, farmers, lawyers—the whole range of groups and interests that make up American life—are forming committees to support Johnson and Humphrey and working actively for their election.

Liberal groups which have reservations about some Administration policies have pushed aside their differences and are strongly urging the election of Johnson and Humphrey.

This movement toward a national consensus for the Democratic candidates was triggered by the nomination of Sen. Barry M. Goldwater at the Republican National Convention in San Francisco in July and picked up momentum and direction as the Goldwater campaign unfolded.

TODAY, 16 days before American voters go to the polls, the shape and tone of the Goldwater-Miller campaign has become unmistakably clear. It is a wild, reckless, irresponsible campaign flailing around wildly for an issue—any issue—that will save the GOP ticket from disaster.

Throughout the Goldwater campaign there has been the transparent appeal to racism, to fear and suspicion and distrust, to the malignant appeal of McCarthyism. There have been unremitting personal attacks on Johnson and Humphrey, open-end innuendoes and even an attack on the Democratic Party as "fascist."

This is the low road in American political life, an approach that the American voter has consistently rejected and should bury under a flood of votes Nov. 3.

Given the nature of the Goldwater-Miller campaign, the record of the GOP presidential and vice presidential candidates and the quality and character of the groups actively supporting them—the John Birch Society and the Ku Klux Klan are representative—the Goldwater bid for national leadership must be decisively defeated.

The campaign of Johnson and Humphrey has been keyed to the nation's problems and its future. They have made their case—and made it well. They will build on the solid structure of the past 30 years—a structure built by a national consensus.

If the destruction threatened by the Goldwater-Miller ticket of everything the nation holds precious is to be prevented—not only at this election but in years to come—there must be a great outpouring of votes.

Overconfidence in the strength of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket that will keep voters at home, apathy because of the published reports of polls that will prevent a record turnout, will be of direct aid and comfort to the Goldwater forces.

If the nation is to continue on the path of the last three decades, the Goldwater bid must be crushed on Nov. 3.

The Choice: Builder or Wrecker

On 19th Anniversary:

Johnson Hails United Nations As Mankind's Hope, Inspiration

THE UNITED NATIONS is dedicated to the same "noble principles" that have made this country's Declaration of Independence and Constitution "a constant beacon of hope and inspiration for all mankind," Pres. Johnson declared in a proclamation designating Oct. 24 as United Nations Day.

For 19 years, he wrote, "it has repeatedly and decisively proved to be an increasingly effective and respected action agency for world peace, progress and prosperity." It has "kindled" a constantly increasing "recognition and practice throughout the world," he added, "of those humanitarian principles to which this country has long been dedicated."

It was on Oct. 24, 1945, that the number of ratifications of the UN Charter required to bring the organization into legal existence was attained. In 1947 the UN passed a resolution stating that the date "shall henceforth be officially called 'United Nations Day' and shall be devoted to making known to the people of the world the aims and achievements of the United Nations.

In his proclamation, Johnson pointed out that the UN has earned the respect of this country and all others for its "inestimable contributions to international peace, justice and understanding," and declared it "essential" that the UN be supported by the people of its member nations.

He called for "a wide dissemination to our people of significant and accurate information" about the UN and urged officials at all levels of government to encourage "appropriate observance" of the day in cooperation with such organizations as the United Nations Association for the U.S.A.

The UN has had the strong support of U.S. organized labor from its inception. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. George M. Harrison have served in this country's delegations to the UN General Assembly. The AFL-CIO is one of the member-organizations affiliated with the UN Association of the U.S.A.

THE UN HAS HAD the steady opposition of the same radical right elements that have fought organized labor over the years. To counter some of the misconceptions these enemies have generated, the UN Association of the U.S.A. has published a program guide, "Facts for Fallacies," which answers current questions about the UN.

The booklet points out, for instance, that the UN has been able to take "many effective actions" without the participation of the Soviet Union, citing Korea, Iran, Greece, Lebanon and most recently the Congo. In addition, it says, "many refugees, technical assistance and specialized agency projects have been very successful" despite Soviet opposition, and answer those who feel the USSR has stymied the UN.

It concedes that in some cases UN action has not been as effective as it might have been because of Russian opposition, as in Hungary, but even there "UN resolutions and debate condemned the Soviet Union and opened the eyes of many nations to the real nature of Communist imperialism."

Also discussed is the question of what happens to the voting rights of a nation that fails to pay its financial contribution. The charter deprives a nation two years in arrears of its vote. The Intl. Court of Justice in an advisory opinion declared that special assessments—on which the Soviet Union and some other nations are now two years behind—are binding. The booklet notes that the matter may come up when the General Assembly meets next month. The U.S. position, it adds, is that the charter proviso should become effective automatically.

For 1964 the UN is costing each American an estimated 99.3 cents. The largest allocation goes to the special voluntary agencies, with 30.9 cents earmarked for the Technical Assistance & Special Fund alone. The regular UN budget accounts for 15.3 cents. Emergency activities, both military and economic, in the Near East, the Congo and Cyprus take a shade less than 10 cents.

The Intl. Labor Organization, of particular interest to workers, takes but 2.15 cents.

The UN was formed in San Francisco when representatives of 50 nations met to work out the basic charter for a world organization that would be more effective and more enduring than the League of Nations.

The U.S. Senate approved the charter by a vote of 89 to 2 on July 28, 1945 and it became effective three months later.

The purposes set out in the charter were to maintain international peace and security, to develop friendly relations between nations, to cooperate in solving international economic, social, cultural and humanitarian problems and to be a center for harmonizing the action of nations in attaining these common ends.

Morgan Says:

Memories of Eleanor Roosevelt Rise as 80th Birthday Is Marked

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EDT.)

NEW YORK—Several years ago, when I was helping Edward R. Morrow produce a radio program called "This I Believe," we persuaded Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt to record a three-minute thumbnail of her personal philosophy. I remember well the Saturday morning she arrived at the studio, without fanfare, a warm, direct greeting for everybody. Then, without any script, without a single note, she sat down before the microphone and in that inimitable Eleanor Rooseveltian voice, spoke simply of her beliefs.

Morgan

But when her brief credo was broadcast it caused a great commotion. Some clergymen especially objected to her statement that "I don't know whether I believe in a future life." One distinguished bishop attempted strenuously to have that observation deleted, to no avail. Serenely stubborn, Mrs. Roosevelt would have none of it. This was her view, an honest, respectful doubt.

"I believe that all you go through here must have some value," she had added, "therefore there must be some reason. And there must be some 'going on.' How exactly that happens I've never been able to decide . . . I came to feel that it didn't really matter very much because whatever the future held you'd have to face it when you came to it . . . and the important thing was that you never let down doing the best that you were able to do. . . .

"I think I am pretty much of a fatalist. You have to accept whatever comes and the only important thing is that you meet it with courage and with the best that you have to give."

That revealing incident and those brave, questing words came back to me from a pigeonhole of memory the other day when I received an announcement of nationwide plans to celebrate the anniversary of this remarkable woman's birth. On Oct. 11, the day before Columbus Day, Eleanor Roosevelt would have been 80 years old. And the postmen rang twice at 25 million American homes as a reminder of the occasion. That is to say, 175,000 members of the Letter Carriers volunteered to carry the message on their rounds in 6,000 cities.

The Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation sponsored a dinner in Washington at which Adlai Stevenson and Sen. Hubert Humphrey, who proposed the federal charter bill creating the foundation, spoke. There was a similar banquet in New York on the 12th with Ambassador Stevenson and UN Sec. Gen. U Thant on the program, followed by others in Chicago, Los Angeles and Miami. In addition more than 50 cities saw a half-hour tribute to her on television prepared by the foundation.

Proceeds from all these memorial festivities go to the foundation's programs continuing Mrs. Roosevelt's work for human rights, world peace, cancer research and aid to underprivileged children. AFL-CIO unions have pledged $3.5 million to these projects, have already given more than half that amount. Other groups and individuals—some 10,000 of them—have made substantial donations, too, but the money is quickly absorbed by the foundation's expanding activities.

One of the most significant and, if you'll pardon the expression, exciting of these is called the Human Rights Internship Program. This involves training volunteers, including graduates of the Peace Corps, to move into local communities where they are invited, to deal at the operational level, with problems of racial friction and other tensions involved in the civil rights issue.

In August, on his way to the Democratic convention in Atlantic City, Eleanor Roosevelt's grandson, Franklin D. Roosevelt III, went to Tarrytown, N. Y., to represent the family at the opening of a 10-day orientation seminar for the second group of human rights interns. But he became so excited at what he saw and heard that he skipped the predictable agenda at Atlantic City and remained for the whole stretch at Tarrytown as an observer. Young Roosevelt wrote Stevenson later that the experience represented "probably the most intensely rewarding 10 days of my life."

THE PERIPATETIC First Lady of the World, as she has been aptly called, would blush with both modesty and satisfaction at the impulse the grateful respect to her memory has given Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation works, especially in the world of young people which was hers.

"I am told by young people," she once wrote, ". . . that it's unfair they have to cope with a world they never made. But this is the common lot of man. What I think they tend to forget is that the world they hand on to their children will be a world they have made. If they do not like their inheritance, at least they have every opportunity to improve it.

"And that, I feel most strongly, is the great adventure of life, an adventure renewed for every generation."

She had another piece of advice that fits in here on her "four score" anniversary. ". . . We must learn to cast out fear," Eleanor Roosevelt said. "People who 'view with alarm' never build anything."

Washington Reports:

'The Conservation Congress' Praised by Church and Javits

THE 88TH CONGRESS can be called "the conservation Congress" as well as the education and the civil rights Congress, Sen. Frank Church (D-Ida.) declared as he told how, after 10 years of effort, the Wilderness bill and the Land & Water Conservation Fund were approved this year.

Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.), interviewed on the same program, Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio series, declared that legislation to protect U.S. wilderness acres should have been passed "10, 20, 30, 40, 50 years ago."

"We would have been very much better off as a nation, as a result," Javits said. "But better late than never."

The Wilderness bill incorporates areas in national parks and national forests, already publicly owned, into a permanent wilderness system. It also requires a review of other so-called primitive areas to determine if they, too, should be included in the wilderness system, or whether certain parts may be made available for commercial interests, such as mining and lumbering.

Church said the Land & Water Conservation Fund is a kind of supplement to the wilderness program since it sets up the first federal aid program to provide states with matching money for public recreational purposes and to develop outdoor recreational facilities. He said this is an important adjunct, since 90 percent of the nation seeks "developed recreation facilities."

THE STATE of New York has done a good job in conservation, Javits declared. He reported that Art. 14, Sec. 1, of the state constitution specifies that "the lands of the state now owned, or hereafter acquired, constituting the forest preserve, shall be forever kept as wild forest land."

He said Blue Line State Park, in the Adirondacks region, is larger than Yellowstone, Yosemite, Glacier and Grand Canyon Parks combined.

Vested interests and a general public lethargy have caused the delay in enacting the legislation, according to Church, who introduced the bill.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

EN ROUTE WITH JOHNSON—Pres. Johnson headed toward the final two weeks of the campaign with his voice slightly hoarse, a slight case of sniffles, his hand bandaged to protect the wounds of thousands of handshakes, but his mood was one of buoyancy.

He could see ahead, it appeared, not only an election victory on Nov. 3 but a country that would remain reasonably united for national purposes despite the strains and divisions generated by a hard-fought campaign.

This is what he has been seeking. He has preached the gospel of unity, Johnson style, in every speech of the campaign and the gospel of common sense, Johnson style, in state after state.

He has talked turkey to the voters when he felt it desirable—notably in New Orleans, where the crowd gasped at the boldness with which he reproached his fellow white southerners for their preoccupation with racial antagonisms.

"We have a law of the land and I signed it," he said in a pointed reference to the Civil Rights Act that had given already resentful Democratic old guardsmen an excuse to jump to Sen. Goldwater.

He spoke of the South's economic gains under New Deal programs and Democratic programs that followed. He spoke of rising per capita income, of the need for still higher economic status, of the need for better education for all Americans regardless of where they were born.

But for the last 20 years all you've heard in election campaigns is "Negro, Negro, Negro," the President said, and he appealed to the South to rise to its best instincts instead of remaining sunk in ancient passions and unreasoning fear.

The crowd gasped, but it also cheered him—this man of the Southwest who, just a few months ago, seemed likely to lose all or nearly all the electoral votes of the Old Confederacy.

THE BUOYANCY of spirit that carries the President on comes from the enormous crowds he has met at every stop—2 million people in 10 states in a recent tour, he estimates, and for the sense of communication he believes the crowds feel toward him and he toward them.

His theory on this was spelled out explicitly in several recent speeches. The President needs to mingle with the people, he needs the help of all groups, and unless he can meet them and listen to what they say, no President can do his job.

"Americans know that the presidency belongs to all the people, and they want the President to be President of all the people," was the way he phrased it in the Wilkes-Barre—Scranton area of Pennsylvania.

He has laid forth very little about future programs, but he has defended the reforms and advances of the past 30 years that were laid under attack by the Republican nomination of Goldwater. He has defended the firm but rational and prudent foreign policy that for 20 years, as he said it, has saved freedom and spared the world the holocaust of nuclear war.

He believes the people have listened and believed him when he warned that this election is a choice between those who want to build on these foundations and those who want to wreck them.

HE WANTS a national victory, naturally, as all presidents do to vindicate their own leadership. He especially wants it both as the successor to John F. Kennedy and to establish that in winning he was able to conduct the kind of campaign that left the people with a sense of unity.

THE 88TH CONGRESS passed a Wilderness bill 10 years after Sen. Frank Church (D-Ia.), left, introduced the measure, he reported in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) said on the same program that such legislation should have been passed 50 years ago.

Meany Gives Labor's View of Election

Printed below is the full text of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's address, "Labor Views the Election," over the nationwide radio network of the American Broadcasting Co., Oct. 12. Copies may be obtained from the AFL-CIO.

MY REMARKS tonight are addressed to the men and women of the trade unions of America and to their families.

But I hope that many other citizens—not only members of unions but Americans in every walk of life—will also listen.

For, in facing the crucial issues in the coming national election, we of the AFL-CIO have no special or unique cause to plead, separate and apart from the interests and welfare of the public at large.

We all share the desire to see wise, experienced and responsible leadership in the White House—the kind of leadership that can be relied upon to work effectively for world peace, to promote economic and social progress, and to defend the rights and liberties of all Americans.

We all have an equal stake in these issues.

If war should come, all of our sons will answer the same call. All of our homes and families will stand in equal jeopardy.

If our economy should falter, payrolls, sales and profits will decline together. The lost job, the foreclosed farm and the business failure are linked in the same chain of cause and effect.

If the civil rights or civil liberties of one man or one group are impaired or denied, the rights and liberties of all are in danger. Freedom and justice cannot be divided and parcelled out in ratio to one's wealth, position or power and still remain the shields of our society.

Americans First

The members of organized labor are Americans first and trade unionists second. We believe that the first duty of good citizenship is to participate fully and responsibly in the political life of this nation—to register, to inform oneself on the issues and the records of the candidates, and vote on election day for those who will best serve America.

That is why the AFL-CIO carries on an active program of political information and education. That is why we maintain, evaluate and publish the records of candidates for public office.

And that is the spirit in which I speak to you tonight.

The Republican candidate for President, Sen. Goldwater, began his campaign as "a choice, not an echo." Yet, as the days have passed, his arguments have sought to blur the clear image of the man and to obscure the real nature of the choice.

Yesterday, he was the war hawk, with one solution for every international problem—the bomb. Today, he has sprouted the wings of the dove, proclaiming that peace is wonderful and promising to end the draft.

Yesterday, he was for extremism in the defense of liberty. Today, well, perhaps just a little bit of extremism, now and then.

Yesterday, he was engaged in an assault upon the foundations of our social security system. Today, he says he is all for social security and only wants to protect the aged from receiving hospital insurance benefits under that system.

Yesterday, he opposed and voted against a reduction in federal income taxes. Today, he promises an annual reduction in taxes, every year for five years, come rain or shine and regardless of the needs of the nation or the state of the world.

Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey

Yesterday, he was billed as the Great Conservative. Today, after a few short weeks of campaigning, he has become the Great Question-Mark.

That is why it is essential to know the record, not just of today's speeches, but of yesterday's votes and actions.

Out of confusion of shifting positions on specific issues, Sen. Goldwater has put forward two broad claims for his candidacy. He says that he is for individual freedom and against crime in the streets.

One is tempted to say, simply, "who isn't?", but the matter merits closer examination. Both questions are of vital concern to us and to all the American people, but on neither score does the record of Sen. Goldwater serve to inspire confidence.

He does not, for example, believe that trade unions should be free. We believe fredom is the lifeblood of the labor movement. Real labor unions simply cannot exist except in a free society.

Careless though he is with the phrase, not even Sen. Goldwater can accuse the AFL-CIO of being "soft on communism."

We have been fighting this insidious force where it counted, in the plants, on the docks, and among the working people of Europe, Latin America and Africa—while Sen. Goldwater was holding the fort against communism from an armchair in his Phoenix home.

We in the AFL-CIO have nothing to learn from the senator about the value and price of freedom. Perhaps we could even teach him something, if he cared to learn.

His particular version of freedom is a very narrow, one-sided thing.

'No Worse Enemy'

He has supported every effort to rob unions of their freedom and to subject them to far-reaching government controls. He has sought to deprive labor of the freedom to bargain with employers on an industry-wide basis. He has sponsored a national "right-to-work" bill, which would strip all unions of the freedom to negotiate union security clauses in their agreements with employers. The institution of free collective bargaining, so vital to the standards and welfare of working men and women, has no worse enemy in public life than Sen. Barry Goldwater.

To the underprivileged who are most in need of the aid and encouragement of a humane government, he offers only the freedom to do without. Those who are poor, he says, deserve it because they have "low intelligence or ambition." In other words, they were not smart enough to inherit a department store.

To the low income family, he offers the freedom of the slum. He has voted against every slum clearance and public housing measure.

To the elderly and infirm, he offers the freedom to seek private charity. He has voted against increasing payments to the aged and to the blind, and against the provision of hospital insurance benefits through social security.

To the exploited worker, he offers the freedom to work at the lowest wage the worst employer chooses to offer. He has voted against every extension or improvement of the minimum wage.

To the jobless worker, he offers the freedom to starve. He voted against additional temporary aid to the long-term unemployed who have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits. He voted against retraining programs designed to give them an opportunity to find another job.

To the victims of discrimination, he offers the freedom to learn to like the barriers and humiliations that confront them daily. He voted against equal employment opportunities and equal access to public services and facilities.

The kind of freedom for which Sen. Goldwater speaks would benefit only a few: The unscrupulous who want the freedom to prey upon the unwary consumer; the chiselling employer who wants the freedom to wear out a working man's life for less than a living wage; the landlord who seeks exorbitant rents for miserable slums; the bigot who wants the freedom to deny basic human rights because of race, creed or color.

We in the AFL-CIO, on the other hand, believe that the quality of freedom and justice in any nation is measured, not by the advantages enjoyed by the rich and the powerful few, but by the rights, standards and opportunities afforded to all.

By that measure we can only conclude that the election of Sen. Goldwater, far from advancing the cause of freedom in America, would gravely threaten the rights and freedoms we now possess.

That conclusion is further reinforced when we consider the Senator's prescriptions for dealing with the problem of crime.

He has sought repeatedly in this campaign to make local crime a national issue and to lay it at the door of the President and/or the Supreme Court.

It can, of course, be pointed out that Phoenix, Ariz., where Sen. Goldwater exercises a far greater degree of local civic influence than either, has a far higher crime rate than Washington, D. C., and ranks among the very worst in the country in that respect. But I am sure that the high crime rate in Phoenix is not the senator's fault; any more than it is the fault of the President or the Supreme Court of the United States.

Nevertheless, when you have separated the pure politics out of the senator's oratory, local crime is still a matter of concern to every thoughtful citizen. And, since he raised the issue, let us see whether there is anything in Sen. Goldwater's record or program that commends him on this score.

During his service in the Senate, he had a number of opportunities to take a position on proposals that would have helped in the war against crime—and he failed every test.

In 1961, the Senate acted on six measures put forward by Atty. Gen. Kennedy to aid law enforcement officers in the campaign against interstate racketeers. Sen. Goldwater was absent and did not vote.

Again, he showed no interest, and did not vote, when the Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Offense Control Act was before the Senate.

Another part of the crime picture is the unrestricted interstate sale of firearms. The worst crime of our century, the assassination of Pres. Kennedy, was accomplished with a mail order rifle. After this tragedy, Sen. Dodd of Connecticut introduced legislation to prohibit the interstate sale of firearms to children, convicted criminals and the mentally deranged. As a member of the National Rifle Association, which lobbies against any restrictions on the purchase of arms, however, Sen. Goldwater has consistently opposed any regulation of the sale of guns.

How, then, would the senator fight crime?

Would Stack Courts

Well, he says, he will, if elected, stack the courts with judges who are less concerned with the rights of persons accused of crime.

If that does not work, he will offer an amendment to the Constitution, and ask the Congress to change the rules of judicial procedure, so as to limit the power of the federal courts to enforce the Bill of Rights in behalf of the individual confronted by the police power of the state.

And this is the man who claims to be an advocate of individual freedom and an opponent of state control over the lives and affairs of citizens.

If there is anything more disturbing and more dangerous than the local crime rate, it is the prescription that Sen. Goldwater offers for dealing with it.

Crime has many roots.

Poverty breeds crime. A slum environment nourishes it. The absence of opportunity, economic desperation and despair help to make it grow.

A successful war on crime cannot be waged without a sustained attack upon the sources and breeding places. More decent housing, better schools, more and better jobs and opportunities for economic improvement are all vital ingredients of any effective campaign against crime.

Pres. Johnson's anti-poverty program is an important step forward in this direction. Slum clearance, housing programs, aid to education, manpower retraining, equal employment opportunities legislation and other measures which strike at the conditions which foster crime will do far more to eliminate that blight than any increase in the rate of convictions and imprisonment.

More Jails, Fewer Schools

Sen. Goldwater has, without exception, opposed and voted against each of these measures. If his philosophy prevailed, we would have more jails but fewer schools; longer prison sentences, but fewer employment opportunities; harsher courts, but fewer decent homes. We would, in short, have less freedom but more criminals.

The senator's pretense to the role of crime-buster is just as false and misleading as that of Goldwater, the Freedom Fighter. In either pose, he represents far too great a risk to entrust with the direction of the nation's destiny.

But our stand on this national election is not merely a negative one, based solely on the obvious deficiencies of the Republican candidate. We are first and foremost, in a very positive way, strongly in favor of the election of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert Humphrey.

In his 10 months as President, Lyndon Johnson has proved that he is a man of the people—all the people.

He has supported and initiated programs that really mean constructive freedom—not just license for the few, but freedom for all.

And the record of Hubert Humphrey on this score is also clear and eloquent.

Lyndon Johnson and Hubert Humphrey believe in the freedom of workers to promote democracy on the job—the freedom to organize and to bargain collectively with employers.

Fundamental Freedoms

And they believe in those other fundamental freedoms that were restated in the Atlantic Charter, lifting and inspiring all the peoples of the earth in an hour when freedom was in peril everywhere.

Freedom of speech; the freedom to be heard. That is a freedom the Goldwater supporters refused to give to opponents within their own party.

Freedom of worship—in a church that is secure from acts of terror, arson and bombing by the haters and fanatics of the right.

Freedom from want; freedom from poverty, freedom from crushing medical costs in old age; freedom from slum environments.

And freedom from fear—fear of economic disaster or of nuclear war.

And now we have added another—freedom of opportunity, for all Americans, to the limit of their abilities. Not a quota system, as has been falsely charged. Not discrimination in reverse, but genuine freedom for every worker and every student, to go as far as his talents will take him.

These are the freedoms that count.

To us in the trade union movement, these are the essential elements of true freedom.

And we are convinced that they can be assured, in this time of choice, only by the election, on Nov. 3, of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey as President and Vice President of the United States.

If Trend Continues:

Democrats Hoping for Sweep Of All 6 New England States

tions in parts of Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine.

The overwhelming support for the President among New England voters, as shown by just about every poll taken in the region, seems in part his heritage from the late John F. Kennedy, the martyred president who was a native son of the region.

Johnson is seen as a man of experience and good judgment who has carried on the Kennedy program and succeeded in pushing key segments of it through Congress following the late President's assassination. The prevailing feeling is that he should be given a full term to continue on this course.

The factor that accounts for most of the apparent defections among Republican voters of the region, however, is not so much Johnson as Goldwater.

The Arizona senator suffers from the image of a trigger-happy bomb-rattler in an area which has produced such internationally-minded Republican leaders as the late Sen. Warren Austin and Sen. George D. Aiken of Vermont and Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts.

On domestic issues, many Republicans who regard themselves as essentially conservative nevertheless seem appalled at Goldwater's suggestions that social security be made "voluntary," that the government has no responsibility for a system of public education, that the Rural Electrification Administration be turned over to private utilities.

New Englanders have a reputation for Yankee thrift and a regard for economy in government, and they are no more fond of taxes than voters in other areas. But they see basic contradictions in the GOP candidate's demands for sharp cuts in federal spending while he charges that Kennedy and Johnson have not maintained the nation's military strength.

Federal Aid Noted

The region has drawn substantial sums and new employment from such federal programs as worker retraining, slum clearance and urban renewal and aid to depressed areas. It casts a cold eye on anyone who suggests, as does Goldwater, that the states alone should handle these problems.

The Democratic Party's major strength in New England lies in the southern half—Connecticut, Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

In Connecticut, estimates of Johnson's lead range from 90,000 to 250,000 and could spell defeat for the state's only Republican House member, Rep. Abner W. Sibal from the 4th District. The state recently was redistricted, and although 51.7 percent of the voters within the confines of Sibal's new district went GOP in 1962, the Republican incumbent has an uphill battle against former Rep. Donald Jay Irwin, a Democrat strongly supported by organized labor.

Rep. Bernard F. Grabowski (D), elected at-large last time, now is running for the House seat representing the new 6th District and observers favor him over his opponent, former Mayor Thomas J. Meskill of New London. The remaining four House seats look safely Democratic, even that of the 2nd District where the incumbent, Rep. William St. Onge, narrowly won election two years ago and now is opposed by a moderate Republican who has refused to endorse Goldwater.

In the only other major race in Connecticut, Sen. Thomas J. Dodd is considered home clear in his contest with former Gov. John D. Lodge, brother of the former ambassador. Lodge has suffered heavily from his post-convention endorsement of both Goldwater and the 1964 Republican platform.

Republicans in Massachusetts are scarcely acknowledging their partisan kinship with Goldwater. Atty. Gen. Edward W. Brooke, the only Republican holding a key elective position in the state and the highest ranking Negro in any state government, is running an independent campaign for re-election and has refused to endorse Goldwater. He is the only person on the GOP state ticket currently favored locally to win.

The present House lineup in the state is 7 Democrats to 5 Republicans and there is little likelihood of any change. Rep. Sylvio Conte, who fought hard at the GOP convention for a stronger stand against extremism, won both the Republican and Democratic nominations and is thus assured re-election in the 1st District.

Bedside Campaign

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, youngest brother of the late President, is campaigning from a hospital bed for re-election, but local observers see little chance that voters will turn to his opponent, former Newton Mayor Howard Whitmore, Jr. Kennedy suffered severe back injuries when the light plane he was flying in cracked up en route to the Democratic state convention last June. His wife, Joan, has enthralled voters in personal appearance on behalf of her husband.

The tightest race confronts Lt. Gov. Francis X. Bellotti (D) and former Gov. John A. Volpe (R) in their bid for the governorship. The incumbent governor, Endicott Peabody, defeated Volpe narrowly in 1962, but this year lost his party's nomination to Bellotti in the primary.

The 41-year-old lieutenant governor has since won the support of both Peabody and Sen. Kennedy, and his youth, energy and campaign style remind observers here of a Kennedy. While Bellotti is still given the edge, he could suffer possible damage from indictments won by Brooke against former Democratic Gov. Foster Furcolo and other prominent figures in his administration.

In Rhode Island, Democratic Sen. John O. Pastore, the keynote speaker at the Democratic convention, and the two Democratic House members, Representatives Fernand J. St Germain and John E. Fogarty, are rated just about unbeatable in their bids for re-election.

Chafee Faces Fight

On the other hand, Republican Gov. John H. Chafee, elected by only 398 votes two years ago, has to buck the Democratic trend. At no time in recent history have Rhode Island voters returned to office during a presidential election year a Republican governor who originally was elected in an off-year. His Democratic opponent, Lt. Gov. Edward P. Gallogly, also is free of the partisan internal battles which lost the Democrats the State House in 1962. If the expected heavy plurality for Johnson develops, this also should benefit Gallogly.

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, seeking his second term as a Democratic senator from the rock-ribbed Republican state of Maine, is favored to win re-election against the challenge of conservative Rep. Clifford G. McIntire, who has clung to the Goldwater-Miller ticket. The results, however, could depend not only on Muskie's own vote-getting abilities but on the size of Johnson's expected victory.

While Maine has voted only once previously for a Democratic presidential candidate—Wilson in 1912—every sign points to success for Johnson this year. Recent polls by the Portland Sunday Telegram show the President increasing his lead over Goldwater —61 to 12 percent by latest count—although a large number of undecided votes remain.

Maine Democrats also hope a victory by the President will help them elect a congressman to the seat being vacated by McIntire. William D. Hathaway, state party chairman, is given a good chance of defeating his Republican opponent, State Rep. Kenneth P. McLeod, a militant Goldwater conservative. Hathaway came within 3,200 votes of beating McIntire for the seat two years ago.

In the 1st District, Rep. Stanley R. Tupper, the Republican incumbent, is the first GOP candidate to win the support of the Maine State AFL-CIO. He could win re-election on that basis alone in a tough fight with another liberal, Kenneth M. Curtis, former state coordinator of the Area Redevelopment Administration. Both candidates have pledged support of measures to repeal Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act, which permits the enactment of state so-called "right-to-work" laws. Tupper says he is running "on my own record" and has refused to endorse Goldwater's candidacy.

In Vermont, too, the chances of Democratic state candidates may well hinge on the size of Pres. Johnson's victory. State GOP leaders are concentrating on efforts to defeat Democratic Gov. Philip H. Hoff and preserve the seats of Sen. Winston L. Prouty and Rep. Robert T. Stafford.

Hoff, the first Democratic governor in 109 years, was elected narrowly two years ago in an off-year election. The vote is much heavier in presidential years, but Hoff is counting on the President's popularity to help swing most of the increase away from the GOP. Also working for him is a better economic picture in the state, including increased employment.

Wide Coattails Needed

Seasoned political observers suggest that the President's coattails will have to be "awfully wide" to carry State Sen. Frederick J. Fayette to victory over Prouty and State Sen. Bernard G. O'Shea over Stafford.

New Hampshire's Gov. John W. King, who broke 40 years of Republican rule to be elected as a Democrat in 1962, appears to have an excellent chance of re-election despite some healing of the massive Republican breach that helped him into the State House. Nevertheless, former Republican Gov. Wesley Powell, who broke with his party to endorse King two years ago, now is backing the GOP candidate, John Pillsbury, former majority leader in the state's House of Representatives.

Former Laconia Mayor J. Olivr Huot is given an outside chance of ousting incumbent Rep. Louis C. Wyman (R) in the state's first congressional district on the basis of Wyman's voting record, if anything more conservative than Goldwater's. But in the second district, Charles B. Officer, a geophysicist running in support of the Kennedy-Johnson program, faces heavy odds in his challenge to Rep. James C. Cleveland (R).

STANDING OVATION was given for Mrs. Joan Kennedy when she appeared at the convention of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO to deliver a message from her hospital-bound husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who is seeking re-election.

Bay State AFL-CIO Elects New President

Boston—Politics—internal and external—absorbed the 7th convention of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO here as the 1,100 delegates chose new leadership and roared their approval of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and his running mate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, at every mention.

The Johnson-Humphrey ticket and Democratic candidates for key state offices had already won the state labor body at a recent meeting of its Committee on Political Education.

Elected new president of the State AFL-CIO was Salvatore Camelio, New England director for the Rubber Workers, who defeated Richard B. O'Keefe, international president of the Leather Workers. Camelio succeeds J. William Belanger, who had headed the state central body since merger and was recently sworn in by Gov. Endicott Peabody as director of the State Division of Employment Security.

John Callahan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, state commissioner of labor and industries, was returned to one of two executive vice presidencies, and Daniel Murray, state legislative agent for the Steelworkers, was chosen for the second. Defeated in the three-way contest was George E. Carignan, New Bedford joint board manager for the Textile Workers Union of America.

In the closest competition for a top post, incumbent Sec.-Treas. James P. Loughlin, of the Hotel & Restaurant Workers, was re-elected by about 5,000 weighted votes of some 218,000 cast. He defeated James A. Broyer of the State, County & Municipal Employes, legislative agent for the State AFL-CIO. Contests also developed for nearly all of the 31 vice presidencies.

Peabody Backs Ticket

Peabody, who was upset in his Democratic primary bid for renomination by Lt. Gov. Francis X. Bellotti, urged the delegates "to support the Democratic ticket from top to bottom." He expressed agreement with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's editorial in the current issue of the American Federationist and declared, "I urge you to defeat those who want to turn back the clock."

"I do not need to remind you of Sen. Goldwater's anti-labor record," he added, citing the GOP presidential candidate's score of 53 "wrong" and 0 "right" according to COPE's compilations of key Senate votes.

Bellotti urged the delegates to maintain labor unity in the state following the convention's own spirited election just as, he said, the state Democratic Party had drawn together following its primary.

"If you think that a Barry Goldwater is something to smile at," he observed, "ask yourselves how he could have reached this ascendency.

"Does it not seem inconceivable that a candidate for the presidency could stand up at this time in history and say: 'I am against hospital care for the elderly' and 'The government has no right to educate the child'?"

Rounds of applause from the delegates and guests greeted Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy, representing her hospitalized husband in his campaign for re-election to the Senate. Mrs. Kennedy described her husband as "the busiest patient" the New England Baptist Hospital has ever seen. The senator, while undergoing treatment for severe back injuries suffered in a plane crash last June, has been in constant touch by telephone with his campaign lieutenants and his office in Washington, she reported.

The convention acted on more than 60 resolutions, including one setting forth these major legislative goals to be submitted to the next session of the Massachusetts General Court:

- Sickness disability payments to workers idled by illness.
- Revision of unemployment compensation laws to provide benefits for employes thrown out of work by a labor dispute.
- Higher minimum wages for workers depending on tips for a large portion of their income, and elimination of many of the exemptions from the overtime protections in present law.
- Increased benefits under workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance laws.

The Times—and Pay Are Out of Whack

Chicago — Supersonic planes and time zones posed some interesting problems at an Air Safety Forum conducted by the Steward & Stewardess Div. of the Air Line Pilots. For instance:

A stewardess on a Mach 3 flight (three times the speed of sound) could leave Manila at 11 a.m. on the fifth of the month, pass over Los Angeles at 10:30 p.m. on the fourth and land at St. Louis at 1:15 a.m. on the fifth. Then she could leave St. Louis at 2 a.m. on the fifth and land at Honolulu at 11:30 p.m. on the fourth.

What the stewardesses want to know is this: If she gets her pay up to and including the fifth, does she owe the company money when she lands in Honolulu on the fourth?

PRES. JOHNSON is welcomed to LaGuardia Airport in New York by Robert F. Kennedy, right, and Mrs. Kennedy as Johnson started a round of campaigning for Kennedy, Democratic nominee for U.S. senator in New York, and on his own behalf. Kennedy, brother of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy, resigned as U.S. attorney general to run against Sen. Kenneth Keating (R).

5 Key Labor Cases Scheduled For Review by Supreme Court

The U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to review lower court rulings in five labor cases, including one which the AFL-CIO said might endanger union contracts covering millions of workers.

The court will hear oral arguments in the five cases, including one with anti-trust law aspects involving the Meat Cutters and the Jewel Tea Co.

Collective bargaining agreements in the Chicago area since 1919 have regulated the operating hours of food store meat departments. Jewel Tea contends, and the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals held, that the agreements as to marketing hours violate the anti-trust laws.

The union and the AFL-CIO deny the agreement violates the anti-trust statute and claim, in addition, that the dispute is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board.

The Supreme Court scheduled the case for argument in conjunction with another anti-trust case held over from last term—the Mine Workers v. Pennington, involving UMW contracts with mine owners. The AFL-CIO was granted permission to file a brief supporting the unaffiliated union's arguments.

The court agreed to review the case of American Shipbuilding Co. v. NLRB, where the issue is whether employers have a right to engage in a lockout as a parallel to, and a corollary of, the workers' right to strike. The Boiler Makers and other craft unions charged the firm shut down its Chicago yard to force the unions to abandon their contract proposals. The same issue is involved in a pending case involving a lockout by Carlsbad, N. Mex., food chains of non-striking retail clerks.

Other cases to be reviewed:

- NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. The 1st U.S. Circuit Court reversed a labor board ruling that Metropolitan's office at Woonsocket, R. I., was an appropriate unit. The high court will hear argument in this, the only one of four insurance cases reversed by higher tribunals.

In seeking review, the NLRB said the dispute over whether unions may represent single units instead of state-wide units "unsettled the administration" of the labor law affecting "hundreds of thousands" of insurance employes.

- Radio & Television Broadcast Technicians, Local 1264, v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc. The Alabama Supreme Court ordered the local, an affiliate of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, to stop picketing a radio station whose new owners had replaced a union employe. The question at issue: Is the broadcasting service a single employer subject to NLRB rulings because of the volume of overall business or exempt because a number of stations are separately incorporated?

- Three cases involving the National Railway Labor Act will be heard as one. The Railway Clerks and the Machinists were affected when the D. C. District Court enjoined an election among 12,700 United Air Lines employes because the ballot did not have space for a "no union" vote.

NLRB Urged to Allow 'Reserved Gate' Pickets

The National Labor Relations Board has been urged by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. to rule that building trades unions may peacefully picket "reserved gates" at building sites.

Applying the Supreme Court's 1961 General Electric decision to the construction industry would prevent nonunion contractors from engaging in "legal gamesmanship," counsel for the department said in oral argument before the five NLRB members. The ruling permits industrial unions to picket "reserved" gates used by workers engaged in the employer's "normal operations."

Some employers have been establishing "separate" gates for nonunion workers at building projects to "convert legal primary picketing into enjoinable secondary boycotts," Counsel Louis Sherman told the board in an important test of picketing rights.

The case, which went directly to the full board without prior hearings, involves unfair labor practice charges filed by Markwell & Martz, Inc., Memphis, Tenn., contractors, against the New Orleans Building & Construction Trades Council in 1963.

The company accused the council of conducting an illegal boycott by picketing gates reserved for subcontractors at a Jefferson Parish, La., water filtration plant improvement. The contractor had "reserved" several gates for the use of subcontractors, and one gate for its own employes and those of suppliers. The council picketed all gates.

Picketing began Oct. 17, 1963, and was halted Jan. 16, 1964, when the NLRB's regional office issued a formal complaint against the unions and secured a court order forbidding picketing on the ground that it induced employes of the subcontractors to stop work.

At issue, Sherman told the board, is "whether unions in this industry can regain the right to picket which is essential to maintain" the prevailing union wage scale. The unions were protesting wages as much as 80 cents an hour below the union scale, the lawyer declared.

District 50 of the unaffiliated Mine Workers, intervening in the case, urged the NLRB to continue issuing court orders against the New Orleans pickets, according to Sherman. He charged that the UMW has a "cut-rate" contract in New Orleans and has been undercutting building trades wages throughout the United States.

UAW Editor Heads Jersey Labor Press

No Easy Answers:

World Complexities Stressed By Johnson

observing that the nuclear test-ban treaty and "hot line" between the White House and the Kremlin suggest that relations "have come a long way since shoes were banged on desks in New York and a summit conference collapsed in Geneva."

Johnson entered New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, plugging hard for senatorial and congressional candidates including former Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy in New York, after one day in Washington following eight solid days of strenuous campaigning clear across the nation.

He put his weight squarely behind Kennedy's election bid against Republican Sen. Kenneth B. Keating, who has walked a tightrope across the tangled thickets of New York State politics by refusing to endorse or say he will vote for Goldwater.

Kennedy Joins Tour

He rode in motorcades to and from La Guardia airport with the former attorney general beside him, took Kennedy with him to vote-heavy and often Republican Buffalo and Rochester, made a joint-appearance televised tape, and finally rode with the brother of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy in a 30-mile motorcade through Manhattan and Brooklyn before a Liberal Party rally in Madison Square Garden.

Earlier he had urged the voters of New Jersey to re-elect Democratic Sen. Harrison A. Williams and the voters of Pennsylvania to elect Genevieve Blatt, now state secretary of state, against incumbent Republican Sen. Hugh Scott. Williams is challenged by Bernard Shanley, once an aide to former Pres. Eisenhower in the White House.

Johnson's assault on the policy positions offered by Goldwater during the campaign became sharper and harder as he also stepped up his open endorsement of Democratic candidates for other offices.

The President in upstate New York bounced back vigorously from a day of hoarseness and what he termed the sniffles that may have caused him to shorten in actual delivery the text of some of his prepared remarks in New York City and Pennsylvania.

He said he stood by the viewpoints expressed in the full text.

Healthy, Vigorous

He looked healthy and vigorous again as Kennedy introduced him to an enthusiastic group at Rochester Airport. The roaring crowd included substantial numbers of union members carrying signs.

The President praised Kennedy warmly as a public servant who had proved his merit in high office and promised that, if the voters sent the former attorney general to the Senate, he himself would return with Kennedy to the upstate area to study problems and evaluate them.

His voice strong and clear again, Johnson picked up an earlier theme —that Goldwater in promising to reduce presidential activity seemed to be "running against the office rather than for it."

A "responsible government will not turn its back on the needs of workers whose jobs have been taken over by machines," but must "speed up" their training and transition into new industries, he said scornfully in Rochester.

"A responsible government will not gaze contentedly into the sky while millions of Americans live in poverty."

Education must be "put high on the agenda" or we will find that 8 million boys and girls entering the job force in the next 10 years "will not have finished high school" and 2.5 million "will not have seen the inside of a high school," he warned.

In Buffalo he spoke with heavy irony of those who said in 1960 that the country "was tired and worn out," that the people had "lost vitality and reached its peak."

Policies and programs "have got America moving," the President said, and "I will not be satisfied until every American who wants to work can find a decent job."

Our local public school systems "will crack under the pressure" of increased attendance unless "the states, short on new revenue, laden with new taxes, get help," he continued.

Johnson showed no outward sign of disturbance at the resignation of Walter Jenkins, a longtime aide, from his post as special assistant in the White House after published reports that he had been arrested on a disorderly conduct charge Oct. 7 and forfeited $50 in collateral, not going to trial.

There was a disclosure that he had been arrested in 1959 on the same charge.

Jenkins' resignation and the President's acceptance were announced by White House Press Sec. George Reedy, who said Jenkins had entered the hospital earlier in the day on doctor's orders because of "extreme fatigue."

More Campaigning

The President scheduled two evening speeches in western Ohio and two days of campaigning in Texas after his mid-Atlantic trip.

He had started his longest campaign swing by urging the voters of Louisiana, now thought to be leaning toward Goldwater, to think of the economic benefits of Democratic national programs, and then moved to counter Republican assaults on "big government."

"It doesn't do any good to be talking about crime," he said in Denver, and in an indirect but pointed reference to the GOP candidate's hostile Senate record on domestic reforms, added: "When the roll is called on measures that would drive out crime . . . and the ancient diseases of poverty, illiteracy and ignorance, you must answer those rollcalls."

"We in the West aren't about to turn in our sterling silver American heritage for a plastic credit card that reads, 'shoot now, pay later,'" he declared in Reno, Nev.

"I deeply regret the senseless argument during the campaign about what has already been decided," he said in Cleveland. Every New Deal-Fair Deal-New Frontier reform, he observed, had brought "cries from a small band of nay sayers, the fearful, the doubters," but now in the campaign all the programs "are under attack, today, tonight, tomorrow." We ought to be debating about "the present and the future, not the present and the past," he added.

Heavy Ticket-Splitting Seen:

5 Mid-Atlantic States Show Solid Strength for Johnson

ators and two Senate Democrats are running for re-election this year.

Two gubernatorial contests—in West Virginia and Delaware—are currently rated as very close. Both states have had Democratic governors, but neither incumbent is a candidate for re-election. West Virginia's William W. Barron is ineligible to succeed himself; Delaware's Elbert N. Carvel is a candidate for the Senate.

Here is how the election trend looked with several weeks of campaigning still to go:

NEW YORK

Senate: The race between Robert F. Kennedy and incumbent Republican Sen. Kenneth B. Keating is second only to the presidency in national interest. Every poll shows a very heavy percentage of still-undecided voters and observers predict that in the weeks before Election Day half a million New Yorkers may change their minds at least once, perhaps back and forth.

Kennedy, with a sharp, biting style reminiscent of his brother, has a chance to pick up considerably in the televised debates whose details have yet to be worked out.

Both parties have gone all-out for their candidates. Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N.Y.) has been campaigning almost as actively for his GOP colleague as he would for his own election. Gov. Rockefeller and other GOP officeholders see Keating as the hope to salvage their party from a Johnson victory. Former Pres. Eisenhower will urge votes for Keating in a series of television spot commercials.

On the Democratic side, political leaders with wide appeal to New York's diverse ethnic groups are coming into the state to rally support for Kennedy—including Connecticut's Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff, Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Anthony J. Celebrezze and Postmaster Gen. John A. Gronouski. The woman mayor of San Juan, Felisa Rincon deGautier speaks in Puerto Rican sections of the city, winning cheers as she punctuates her speeches with the refrain, "Kennedy, Kennedy, Kennedy." On a blustery October afternoon, tall, distinguished W. Averell Harriman, under secretary of state and former governor of New York, can be seen shivering in too-light a topcoat as he helps hold a street-corner audience waiting for the Kennedy motorcade.

A politically-unknown Conservative Party candidate, Henry Paolucci, gives the more rabid Goldwater supporters a chance to get back at Keating for his failure to endorse the GOP's presidential candidate. Paolucci is not expected to poll more than a tiny percentage of the vote, but even a small defection to the right could be costly to the senator. On the other hand, even a tepid endorsement of Goldwater would certainly lose Keating a large slice of the Democratic-Liberal votes he needs for re-election.

House: With Johnson leading the ticket, the Democrats appear likely to keep all of their present seats, and may solidify very close victories of two years ago in districts which had been gerrymandered to help the Republicans.

Democrats see a possibility of picking up one or two seats on Long Island. In the 5th District in Nassau County, where the GOP inumbent, Frank J. Becker, is retiring after six terms in Congress, they rate the race as even, with Herbert Tenzer running against Republican Ralph J. Edsell, Jr. Another Long Island seat which the Democrats hope for is that of GOP incumbent James B. Grover, Jr., in the 2nd District. A big Johnson vote would boost the chances of Democrat Edwyn Silberling.

Upstate, the Democrats are seeking to capture the seat held by the GOP vice presidential candidate, William E. Miller, including Niagara Falls and part of the Buffalo area, where Wesley J. Hilts, secretary-treasurer of Dist. 8 of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, is the Democratic candidate against Republican Henry P. Smith III.

NEW JERSEY

Senate: In closely-divided New Jersey, Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., who won in 1958 with 51.4 percent of the vote, could have expected a tight election race this year. But with Johnson leading the ticket, and a significant record of accomplishment as a freshman senator, Williams looks to most observers as a clear winner over Bernard M. Shanley, a former Eisenhower aide.

House: Democrats see a chance to tilt the 8-7 Republican margin in congressional seats the other way by winning the 12th District Newark area whose personally popular congressman, Republican George M. Wallhauser, is retiring. Paul J. Krebs, an Auto Workers official who once headed the former State CIO Council, is running against Republican David H. Weiner.

If 1964 turns out to be a big Democratic year, the party's candidate in the Atlantic City 2nd District, Thomas C. McGrath, Jr., will stand a chance to unseat incumbent Milton W. Glenn.

MARYLAND

Senate: At this stage in the campaign, Democrats are optimistic about the chances of Joseph D. Tydings, step-son of a former U.S. senator, to unseat incumbent J. Glenn Beall. Both sides view the Johnson margin of victory as decisive. Beall will benefit by some Democratic votes.

House: Six Democratic seats appear safe and Republican Rogers C. B. Morton is favored, at this stage of the campaign, to retain his southern-oriented Eastern Shore seat. In the 6th District is Republican Charles Mac. Mathias, Jr., with appeal to Democrats and independents. Democrats put on a massive voter registration drive, nominated an attractive candidate in Royce Hanson—a political science professor who has led the drive for one man, one vote legislative apportionment. If the district goes heavily for Johnson it could bring an upset.

WEST VIRGINIA

Senate: It would take a massive swing for Republican Cooper P. Benedict to unseat Robert C. Byrd and there are no signs of such an upheaval.

Governor: This is a much closer race, pitting Hulett C. Smith, who has been the state's commerce commissioner, against Republican Cecil H. Underwood, a former governor. Smith cites West Virginia's economic comeback under Democratic state and national administrations and is believed to be picking up strength.

House: West Virginia presently has four Democratic and one Republican congressmen, with little likelihood of any change. In the 5th District, James Kee is expected to be the third Kee to represent the Bluefield area in Congress. His father held the seat from 1933 until his death in 1951; his mother succeeded him and is retiring this year. The Republicans are rated as having an outside chance of unseating Democrat Ken Hechler in the 4th District, usually considered a marginal area.

DELAWARE

Senate: Republican John J. Williams is the most conservative mid-Atlantic senator running for re-election and is being opposed by the state's incumbent governor, Elbert N. Carvel. Most observers rate Williams ahead in his bid for a fourth Senate term. A Carvel victory would be something of an upset but, given a big Johnson vote, it could happen. Delaware incidentally is the only mid-Atlantic state which Republicans see any hope of carrying for Goldwater.

Governor: This is another close one. Democrat Charles L. Terry, Jr., stepped down from a long career as State Supreme Court justice, to make the race. His opponent is State Atty. Gen. David P. Buckson.

House: Rep. Harris B. McDowell, Jr., a respected legislator in Washington, increased his margin of victory from 50.2 percent of the vote in 1958 to 50.5 percent in 1960 and 52.9 percent two years ago, hardly a landslide but a steady rise. His Republican opponent, James H. Snowden, is considered an effective campaigner.

THE 88TH CONGRESS was the best since 1936 and the new 89th Congress should be even better if a Johnson victory brings in additional liberal congressmen, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller said on Labor News Conference. Around the table at the broadcast interview are, from left, Biemiller; Harry W. Flannery, program moderator; Neil MacNeil of Time Magazine, and Roy McGhee of United Press Intl.

Gain in Liberal Ranks Seen in New Congress

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller predicted that a Johnson-Humphrey victory on Nov. 3 will bring in with it a more liberal Congress which will complete the unfinished business of the 88th Congress.

He foresaw, in a network radio interview, enactment of such labor goals as hospital care for the aged, a shorter workweek, double time for overtime, a higher minimum wage and extended coverage under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

If the election should add 20 or 25 new liberals to Congress, he said, there would be a real chance to make needed revisions in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Biemiller, in the Labor News Conference interview, praised the record of the 88th Congress as "the most productive" since 1936.

Met Many Needs

"It is a Congress that has met many needs that had long been overlooked," he said. "It is a Congress that has broken new ground . . . that has passed important labor legislation."

He agreed that if Sen. Goldwater were elected President, it would be "the death knell for the basic programs of the labor movement."

The Republican presidential nominee, he said, would like "to repeal laws protecting the right of labor to organize and have national unions."

Biemiller added, however, that he doesn't think there is any chance of a Goldwater victory. On the contrary, he declared, "there is every indication that Pres. Johnson will be elected this fall" and that the new Congress will be "an even more liberal body than the current one has been."

The AFL-CIO legislative spokesman strongly supported the decision to scrap social security legislation this year rather than adopt a program which would likely rule out hospital care for the aged.

"The most important problem confronting the elderly people of this country is hospital costs," he stressed. The leading senior citizen organizations agreed completely with this policy, Biemiller noted.

He expressed regret that the Appalachia development bill was not enacted because it would have "created more jobs" in a depressed area.

Biemiller said that labor's strong stand for civil rights progress has not created a significant "backlash" problem.

"The labor movement," he said, "is more united than I have ever seen it in any other presidential campaign. I do not know of a single labor leader anywhere in the country who is for Sen. Goldwater."

Mrs. FDR Honored On 80th Birth Date

A thousand of the people who had worked with and loved Eleanor Roosevelt during the 78 years of her life gathered in Washington to mark the former First Lady's 80th birthday anniversary at a dinner to raise funds to carry on the work she had started.

The dinner, one of a number of anniversary observances sponsored by the Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Foundation, was described by Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, the Democratic vice presidential candidate, as "a birthday party" rather than a "memorial." He and other speakers reminisced with warm affection of Mrs. Roosevelt's lifetime of service in "the pursuit of public happiness."

UN Ambassador Adlai E. Stevenson, chairman of the foundation's board of trustees, said Mrs. Roosevelt's "unquenchable energy and forward looking interests" had made her "the youngest old lady we shall ever know."

Stevenson presented special awards to four leaders in the memorial foundation's fund drive: AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, and Mrs. Agnes E. Meyer, both vice chairmen of the foundation; AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, chairman of labor's Eleanor Roosevelt Memorial Fund, and Meyer Feldman, White House counsel.

Meany, responding for the award recipients, said that Mrs. Roosevelt's work for human rights and human welfare "is our work—our common goal."

Sec. of Commerce Luther H. Hodges was chairman of the dinner. Other speakers included Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., and Danny Kaye.

Aims at 5 Key States:

Goldwater Hits Out At Democrats, LBJ

Sen. Barry Goldwater, Republican presidential nominee, cast a "fascist organization" charge against the Democratic Party as his strategy board decided to concentrate on five major states and four major issues for the last weeks of the campaign, with heavy emphasis on television appearances.

Hitting his now almost constant theme that the "moral fiber" of the nation is "beset by rot and decay," he campaigned from the West Coast to the mountain states and traditionally Republican middle western states charging that the Johnson administration has "turned off the lights" in the White House, "lights of honesty, lights of leadership."

He assailed U.S. Supreme Court decisions forbidding the states to devise forms of prayer and other religious exercises for public school systems.

He denied—as he has felt compelled to do many times—that he is "trigger-happy," and announced in a taped television interview that he "personally feels" the country will "never engage in a nuclear war."

He doesn't think that either the Soviet Union or the U.S. "would be stupid enough to devastate cities that we can't afford to rebuild," he said.

'Real Nuclear War'

This was an apparent reversal of an earlier Goldwater statement that: ". . . . There will either be a war, or we'll be subjugated without war . . . real nuclear war . . . I don't see how it can be avoided—perhaps five, 10 years from now."

In his television appearance, in speeches in Salt Lake City, Topeka, Des Moines and Milwaukee, the GOP candidate brought into question, directly or indirectly, the moral integrity of the Administration.

He said in Culver City, Calif., that a "sick, weak attitude about communism permeates Washington" and that he "could think of ways" to make communism "mellow."

He spoke out on "extremism"—an issue which he rejected as a theme for the party platform last July—saying that if he was elected extremist groups that have "infected" the country would be exposed to the "spotlight of publicity."

He named the John Birch Society and the Ku Klux Klan specifically—a reversal of the Republican convention's decision when it rejected a minority platform plank offered by New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller—and said such preachers of hate "would have their robes pulled open so the American people could see" them for what they are.

40 Percent Claimed

Republican National Committee Chairman Dean Birch released the results of what he said was a private opinion survey showing that the Arizona senator's vote proportion had climbed to 40 percent. Goldwater also said that great numbers of individuals are financing the GOP campaign with small contributions, most of them between $5 and $25, and that more television time could be purchased than previously planned.

Former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon campaigned widely for Goldwater, appearing relaxed and at ease as he sought to strengthen Republican candidates at state and congressional district levels. He said in San Francisco that the party had fielded "an exceptionally fine team" of candidates which should "help close the gap which seems to exist between Goldwater and Johnson."

He said a State Dept. "clique" was responsible for the Bay of Pigs debacle for which the late Pres. Kennedy publicly took responsibility in a televised press conference in 1961.

Rep. William E. Miller, the Republican vice presidential nominee, campaigned in the GOP's "key objective" states in defense of Goldwater's record on social security and foreign policy and against Johnson's alleged "spending" record and "big government" policies.

The five states Goldwater must seek to win, together with a few mountain states and the entire South, are Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Texas and California, GOP strategists have agreed since the campaign opened. The senator, it is reported, will not concentrate in this territory.

Northeast 'Conceded'

The heavily populated northeastern states of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and others have been in effect conceded to Johnson.

The southern states are now shaky for Goldwater, according to estimates of southern governors recently gathered in San Antonio, Tex., for their annual conference. California, Texas, Ohio and Illinois polls indicate that these states, too, may go to Johnson unless there is a "silent" vote uncountable in the opinion surveys.

Goldwater based his "fascist organization" charge against the Democratic party on the report that a Milwaukee Democratic alderman had been "expelled" for announcing support of the Arizona senator.

He also said Johnson was a "part-time" president who was campaigning too much.

ORGANIZING CONFERENCE of the Carpenters, called by Pres. M. A. Hutcheson to help get members to vote in the Nov. 3 election and non-members to join the union, heard Sen. Humphrey (speaking), Democratic candidate for vice president, at meeting in Washington. Pres. Johnson, the party's nominee to succeed himself, in a message read at a dinner declared that "with your help, we will complete our program for prosperity and peace." Hutcheson told the 150 international representatives that though he was a life-long Republican, "I couldn't endorse Barry Goldwater for dog-catcher."

Meany Assails Campaign Stands Of Goldwater as 'Hypocritical'

"To the victims of discrimination, he offers the freedom to learn to like the barriers and humiliations that confront them daily. . . ."

A Goldwater victory, Meany said, "far from advancing the cause of freedom in America, would gravely threaten the rights and freedoms we now possess."

Turning to the crime issue, Meany noted that Goldwater was either absent or did not vote on a wide range of anti-crime proposals placed before the Senate.

"The worst crime of our century, the assassination of Pres. Kennedy, was accomplished with a mail-order rifle," he continued. "After this tragedy, Sen. (Thomas J.) Dodd (D-Conn.) introduced legislation to prohibit the interstate sales of firearms to children, convicted criminals and the mentally deranged . . . (But) Sen. Goldwater has consistently opposed any regulation of the sale of guns."

Meany also assailed Goldwater's expressed intention of naming judges who would seek to limit the rights of defendants in criminal cases.

"If there is anything more disturbing and more dangerous than the local crime rate, it is the prescription that Sen. Goldwater offers for dealing with it," he said.

"The senator's pretense to the role of crime-buster is just as false and misleading as that of Goldwater, the freedom fighter. In either pose he represents far too great a risk to entrust with the direction of the nation's destiny."

Meany stressed that the AFL-CIO's position was not just "negative."

"Lyndon Johnson and Hubert Humphrey believe in the freedom of workers to promote democracy on the job—the freedom to organize and to bargain collectively with employers," he said.

Other Freedoms

"And they believe in those other fundamental freedoms that were restated in the Atlantic Charter, lifting and inspiring all the people of the earth in an hour when freedom was in peril everywhere.

"Freedom of speech; the freedom to be heard. That is a freedom the Goldwater supporters refused to give to opponents within their own party.

"Freedom of worship—in a church that is secure from acts of terror, arson and bombing by the haters and fanatics of the right.

"Freedom from want; freedom from poverty, freedom from crushing medical costs in old age; freedom from slum environments.

"And freedom from fear—fear of economic disaster or of nuclear war."

"And now we have added another—freedom of opportunity, for all Americans, to the limit of their abilities. Not a quota system, as had been falsely charged. Not discrimination in reverse, but genuine freedom for every worker and every student, to go as far as his talents will take him.

"These are the freedoms that count.

"To us in the trade union movement, these are the essential elements of true freedom."

U. S. Labor 'Shocked' by Vietnam's Arrest of Buu

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said the American labor movement is "shocked" by the charges of treason leveled against Tran Quoc Buu, head of the Vietnamese Confederation of Trade Unions, and called on the governments of the U.S. and Vietnam for assurances that he will "be provided every opportunity to refute the allegations."

The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, protesting the arrest of Buu in a wire to Premier Nguyen Khan from Gen. Sec. Omer Becu, called for withdrawal of the charges and "immediate steps to restore industrial peace and trade union rights." Becu termed the charges brought against Buu "political."

Meany said "it is incomprehensible that one who has devoted his life to the advancement of human freedom and social justice and who has suffered years of imprisonment and untold hardships for his devotion to the national independence of his country, democracy and free trade unionism could be guilty of treason."

The AFL-CIO, said Meany, reiterates its confidence and support of Tran Quoc Buu and the Vietnamese Confederation of Trade Unions "which has, under his leadership, served the best interests of the workers and the entire Vietnamese nation."

Layoff Rate Hits Nine-Year Low

Factory hirings increased less than seasonally between July and August but the layoff rate of 14 per 1,000 workers, seasonally adjusted, was at its lowest point since 1955.

The seasonally adjusted hiring rate, which has fluctuated from 37 to 41 per 1,000 for eight months, stood at 38 per 1,000 in August, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Unions Urged to Back Science Youth Month

The AFL-CIO has urged state and local central bodies to cooperate with student clubs and groups seeking labor's aid in observing National Science Youth Month during October.

The AFL-CIO is one of 50 national organizations cooperating in the effort to spotlight the science talent of tomorrow. Stanton E. Smith, coordinator of state and local central bodies, pointed out that pupils can be helped by being brought into contact "with the practical application of scientific processes in apprenticeship schools and the advanced training of skilled workers and journeymen."

Job Training Project Begun In Colorado

Denver—Labor, business, education and other community units have joined hands here to sponsor a training program for more than 500 unemployed heads of families and their dependents.

Community leaders were on hand when Board Chairman Herrick Roth of the Job Opportunity Center, Inc., signed a contract for a "demonstration project" financed through the Special Projects Dept. of the U.S. Office of Manpower, Automation & Training. Roth is a board member of the Teachers and president of the Colorado AFL-CIO, which initiated the program.

Training will include counseling and testing, and will be provided on an individual basis to fit the need of 500 breadwinners in the Denver-Pueblo area.

The center will offer services principally to the chronically unemployed, or those jobless for 15 months or longer, along with welfare recipients and those with a lack of work experience.

Besides Roth, directors of the center include Pres. Walter C. Emery of the Bank of Denver; Dir. James F. Reynolds of the Colorado Anti-Discrimination Commission; and Dr. James Galvin, project director.

Johnson Hits 'Mudslinging' As GOP Desperation Drive

NOT EVEN the old Brooklyn Dodgers got a reception in Flatbush equal to the throngs that turned out to greet Pres. Johnson as he toured Brooklyn, accompanied by Robert F. Kennedy, Democratic senatorial candidate, on his way to a Liberal Party rally.

President Declares Attacks Backfiring

By Willard Shelton

Pres. Johnson hit hard at Republican campaign tactics of "mudslinging and muckraking" as he resumed his country-wide election drive after reporting to congressional leaders and the country on the Administration's assessment of the fall of Khrushchev in the Soviet Union and Red China's first nuclear test-explosion.

Showing his first direct reaction to Republican assaults on his personal ethics and morality, the President said that the GOP had conducted a "desperate" campaign that was now "backfiring."

"It's not the backlash that's gone. It's not the frontlash. It's the smearlash," Johnson said angrily before a downtown St. Louis audience estimated at 25,000.

Ahead of the President was a final week of campaigning in the nation's great cities against his Republican challenger, Sen. Barry Goldwater.

His speeches were scheduled for Los Angeles and other populous Southern California areas, for Chicago and Philadelphia, for New York City as the campaign moved to its final days.

New Relationship

Before the President temporarily cut off campaign activities, he had given a New York City Liberal Party rally in Madison Square Garden a spelled-out description of what he has termed the "Great Society" and had made it clear that he was urging "a new set of relationships between the federal government and the American city."

The significance of events in the Soviet Union and Communist China was reported in various ways as Johnson cancelled Texas, Kansas and Utah scheduled appearances to concentrate in the White House on meetings with key advisers and congressional leaders.

- He spoke to the Liberal Party rally in New York of "changes and uncertainties in this big world of

Rail Pact Proposed By Board

A three-year contract with wage increases totaling 27 cents an hour and improved fringe benefits and job protection measures has been recommended by a Presidential Emergency Board for more than 400,000 U.S. railroad workers.

A seven-member board headed by Richardson Dilworth, former mayor of Philadelphia, made a series of recommendations to Pres. Johnson to settle a 1964 dispute between 11 labor unions representing non-operating workers and 187 railroad, terminal and switching companies.

The parties have 30 days to reach agreements based on the board's report. If no agreement is reached, then the unions will be free to strike and management to put new conditions into effect, in accordance with provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

The Dilworth board recommended:

- Wage increases of 9 cents an hour in each contract year, with the first 9 cents retroactive to Jan. 1, 1964.
- An additional raise of 2 cents an hour as of Jan. 1, 1966, to cover

Only Indiana Seems Doubtful:

Democrats Look with Hope To 7-State Midwest Area

Chicago—The 7-state empire of the Midwest's upper central region—rich in industry, agriculture and commerce—disposes of an equally rich bloc of 103 Electoral College votes, well above one-third of the 270 bare majority needed to elect the next President.

Barring a violent reversal of the trend, as measured by professionals of both parties and by public opinion surveys, six of the seven states seemed as of two weeks before the Nov. 3 election likely to give substantial majorities to Pres. Johnson or to be clearly leaning toward Johnson.

The seven states include Minnesota, Iowa and Missouri—a tier just westward of the Mississippi River—and the populous states of Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois and Indiana on the eastern side.

Indiana, a state with a long tradition of bitter politics of personality, remained a battleground as the election campaign headed to a climax. The polls had shown Pres. Johnson continuously ahead of the Republican presidential nominee, Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona, but the margins were slight and disputable.

Most of the upper central midwestern region used to be considered a Republican heartland—the land that gave its loyalty to the late Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio, that fought the GOP's so-called "eastern establishment," which managed the nomination of every Republican presidential candidate for a generation until Goldwater.

It does not appear to be a Goldwater heartland in the election, although the Arizona senator captured the votes of the area's Republican National Convention delegates in San Francisco last July.

Revolt in Suburbs

There is evidence of revolt in the populous suburbs of the big cities, suburbs normally considered Republican by instinct, against which are considered the uncertainties of Goldwater's philosophy, particularly his vagueness and so-called "hip-shooting" in foreign policy.

There is evidence that rural voters in many areas will vote for Johnson—the same areas that in 1948 switched from Republican to Democratic and helped reelect Harry S. Truman against the overwhelming pre-election favorite, Gov. Thomas E. Dewey.

There is evidence, indeed, that the upper central region is shifting to a degree away from a Republican anchorage, simply as party against party.

- Five senators are up for reelection (Illinois and Iowa have no

Montana GOP Fans Racial Bias in State

Helena, Mont.—Montana Republicans have appealed to race prejudice in the state's campaign with a charge that the Democratic Party has enacted a national "right-to-work" law in the form of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The charge was made in a broadcast by the Montana Republican State Central Committee titled "Emphasis-Fact" over the Intermountain Network on Oct. 12.

In an appeal directed to union members who have led a long and successful fight to block "right-to-work" legislation in the state, the Republican Committee said:

"There is no doubt that the Civil Rights Act was intended to be a "right-to-work" law for those who have been denied the right to work.

"The friend of the workers, the friend of the labor union, the Democratic Party and its liberal thinking leaders enacted this 'right-to-work' law."

The Rev. Howard Y. Williams, chairman of Montana Citizens Rededicated and a Montana member of the national Civil Rights Commission, termed the broadcast "an appeal to racial hatred" that is "re-

Johnson Seen Leading In Pennsylvania, Ohio

The neighboring states of Pennsylvania and Ohio are a battleground in this election campaign, with a total of 55 presidential electoral votes and 51 House seats and two Senate seats to be filled.

Pres. Johnson is considered to have a commanding lead in Pennsylvania and polls show him running well ahead in Ohio. Democrats, who were surprised by former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon's unexpectedly large victory in Ohio four years ago, are for that reason cautious about considering the state "safe" for Johnson. They are encouraged by the registration figures—particularly the gains chalked up by Ohio labor in eight major cities—but are taking nothing for granted.

The extent of ticket-splitting is regarded as the key to the Senate races, where both incumbents—Democrat Stephen M. Young in Ohio and Republican Hugh Scott in Pennsylvania—face strong opposition.

Informed observers see a good chance of a net gain for the Democrats in the House races. Pennsylvania Republicans pres-

UPWA Wins Early Pension, Ends Strike

Waterloo, Ia.—A three-week strike by 3,700 members of the Packinghouse Workers against the Rath Packing Co. has been settled with a contract "package" that included a $375,000 fund permitting workers to retire voluntarily at 62.

Another fund of $50,000 was set up to help clear wage inequities. Most Rath workers are employed here at the nation's largest single-unit packing plant but others work at Birmingham, Dallas, Houston and Decatur, Ill.

Pattern Settlement

The strike-ending agreement was similar to those negotiated with other major packers, the union said. Also settled were such issues as the subcontracting of work, job security and protection for workers against plant decentralization and mechanization.

The UPWA and the Meat Cutters recently won major gains in wages, working conditions and job protection for more than 40,000 industry workers, starting with a "master agreement" reached Sept. 2 at 29 plants of Armour & Co.

The 1964 pattern settlements provided three-year agreements featuring wage boosts of 34 cents an hour, with nearly 15 cents effective this year; pension, health and welfare improvements; maintenance of rates in case of job changes, and contract extension to several previously uncovered plants and departments.

Major firms include Swift & Co., Cudahy Packing Co., Hygrade Food Products Co. and John Morrell & Co.

BRITISH PRIME MINISTER Harold Wilson, whose Labor Party won a narrow victory, is shown just before the election with a group of constituents—coal miners near Liverpool in the district which sent Wilson to Parliament.

Skill Upgrading Pact Signed by N.Y. Hotels

New York—A union-management agreement will provide new training and promotion opportunities for thousands of Negro and Puerto Rican workers in New York's hotel industries.

The pact between the Hotel & Motel Trades Council and the employers' association was worked out in cooperation with four civil rights groups. It climaxes more than a year of union-initiated conferences designed to help minority group workers qualify for better jobs.

Jay Rubin, president of the nine-union council which bargains for 33,000 workers at 180 hotels, said a survey showed that 40 percent of New York's hotel workers are Negroes or Puerto Ricans—with a heavy concentration in lesser-skilled service jobs.

The union-management committee, he said, agreed that first consideration in filling better jobs should be given to persons presently employed in the hotel industry. As vacancies occur, they will be filled on a merit basis and training opportunities will be made available without regard to race, creed or color.

The following steps will be taken immediately, the labor-management committee said:

- Employment of a qualified person to supervise the job-upgrading program on a full-time basis.
- A request to the city to establish special reading, writing and speech classes to remove language barriers to promotion.
- An initial concentration on placing Negroes and Puerto Ricans in white collar positions. A pool of qualified, presently employed workers will be formed from which vacancies can be filled.

Review Group Named

Each of the four cooperating civil rights groups—CORE, the NAACP, the Urban League and the Puerto Rican Civil Rights Organization—will name a representative to meet periodically with the labor-management committee to review the progress of the program.

A number of job upgrading programs are already under way, union representatives reported at a news conference, including a successful pilot program at the Americana Hotel. Betty Bentz, general organizer for Local 6 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, said the labor-management committee is seeking federal manpower training funds to train 50 cooks in "the 10 best hotel kitchens in town" and to train other employes for specialized clerical jobs.

Labor 'Deadly Serious' On Jobless Pay Gains

The labor movement is "very serious" about making unemployment insurance a "working partner" in an effective manpower and anti-poverty program, Dir. Nelson H. Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security told the Interstate Conference of Employment Security Agencies at its meeting in Miami Beach, Fla.

"I know it will cost more money than is required to maintain the present level of benefits," he added. "If this is one of the reasons we haven't been able to get changes, well then, we will face up to that.

Money Required

"The fact is that to improve the system will cost money—payroll money, labor cost money, wages or profits money. No kind of reform without this will be of much value. This is where the rub is. There are a lot of employers who don't mind if Uncle Sam spends $20 a year for each of the poor people, but they don't want unemployment insurance involved because that would affect their experience rating."

Cruikshank declared unions are "deadly serious" about better unemployment compensation benefits. He predicted the day may come when workers may decide to allocate to jobless benefits part of the return for increased productivity, "because they will know it is at last a program designed basically and fundamentally to meet their needs."

In another address, to the Congress on Voluntary Health Insurance & Prepayment conducted at Las Vegas, Nev., by units of the American Medical Association, Cruikshank asserted that the "wall of resistance" to changes in traditional medical practice "is showing cracks and fissures which forecast the crumbling of the whole socio-economic myth."

Changes in Methods

"The technical revolution in medicine is forcing a revolution in the methods of providing services," he said in an address stressing the need for improved medical care which was read for him by Richard Shoemaker of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

He maintained medical care facilities' equipment and personnel must be planned and coordinated in a "rational way" to provide high-quality care "tailored to the needs of the patient and at as reasonable a cost as is consistent with his medical care needs."

He said the answers to the problem can be found "only by a dedicated cooperative effort" by the providers and the consumers of medical care. When the answers are determined, he added, "we shall have found the key to the conservation of expenditures for health care."

Turkish Union Gets Assist From URW

Akron, O.—Union workers at the Istanbul, Turkey, plant of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. have successfully negotiated a contract ending a strike of nearly two months' duration. URW support of the Turkish workers proved decisive, Gen. Sec. Charles Levinson of the Intl. Federation of Industrial Organizations & General Workers' Unions notified URW Pres. George Burdon.

The URW executive board authorized a $500 contribution Sept. 15 to the 350 strikers.

Brass Workers Win Union Shop

Bridgeport, Conn.—A full union shop, severance pay and wage increases are among the benefits won by 1,600 workers at the Bridgeport Brass Co. in a new three-year agreement. The pact was ratified unanimously at a meeting of the AFL-CIO Brass Workers, directly affiliated Local 24411, according to Pres. Samuel R. Volpe.

Benefits include a wage increase of 7 cents an hour, effective Oct. 1, 1965; inequity increases of from 2 to 5 cents for listed job classifications in the first and third contract years; pension fund improvements, and better holiday pay, vacation and insurance benefits.

Labor Secretary for 7 Years:

Jim Mitchell Dies, Labor Hails Record

New York—James P. Mitchell, who served as secretary of labor for seven years in the Eisenhower Administration, died here of a heart attack. He was 63.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called him "an outstanding Secretary of Labor whose vigorous enforcement of protective labor laws raised them to new levels of effectiveness" and whose activities elevated the Dept. of Labor "to the status it now enjoys with both labor and management and within the councils of government."

Labor's "friendship and esteem for Jim Mitchell grew with the years, Meany said, adding: "We respected his counsel and we valued his friendship; his passing is a loss to us and to the nation."

In a message to Mitchell's widow, the AFL-CIO president expressed his shock and bereavement and termed Mitchell one of "my most valued friends," who "carved for himself a monument that will long be remembered by myself and the many, many personal friendships he had in the labor movement."

Mitchell became secretary of labor in October 1953, moving over from the Dept. of Defense where he was assistant secretary of the Army in charge of manpower and reserve forces affairs. During World War II he served as director of the Industrial Personnel Division of the War Dept. After the war he was director of personnel and industrial relations for R. H. Macy & Co. and later vice president in charge of labor relations and operations at Bloomingdale Brothers, both in New York.

Ran for Governor

After his service in the Eisenhower Administration, Mitchell won the Republican primary nomination for the 1961 New Jersey gubernatorial race but lost to Gov. Richard J. Hughes in the general election. He subsequently joined Crown Zellerbach Corp. as a consultant and director for the West Coast pulp and paper company. Last December he was elected senior vice president for corporate relations for the company.

Mitchell was born in Elizabeth, N. J., and after graduation from high school went to work in a grocery store, the first in a series of jobs. After a few years he went to work for Western Electric Co. in the personnel department and for the rest of his life dealt with personnel and labor-management problems.

Before leaving the secretaryship, Mitchell was tendered a dinner by the trade union movement where he was honored for his "deep understanding of and concern for the welfare of the nation's working men and women."

After leaving the government he served as president of the National Council on Agricultural Life and Labor.

He is survived by his widow, the former Isabelle Nulton, a daughter, three sisters and three grandchildren.

'Unfinished' Business Awaits 89th Congress

The AFL-CIO gave the 88th Congress a high grade for its two-year record of accomplishment, but listed nine major items of "unfinished business" to be put on the agenda of the next Congress.

The 74-page booklet, Labor Looks at the 88th Congress, analyzes 58 issues on which the AFL-CIO took a stand, ranging from one man, one vote reapportionment to conservation policies.

Under unfinished business, the pamphlet lists the following:

- Hospital insurance for the aged.
- Job-creating, full employment measures.
- Repeal of Taft-Hartley Sec. 14b, which authorizes so-called "right-to-work" laws in the states.
- Fair Labor Standards Act improvements, including broader coverage, a $2 minimum wage, a 35-hour standard workweek, and double-time for overtime work.
- Improved standards of unemployment benefits.
- Federal aid for health, education and welfare programs.
- Consumer protection, including "truth in packaging" and "truth in lending."
- Foreign aid improvements.
- Reform of rules, procedures and organization of Congress.

In a foreword to the booklet, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany termed congressional rules reform necessary "to prevent the will of Congress from being frustrated by its own rules."

The "great record" of the 88th Congress, Meany noted, was compiled "only after a series of desperate struggles against a determined minority, armed with the powerful weapons of restrictive rules and the unrestricted seniority system."

Meany termed the 88th Congress "even more remarkable" in its accomplishments than the 73rd and 74th, which enacted the bulk of the New Deal program, because "it was not faced with a nation prostrated by depression" and had to reject the temptation to be "complacent."

Credits Kennedy, Johnson

This record of accomplishment, Meany said, "can only be attributed to the wise, prudent but forceful leadership exercised by Pres. Kennedy and Pres. Johnson."

Single copies of Labor Looks at the 88th Congress are available without cost from the Pamphlet Div., AFL-CIO Dept. of Publications, 815 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D. C., 20006.

GM Council to Meet:

American Motors Strike Wins Gains

Detroit—A modified profit-sharing plan is included in a new agreement won by the Auto Workers at American Motors Corp. after a brief strike of 26,000 AMC workers.

The strike of the AMC automotive division ended in a pact paralleling the wage, pension and insurance benefits won from auto's Big 3.

Meanwhile, as the strike of 250,000 General Motors workers went into its fifth week, the UAW executive board called the union's General Motors Council to a meeting here Oct. 23 and directed all GM locals and units to schedule membership meetings Oct. 25.

The 275-member Council scheduled a vote on whether to recommend ratification or rejection of the national agreement, not yet signed while contract talks continued on working conditions and other local issues.

In telegrams to GM units, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther and Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock reported that, as of Oct. 21, some 86 locals representing 220,900 GM workers —63.5 percent of the GM membership—had completed local negotiations.

Time for Action

Because of this majority, the board decided to act. Woodcock told newsmen that the meetings were called in part because Pres. Johnson has urged an early end of the strike, but also because of the union's desire to learn the views of its members and leaders.

Reuther and Woodcock reported that, if a majority of GM locals vote to ratify the national pact, the national GM strike would end and locals which have ratified local settlements would return to work when recalled by plant management.

Those locals which haven't settled their local differences were directed to present a full report so members may decide whether to continue on strike locally, but all were urged to intensify their efforts to reach a satisfactory agreement.

Under the UAW's agreement with American Motors, the profit-sharing plan will be used to finance an extra week's vacation. The pension and insurance payments, formerly made from the profit-sharing fund, will become a direct charge on the employer.

The $4.8 million now in the fund will be held in reserve to pay the cost of the extra week's vacation and some shares now held will be sold with the proceeds to be divided among the workers.

Under the new agreement, workers will get another week's cash pay if the profit-sharing fund permits in December, in addition to a Christmas bonus financed by diverting 5 cents an hour from the SUB fund (supplemental unemployment benefits) to a special fund.

The union said it won other benefits also while improving the language on production standards and retaining most of the working conditions of the prior contract.

"Instead of bringing American Motors to Big 3 levels, we have brought Big 3 workers to AMC levels," said AMC Dir. Douglas Fraser. "Thus AMC will remain competitive without taking anything from its workers."

Rail Emergency Board Recommends Pay, Fringe, Layoff Pact for 400,000

the added costs of continuing present health and welfare benefits.

- A fourth week of vacation after 20 years of service, an added paid holiday to make the yearly total 8, and $2,000 in group life insurance for employes retiring after Mar. 1, 1964.

On the major issues of job protection and the contracting-out of employes' work, the board's recommendations were patterned after the recent agreement between the railroads and six shopcraft unions.

Standards were established for conditions under which work may be contracted-out, and substantial severance pay and other allowances were provided for workers displaced by automation or technological changes.

The recommendations went beyond the shopcraft agreement by extending job-protection measures also to workers who lose their jobs because of business declines.

Members of 11 unions were involved in the job protection movement—the Boiler Makers, Firemen & Oilers, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Maintenance of Way Employes, Railroad Telegraphers, Railway Carmen, Railway Clerks, Sheet Metal Workers, and Signalmen.

All unions but the Signalmen appeared before the board to argue for a wage increase. The Signalmen reached agreement last July on a 9-cent annual increase, but the Dilworth board included them in the 11 entitled to 2 cents more per hour in 1966 in anticipation of higher medical care costs.

Several of the unions had urged the board to grant them a 29-cent wage increase retroactive to June 30, 1963, with a 3.5 percent boost each year thereafter, plus a cost-of-living escalator clause geared to rising prices.

Union spokesmen said the critical need for job protection was underscored by a 42 percent drop in jobs between 1955 and 1963 and a widespread feeling of insecurity by rail workers in general.

Johnson named the Dilworth board Aug. 18 to head off a strike voted by the workers after contract talks got nowhere. It held hearings for 22 days, considered a "mountain of exhibits" and many hours of testimony, and concluded that 30 days is too short a time to consider so complex a dispute.

The board recommended that future hearings be shortened by holding a "pre-trial" conference at which each side would file a trial brief summarizing the issues, the existing agreements and the proposed changes.

The board said the parties "appear to regard the board as an audience to an elaborate ritual—something like the Japanese Kabuchi theater" where offerings are rigidly stylized and follow an undeviating pattern.

Besides Dilworth, board members were Robert J. Ables and Frank J. Dugan of Washington, D. C.; H. Raymond Cluster of Baltimore, Lewis M. Gill of Philadelphia, Paul D. Hanlon of Portland, Ore., and Jacob J. Weinstein of Chicago, all representing the public.

Chicago Teachers Win 1st Written Agreement

Chicago—The Chicago Board of Education has approved in principle a memorandum of understanding with the Chicago Teachers Union which union Pres. John M. Fewkes called a "sizeable step" toward collective bargaining.

The memorandum, signed by Fewkes and School Supt. Benjamin Willis, calls for the "orderly and speedy processing of grievances and the resolving of professional problems" of the 13,000 members of AFT Local 1, and 2,000 others who want the union to represent them.

The school system has about 21,000 teachers and professional employes. The board passed a resolution last Feb. 26 recognizing the union as collective bargaining agent for its members and directing Willis to help draft a written memorandum.

Fewkes hailed the board's actions as the climax of a two-year drive and added: "We hope that written procedures will help us get more definite answers to questions about wages and working conditions."

The board, in ratifying the memorandum, made suggestions for changes which the union and superintendent will study.

The memorandum signed by Willis and Fewkes agreed that the procedures to be established will provide channels for resolving grievances and problems, and that these may include salaries, fringe benefits, hours, transfer policies, efficiency ratings, working conditions and similar matters.

The agreement provides that complaints of unfair treatment or disputes about the rules of the city schools, the Illinois school code or the provisions of the new memorandum may be submitted to the grievance procedure.

Grievance Rules

Other stipulations are that differences should be settled at the school level, if possible, and that any teacher may present a grievance in writing to the principal or other administrator, may be heard personally and may be represented by a union designee.

A decision by a principal shall be made in writing within a reasonable time, with the reasons listed, and a teacher or the union may appeal to a higher level, then to the superintendent and the board.

Professional problems—involving welfare, working conditions and professional duties—are to be worked out in conferences between the union and the superintendent and may be referred to the board in cases of disagreement.

Group Health Shows Lowest Hospital Rate

New York—Federal employes and their families enrolled in prepaid group health plans, which emphasize preventive medical care, spent less time in hospitals than employes and dependents covered by other forms of health insurance.

George S. Perrot, a consultant to the Group Health Association of America, said the Civil Service Commission's latest statistics show a lower utilization of hospital services by group health plan members in all age groups—including retired employes over 65.

Meany Praises Hoover as Patriot

Former Pres. Herbert C. Hoover "exemplified the highest tradition of selfless public service," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared.

Meany described Hoover, who died in New York at the age of 90, as "a patriot in the best sense of the word . . . in all circumstances ready to place himself at the service of the nation."

He said Hoover's "deep devotion" to the United States and the welfare of mankind "transcended partisan politics."

Boss Watched Voting, NLRB Voids Election

An employer who stationed himself a few feet from the polls while his workers voted in a National Labor Relations Board election interfered with the employes' freedom of choice, the NLRB has ruled. The employer interfered also by announcing, a few days before the balloting, that he would pay $6 toward the cost of work shoes as soon as the election results were announced, the board held.

The employes voted against the Auto Workers, 25-19, at the Detroit and Highland Park, Mich., plants of Performance Measurements Co., Inc., last Apr. 28.

Overruling its acting regional director, the board set aside the election and ordered a new one at a time the regional director finds to be "appropriate."

In its decision the board related that the firm's president, during the election at each plant, stood so close to the door into the election area at various times that each employe had to pass within two feet of him to get to the polls. For a period of time he sat at a table about six feet from the doorway, allegedly "instructing supervisors," the NLRB investigation also disclosed.

In addition, the company head entered the voting area on two occasions. Two board members declared:

"While we agree that the brief forays into the election area may not tend to interfere with the free choice of the employes, the continued presence of the employer's president" near the polling place was "improper conduct not justified by the fact that for part of the time he was instructing supervisors on the release of employes" to vote.

Member John H. Fanning maintained that it was unnecessary to rely on this reasoning but joined with members Boyd Leedom and Gerald A. Brown in finding the employer influenced the employes by promising to give them boots or shoes or a $6 allowance toward damage caused by certain chemicals on the floor that caused footwear to deteriorate.

Sudden Hurry Questioned

It is "undisputed," the NLRB wrote, "that shoe damage was a long-standing problem of employes which the employer had been in no hurry to resolve until just before the election." There was no apparent reason "why the announcement, as well as the benefit, could not have been withheld" until after the election, said the board.

It added: "Promising the benefit but withholding the payment until after the election could itself be interpreted as a form of unlawful pressure upon, and interference with, the employes' freedom of choice."

Wirtz Rejects Second South Dakota Pay Law

The Labor Dept. has again slapped down a South Dakota law which set up an illegal "means test" for jobless workers who apply for unemployment compensation.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told South Dakota's Gov. Archie M. Gubbrud (R) that his state can't participate in the federal unemployment insurance program unless it stops trying to disqualify applicants who made as much as $6,000 a year before they lost their jobs.

The Republican-controlled South Dakota legislature in 1963 first enacted a law requiring a seven-week waiting period before a $6,000-a-year worker could apply for benefits, rising up to 13 weeks disqualification for a person with base-year earnings of $9,000 or more.

Wirtz promptly ruled that it was out of conformity with federal law, which establishes unemployment benefits as an insurance program and not a form of relief.

The legislature then re-enacted the law this year, declaring that its purpose was to obtain from the Labor Dept. a more extensive hearing and consideration than was given the first time around.

Law Termed 'Alien'

The state got its hearing—at which the AFL-CIO submitted a brief denouncing the law as "alien" to the principle of wage insurance.

Hearing Examiner Clifford P. Grant rejected the South Dakota law in strong terms.

"It is difficult to understand, by any stretch of the imagination," he said, "how this contributes to the goals of economic stability and the relief of the unemployed. Rather it runs counter to these purposes for which the federal law was enacted. . . . The very wages and salaries which Congress intended to be insured have been made the basis for the denial of insurance benefits."

Congress, he said, had clearly mandated "that unemployment compensation is to be paid as a matter of right without any test of means."

Wirtz told the South Dakota governor bluntly that he concurs in the hearing examiner's decision. The state law, he said, no longer meets federal requirements.

The next move is up to the governor. With an eye on a possible adverse ruling, the legislature empowered Gubbrud to void the legislation if it didn't meet federal standards.

If he doesn't, the federal unemployment insurance tax paid by South Dakota employers will shoot upward from a present average of 1.4 percent of taxable payroll, based on experience rating, to the statutory 3.1 percent. None of the money would come back into the state. South Dakota would either have to finance the program from its own funds or abandon unemployment benefits entirely. But even if the latter course were adopted, employers would still be obligated to pay the federal tax.

Texas Labor Sets Up Equal Opportunity Unit

Austin, Tex.—The Texas State AFL-CIO has set up a new Dept. of Equal Opportunity, to be headed by Henry Munoz, Jr., of San Antonio. State AFL-CIO Pres. Hank Brown said the department will work for equality of opportunity "in all areas of life" and will undertake programs dealing with manpower retraining, youth employment, civil rights and employment of the handicapped.

'Desperate Vote-Seekers':

'Haters' Falsify Rights Act, Justice Dept. Chief Charges

Indianapolis—"Extremists, professional haters and desperate vote-seekers" have been talking "nonsense" and "untruths" about the Civil Rights Act, Acting Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach charged in a speech to the Indiana AFL-CIO convention here.

Katzenbach, the man charged with enforcing key provisions of the new law, said the "propaganda barrage" failed to block passage of the legislation but "nevertheless succeeded in raising some enduring doubts in the minds of many people."

To "set the record straight," the Justice Dept. chief spelled out what the law does not do, as well as what it does provide. He told the delegates:

- It does not require or authorize the busing of school children.
- It does not affect the sale of homes or apartments.
- It does not prevent any retailer from refusing to serve a person who is disorderly or drunk—white or Negro.
- It does not give dictatorial powers to the federal government, nor does it permit massive cutoffs of federal funds.
- It does not affect union seniority which is free of discrimination.
- It does not create any racial hiring quotas.
- It does not require the firing of whites to hire Negroes—or anyone else. In fact the law forbids preferential treatment.
- It does not tell unions whom they must admit to membership, or tell employers whom they must hire.

On the other hand, declared Katzenbach, "the Civil Rights Act of 1964 protects the basic rights of citizenship. The right to vote. The right to attend a movie—and to get a hamburger afterwards. The right to attend public schools. The right to use the public library. The right to be judged on ability when seeking a job."

Delegates gave a rousing reception to Sen. Vance Hartke (D-Ill.), who has labor endorsement in his campaign for re-election. Earlier State AFL-CIO Pres. Dallas W. Sells stressed the importance of electing Hartke and Democratic Gubernatorial Candidate Roger D. Branigan as well as the Johnson-Humphrey top-of-the-ticket. The Republican candidates for governor and senator, he stressed, were both leaders in the adoption of Indiana's so-called "right-to-work" law which banned the union shop.

The convention re-elected the state central body's top officers including Sells, Sec.-Treas. Max F. Wright, and Vice Presidents Jacob R. Roberts and George Colwell.

Among other speakers were COPE Dir. Al Barkan, Steelworkers Sec.-Treas. I. W. Abel, and Assistant Secretary of Labor Esther Peterson.

Alabama Labor Raps Vote Denial, Backs LBJ

Mobile—Alabama labor is squarely behind the Johnson-Humphrey ticket even though there is no direct way Alabamans can vote for the Democratic presidential nominee.

Delegates to the State AFL-CIO convention here—with only one dissenting vote—praised the records of Pres. Johnson and Sen. Humphrey and denounced the Republican platform and the "anti-labor" records of the GOP nominees.

Noting that all GOP congressional candidates in the state are supporting Sen. Goldwater "and his extreme views against labor," the state labor council urged union members to "vote the straight Democratic ticket on Nov. 3."

Lack of Choice Protested

As the only alternative to voting for Goldwater, the state central body is urging support for the uncommitted Democratic electors in the presidential race. But the delegates adopted a resolution strongly protesting the denial of the "precious and cherished right" of Alabamans to vote for the candidate of their choice.

In major resolutions, the convention:

- Urged the legislature to enact a state minimum wage law.
- Called for an increase in amount and duration of unemployment benefits, noting that the present $32-a-week is next to the lowest in the nation.
- Demanded free textbooks for all students, through high school, and condemned the present system of textbook purchases through a single contractor as "the spoils system in its ugliest form."
- Called for regulation of private employment agencies.
- Urged enactment by Congress of a social security hospital care program and truth-in-lending legislation.
- Opposed any congressional interference with one man, one vote legislative apportionment.

Delegates re-elected the state central body's three top officers, Pres. Barney Weeks, Sec.-Treas. A. G. Trammell and Exec. Vice Pres. William Mintz.

The convention gave a standing ovation to Rep. Carl Elliott (D-Ala.), retiring from Congress this year after having been squeezed out in an at-large primary election. Other speakers included Sen. John J. Sparkman (D-Ala.); Rep. Robert E. Jones (D-Ala.); AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul L. Phillips, president of the Papermakers & Paperworkers; COPE Dir. Al Barkan; Stanton Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and city central bodies; William J. McSorley, Jr., assistant to the president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., and Stanley Ruttenberg, economic adviser to the secretary of labor.

Iron Workers Re-Elect Officers, Map Program

San Francisco—The 32nd convention of the Iron Workers re-elected the union's international officers and set policy on such subjects as political action, organizing, job safety and economic objectives including the need for action against unemployment.

Re-elected were Pres. John H. Lyons, Sec. James R. Downes, Treas. James V. Cole and nine vice presidents.

Noting that automation and the increase of the working force in the construction industry are boosting unemployment, a convention resolution called for payment of double time rates for all overtime work on outside construction.

The delegates, who heard speaker after speaker urge all-out backing for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket gave the Democratic slate unanimous support and endorsed the international's policy, as outlined by Lyons, of close cooperation with the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Another convention action continued the John H. Lyons Scholarship Fund, commemorating former Pres. John H. Lyons Sr., who died in 1961. The program, originally set up in 1958, has benefitted 11 sons and daughters of Iron Workers members. It will provide two 4-year scholarships annually for children of union members.

More Safety Urged

Declaring that the Iron Workers, whose members include men who erect tall buildings, have "the most hazardous occupation" in the building trades, the convention recommended that all local unions incorporate provisions for safety meetings on the job and other safety measures in their collective bargaining agreements.

Another resolution called for planking of working floors and provision of nets on bridges, buildings and other structures under construction.

The convention approved Lyons' report on establishment last year of a Dept. of Research & Organization by the international union. Lyons and Downes reported that a membership drop, triggered by the 1957 recession and new production methods and materials, had been reversed and the union has shown gains to a present strength of close to 139,000.

The union was successful in 80 percent of its organizing campaigns in 632 unorganized shops in the last four years, Lyons told the convention. Both shopmen and members of outside erection locals received substantial wage and fringe increases during the same period, he reported.

Shopmen were able to cope with job losses from new techniques and materials in most cases because, Lyons said, "our members have applied their ingenuity and acquired alternative skills."

Lloyd P. Vaughan, Organizer, Dies

Charleston, S. C.—AFL-CIO Field Rep. Lloyd P. Vaughan died here after a heart attack Oct. 14 and was buried in Columbia, S. C. He was 55.

Formerly a school teacher, Vaughan was president of Local 427 of the Textile Workers Union of America when the former CIO named him an organizer in 1940. For 10 years he was secretary-treasurer of the Virginia CIO Council and then served as CIO director in Panama and state or area director in South Carolina, Virginia and West Virginia.

Vaughan later was director of organization for the United Paperworkers of America.

In 1958 he began a three-year stint as an AFL-CIO field representative in Puerto Rico, followed by his transfer to the federation's region in North and South Carolina. His widow, Mary, survives.

Unions Report 90% Eligible In Delaware

Wilmington—Reports to the Delaware AFL-CIO convention here indicate that close to 90 percent of union members in the state are registered to vote in the November election.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Clement J. Lemon said union registration workers—including volunteers from the auxiliaries—had helped enroll the greatest percentage of eligible workers in the state's political history. He called for an equally intensive get-out-the-vote effort for Election Day.

The state COPE endorsement of the entire Democratic slate had been made before the convention and delegates applauded AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Lee W. Minton, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers, as he called for election of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

Turning to state issues, Lemon called in his report to the convention for a state minimum wage law, a Delaware labor relations law, extension of free public education to include two years at the college level, and establishment of a state medical school "so that children of workers can have an opportunity to become doctors."

At Stone Workers' Conention:

Get Out Vote Drive Stressed by Meany

New York—Issuing a strong appeal to union members to exercise their voting rights Nov. 3, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared that the United States would never have a Congress indifferent to the interests of working people if 75 percent of the labor movement voted in elections.

Addressing the Stone Workers' 11th convention, Meany called labor's record at the polls "no better than the record of the American people in general" and characterized this record as "the poorest in the world."

He lauded Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson, and said the nation's chief executive could justifiably base his campaign on the issue of prosperity achieved by the nation partly under his Administration.

"I think it is to his credit that at a time when he is campaigning he has gone to Congress and called for action on a poverty program," Meany declared.

Freedom Essential

"We in the labor movement can't be satisfied ever," he added, stressing labor's interest in a free society "because the trade union movement can't operate in any other kind of society."

Convention delegates were told that organized labor must reverse a trend in which unorganized workers are being deceived by employers into voting against unions in representation elections. This was a major conclusion in an officers' report submitted to the convention.

To document this point, Stone Workers Pres. Sam H. Scott noted that in spite of devoting every effort to organizing within its jurisdiction, his union during a 31-month period won 19 National Labor Relations Board elections and sustained losses in 22. He attributed these losses to "anti-labor, anti-union legislative drives" which have resulted in legislation like the Taft-Hartley Act and so-called "right-to-work" laws and to fear by non-union workers of loss of their jobs brought on by employer intimidation and opposition.

Scott told delegates that in spite of stiff employer resistance, the union had maintained a militant policy in its organizational activities. Strikes alone, he explained, had cost the union $125,000 over a 29-month period.

Johnson Endorsed

Delegates voted unanimously to endorse the candidacies of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey for president and vice president. A resolution setting forth the endorsement noted that the Johnson-Humphrey ticket shows a "dedication to progressive government programs" and represents the best answer to the needs of the labor movement.

The convention heard a sharp attack on Sen. Goldwater by Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver, who declared that Pres. Johnson "champions the Great Society while the other wants to dwell in the hate society—a society of contending forces where survival of the fittest is the norm and the most powerful groups would live on the labors of the subjugated."

Other speakers included John Edelman, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens; Al Barkan, National COPE director; and William Dodge, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress.

CHECK for $40,000 in donations to Florida East Coast Railway employes' "hardship fund" is passed by Pres. Charles Luna (left) of Railroad Trainmen to Deputy Pres. Ray Moore. Check represents donations by 1,100 BRT convention delegates and 35 officers to the fund for members idled by strike. Convention in Miami Beach later urged Pres. Johnson to intervene personally to settle strike of other railroad employes in effect since January 1963.

Rail Trainmen Elect Luna to Full Term

Miami Beach—The Railroad Trainmen elected Pres. Charles Luna for a four-year term here after a contest, re-elected Sec.-Treas. W. E. B. Chase and National Legislative Rep. Al H. Chester without opposition, and approved an action program proposed by Luna when the BRT opened its 32d convention Sept. 28.

Luna won, 875-202, over Clyde Titler, BRT general chairman on the Monongahela Railroad, near Pittsburgh.

President since 1963, Luna succeeded W. P. Kennedy, who retired after passing the age limit set by the last convention. In an acceptance speech, Luna thanked delegates and pledged to carry out the goals approved by the convention.

Union Program

In addition to "adequate wage increases for all classes of service" represented by the BRT; a supplemental pension and an end to jurisdictional disputes, the new union program includes:

- Amendments to the Railway Labor Act for better protection of the rights of railroad workers.
- Establishment of "safe and adequate" crew-size rules in road and yard service when the two-year work rules settlement of 1964 expires.
- Improvement of the expense-away-from-home rule.
- An intensified public relations program.

Other Contests

In other election results:

Vice Pres. L. E. Chester of Jacksonville, Fla., was chosen assistant to the president over Cecil Selby of Mattoon, Ill., 832 to 254.

Assistant Sec.-Treas. W. L. Hill won by a large majority in a three-man race.

One new vice president was chosen—Walter E. Grady. Re-elected vice presidents were Sam Vander Hei, F. A. Collin, P. K. Byers, W. B. Kelly, W. G. Parks, J. M. King, F. C. Montgomery, Roy D. Heape, P. J. McNamara, R. D. Jones, J. H. Shepherd, Gordon C. Gale, W. J. Weil and Q. C. Gabriel.

Elected from Canada were W. J. McGregor, legislative representative, and J. H. Irwin, alternate representative.

The convention disposed of its business so expeditiously that officers hoped for an Oct. 27 adjournment, about two weeks earlier than expected.

Dispatchers Vote Raise in Dues, Services

Los Angeles—A dues increase to cover the cost of stepped-up union activities was voted by the Air Line Dispatchers at the union's 22nd convention.

Delegates voted for an accelerated organizing drive and authorized additional services to members, including a larger staff at national headquarters in Arlington, Va., and more activity by the union's five elected vice presidents in handling negotiations, grievances and safety work.

Convention speakers included Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany; Vice Chairman Robert T. Murphy of the Civil Aeronautics Board; E. R. Bonner of the Decca Navigation Corp., England; and Frank Leone, assistant Los Angeles airport manager.

Re-elected for four-year terms without opposition were Pres. Robert E. Commerce and Sec.-Treas. Ernest A. Bressin. John H. Steele of National Airlines, Miami, won in a field of five candidates for executive vice president.

The union, among the smallest in the AFL-CIO, represents certified airmen who work for scheduled air lines and are responsible for ground control duties involving air safety.

Convention delegates also:

- Urged member locals to affiliate with state and local central bodies.
- Established dues and assessment schedules for new groups of employes eligible to join the ALDA.
- Adopted a resolution prohibiting members from handling the work of any group of employes during an authorized work stoppage.
- Amended the constitution to bring election procedures regarding proxy votes into conformance with the Landrum-Griffin law.
- Voted to meet in Miami in 1965, Las Vegas in 1966.

Kansas AFL-CIO Maps Final Election Drive

Topeka—The Kansas AFL-CIO took action here at its annual convention to help the Johnson-Humphrey ticket carry the state Nov. 3 and instructed a subcommittee to undertake discussions seeking affiliation of all AFL-CIO unions with the state central body.

The 450 delegates adopted an officers' report strongly recommending support of Pres. Johnson and his running-mate, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey.

Convention sessions were recessed for a COPE meeting at which speakers reported that intensive registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns have improved the election prospects of endorsed candidates in the state, including Harry Wiles, Democratic candidate for governor, and at least three congressional endorsees.

Pres. John J. Grogan of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers, an AFL-CIO vice president, brought the greetings of Federation Pres. George Meany. Other speakers included William J. McSorley, Jr., assistant to Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Vice Pres. A. J. Eberhardy of the Boiler Makers; Mrs. Marcella Beatty, executive director of AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries; COPE Area Dir. Walter F. Gray; and Pres. Martin Byrne of the Kansas Farmers' Union.

The convention instructed a committee to seek unity of all AFL-CIO unions in the state within the central body and approved a resolution providing for a special convention to consider any needed constitutional changes.

Convention delegates also:

- Amended the constitution to convene biennially, starting in 1965, with COPE conferences every two years starting in 1966.
- Reaffirmed a policy of supporting candidates who will help repeal the state's so-called "right to work" law and support the Supreme Court ruling on state reapportionment.
- Called for improvements in state minimum wage, workmen's compensation and Sunday closing laws, and opposed any state sales tax increase that does not exempt food and children's clothing.

The delegates, noting that Diners' Club credit cards are being printed at a color-press plant near Lawrence, Kan., where the Typographers are on strike, urged union members to stop using the cards or to return them.

Messages of greetings from Gov. John Anderson, Jr. (R) and gubernatorial candidate Wiles were reported by State Federation Pres. Kenneth Kitchen and Sec-Treas. F. E. Black.

U.S. Bulletins Listed On Welfare, Pensions

The Labor Dept. has issued a new listing of government bulletins dealing with welfare and pension plans. The list, including a form for ordering the bulletins, is available from the department.

Chemical Workers Hike Per Capita

Miami Beach — A 30-cent per capita tax increase was voted by the Chemical Workers here at the union's 19th convention. That will raise the monthly total to $2.30 per member, with the increase going largely for organizing purposes.

The delegates also modified the union's proxy voting system and approved departmental reports.

Earlier the convention took the unprecedented step, for the ICWA, of endorsing a national political ticket—that of Pres. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey.

Cement Union Marks Its 25th Anniversary

Montreal, Que.—Cement Workers Pres. Felix C. Jones set the tone of the union's 25th anniversary convention with a declaration that its future success "can be greatly enhanced by the same determination and dedication which has worked so effectively over the past 25 years."

Heading the list of speakers, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said that the 1964 presidential election "isn't the usual political race where one finds that someone has to win and the other has to lose."

"There is," he said, "a definite movement—an extreme right-wing movement, and unless it is eliminated from the American political scene, it has but one way to go, and that is up."

Emphasizing such social and economic problems as unemployment, poverty and civil rights, Schnitzler said that American labor faces the task of helping to complete an incomplete program.

"We must approach these problems with an understanding that will provide opportunities which did not exist in the past," he said, reminding the delegates that their locals and members would be expected to play their part.

Path to Peace

Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress emphasized that the maintenance of peace in the world is through the establishment of free and democratic trade unions.

"Where you have a free trade union movement," he said, "you have no war mongers. . . . If free trade unions disappear, our Democratic way of life will also disappear." The AFL-CIO, CLC and Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions have one common and basic principle, he said:

"We will never be satisfied until free trade unions are established in every country of the world."

Although no increase in per capita tax is anticipated, the 250 delgates from the union's locals in the United States and Canada will deal with the question of rate of per capita payments to the international's strike fund and whether or not the amount of strike benefits paid by the union should be increased.

On the political front, the convention for increased political education will deal with proposals through the election of a registrar by each local union, and endorsement of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket.

Facing later sessions of the convention are the election of all internatonal union officers and a series of legislative proposals.

Johnson and Humphrey

It is the considered judgment of the General Board of the AFL-CIO that the election of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey is a matter of the most vital concern to the labor movement, to all the people of the United States and to the cause of peace and freedom throughout the world.

We endorse their candidacy.

We urge every union member to give these candidates their most wholehearted support.

—AFL-CIO General Board

The New Congress

IN A SERIES of intense battles in about 100 congressional districts and in 20 statewide senatorial races, the shape of the 89th Congress is taking place and with it the direction and pace of the program to be presented by the new President.

To a significant extent, the makeup of the new Congress will shape the new Administration's program, and in shaping it determine its fate. The stakes, in these elections, therefore are high despite their lack of overall national attention.

The 88th Congress put together a remarkable record stemming from the forceful leadership of Presidents Kennedy and Johnson. But despite its outstanding—and in the case of civil rights historic—achievements, there are nine major issues and a string of secondary ones that will be the unfinished business when the 89th Congress convenes in January 1965.

The need is clear: an increase in liberal, progressive congressmen and more liberal senators can mean the difference in cleaning up the agenda and going on to the difficult problems facing the nation.

With a new Congress committed to the program and policies of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket, there can be solutions finally to the vexing problems of hospital care for the aged, job-creating programs, repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act section that sets up "right-to-work" laws and the other unfinished items from the 88th Congress.

COPE-endorsed congressional and senatorial candidates will support the Johnson-Humphrey program. Their election is vital to the direction the nation takes in the next two years.

The Mark of a Senator

IT TOOK A LOT of digging and research, but Sen. Barry Goldwater's contribution to the public laws of the United States has finally been unearthed. It is an interesting record, especially for persons opposed to the khapra beetle.

In his 12 years in the Senate, Goldwater introduced 144 bills. Of these 80 have some sort of national significance. But of the 80 only six have become public laws.

Goldwater's six public laws include directing the secretary of the interior to conduct a study of Indian education; appointments to the staff at the Corregidor Bataan Memorial Commission; reimbursing persons for expenses incurred in fumigating to eradicate the khapra beetle; incorporation of the American Symphony Orchestra League; reciprocal agreements for alien amateur radio operators; mailing of live scorpions for medical research.

Or, what other qualifications are needed for the presidency of the United States?

Labor's Choice

Johnson Tells Liberal Party:

Meeting Needs of Nation's Cities A Major Goal of 'Great Society'

The following is excerpted from an address by Pres. Johnson to a Liberal Party rally at Madison Square Garden in New York City.

AMERICA has to face a whole new set of problems. I have summed up this challenge in my call for the Great Society. The Great Society is not a slogan; it is an idea. The Great Society is not something brand new; it is a dream as old as our civilization. The difference is, for the first time in man's history we really have the resources to make it possible, to make the Great Society a reality. The Great Society is not some vague dream-like Utopia. The Great Society is a very clear and very definite objective, a very definite goal. It will be met by specific programs, directed at concrete problems, carried out by dedicated and determined men.

We recognize that our abundance must be extended to all of our people, but that is not the Great Society. That is simply the base on which we build it. We build our strength and we keep the peace, but that is not the Great Society. It is the shield behind which we build. We did not establish freedom and we did not work for two centuries simply to pile up more money in our bank accounts and more goods at home and more power in our arsenals.

We built this nation for the people of this nation and we will not now permit our people to be overwhelmed by our growth and our progress, walled in by our cities and our signs. Our brave men did not die in battle, our pioneers did not risk their lives and fortunes so that their descendants could sit in expensive apartments with washing machines and television sets without a place to walk and touch nature, breathing poisoned air beside polluted rivers, unable to send their children to a decent school or even to a decent playground.

We cannot, we must not, and we will not sacrifice natural beauty and the sense of community, the creations of art and the joy of thought in the rush to become bigger and stronger and more wealthy. We will not permit ourselves to be mastered and stifled by machines and buildings and highways. We want to grow and build, and invent, but we want progress to be the servant of man and not have man become the victim of progress.

Well, that is the Great Society—concern for the quality of the life of each person in America. Nowhere is that concern more urgent than in the American city. By 1975 we will have to shelter and sustain a new urban population equal to the entire 1960 metropolitan population of New York and Chicago, Los Angeles and Philadelphia, Detroit and Boston, Baltimore and Johnson City, Tex.

We will have to build at least 2 million new homes a year compared with the current rate of just a little over a million. We will have to rebuild the 7 million homes that do not have running water, or even decent plumbing. We will need schools for 60 million children. We will need welfare and health facilities for 27 million people over the age of 60. We will need transportation facilities for the daily movement of 200 million people in 80 million or 90 million cars.

WE WILL HAVE to improve the health and the beauty of our cities. Our air and our water are being contaminated. Open spaces and parks are disappearing. Careless highways and unplanned buildings are destroying the trees and the fields which are part of our American heritage. You can't drive out of the city limits without being confronted on both sides of the road with a bunch of old, ugly, junked automobiles, and if you take away the gift of nature, you erode the finest values of the heart and mind.

More important, we want to create a sense of community, a sense of closeness to our neighbors.

These proposals will not involve the federal government alone. The work of our cities will require the cooperation of the state and the city, and of business and of labor, and of private institutions and private individuals.

We must not only seek peace in the world. In order to have peace in the world, we must have peace at home, and we must try to get these groups working together. The federalism of the future, creative federalism, is not just the relationship between states and Washington, but among all the institutions and government units whose influence and problems cut across traditional jurisdictions. The work of the American city is a challenge that is worthy of the finest traditions of American liberalism. We are never going back in the direction of the past. We are going to go—go forward. We are going to make our cities a place where men can not only live, but where they can live the good life. We have so much to be thankful for. We have so much yet to achieve.

Morgan Says:

Johnson's Courageous Speech Puts Race Issue in Perspective

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

AS HAS BEEN noted in this corner and elsewhere, the quality of campaign oratory this season is strained. But there have been exceptions. One of the more remarkable of these exceptions was made by Pres. Johnson in New Orleans and it would be worth recalling even in a time ringing with the most responsible rhetoric, for it stands comparison with the best of utterances on the hustings.

Morgan

Near the end of his address, the President recalled an illustrious but unnamed southern statesman who once told the late Sam Rayburn at election time: "I would like to go back down there and make them one more Democratic speech. I just feel like I have one in me. The poor old state, they haven't heard a Democratic speech in 30 years. All they ever hear at election time is 'Negro, Negro, Negro.'"

What the President was doing was reminding his New Orleans audience in only slightly less brutal terms that for too long in too many parts of the South it had been accepted campaign practice that the candidate who managed to holler "nigger" louder than anybody else was the candidate who got elected. The issues that move the voters in a Louisiana parish or an Alaskan precinct are, or should be, not so narrow. In the less than a fortnight of time that has elapsed since Pres. Johnson made that remark—which, encouragingly enough was applauded—there has been a change of government in Britain by free elections, a change of government in the Soviet Union without elections or even a respectable warning and, presumably, consolidation of a government in Communist China on the strength of a successful test explosion of an atomic "device."

It is not an economic problem that faces you, the President went on to say, or a Negro problem. ". . . This is a moment when all nations must look all ways to try to find some ways and means to learn to live together without destroying each other . . . When you look at history and you see what has happened to us in our lifetime, . . . we have gone through two wars, and then you see what the next war could bring us, it is no time to preach division or hate. If there ever was a time for us to try to unite and find areas of agreement, it is now. . . . It is time for all of us to follow the Golden Rule. It is time for all of us to have a little trust and a little faith in each other, and to try to find some areas that we can agree on so we can have a united program."

Ah, but how much more easily is that said than done! Fear and hate and prejudice tie people's reason in ugly knots, strangle common sense and defeat enlightened self-interest. Nor is this by any means a reaction confined to the South.

SLOWLY, ever so slowly, civilized acts emerge to dominate the pattern of paganism. Almost lost in the other monumental events of the last week was the award of the Nobel peace prize to Dr. Martin Luther King, who has known the inside of some of the best jails in the South. The issue here, however, is not just the mending of neighborhoods and communities torn by the cutting passions of the racial problem. The issue becomes the need to build a stronger, more civilized society to grow with and withstand the pressures of the vast changes, scientific, political, economic, mental and emotional, of the age in which the world is spinning.

At bottom that was what the President was talking about. Think how far beyond its present boundaries of progress the South would be today, industrially, culturally, educationally and in almost every other way, if its election campaigns had not been so everlastingly soaked in the fluid of fear and hatred labeled "Negro, Negro, Negro!" Think how much farther the whole country would have progressed if we had put down the emotional issues and confronted the big ones.

This is not to say that racial adjustment is a petty thing. It is a tremendously complex problem. To their shame, demagogues have exploited it for their own selfish, short-term ends, leaving region after region destitute of tolerance, reasonableness and human compassion. But if too many of these demagogues have been Democrats in the past, what a shocker it is today to see the party of Abraham Lincoln using the issue so cynically as an excuse to expand its bridgehead in the South. A two-party system so constructed runs backward at a time when the country needs not political anachronisms, but all the coordinated forward motion it can muster.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

CHICAGO—Two weeks before the election the campaign pace suddenly slackened. For Pres. Johnson, it was because events had occurred in the Soviet Union and in Communist China that required both assessment and a chance to communicate with congressional leaders and the country. As for Sen. Goldwater, he simply slowed down.

The Republican candidate was slated to go once more from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific and back again—but the number of speeches was reduced. He preferred to spend his energies on television, it was said, where he might reach more people.

The Senator has never shown any enormous enthusiasm for the ordeals of the presidential campaign. Indeed, there is a good deal of evidence—fragmentary but significant—that he dislikes it intensely. He shook hands with voters during the New Hampshire primary last February and March, seemed awkward and ill at ease in the process, and vowed never to do it again.

A month ago he made one experiment with a whistle-stop train trip for five and a half days through states he must carry to be elected—Ohio, Indiana and Illinois—and told reporters that he rather enjoyed it, that it gave him time for relaxation between the pressure of speeches. But thereafter he scheduled only two other whistle-stop tours—both for short distances.

Goldwater's television pace has not been strenuous, at least not yet. His appearances have been taped, not live, and they have invariably taken over only one network, which is scarcely the way to guarantee excitement and a large audience. This may reflect a lack of money but it is possible that it also reflects a sense of discouragement.

PRES. JOHNSON, who enjoys campaigning as much as Franklin D. Roosevelt did, has hit the trail with a vigor that left everyone traveling with him exhausted. And after the pause for international affairs, he started back again, with a schedule planned clear through Oct. 31, and no doubt beyond that to election night, Nov. 3.

It should be emphasized that it was the staff and traveling reporters, not Mr. Johnson, who ended up the trips exhausted. The President can take two-hour naps on board his aircraft, in private quarters and in bed, after a strenuous series of appearances, while the jets fly halfway across the continent.

Mr. Johnson has been hoarse occasionally, and his right hand has borne almost constantly the wounds of the handshaking multitudes.

His voice he has explained himself: it is usually strong in the mornings, although it may become strained from speaking through haphazard amplifying equipment to open-air audiences of 30,000 or so, and the hoarseness recurs. As for the hand wounds, which are superficial, one is reminded of Theodore H. White's report of John F. Kennedy in 1960, grimly hearing Ohio election returns showing he had lost the state and holding up his swollen, bruised hand remarking he had got that from Ohio.

So the President campaigns with zest, because he wants to win and is determined to win, because he gains strength through contact with the people, because he thinks that the more he lets people see him in person the more he can count on their trust.

SEN. GOLDWATER'S style is different. He does not campaign with zest or pleasure, quite obviously, and there is an odd impression of remoteness, of aloneness, about him even when he speaks to the packed arena, the leaping auditorium that sparks most politicians to their best efforts.

The campaign pace will pick up, no doubt, as the final accusations are hurled, as the moment of decision nears. But accusation is about the only theme Sen. Goldwater has been hitting recently, and there is presumably a limit to that.

Washington Reports:

National Defense Education Act Lauded on Coverage Extension

EXTENSION and improvement of the National Defense Education Act was one of the most important education accomplishments of the 88th Congress, Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) and Rep. Alvin E. O'Konski (R-Wis.) agreed in interviews on the AFL-CIO public service program Washington Reports to the People, heard on more than 700 radio stations.

The NDEA, Mrs. Green noted, was extended from coverage for science, mathematics and engineering students, to history, geography and English as well.

"We broadened Title III," she said, "so that equipment could be purchased in teaching the three additional subjects. We broadened the institute program so that teachers in these subjects could also attend institute programs either the year around or in the summer, not only for the foreign languages, guidance and counseling we have at the present time, but for teachers of history, geography, English, civics, disadvantaged youth and library personnel."

O'Konski said the inclusion of the other subjects was long overdue as well as "the extension of the forgiveness feature in the loans to teachers in private as well as public schools."

Mrs. Green said that failure to include private school teachers "has been a great injustice over the past years."

O'Konski called the old bill discriminatory. He also said that extension of the student loan feature "will be for the good of the country." Since the bill was enacted, 600,000 able and needy students obtained loans.

"REPAYMENT has been three times as fast as the law required and only one has been written off as a bad risk," the Oregon congresswoman observed.

The interest rate is 3 percent and is not payable until after the student leaves school.

O'Konski said this is a "great investment in our youth," and because of the greater resultant tax returns "has other advantages for the country."

The NDEA was extended for three years and the federally impacted areas part of the bill for one year, because Mrs. Green said, a study is being made of the latter in Congress and by the Office of Education. Both Mrs. Green and O'Konski declared that inclusion of the District of Columbia in the impacted areas section was long overdue. They spoke of the needs in crowded Washington schools, the "recreation areas that need to be opened in the evening so we'll get the kids off the street corners."

FEDERAL AID to public schools, at least for construction, is a likely possibility in the next session of Congress, Rep. Alvin E. O'Konski (R-Wisc.), left, and Rep. Edith Green (D-Ore.) agreed in interviews on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Non-Interest Savings Accounts Cost Millions of Dollars a Year

By Sidney Margolius

MODERATE-INCOME families lose millions of dollars a year in potential interest payments by using Christmas clubs and other types of special-purpose accounts which pay no interest. Homeowners lose additional millions, in this case involuntarily, through "escrow accounts" required by mortgage-lenders for advance deposits toward payment of property taxes and insurance. You usually pay these advance deposits each month with your mortgage payment.

In New York State, Atty. Gen. Louis Lefkowitz considers this forfeiture of interest so unfair that he has announced he will ask the legislature to require banks and mortgage-lenders to pay at least some interest on club and escrow accounts. He reports that nationally about 14 million people had Christmas club accounts last year, with accumulated savings totaling $1,659,000,000. On this basis, we estimate that American families using Christmas clubs forfeit about $35 million a year in interest, since these savings usually could earn them 4 percent or more in regular savings accounts.

How much is lost through the failure of mortgage lenders to pay interest on escrow accounts is not known, but may well be between $50 and $100 million a year.

In many other ways, families pay millions to have other people discipline their savings. These include those types of life insurance which accumulate cash value; contractual purchases of mutual-fund shares which involve a serious cash penalty if you discontinue payments; passbook loans, in which you borrow against your own savings but pay a higher fee than your savings earn (which has value only if you needed some cash just before an interest-dividend date), and monthly installment and revolving budget accounts.

The interest you can earn on your savings, and by saving ahead for purchases, can be a useful tool towards family financial progress. If you save $20 a month at no interest, at the end of 10 years you have $2,400. But if these same savings earn 4 percent compounded semi-annually, you have $2,950.

Even a difference of 1 percent or so in the interest rate can make a noticeable difference in savings. One worker we met put $40 every month towards his children's education into a savings account downtown which paid 3.5 percent interest. He could have put these savings into the credit union right at his plant which paid 5 percent. At the end of 10 years, his savings at 3.5 percent would total $5,746. At 5 percent he would have $6,420.

ANOTHER COUPLE looking toward retirement sold their house, put the proceeds into a local bank, and rented an apartment meanwhile. The bank paid 3.5 percent while another savings institution on the same street paid 4.5 percent. In five years, the difference of 1 percent on that $7,000 would mean an extra $400.

If you are mature enough to be master of your own money, you don't need the enforced discipline of club-type savings. Some of these pay no interest while others do.

Usually credit unions pay the highest return: frequently 4.5 percent, with a significant number paying 5 percent. Savings and loan associations often pay 4.5 to 4.75 percent, some as much as 4.9 percent. Mutual savings banks in 18 states pay, usually, 4.5 percent with some in the Northeast paying as much as 4.75 percent. Commercial banks are more anxious to cultivate small savers nowadays, and many pay 3.5 to 4 percent. E Bonds pay 3.75 percent.

Tips on Saving:

- You're likely to carry out a savings program more successfully, and win family cooperation for saving, if you set up separate accounts for specific purposes. People are more apt to save for a specific goal than just in general.
- You'll save more by getting an early start. One family saves $20 a month for 10 years at 4 percent. It accumulates $2,850. Another saves $40 a month for five years. It deposits as much as the first family but winds up with $2,658.
- For those short-term savings, cash accounts are most suitable. E bonds earn no interest the first six months. Not until the third year do they earn over 3 percent. But they have an advantage for long-range savings, as for retirement or as an unemployment backlog, since you can postpone the tax on the increase in value. When you need to cash in E bonds, cash in first those you bought most recently, to protect the higher yield earned by the older ones.

From Soup to Nonsense:

All You Do Is Snap the Shutter And the Result Is Pure Chaos

By Jane Goodsell

LET'S BROWSE through the photograph album: This a view of the mountain lake we went to this summer. Boy, what a beautiful place that was! The water was a deep, deep blue, and you never saw such wildflowers in your life! Gee, it's a shame this picture isn't in color. . . .

This is a snapshot of Molly's eighth birthday party. For an indoor picture, it has remarkable clarity of detail. You can almost read her name on the cake, and you can actually see the texture of the tablecloth.

No, that little girl isn't Molly. I'm not sure who she is. As a matter of fact, Molly doesn't seem to be in the picture, but see that arm reaching out in the lefthand corner? I'm pretty sure that's Molly's arm. . . .

Here's a picture of my husband holding a trout he caught at some lake or other. It would have been a really good picture if I hadn't cut off his head. This one's better because I got him all in. No, he's not small. He's over six feet tall. He just looks little because he's so far away in the picture. On second thought, I'm not sure that's him. I think maybe it's the man who had the cabin next door to us. . . .

Hm, I wonder what this is? It's so dark it's hard to tell. Oh, I know! It's a picture of Katie when she was a baby, sitting in her highchair. It would have been really good except the flashbulb didn't go off.

OH HERE'S a really marvelous picture! This is a gas station we stopped at on our way to Yellowstone Park. No, that's not my husband. That's the gas station attendant. I can't imagine why we took a picture of him. Good though, isn't it?

This is a scenic shot of a waterfall. I think it's one we passed on our way to Yellowstone. Or maybe it's Horse Tail Falls on the Columbia River. I'm not just sure. Anyway, it's pretty.

Let's see now, what's this? It looks like a picture of our sofa with a sweater lying on it. No, wait a minute! That's Clare, our Siamese cat! Too bad we didn't pose her against a contrasting background. . . .

Who on earth are these people? I don't believe I ever saw them before in my life. Look at those women in old-fashioned bouffant skirts practically down to their ankles! And get a load of those hairdos! Have you ever seen anything so unbecoming in your . . . good grief, that's me!

Two-Front War:

New Book Dissects Extremism on Right

"I AM IMPRESSED by the type of people in it. They are the kind we need in politics."

This statement on the John Birch Society made by Barry Goldwater in Los Angeles, Calif., Mar. 29, 1961, and reported in Time Magazine for Apr. 7, 1961, is much more important for what it indicates about the Republican candidate for President of the United States than for what it says about the John Birch Society.

For it shows that Sen. Goldwater is not able to comprehend the basic anti-democratic purpose and methods of the Birch Society and its many allied groups whose activities form the subject of the new and excellent book by Harry and Bonaro Overstreet, The Strange Tactics of Extremism (Norton, 320 pp. $4.50).

Mr. and Mrs. Overstreet turned to a study of right wing extremism out of their desire to awaken the American people to the forces which present a danger to our society. They believe that the more we know about the enemies of democracy, the more effective we will be in combating them.

For ten years or more they have been focusing their attention on the fight against communism, publishing three books, What We Must Know About Communism, The War Called Peace and The Iron Curtain. In their new book the Overstreets turn their attention to the other side of what they call a "two front war."

The book does not attempt to deal with every organization on the far right. The John Birch Society receives the greatest attention. There are also chapters on Dan Smoot, Carl McIntire, the Circuit Riders, Billy James Hargis, and the Church League of America.

The Overstreets have based their indictment of the Birch Society and its fellows on careful study and analysis of what the organizations say about themselves as well as what they do. Here are some of the characteristics of right extremism on which they base their judgment that it is an enemy of our democratic society:

The far right organizations are monolithic in structure. Decisions are made at the top, and orders go from the top down. Prospective members of the John Birch Society sign an agreement that they can be ousted at any time by a duly appointed officer without any reason.

THESE ORGANIZATIONS can never admit that they have been wrong. When the facts are against them, they respond more vituperatively and more hysterically than in their original statements. They are thus secure against any challenges to check their conclusions or examine the morality of their methods.

They practice a loose and irresponsible use of derogatory labels. Those with whom they disagree are Communists, tools of the Communists, or a part of the communist conspiracy. And the list goes all the way from former Pres. Eisenhower and John Foster Dulles to David Dubinsky.

While claiming to fight only Communists, the extreme right directs its attack as much if not more towards known anti-Communists who do not go along with them. Thus every liberal becomes, in their eyes, a Communist or "Comsymp" or "traitor."

They infect the groups within which they work.

They describe as Communist every effort of our society to deal with basic social problems, such as civil rights, or unemployment.

It is these tactics and others like them that draw the sharp line between right wing extremism and conservatism. Mr. and Mrs. Overstreet see this difference clearly.

The inability of Sen. Goldwater to draw this important distinction makes it possible for him to praise members of the John Birch Society, and provides one major reason why he is unfit to be President of the United States.

Johnson Leads in Vote-Rich Midwest

Democrats Hope For House Gains

Senate races this year), and all five of them are Democrats. Three of them, at least, seemed two weeks before the election certain of winning and the other two were considered as likely to win.

● There are six governorships at stake (Minnesota's Democratic Gov. Karl Rolvaag was elected two years ago for a four-year term) and all of them except one are now held by Democrats. The solitary Republican seeking re-election, Gov. George W. Romney of Michigan, has steadfastly refused to give active support to Sen. Goldwater and is running an "independent" campaign. The Illinois GOP candidate, the young businessman-salesman, Charles H. Percy, is conducting an "independent" campaign.

● There are 87 House of Representatives seats, the majority of them held by Republicans, in the 7-state region. It is the area in which Democratic professionals think they have their best chance of scoring gains in congressional elections to offset possible losses in the once-solid Democratic South.

Cautious observers in the area do not put much credence in the "coattail" theory that a victory by Johnson for the presidency may pull in other Democratic candidates at congressional and state levels.

They expect a good deal of split-ballot voting.

Many do believe that industrialization of once-rural areas in the Midwest is producing a different voting pattern, and that with good candidates Democrats now have an even chance of victory.

ILLINOIS

Illinois is one of the nation's political prizes, a big state among the big 7 with 27 Electoral College votes. It appears to be going for Johnson, heavily.

The Cook County (Chicago) Democratic organization may not produce the majorities it once did (Republicans elected a county sheriff in 1962), but suburban and downstate voters seem to be shifting from Republican moorings in regard to the presidency.

One experienced political observer remarked, "Goldwater can't win without Illinois, and he can't win Illinois." Chicago's Democratic Mayor Richard Daley has raised his publicly-stated estimate of the probable Johnson plurality to 300,000. This compares with the late Pres. John F. Kennedy's razor-thin margin of 8,000 in 1960 and former Pres. Truman's almost equally narrow 1948 plurality. Private GOP polls showed Johnson with great strength in the normally Republican North Chicago suburbs a month ago. The apparent trend is verified by recent Chicago Sun-Times "straw vote" surveys indicating that the President is leading in some suburbs, and nearly even in others.

In four "downstate" counties lost by Kennedy in 1960—normally Democratic areas in the economically-depressed coal-mining country—the polls showed Johnson ahead by margins of 58 to 68 percent.

Percy, the young business executive running against incumbent Democratic Gov. Otto J. Kerner, walked a tightrope through the Republican convention to avoid offending Illinois Goldwater delegates. As the election neared, he seemed certain to run well ahead of Goldwater in the state, largely because he declined to identify himself with the presidential nominee.

Kerner is generally credited with a constructive administration and has labor-liberal backing for re-election. Registration jumped in the final days. The Illinois state government situation is confused by a court order knocking out state legislative districts as inequitable, which means that 177 members of the General Assembly must be elected at-large on an incredibly lengthy separate ballot sheet. Kerner was considered narrowly ahead, but the race seemed close.

All incumbent members of the House seeking re-election seem likely to win, observers here say, although in the 15th Congressional District a Democrat, Poppy X. Mitchell, is waging a hard fight against incumbent Republican Rep. Charlotte Reid.

MICHIGAN

Gov. Romney, the incumbent Republican, is being challenged by Rep. Neil Staebler, former state Democratic chairman, who appears to be in need of a smashing vote for Johnson to score an upset. Romney openly denounced Goldwater's political philosophy at the annual conference of state governors last June and has refused to endorse the GOP presidential nominee.

Johnson is considered far ahead of Goldwater for the state's 21 Electoral College votes.

Sen. Philip A. Hart, one of four midwesterners from the celebrated group of Democratic senators first elected in 1958, is considered well ahead of his Republican opponent, Mrs. Elly Peterson, who sought the GOP nomination only after various other potential candidates turned it down.

Local political observers say all five Democratic House members can expect re-election and that Raymond F. Clevenger, former state corporation commissioner, may beat incumbent Republican Victor A. Knox in the Upper Peninsula 11th District. Another Democratic gain is considered possible in the 18th District, where Frank J. Sierawski is opposing incumbent GOP Rep. William S. Bloomfield, and a Democrat, John J. Conyers, is rated ahead of Robert B. Blackwell, Republican, in the newly created 7th District.

INDIANA

Traditionally and heavily Republican, Indiana has 13 Electoral College votes and it is the closest state in the upper central area to being Goldwater country. But Johnson is rated as no worse than an even choice, and some voter surveys show him narrowly ahead.

Democratic Gov. Matthew Welch is ineligible for re-election under the state's one-term rule, and the candidates for governor are Roger D. Branigan, Democrat, and Republican Richard O. Ristine, with Branigan rated as running a strong race.

For the Senate, incumbent Democratic Sen. Vance Hartke—another member of the class of '58—is a slight favorite over Republican D. Russell Bontrager, who nevertheless is himself waging a hard campaign.

For House seats, two Democrats are given good-to-excellent chances of ousting incumbent Republicans. They are Max E. Hobbs of Fort Wayne over Rep. E. Ross Adair in the 4th District and Lee H. Hamilton of Columbus over Rep. Earl Wilson in the 9th District. Democrat Andrew Jacobs, Jr., is also considered ahead of Republican Don A. Tabbert in the Indianapolis 11th District.

WISCONSIN

Former Vice Pres. Nixon carried this state, which now has 12 Electoral College votes, over the late Pres. Kennedy in 1960, but Johnson is rated well ahead of Sen. Goldwater. In all other races, the contests are tighter, but incumbent Sen. William W. Proxmire seems to have pulled in front of his Republican opponent, Wilbur N. Renk.

Incumbent Democratic Gov. John W. Reynolds faces the same re-election troubles—accumulated grievances, fiscal problems—that plague state chief executives elsewhere. He has, however, help going against his Republican challenger, Warren P. Knowles, after trailing in earlier voter surveys.

The only congressional district that is considered possibly to be in a party-changing mood is the 1st District, including industrial Racine and Kenosha, where Democrat Lynn E. Stalbaum might defeat incumbent Republican Rep. Henry C. Schadeburg, according to some Democrats.

MINNESOTA

Minnesota, which gave its 10 electoral votes to Kennedy in 1960, is rated certain to give 12 to Johnson this year—particularly with the state's senior senator, Hubert H. Humphrey, as vice presidential nominee.

Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, another class of '58 member, is rated equally sure of re-election over Republican Wheelback Whitney, an investment broker.

If the Johnson-Humphrey-McCarthy tide runs high enough, local observers say that Democrat George P. Delay might defeat incumbent Republican Rep. Albert H. Quie.

IOWA

Pres. Johnson is conceded to be well ahead of Goldwater in the race for Iowa's nine Electoral College votes but more than this is stirring in this once Republican state.

"Iowa is a sleeper," one Democratic Party expert says, in claiming "excellent" chances that at least two congressional seats may be wrested away from Republicans. "The Democrats have two pairs of coattails here," says another, explaining that popular Gov. Harold E. Hughes, running for re-election, has basic strength of his own and is considered certain to defeat his Republican opponent, Evan Hultman, the state's attorney general.

The professionals claim that Iowa's present solitary Democratic House member, Rep. Neal Smith, will be re-elected, and that John C. Culver must be rated ahead of incumbent Republican Rep. James E. Bromwell in the 2d District (Cedar Rapids). GOP leaders do not privately disagree with the analysis.

Opinions disagree thereafter whether the 6th or 7th District should also be listed as the next most promising Democratic ground. Stanley I. Greigg, mayor of Sioux City, is challenging Howard Sokol, state representative, in the 6th. In the 7th, the veteran Republican Rep. Ben F. Jensen is hard pushed by John R. Hansen.

Astonishing as it may seem, Democrats claim that no Republican congressional seat in the state is "safe," not even the 3d District seat held by Rep. H. R. Gross, economy gadfly of the House. Democrats do not claim all seven seats; they say they have a chance in all of them.

A well-informed labor observer attributes the changing scene both to the strength of Gov. Hughes, who has proved vigorous and courageous as chief executive, and economic changes in the state. Iowa is no longer just rural and small town; it is becoming heavily industrialized, and labor's relations with several farm groups are excellent.

MISSOURI

Missouri went narrowly for Pres. Kennedy in 1960, giving the ticket a scant 6,000 plurality; Johnson is expected to do much better. The state has 12 Electoral College votes.

Democratic Sen. Stuart Symington, seeking a third term, is widely popular and is expected to defeat his Republican opponent, Jean Paul Bradshaw, a conservative Republican, without trouble.

The GOP, seeking to end the long Democratic monopoly in the state capital, nominated an able and respected candidate for governor, Ethan A. H. Shepley, former chancellor of Washington University in St. Louis, but it would be rated as an upset if he defeated William E. Hearnes, now secretary of state.

Little change is expected in the present House of Representatives lineup of eight Democrats, two Republicans. The GOP is making a hard fight for the 4th District, where Rep. William J. Randall is the incumbent, but Republican James M. Taylor is still an underdog.

AT AKRON-CANTON AIRPORT, as at virtually every campaign stop he has made, Pres. Johnson draws a huge crowd—and mingles in it with obvious relish.

Younger Set Using Bookbag Stickers

Pittsburgh, Pa. — Politics comes naturally to Jackie Lou, Bernadette and John McDonough. Their father, a member of American Bakery & Confectionery Workers Local 12, serves on the COPE committee of the Allegheny County AFL-CIO; their mother is active in Union Women United for Johnson and Humphrey.

The three youngsters wanted to do their share, too, and they came up with a new use for LBJ bumper stickers. They pasted them on their school bookbags and, as 11-year-old Jackie Lou wrote the AFL-CIO News, "every time we walk up the street, people see our stickers, and I know they will get out and vote for LBJ."

More Unions Vote Support For Johnson

Two more union bodies have voted "full and active support" of Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, his vice presidential candidate, in their election campaign.

The executive board of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers called on members to support the Democratic candidates in order that an "enlightened Administration can be maintained." It declared the "overriding issue of the campaign is war or peace" and called Sen. Barry Goldwater, the GOP candidate for President, "trigger-happy."

Delegates representing 29,000 members of the United Federation of Teachers, New York City, voted to end a tradition of non-involvement in politics by endorsing Johnson and Humphrey. They voted also to raise funds for the ticket through a voluntary campaign in the schools.

UFT Pres. Al Shanker called on members to "rise to their responsibilities as citizens and teachers" and to meet head-on "the challenge to public education represented in the national contest" for leadership.

Canadian Woodworker On Territorial Body

Ottawa, Ont.—Stuart Hodgson, financial secretary of Woodworkers Local 1-217, Vancouver, B. C., has been appointed a commissioner of the Northwest Territories Legislative Council, governing body of Canada's northern territories.

CLERKS AS WELL AS CUSTOMERS turned out to hear Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey as the Democratic vice presidential nominee campaigned at a Dundalk, Md., shopping center. Local and state Democratic candidates joined him as he crisscrossed through the state.

House Gains Likely:

Ohio, Pennsylvania Leaning to Johnson

ently have 14 seats to 13 for the Democrats; in Ohio, the GOP margin is a lopsided 18-6.

In Pennsylvania, Sen. Scott would normally be considered a strong favorite for re-election. The Democratic nominee, Genevieve Blatt, Pennsylvania's secretary of state for internal affairs, emerged from a bruising primary battle with a photo-finish victory or 513 votes after months of recounts and court litigation. Nevertheless, Miss Blatt is now credited with a real possibility of upsetting Scott.

Aggressive Campaigner

Part of the change is the result of her active, aggressive campaigning—two years ago she was the only Democratic survivor in the GOP takeover of state offices. And part is the result of the damage the Goldwater candidacy has apparently done to the Pennsylvania Republican ticket. The outlook is for a close race.

Democratic candidates are given a chance to capture four House seats now held by Republicans, while one Democratic seat is considered vulnerable.

The possible Democratic pickups include the 10th District, once represented by Gov. William W. Scranton (R), where Democrat James J. Haggerty is trying to unseat Joseph M. McDade. Democrats have hopes also that Ralph O. Samuel can upset veteran incumbent Willard S. Curtin in the 8th District; that N. Neiman Craley, Jr., can unseat George A. Goodling in the 19th, and that Joseph P. Vigorito can beat James D. Weaver in the marginal 24th District, which includes Erie.

Democrat George M. Rhodes of Reading, a former labor editor with an impressive record in eight terms in Congress, faces a tough battle in his enlarged 6th District, considered a very marginal area. His opponent is James B. Bamford, a former Reading mayor.

Ohio Senate Battle

In Ohio, Robert Taft, Jr., presently congressman-at-large, carried a famous Ohio name into his campaign against Sen. Stephen M. Young, who won his seat in the 1958 "right-to-work" upheaval. Taft is expected to run ahead of Goldwater; the key will be how much ahead.

The peppery Young has won against heavy odds before, and if Johnson runs strong in the state, he has a chance of doing it again.

In the congressional battles Democrats are hopeful of unseating Homer E. Abele in the 10th District with Walter H. Moeller, the former congressman. They also see a good chance of winning the 11th District with C. D. Lambros of Ashtabula. The incumbent, Oliver P. Bolton, is running statewide for congressman-at-large, and the GOP candidate in the district is J. William Stanton.

Republican incumbent Paul F. Schenck is considered vulnerable in the Dayton area 3rd District, where Rodney M. Love is the Democratic candidate. Democrats are also given a chance to upset Republicans in the 6th and 13th Districts.

Nobel Prize Group Backs LBJ Ticket

Thirty-three winners of the Nobel Prize have called for the election of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey because they have the qualifications for responsible leadership.

The great issue in the election is war and peace, the 33 distinguished Americans declared in a joint statement, and leadership of the U.S. on this issue requires responsibility, patience and understanding of the nature of a nuclear age.

"Pres. Johnson meets these qualifications," said the Nobel winners, "and his opponent does not." They added: "We salute his choice of Hubert Humphrey, a proven champion of reason and vision in world affairs, as his vice presidential candidate."

10-State Union Group Confers on Appalachia

Charleston, W. Va.—One hundred and thirty trade union leaders from 10 Appalachian states met with government and university experts here for a three-day discussion of regional problems and federal programs aimed at reviving the economy of this depressed mountain area.

The conference was sponsored by the West Virginia University Institute for Labor Studies and by the state AFL-CIO central bodies in Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia. The program was coordinated by West Virginia AFL-CIO Pres. Miles C. Stanley and Stanley Hostler, acting director of the university institute.

In workshop discussion groups and in general sessions, participants heard and questioned top staff members of the President's Appalachian Regional Commission, Asst. Labor Sec. Daniel P. Moynihan, and panelists from agencies dealing with area redevelopment, manpower training and the anti-poverty program.

Speakers included Author Michael Harrington, who termed the anti-poverty program under way only "the beginning of the beginning," and Jack Conway, Industrial Union Dept. director who is on a special assignment to set up the community action portion of the anti-poverty program.

Education, research and community services staff experts from the AFL-CIO, affiliated unions and state central bodies served as panel experts.

In closing discussion, delegates had high praise for the conference and adopted a resolution calling for a continued association of the 10 state central bodies to coordinate efforts in support of needed legislation, including the Appalachia development bill, and to keep union members informed on the various programs now being developed to improve the economy of the area.

Rubber Workers Give Scholarships

Chicago—Seven winners of Joseph W. Childs Memorial Scholarships were announced by Pres. George Burdon of the Rubber Workers.

Named were Carmen Anthony Mannella, Buffalo, N. Y.; Edward Baranosky, Needham Heights, Mass.; Michael Scott Nesja, Eau Claire, Wis.; Steven R. Lester, Whittier, Calif.; Barbara Foell, Elmira, Ont.; Allan Jaworski, Passaic, N. J., and Larry Hassell, Waco, Tex.

Reuther Finds Training Class Dropouts Low

Detroit—The dropout rate for students who attended a technical training school sponsored by Auto Workers Local 412 was less than 4 percent, UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther reported at "commencement" exercises here.

Reuther and Sen. Patrick V. McNamara (D-Mich.) lauded the 60 adult students who attended drafting, clay modeling and graphic illustration classes for the past 10 months to upgrade their skills.

The trainees, both men and women, ranged from 18 to 46 years in age. Local 412 provided teachers and most pupils. The parent UAW provided meeting rooms, equipment and program development techniques. The Chrysler Corp. and other firms furnished materials, advice and suggestions.

The training program, said to be the first of its kind, was financed by an initial $16,231 grant from the Labor Dept. under the Manpower Development & Training Act. Its purpose was to help workers, and the unemployed, prepare to meet job opportunities created by technological changes in industry and business.

Other speakers included Representatives Martha W. Griffiths and James G. O'Hara, both Democrats from Michigan. Congratulatory messages from Sen. Philip Hart (D-Mich.) and Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz were read to the graduates.

Montana Farmers See Threat in 'R-T-W'

Four Montana farm leaders have warned that a drive to outlaw the union shop through a state "right-to-work" law is being pushed by the same groups that have been fighting rural electric and marketing co-ops.

Both Montana Gov. Tim Babcock (R) and GOP Presidential Nominee Barry Goldwater have been associated with the "right-to-work" campaign, the National Council for Industrial Peace warned. "The attack on free collective bargaining and farmer co-ops has become a major election issue in Montana," the council declared.

S. T. McFarland, president of Montana Associated Utilities, a statewide rural electric co-op, called on the state's farmers and workers to "join together" against "a common enemy." Failure to unite, he warned, "could mean disaster for all."

Similar statements were issued by George C. Borchers, president of the Western Montana Dairy Breeders Association; Riley W. Childers, chairman of the Montana Council of Cooperatives, and Leonard Kenfield, president of the Montana Farmers Union.

Childers warned that "any law that cuts the buying power of our best customers, the working people in industry, is a body blow to farmers."

'Morally Evil'

In another state where "right-to-work" forces have been active, Pennsylvania, the industrial peace council released a statement by Msgr. Charles Owen Rice terming the "work" proposal "morally evil."

Msgr. Rice, pastor of a church at Washington, Pa., and a writer and radio commentator, said legislation banning union shop agreements "would upset the present morally healthful balance" between labor and management. It would lead, he added, to "increased social discord and eventual loss of union protection by the very ones who need it most."

pugnant" to all citizens and to responsible Republicans in the state.

Rev. Williams termed the broadcast "a move by the Republican Party to cloud the real issue of the dangerous so-called "right-to-work" law which the Republican Party is supporting in America today through its support of Sen. Barry Goldwater."

G. Richard Pattison, executive secretary of Montana Citizens Rededicated, in a letter to all clergymen in the state on the broadcast, noted that in addition to the appeal to racial prejudice the implication that there are job quotas established by law is "deplorable" because "there is no such language in the law."

No Connection

A "right-to-work" law is simply legislation to prevent a union and an employer from negotiating a union shop or any other form of union security agreement. It has been widely attacked by political leaders, editors, businessmen, members of the clergy, farm and other groups as a direct assault on free collective bargaining.

The Civil Rights Act—supported by a majority of both Republicans and Democrats in both the House and Senate—does not deal with union security. The act's section on fair employment practices prohibits discrimination in hiring by employers and unions.

In the long fight leading to passage of the act, racist and anti-civil rights forces launched a concerted campaign on the bill and the fair employment practices section as impairing the rights of union members.

No Quotas

One of the more blatant lies of that campaign—now picked up by the Montana GOP—was that job quotas for Negroes would be imposed. The Montana broadcast posed the possibility of Negroes moving "into labor centers like Butte, Anaconda or Great Falls and demand their right to work," demanding that "at least 30 percent of the jobs belong to Negroes."

The AFL-CIO, a leader in the fight to secure passage of the act, documented the lies and distortions in the anti-civil rights campaign, and with enactment of the law published and widely distributed a leaflet, "Civil Rights: Facts vs. Fiction," which said in part:

Facts vs. Fiction

"Fiction: 'A certain number of Negroes will have to be hired on every job, even if white people have to be fired to make room for them.'

"Fact: This is a myth. The law will properly put an end to discrimination in employment — including discrimination in seniority systems. But it does not in any way interfere with existing job rights. There are no 'quotas' established. As a matter of fact, 'inverse discrimination' even if intended to offset past evils, would actually be a violation of the law."

The Montana GOP broadcast said the law "was enacted for the protection of a minority race and declared that the right of a man to a job, even a union job, shall not be denied because of race or color."

Running Attack on LBJ:

Goldwater Pounds Immorality Theme

Sen. Barry Goldwater, entering the final weeks of his campaign for the presidency, maintained his running attack on Pres. Johnson, returning again and again to charges that the President runs the country by "twisting arms" and by "buying and bludgeoning votes."

"Immorality" emerged as the Republican's dominant theme in the final period before the Nov. 3 election. Addressing supporters at a fund-raising dinner near Baltimore, the Arizona senator also repeated his accusation that Johnson is "soft on communism."

He declared that the President had surrounded himself with "bosses—bosses of big cities, bosses of big unions and bosses of big business," and he equated all of these with "the corrupt, the immoral, the power mad and the radicals of the left."

Campaigning in Philadelphia, the senator declared that the nation is riddled with immorality that had trickled down "from top to bottom."

The Senator repeated for network television a speech keyed solely to what he termed "the breakdown of morals" and "crime in our streets," which he delivered originally in the Mormon Tabernacle at Salt Lake City a week earlier.

He charged that "the moral fiber of the American people is beset by rot and decay" and that this could be "corrected" only at "the top," where, he said, "it always starts."

Chides Supreme Court

He repeated criticism of the U.S. Supreme Court decision banning organized prayer in the public schools and implied that this, too, was a factor in the "moral crisis."

The Republican campaign's emphasis on crime and morality in government, almost to the exclusion of meaningful discussion of other issues, was heightened by a half-hour GOP television film originally scheduled for showing on NBC Oct. 22 at 2 p. m., in an admitted effort to reach women viewers.

The film was temporarily withdrawn at Goldwater's insistence, however, following deletion of a scene showing a model in a topless bathing suit and other footage at the request of NBC, and charges by Democratic National Chairman John Bailey that the film would "introduce smut into living rooms" in a "desperate grab for votes." The Democrats released the transcript of a story conference on the film—which a GOP official later acknowledged was accurate—in which the aim of the film was set forth as to arouse "raw and naked emotions," to "play on their prejudices."

Beer Can Theme

Titled "Choice," the film reportedly depicts rioting teenagers, the covers of pornographic books on a newsstand, several shots of a speeding limousine from which the driver throws beer cans, and other scenes aimed at supporting the Republican charge that the nation's morals have declined under Pres. Johnson.

Republicans also purchased a half-hour of time over the ABC network to enable Goldwater to express disagreement with Johnson's address to the nation following the ouster of Khrushchev as premier of the Soviet Union. The Arizona senator predicted that the Kremlin's new rulers would follow a "tougher" line in dealing with the West.

On a swing through parts of Ohio, Goldwater told crowds in such industrial cities as Youngstown, Mansfield, Canton and Akron that he really is a friend of labor in contrast to "some in Washington" who he said would deny workers the right to strike by imposing compulsory arbitration.

"I will defend the right to strike to my last breath," he said, "because that is the only weapon the working man has."

He made no mention in the heavily union cities, however, of his advocacy of state so-called "right-to-work" laws and his sponsorship of a bill that would outlaw union security contract clauses unless the individual states specifically permitted them.

The senator said he was optimistic over his election chances in the face of polls and surveys that give a commanding lead to Pres. Johnson.

Some Fear Defeat

But a number of state GOP officials do not share this optimism, and privately express the fear that Goldwater will drag lesser party candidates down to defeat. Neither Ohio's Republican Gov. James Rhodes nor Rep. Robert A. Taft, Jr., the GOP candidate for U.S. Senate, appeared with their party's standard-bearer on his tour through the state.

On the same midwestern swing, Goldwater set forth his philosophy on civil rights with the declaration that "forced integration is just as wrong as forced segregation." Addressing a $100 a plate fund-raising dinner in Chicago, he charged that the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which he voted against in the Senate, "dangerously treads" into new areas. Government, he said, "can do little more than offer moral leadership and persuasion" in combatting racial discrimination in private affairs.

ours" that give "great weight to our need for a stable, sure and steady course on the basis of a tested bipartisan foreign policy."

- He went before the nation in a television speech carried by all three networks to warn that the emergence of Red China into nuclear capacity raised imperative issues about the world power balance.

- He called in the Cabinet and congressional leaders of both parties for full-scale briefings on the issues raised by Red China's nuclear test and the ouster of Khrushchev in the Soviet Union.

Raps GOP Tactics

The President as he resumed the political campaign slashed bitterly at the nature of the Republican attack on him.

He told an audience at the University of Akron in Ohio that the wisest advice ever given him about policies and campaigns by his political mentor, the late Speaker Sam Rayburn, was "just a minute."

"I am deeply conscious," he said, "of the immense power this nation commands. This power cannot be put into the hands of those who would use it impulsively or carelessly."

The President spoke in these terms when the Republican campaign was clearly in disarray, with scheduled plans to show television films on the theme of "morality" being hastily cancelled. One film show, according to Republican National Committee Chairman Dean Burch, was knocked out at the last minute by the personal orders of Goldwater himself.

The AFL-CIO News learned that two more films of a similar nature had been written, photographed and completed, ready for delivery, when the stop-order came. One of them stressed as its theme, the source said, violence in the street.

Pres. Johnson in St. Louis laid down a 10-point program for the conduct of the United States in confrontation with the Soviet Union and other Communist powers, warning that "some people" speak of nuclear war as if it were inevitable and speak of the atomic bomb "as if it were merely another weapon."

In words that could not be mistaken in meaning, he urged Republican moderates to vote against Goldwater in order to salvage the GOP's "international-ist" position. He did not mention the senator by name.

Johnson's Madison Square Garden speech prior to the emergence of Soviet and Red Chinese events was an extraordinarily candid exposition of his views about the changing nature of American society and the policies demanded.

There must be "a new creative federalism" in the future, he told his Liberal Party audience, involving a great deal more than traditional relationships between the federal government and the various states.

"The federalism of the future," he said, must include "all the institutions and government units whose influence and problems cut across traditional jurisdiction."

There must be "experimentation with . . . a new set of relationships between the federal government and the American city," the President said.

"I propose to work with your local officials and to present a series of proposals designed to meet the challenge of urban America," he said.

Akron Labor Fights Effort to Repeal Law Barring Housing Discrimination

Akron, O.—Presidents of two international unions with headquarters here have joined with local labor, church and civil rights leaders to fight a segregationist attempt to repeal the city's fair housing law.

The city charter proposition, petitioned on the ballot by the Akron Real Estate Board, would go even further than repeal of the ordinance prohibiting discrimination in sale or rental of housing which is not occupied by the owner. It would also bar the city from ever enacting any other fair housing law or regulation.

Pres. George Burdon of the Rubber Workers and Pres. Walter L. Mitchell of the Chemical Workers are members of the Akron Committee for Equal Opportunity in Housing, which is leading the fight against Charter Issue No. 6. Other labor leaders on the committee include Sec. Leo E. Dugan of the Akron Labor Council and James Turner, director of the URW's Fair Employment Practices Dept.

The fair housing ordinance had been adopted by the City Council in July by a vote of 11-2. An important assist for citizen efforts to prevent repeal of the law has come from the Akron Beacon-Journal, which in a recent front page editorial opposed the charter proposition.

The Akron battle echoes the statewide campaign in California, where a proposition to repeal California's fair housing law also has been petitioned on the ballot.

There, too, labor has joined with church and civil rights groups to fight the segregationist real estate lobby and its allies among California "hate" groups.

Southern California's Democratic chairman, Mrs. Carmen H. Warschaw, charged in a recent speech that a joint campaign of "distortion and deceit" is being waged to repeal fair housing and elect Sen. Goldwater.

She said Democratic voters have been receiving anonymous "fright literature" in the mails and headquarters of the coalition opposing the repeal drive "have been harassed and threatened by bigots and extremists."

The AFL-CIO nationally has been working with groups fighting house segregation and a recent meeting of the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing elected three labor members as vice president, Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee; Exec. Dir. Jack T. Conway of the Industrial Union Dept., and William H. Oliver of the Auto Workers. AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman was elected to the committee's board of directors.

Auto Union Seeks Pattern at Dana

Cleveland, O.—The Dana Corp. is in such a favorable profit position that it can afford, at a minimum, to accept the "pattern" contracts won recently from major auto makers, the Auto Workers said at the opening of negotiations here on a new contract covering 5,700 production, maintenance, office and clerical workers in 16 Dana plants.

The UAW's national agreement with Dana, supplier of Perfect Circle piston rings and other auto parts, has a Nov. 15 expiration date.

North Carolina Furniture Firm Votes Union

New York—The Furniture Workers have won collective bargaining rights at a major southern plant producing bedroom and dining room furniture.

Workers at the 83-year-old White Furniture Co. in Hillsboro and Mebane, N. C., voted for UFWA in a National Labor Relations Board election. The result was 240-139 with 22 ballots challenged.

UFWA Pres. Morris Pizer said the victory indicates that workers in North Carolina, the "No. 1 furniture state," are ready for union organizing. The union, he said, intends to intensify its efforts to bring better wages, working conditions and improved job security to the industry.

Organizing activities, started last July, were carried to success despite harassment. Company attempts to enroll local merchants and clergymen in an anti-union coalition proved unsuccessful despite anti-labor editorials in the local weekly newspaper, the union reported.

A large rank-and-file committee signed letters sent to their fellow workers, distributed information and talked union in the plants.

September Tally Shows:

Jobs, Wages Rise To All-Time High

Better-than-seasonal improvements in non-farm and factory employment marked the job situation in September, the Labor Dept. reported in releasing detailed figures for the month.

Non-farm payroll employment reached an all-time record high in September of 59.8 million, with 100,000 of the increase from August tagged as more than seasonal. The non-farm job figure is 1.6 million higher than a year ago.

Factory employment moved up to 17.8 million, the highest level for the month in more than a decade, with the September gain 60,000 better than seasonal.

The department reported also that the average weekly earnings of factory production workers rose nearly a dollar to $103.94, a new high, and that hourly earnings moved up in three-fourths of the individual manufacturing industries. Average hourly earnings for all manufacturing was $2.56.

In a separate report the department said that five major labor market areas moved to categories of lower unemployment in September and the number of areas classified as having 6 percent or more unemployed dropped to 31, the lowest point since the spring of 1961.

Listings Down

The Muskegon - Muskegon Heights, Mich., area was dropped from the substantial unemployment category, lowering the number from 32 in August to 31 in September. In September 1963 the number of major areas with substantial unemployment was 37.

On the overall employment report, the Labor Dept. said the workweek declined by three-tenths of an hour in September, the usual seasonable movement for the month, but that overtime hours remained unchanged at 3.3 hours, mostly in the high-wage, durable goods sector.

Employment in state and local governments was swelled by nearly half-a-million workers as the new school year began, with the expansion nearly 90,000 greater than expected. State and local employment has increased 340,000 since September 1963.

In contract construction, employment dropped slightly from August, but remained above the year-ago figure.

As reported earlier, the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate hit 5.2 percent for September, essentially unchanged from August. The rate has ranged between 4.9 and 5.3 percent for the past five months. Unemployment at 3.3 million in September was down 350,000 from August and was at the lowest September level since 1959.

Shown here are Yunusa Kaltungo, regional secretary of the Nigerian Nurses Association; B. M. Udolkporo, general secretary of the Eastern Nigeria Development Corp. and Allied Workers Union, and Fidelis O. Nwadiashi of Nigeria's local authority staff union. 105 Youth Opportunity Centers To Give Job Guidance, Training

A nationwide network of Youth Opportunity Centers is being set up to combat the critical problem of youth unemployment, the Labor Dept. has announced.

The centers will be part of the federal-state public employment service. Some 105 metropolitan areas will have youth job centers, with at least one center in each state. Rural comunities will be served through reinforced personnel in 1,400 local public job centers and by mobile teams.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, in announcing the youth job system, recited these "brutal facts":

- 5.5 million youngsters between 16 and 21 live in families with incomes below $3,000 a year.
- An average of 1.2 million youngsters last year needed help, with over 700,000 of them both out of school and out of work.
- The youth jobless rate has been nearly three times that of the rest of the labor force, often rising over 15 percent, and the gap is widening.
- Of the 30 million young people entering the labor force in the next decade, more than 8 million will not have completed high school and some 2.5 million will lack even a grade school education, handicapping them in the competition for shrinking unskilled work.

"Our hope for the future," declared Wirtz, "depends for its fulfillment upon the character, energy and wisdom of our young people. But today that hope is forlorn as far as too many young men and women are concerned.

"Uneducated and untrained to fill the jobs created by modern technology, they walk an aimless path darkened by poverty, prejudice and lack of purpose. Too often these conditions lead to delinquency and crime."

Wirtz went on to say that to accept the plight of today's youth as being beyond help would be "a cruel error." America's young people can know the satisfaction of working, of achieving goals and enjoying rewards, but they need help, he added, declaring that the Labor Dept. means to provide this help.

The new Youth Opportunity Centers will have the major responsibility for recruiting and selecting candidates for the Neighborhood Youth Corps and the Job Corps, both created under the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964.

The NYC, administered by the Labor Dept., will provide work-training to about 200,000 disadvantaged youth in their home communities. Emphasis will be applied through schools on finding part-time work to enable high school students to complete their schooling.

The Job Corps, to be run by the new Office of Economic Opportunity, will provide work-training opportunities in camps for some 40,000 disadvantaged youth.

The centers also will be equipped to provide counseling, guidance and job placement services for young men who fail the Armed Forces Qualification Test because of educational deficiencies. It is estimated that as many as 800,000 young men during the next year will fail this test and be referred to Youth Opportunity Centers.

The YOCs also will service youngsters who qualify for literacy and vocational training under the Manpower Development & Training Act and those being counseled through regular employment service high school programs.

Special attention will be given by the YOCs to those youngsters who have not had the means of securing adequate education, training or employment, the Labor Dept. said.

The YOCs will be staffed in part by counselor aides and youth advisors, 1,700 of whom were trained this summer at 27 universities in methods of helping jobless youth.

U. S. Task Force to Aid Cities Hit by Shutdowns

Pres. Johnson has created a permanent task force of key government agencies to assist the economic recovery of communities faced with plant closings.

He ordered the Departments of Commerce and Labor and the Office of Economic Opportunity to establish a permanent group to join with state and local officials and other community leaders in immediate action programs whenever large-scale layoffs occurred.

The President said:

"Although rapid economic growth during the past several years has sharply lowered the level of unemployment, and reduced the incidence of plant closings, individual cases of large-scale layoffs will undoubtedly continue to occur in a dynamic economy. The federal government must be prepared to move quickly to the assistance of communities affected by such layoffs."

The President said he had been impressed by the preliminary results of the South Bend, Ind., program set up with the closing of the Studebaker plant there.

Under the task force approach, the President said the following actions will be considered in communities faced with actual or imminent plant closings:

- Emergency and long-range programs to open job opportunities through the creation of new industries and the expansion of existing ones.
- An industrial procurement conference for local firms with federal procurement agencies to make available complete information on the possibilities and requirements of government contracting.
- Arrange for the approval and establishment of training programs under the Manpower Development & Training Act.
- Expand the existing surplus food disposal program of the Dept. of Agriculture.
- Arrange with the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration for the approval of mortgage forbearance agreements.
- Determine the possibility of establishing special programs for the employment of older workers.

TV Show to Stress Need For Aged Hospital Care

America's senior citizens—and their sons and daughters—will present the case for social security hospital care for the elderly in a half-hour television program to be shown Sunday, Oct. 25, over Columbia Broadcasting System stations. The scheduled time is 5 p.m., EST, although showings may vary in some cities.

Only one professional actor is in the cast—E. G. Marshall, who plays a leading role in The Defenders television series. But Marshall will just be the narrator in the National Council for Senior Citizens program. The stars will be men and women playing their real life role—telling of their first-hand experience with the high cost of hospital care for people living on modest, fixed incomes.

Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.), co-sponsor of the bill to include health insurance under social security, will be on the program. So will Dr. Benjamin Spock, the baby doctor.

There will be clergymen of all faiths, active and retired workers, farmers, teachers.

The program is titled RX for a Nightmare. "It will tell the truth," Senior Citizens Pres. John W. Edelman declared, "and it will be a powerful answer to the American Medical Association's deliberate campaign to confuse the public."

The AMA, which was turned down by the network in an attempt to blanket the nation with spot announcements attacking social security hospital care, was given a half-hour free time by CBS to present its arguments. But the network also gave equal time to the senior citizen groups to present the affirmative case.

Trainee Information Unit Set in Newark

Newark, N. J.—The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training has opened the nation's seventh apprentice information center here in cooperation with the U.S. Employment Service.

Thomas D. Miller, of the USES, has been named director. The center will inform and counsel young people, regardless of race, creed or color, on opportunities for apprenticeships which will bolster the country's supply of highly-skilled artisans and craftsmen.

Pilots Approve Strike at TWA As Talks Lag

Chicago—Trans World Airlines pilots have voted by an almost 95 percent margin to call a strike if that should become necessary to obtain a new contract.

The Air Line Pilots said strike authorization was given by the largest vote in favor of a walkout in TWA history. The union polled its 1,800 members on TWA when negotiations with the company reached a stalemate Sept. 23 after more than a year of contract talks.

ALPA said improvements similar to those negotiated on other air lines are needed to "provide relief from excessive flying hours, unnecessarily long daily flight duty periods, and schedules providing insufficient time off between duty periods and trips." Members also want "more protection against premature career termination," the union said.

Negotiations started in September 1963 on contract terms due to terminate Nov. 6, 1963. No strike date will be set, ALPA said, until the National Mediation Board ends its mediating efforts and a "cooling off" period expires.

LBJ, Humphrey Triumph Seen with Record Balloting

Senate Lead Safe:

Democratic Gains Predicted in House

By David L. Perlman

The political signposts pointed to Democratic gains in the House as the campaign entered its final days. In the Senate the outlook was for the Democrats to retain a heavy majority, close to or above their present 32-vote margin.

Most estimates of Democratic House gains ranged from 10 or 12 seats to as high as 25, depending on the impact of the presidential race.

The lower estimate presumed only modest assistance to Democratic congressional candidates from the big vote expected for the party's presidential ticket. The higher predictions assumed that a substantial number of Johnson supporters will vote for other Democratic candidates. The consensus was that heavy ticket-splitting will keep the victory from reaching the tidal wave proportions of 1936.

Since the Roosevelt era, Democratic congressional candidates have as a group outpolled the party's presidential ticket. This year, observers agree, it will be the other way around. It is the unknown impact of this turnabout which has caused some political experts to hedge their predictions more than usual.

The Senate picture was projected on a narrower screen, since 26 of the 35 seats up this year are held by Democrats and a number of contests are rated extremely close. Most estimates range between a net GOP gain of two Senate seats and a Democratic pickup of three.

A House gain for the Democrats would strengthen the Administration's base of support and weaken

GM Strike Ended at Most Plants

Detroit — General Motors assembly lines began coming to life again as the Auto Workers voted to end a 31-day strike and to stand by for job recall in all plants where local-level agreements have been reached.

The vote to settle was by an overwhelming margin at plant ratification meetings around the country and at a General Motors Council meeting here. But 24 of the 130 GM plants were still negotiating on contract-covered working conditions as the AFL-CIO News went to press, and workers remained on strike at those plants.

In a parallel development the UAW set a strike deadline of Nov. 6 at plants of the Ford Motor Co. where local-level agreements have not been reached by the deadline—18 of the 87 Ford plants.

The UAW reached agreement

George W. Romney, exhibit the canine campaigner for the Minnesota senator. At left rear is Democratic Sen. Philip A. Hart, seeking re-election for a second term in Michigan.

Vote Total May Reach 75 Million

By Willard Shelton

An estimated 70 to 75 million Americans will go to the polls Nov. 3 to elect the nation's next President and Vice President. The opinion samplers unanimously predicted a heavy majority for the Democratic ticket headed by Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota, but acknowledged it was the votes in the ballot box, not the opinion surveys, that would be counted on election day.

Also to be elected on Nov. 3 are 35 U.S. senators, 25 of the nation's 50 state governors and all 435 members of the House of Representatives. In addition, 44 of the states will elect members of the state legislatures and tens of thousands of local officials and state officials below the rank of governor.

The estimated total vote of above 70 million would be an all-time high, surpassing the 68.8 million cast in 1960 for the late Pres. John F. Kennedy, former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon and a dozen minor-party candidates.

A total election turnout approaching the upper estimated range of 75 million, however, would be required merely to show the vote keeping pace with the country's population gain of approximately 3 million a year.

A high-level vote seemed to be likely because of at least two changed factors: Registration of Negro citizens, particularly in southern states, has increased sen-

18 Democratic, 7 GOP:

25 Governorships At Stake in Election

"People have to have someone to get mad at, and recently it's tended to be the governor."

This sage comment was made by Wisconsin's Gov. John W. Reynolds (D), but it could have been said just as validly by a large proportion of governors, both Democrats and Republicans.

There are, of course, governors whose popularity has withstood the need to raise taxes, the often-frustrating battles with malapportioned legislatures, the periodic unearthing of petty and sometimes not-so-petty corruption. As a rule, however, governors have little job security, even in states which do not impose one or two-term limits.

25 Governor Races

This year, 18 of the 34 governorships now held by Democrats are up for election, along with seven of the 16 held by Republicans.

On the pure arithmetic, the odds should favor a Republican pickup of several state houses, especially since gubernatorial elections tend to be marked by more ticket-splitting and less party identification than other political contests.

Nevertheless a number of Democratic governors — including Reynolds — are counting heavily on drippings from the Johnson vote to pull them through against strong Republican challengers. Several Democratic candidates are given a chance to upset Republican incumbents for the same reason.

In the states held by Democrats, the party's candidates are considered certain to win in Texas and Florida and clearly ahead in Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire and New Mexico.

They are leading also, although by lesser margins, in Massachusetts,

Meany Urges All Unions To Get Out Vote Nov. 3

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called for a massive get-out-the-vote drive on Nov. 3 as a weapon against "complacency . . . the greatest threat to victory for the candidates we support."

The text of Meany's telegram to all affiliates and state and local bodies:

"Only a week remains before the American people will make their decision in this most pivotal election. The campaign is all but over. Probably the vast majority of citizens have already decided how they will vote. Now our responsibility is to do all we can to make sure every eligible citizen votes.

"Complacency, fostered by public opinion polls, is the greatest threat to victory for the candidates we support. If the Johnson-Humphrey ticket is to achieve overwhelming triumph, and if a liberal Congress is to be elected, Nov. 3 must produce the greatest outpouring of voters in the nation's history.

"Therefore I urge you to devote all the available energy of your organization to the AFL-CIO's get-out-the-vote drive on Election Day. Only in that way can we reap the benefits of our registration and education campaigns; only in that way can the security and progress of America be insured."

Labor-Industry Aides, Arbiters Back Johnson

Leading arbitrators and negotiators for both management and unions have joined in a call for the election of Pres. Johnson because he "has shown vigorously and consistently that he understands and believes in the principles of free collective bargaining."

Nearly 200 industrial relations experts warned that the election of Sen. Goldwater would risk a "return to the days of industrial warfare."

The newly-formed Industrial Relations Committee for Johnson and Humphrey is headed by Dr. George W. Taylor, University of Pennsylvania professor and one of the nation's most prominent mediators and arbitrators.

Sponsors of the committee, in addition to Taylor, are: David L. Cole, former director of the Federal Mediation Service; Theodore W. Kheel, leading New York arbitrator; Harry W. Platt, permanent umpire for Ford Motor Co. and the Auto Workers; Ralph T. Seward, impartial umpire for Bethlehem Steel Co. and the Steelworkers; William Caples, Inland Steel Co. vice president; Robert A. Levitt and Burton Zorn, management attorneys; David E. Feller, Louis Sherman and Gerhard Van Arkel, labor attorneys.

The committee statement said the election of Johnson and Humphrey "would encourage the dynamic and evolutionary growth of democratic collective bargaining in the interests

New York City Hotel Workers Mark 25 Years of Union Gains

New York—A warning that organized workers will not let hotel owners turn the clock back on union gains of a quarter-century was made by Pres. Jay Rubin of the New York Hotel & Motel Trades Council at a 25th anniversary celebration of the first collective bargaining agreement between the council and the New York Hotel Association.

The occasion also was marked by a musical play, Twenty-Five Candles, which combined music, stage, screen and dance techniques to tell the story of the hotel workers progress over a quarter of a century. The show's cast included more than 250 bellmen, maids, cooks, waiters, elevator operators, busboys, dishwashers and other workers and their children.

The pageant started with the depression period of the 1930s and traced developments in the industry beginning with the days when chambermaids earned $18 a month. It depicted the stormy era of bitter employer resistance to union organization, strikes and police brutality, anti-labor injunctions, passage of the Wagner Act and the early days of organizing.

It went on to show the signing of the first union contract in 1938, which ended 60 years of open shop conditions in the city's hotel industry, and recorded the growth of the council up to the present.

15,000 Attend

Some 15,000 hotel workers, trade union leaders and political dignitaries, including Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) and Mayor Robert F. Wagner (D), viewed the pageant at Madison Square Garden. It was written and produced by top professional talent.

In his remarks following the pageant, Rubin recalled that when the first union contract was signed the hotel industry was bankrupt. Although it is financially sound today, he said, speculators are looking at hotels as a means of earning real estate profits.

"We urge hotel owners who feel they can change the character of the hotel industry to look back at its history," he declared. "You cannot treat these workers as bricks or mortar and throw them out in the streets."

Rubin was critical of owners who have announced that their hotels are to be torn down to make way for office buildings. He held that hotels are the first impression foreign visitors get when they come to this country, and asserted that "the human investment represented in this first impression is well worth protecting by continuing good labor-management relations."

"The days of the past are gone," he said. "Workers have made too many gains to permit anyone to take them away."

A message from Pres. Johnson was read to the audience by Zero Mostel, Broadway comedian. Other messages were received from labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Top Officers Renamed By Cement Workers

Montreal, Que.—The Cement Workers delegates re-elected Pres. Felix C. Jones, Sec.-Treas. Toney Gallo and all other incumbent officers as they wound up the union's 12th convention here.

In the only contest of the election, incumbent Joseph M. Vierra of Santa Cruz, Calif., defeated Dist. 3 Rep. Wayne Sanders of Victorville, Calif., for the 8th vice presidency, 155 to 86.

In other actions, the convention:

- Increased salaries of all officers and representatives of the union 5 percent on Nov. 1, 1964, and another 5 percent a year later.
- Granted four weeks' vacation after 20 years' service to all of the union's officers and representatives.
- Overwhelmingly endorsed the Johnson- Humphrey ticket.
- Increased strike benefits from $25 to $30 per week.
- Changed the international's constitution to make mandatory the election of a registrar by each local union.
- Called on all of the union's Canadian locals to affiliate with the New Democratic Party.
- Urged more activity from locals on the legislative and political fronts, particularly through the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

Heading convention speakers were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress and Donald MacDonald, secretary-treasurer of the CLC.

Louisville, Ky., was selected as the 1966 convention site.

ACWA in Montreal Posts Pay Gains

Montreal—More than 5,000 workers in the men's clothing industry will get wage hikes of 11 cents an hour on Dec. 7 and another 5 cents next June 29 under a new agreement between the Clothing Workers' Montreal Joint Board and the Associated Clothing Manufacturers of the Province of Quebec, Inc.

The pact calls for a wage reopener after 18 months if the cost of living continues to rise. The settlement, which includes a major medical plan covering all workers, an eighth paid holiday and other benefits, was based on an arbitration award by H. Carl Goldenberg, impartial industry chairman.

Air Line Pilot Takes 'Busman's Holiday'

Dallas, Tex.—First Officer James N. Swick of Braniff Airways designed and built a biplane in his garage, flew it 2,500 miles round trip to Rockford, Ill., for the Experiment Aircraft Association's national "fly-in" and won first prize for best original design among 300 homebuilt aircraft. He's a member of the Air Line Pilots.

Swick took two years to build the small plane he calls the Swickster I. It has an 18-foot wing span and a 150-horsepower engine using only nine gallons of gasoline an hour from 23-gallon tanks.

On Board Proposal:

Non-Op Rail Unions Open Contract Talks

Chicago—Eleven unions representing more than 400,000 off-train railroad workers have opened talks here with managers of 187 U.S. railroads to see whether contract agreements can be reached ahead of a possible strike deadline.

The parties have until Nov. 19 to work out contract terms resulting from recommendations made to Pres. Johnson Oct. 20 by an emergency board he appointed.

The board proposed that the non-operating unions and the rail managers negotiate three-year agreements providing wage increases of 9 cents an hour each year, improved vacation, holiday and welfare benefits, and strengthened protection against job slashes due to automation, business losses or the contracting-out of work.

Union representatives met first to discuss the board report and then with management negotiators. As the talks began, Chairman G. E. Leighty of the union committee said that "neither side has accepted or rejected the recommendations" of the seven-member panel that conducted hearings and issued a report.

The parties have 30 days from Oct. 20 to reach agreement. After that, both sides will be free to act unilaterally—the unions to stop work and management to put new wage rates and working conditions into effect on major railroad, terminal and switching properties.

Shopcraft Pattern

The board's job protection proposals were patterned after an agreement reached by the rail companies and six shopcraft unions recently, but went farther by extending severance pay and other benefits to workers displaced by a decline in business as well as technological changes.

The board also proposed an extra 2 cents an hour on Jan. 1, 1966, to cover the increased cost of present health and welfare benefits; a fourth week of vacation, an added holiday and $2,000 in life insurance coverage for retirees.

The unions involved are the shopcrafts—Boiler Makers, Firemen & Oilers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Railway Carmen and Sheet Metal Workers—and five other trades: the Maintenance of Way Employes, Railroad Telegraphers, Railway Clerks, Signalmen, and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

All are seeking improved job protection. The Signalmen won a wage increase in July and are not affected by the current wage dispute.

ILPA Votes To Censure Oregon Paper

The executive council of the Intl. Labor Press Association has voted to censure a member publication, the Oregon Labor Press, for supporting the cause of a secession movement against two AFL-CIO unions in the West Coast paper industry.

The council found that stories in the Oregon Labor Press, which admittedly were heavily slanted in favor of the rump group, constituted a violation of Point 1 in the ILPA Code of Ethics, which requires member publications to serve the best interests of the AFL-CIO.

Censure was voted, rather than the maximum penalty of suspension, because the weekly paper turned to objective coverage shortly after a directive by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called upon all AFL-CIO organizations to support the two unions against the secessionists.

The charges were brought by Richard A. Estep, editor of United Paper. James W. Goodsell is editor of the Oregon Labor Press. Both are ILPA vice presidents.

21 Fired in Union Drive Get up to 6 Years' Pay

Delaware, O. — Backpay of $151,092 has been given by the United States Air Conditioning Corp. to 21 workers and the widow of another worker, fired by the firm in 1958 for trying to organize an Auto Workers local.

After six years of legal battling, the company agreed to comply with two National Labor Relations Board decisions and two enforcing orders by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, according to a UAW announcement.

That means an election set aside July 19, 1960, because of company unfair practices will be re-run when the NLRB regional director decides the time is right. The UAW lost the first election, held Sept. 19, 1958, by a 134-63 vote.

UAW officers said they were pleased that "justice delayed was not justice denied" for Airco workers who "were fired only for seeking their right to join a union." In other cases, delays open to management under the law have prolonged payment of backpay by a dozen years or more, according to NLRB records.

The dispute began in the summer of 1958 when 22 workers were fired during a UAW organizing drive. The union filed charges which were consolidated with later charges when the UAW lost the election.

The NLRB upheld a trial examiner's rulings and went to court when the corporation refused to comply. The 6th Circuit enforced the board order in 1961, and again on Sept. 8, 1964, when management objected to the examiner's backpay rulings.

Under the court decree, five workers got backpay for almost the entire dispute period and must be restored to jobs comparable with their former jobs. Most of the others were rehired earlier for comparable work.

Papermakers Win At Box Plant

Westfield, Mass.—The Papermakers & Paperworkers won a 42-25 victory here in a National Labor Relations Board election at the plant of Boxmakers, Inc.

It was the third straight AFL-CIO win in a coordinated campaign started last spring by area unions in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization.

The Technical Engineers won 14-3 at the Crane Co. at Indian Orchard, Mass., and the Chemical Workers won by a 2-1 margin in a 125-worker unit at Tidy Home Products in Holyoke, Mass., Dir. John Livingston reported.

At Barber-Colman:

Sheet Metal Union Wins Long Strike

Rockford, Ill.—Sheet Metal Workers whose ranks held firm during a 20-week strike against the Barber-Colman Co. voted unanimously here to ratify terms of a strike settlement providing major gains for 2,500 production workers.

The new contract, first in 63 years for the once bitterly anti-union manufacturer of air conditioning components and textile machine tools, provides wage hikes of more than 27 cents an hour by May 1966; company-paid insurance premiums, major medical coverage for retirees, union dues checkoff, a 70 percent increase in shop stewards, more seniority benefits, an arbitration clause and other objectives of Sheet Metal Workers Local 573.

In a memorandum of agreement signaling the end of the strike, union and management negotiators agreed that strikers accused of picket-line violence will not be discharged, but their status will be held in abeyance until an impartial arbitrator rules on each case.

It was agreed that no criminal proceedings will be resorted to while the arbiter holds hearings. The union's nation-wide boycott and refusal to bargain charges against Barber-Colman will be dropped, and the firm will in turn dismiss complaints of secondary boycott and picket-line incidents.

Strong AFL-CIO Support

A factor of the strike, which started June 5 when contract negotiations broke down, was strong support by the AFL-CIO and its unions. Federation Pres. George Meany called the walkout in its early days "a classic example of a trade union's fight for survival" and the AFL-CIO Executive Council rallied wide support.

The memorandum of agreement provides that:

- All strikers shall return to their old jobs or an equivalent or higher job by no later than two or three weeks from the settlement.
- Union and management will work to create a climate of improved relations.
- The parties will cooperate in the increased use of company products.
- Foremen and union stewards will meet with the company labor relations director and the union's director of organization to learn of the responsibilities of both sides under the new contract.

Final settlement was achieved, union Organization Dir. Edward J. Carlough said, with the cooperation of union officers including Pres. Edward F. Carlough, Sec.-Treas. David S. Turner, Atty. Donald Fisher and members of the executive board.

The Sheet Metal Workers won bargaining rights here in February 1963. After long negotiations an interim eight-month agreement was signed after which former management leaders sought to destroy the union and forced a decertification election.

Benefits Listed

Features of the new agreement are these:

- An average wage hike of 6 cents an hour, effective at once, plus three-fourths of 1 cent per hour in a wage adjustment and consolidation of 300 existing wage rate ranges into 19 labor grades, with increased maximum wage rates for some 95 percent of all jobs.
- A union-devised "wage point" formula, which early next year will provide in-grade wage increases ranging from 6 to 8 cents an hour for affected incentive employes and 8-11 cents an hour for affected non-incentive employes.
- Wage increases of 9 cents an hour in May 1965 and again in May 1966; and a second round of in-grade boosts for employes affected by the "wage point" formula.
- Two additional wage reviews under the formula at six-month intervals in 1966.

The union also won firmer union security, stronger grievance procedure, more seniority on recalls, transfers and promotions, new vacation pay formula, elimination of wage-cutting practices and other benefits in the 30-month contract package, whose value it put at 52-54 cents an hour.

Auto Workers Return At Most GM Plants

several weeks ago on national contract terms with Ford and GM. Ford locals did not stop work but GM locals did when a postponed deadline was reached, after repeated warnings by UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the need for promptness in settling disputes over local working agreements.

The union won substantial improvements in its contracts with auto's Big 3—Ford, GM and Chrysler Corp.—and with American Motors Corp. Gains included wage increases, more relief time, better working conditions, early retirement at income up to $400 a month, and other benefits for auto's 575,000 workers.

GM Council Approved

UAW action to end the GM strike started with a meeting of 240 delegates from the GM locals. Council members voted to ratify the national agreement after an all-day explanation by GM Dir. Leonard Woodcock and Reuther.

Reuther reported that the national GM pact would put an additional $1.8 billion into the pay envelopes of GM members and their families over the three-year contract term.

In cents per hour, the Big 3 settlements are worth 54 to 60 cents an hour, excluding an estimated 3.25 cents an hour for an additional daily relief time of 12 minutes for production workers—a major union goal this year.

The UAW head said early retirement, vacation and holiday improvements helped achieve the UAW convention mandate for more job opportunities. He summed up national gains by saying "never before at the bargaining table have so many persuaded so few to part with so much under such painful circumstances."

The union came to terms with GM on national issues Oct. 5 after having started a walkout Sept. 25.

The UAW conducted a two-day strike against American Motors and achieved the Big 3 economic "package" with minor variations, retained most of the working conditions that management sought to scrap, and kept a modified profit-sharing plan.

The UAW reported that the AMC's Kelvinator plant workers have ratified a new contract geared to the economics of the appliance industry. A local plant agreement at the Grand Rapids, Mich., location was ratified also but the two AMC automotive plants, in Milwaukee and Kenosha, Wis., have not yet held ratification meetings.

Brass Pacts Set Pattern At Anaconda

Coordinated negotiations by several locals and three AFL-CIO international unions in Anaconda American Brass plants have set a wage increase "pattern" of about 30 cents an hour over three years, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has reported.

Two settlements to date have added about 6 cents an hour to previous Anaconda offers, on wages, vacations and other benefits, the IUD said. The unions represent 4,500 workers.

Major gains were reported in settlements with Anaconda by the Steelworkers at Ansonia, Conn., and the Auto Workers at Waterbury, Conn. The UAW struck the latter plant briefly but settled for an additional 3 cents an hour in non-economic areas.

The Waterbury local agreed to give up one-half cent out of the second-year wage increase of 6 cents an hour to guarantee service continuity for vacation purposes of 200 workers transferred from the company's Torrington, Conn., plant. The firm was unwilling to transfer vacation credits otherwise.

Negotiations were continuing at the Kenosha, Wis., plant represented by the USWA, and the Buffalo plant, where the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers, unaffiliated, have bargaining rights. Due soon are contracts involving the Machinists at Kenosha, the UAW at Detroit and the USWA at Paramount, Calif.

The union coordinating committee set a 30-cent minimum goal at a meeting Sept. 29 in New Haven, Conn. Noting that historically the firm has settled for less than the industry pattern, the conferees agreed not to settle for an inferior agreement this year.

'Work' Foes Hit Shift In Political Ad Policy

The National Council for Industrial Peace has accused Oklahoma City television and radio stations WKY of "manipulating" their policy on paid political advertisements to suit the political aims of the stations' management. The stations are controlled by E. K. Gaylord, right-wing publisher of Oklahoma City's two daily newspapers. During the "right-to-work" referendum battle last spring, the Gaylord stations turned down a series of spot political advertisements from opponents of "right-to-work" on the grounds that quotations from prominent people could not be used without specific written permission.

Among those the station refused to air because it did not have a written release was a recording made by the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt—even though the former First Lady was a founder of the industrial peace council and its co-chairman at the time of her death.

The Federal Communications Commission refused to intervene, and the attempt to ban the union shop was defeated anyway. But meanwhile a new election campaign rolled around and the stations did an abrupt about-face.

New Rules Proclaimed

They dropped the requirement for written consent of persons quoted and said statements by prominent figures could be used so long as the quotes are accurate and not out of context.

John M. Redding, director of the industrial peace council, wrote the FCC that while his group does not object to the change, "we feel the present action is politically motivated."

He noted that "now Mr. Gaylord is supporting the Republican candidate for the United States Senate in Oklahoma and once more he changes the rules to conform to what he now wants to do. Again the rules change is made in the closing days of a campaign."

Redding pointed out that "there are certain to be issues and elections in the future that will perhaps bring further twistings and turnings to suit the changing interests of the management of these radio and television stations."

Steelworkers Launch Civil Rights Institutes

Pittsburgh, Pa.—The Steelworkers have launched a wide-scale drive to implement the Civil Rights Act, Pres. David J. McDonald has announced.

A series of institutes is under way which will reach into each of the USWA's 30 districts in the United States and suggest the techniques of implementation to the entire international union administrative staff and the leadership of more than 3,100 local unions. Direction of the institutes is in the hands of the union's Committee on Civil Rights, of which Francis C. Shane is executive secretary.

Sessions have already been held in Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Donora, Pa., and Columbus, Ohio.

"We intend to use all of the means at our command to make meaningful the civil rights law which we and so many others fought so long and so hard to have enacted," said McDonald. "Nothing less than full compliance with all it stands for will suffice."

The aim of the institutes is ultimately to familiarize all members of the union with the operational procedures and intent of the act and to dispel the misunderstandings many workers have had regarding the manner in which it is to be applied.

Representatives of top federal agencies, such as the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, National Labor Relations Board, U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and the Army Material Command, have met with the union rights committee and expressed willingness to work with the USWA in its programming, McDonald said.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights and state and local civil rights agencies have promised similar support and have participated in the institutes held to date.

Maritime Trades Dept. Names Legislative Aide

A. F. (Lonnie) Young, administrative director of the Boilermakers Iron Shipbuilders Intl. Marine Council, has been named legislative representative of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Young had served with the Boilermakers since 1945.

Law Change to Help 100,000 Disabled

Social security amendments recently signed into law by Pres. Johnson will bring new or higher benefits to more than 100,000 totally disabled workers and dependents, according to Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball.

The new legislation removed a restriction on retroactive applications for disability insurance benefits. This restriction had caused some disabled workers and their dependents to be refused benefits or to receive reduced benefits.

He urged severely disabled persons who worked under social security for at least five of the 10 years before they became disabled to get in touch with their nearest social security office promptly if they have not yet applied for disability payments.

Studebaker Sued For UAW Retirees

South Bend, Ind.—The Auto Workers have filed suit in Superior Court here to prohibit the Studebaker Corp. from ending life insurance coverage for 3,226 retired UAW members who formerly worked for the auto firm.

UAW Local 5 Pres. Woodrow Frick and Regional Dir. Ray Berndt, announcing the action, said life insurance coverage for retired workers is "explicitly fixed" by the terms of the UAW-Studebaker contract.

The health security program in the contract provides life insurance and hospital-surgical-medical coverage for retirees and their dependents, as well as life insurance benefits for workers on extended sick leave, the union heads declared.

CHICAGO TURNED OUT this audience at State and Madison Sts. to hear Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, the Democratic vice presidential nominee, rip into Republican Presidential Candidate Barry Goldwater's foreign policy proposals as "dangerous and irresponsible." The Minnesota senator planned a final swing from New York into the Midwest, the Mountain States and the Pacific Coast before the election.

State, Municipal Union Backs Johnson Ticket

Cincinnati, O.—The State, County & Municipal Employes abandoned a tradition of 27 years' standing when the executive board, at a meeting here, endorsed Pres. Johnson for re-election and Sen. Humphrey for Vice President.

The "clear division of philosophy on both domestic and foreign policy" between the opposing candidates, the board said in an unanimously adopted resolution, "compels us to break our tradition and endorse the candidacies of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey," the labor-backed Democratic nominees. The union never before has formally supported candidates for the two top offices.

"Sen. Goldwater and Rep. Miller," the board said, "have clearly demonstrated their hostility to the aspirations of the working men and women of this country.

"Both in their speeches and their records they have expressed opposition to everything the American labor movement stands for. They have expressed their antagonism to federal aid for the education of our children, federal assistance to eliminate poverty, federal programs to stimulate employment, and medical progress through Social Security for our aged.

"They oppose reapportionment of our state legislatures. They stand in opposition to the hopes and aspirations of the citizens of our country who are struggling for equal rights and human dignity."

Both Held Disqualified

Goldwater, the resolution said, has exhibited "frightening irresponsibility" in his concept of the U.S. role in world affairs, while Miller "has demonstrated that he is totally unequipped in knowledge and experience" to serve as Vice President.

"The record of Pres. Johnson and the record of Sen. Humphrey on the rights of workers, on education, on poverty, on medical care for the aged, on equal voting rights, on human dignity for all Americans and on responsible world leadership stands in sharp contrast to that of Sen. Goldwater and Rep. Miller."

A copy of the resolution was presented to Humphrey by SCME Pres. Jerry Wurf and Sec.-Treas. Gordon W. Chapman at a Johnson-Humphrey dinner sponsored by the Hamilton County Democratic Committee.

The 12-member executive board that broke with the past and endorsed the Johnson-Humphrey slate includes a Roman Catholic priest, two Negroes and a Jew.

Roger Provost Dies, UTW Vice President

Montreal, Que.—Roger Provost, vice president and Canadian director of the United Textile Workers and a vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, died after a brief illness. He was 53.

Provost, who also was president of the Quebec Federation of Labor, was a member of the Montreal City Council until the recent reorganization of the municipal governmental structure and was active in the international trade union movement.

More than 2,000 government and labor officials from Canada and the United States attended funeral services, which were conducted under the auspices of the QFL.

UTWA Pres. George Baldanzi has named William Foley, Hamilton, Ont., and Georges Payette, Montreal, as national co-directors.

Meany Calls for Support Of Christmas Seal Drive

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has urged union members to support the 1964 Christmas Seal Campaign which starts Nov. 16.

In a letter to Dr. William L. Cooke, National Tuberculosis Association president, Meany noted that inroads are being made against tuberculosis and other respiratory diseases. But, he added, "with tuberculosis still the number one killer among infectious diseases, and with acute respiratory infections still the major cause of time lost from school and work, it is clearly evident that the end of the battle is not yet within sight."

"Millions of Americans need attention because of these ailments," Meany said. "This work deserves and demands not only financial support but the time and talent of all of us."

California 'the Plum':

Alaska, Hawaii, Coast States Show Johnson Holding Lead

Los Angeles—The traditional Pacific Coast states plus the newer states of Alaska and Hawaii have a total of 62 Electoral College votes and the great prize, the plum, is California, with 40. A week before the election, California seemed safely in Pres. Johnson's column.

During the Republican Primary season, California was Sen. Barry Goldwater's victory-land, where he captured a huge bloc of delegates by a thin margin against Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York and went on to his presidential nomination in the GOP national convention.

The Arizona senator, in the latter days of the present campaign, cancelled out scheduled speeches in other areas to concentrate on heavily-populated Los Angeles County, Orange County and San Diego. He cancelled out Wyoming and Nevada, cancelled out a speech in Northern California, and went hunting, to use his phrase, "where the ducks are"—or at least where he hoped the ducks might be available to his gunnery.

Republican professionals were not claiming California as Goldwater victory-land as the election neared. The issue, they acknowledged privately, appeared to be the scope of the Johnson victory. Both the Republicans and the Democrats have private voter-preference polls as between the President and Goldwater, and the question to them was whether Johnson's plurality would be large enough to re-elect Democratic Sen. Pierre Salinger and have an effect on congressional district elections.

This was generally the situation throughout the Pacific Coast. There was no state, nearing the eve of the election, that seemed safely Goldwater's.

Change from 1960

A Johnson victory in this region if it should happen, would represent a sharp change from 1960. The late Pres. John F. Kennedy, with Johnson as his running-mate, lost California, Oregon, Washington and Alaska, picking up only the Hawaii Electoral College vote. Nevertheless, late in the campaign this year Goldwater was apparently running downhill, and Johnson was holding a substantial lead.

Three Senate seats are at stake in Pacific Coast voting—Salinger's in California, Democratic Sen. Henry M. Jackson's in Washington, Republican Sen. Hiram L. Fong's in Hawaii. Only one governorship is at stake: Democratic incumbent Albert D. Rosellini of Washington is seeking re-election.

The guesses on Johnson's prospective majority are wide-ranging in this most populous state in the union. But the key fact is that in California the voters are highly skilled at ballot-splitting. Two years ago, Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown beat former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon by about 325,000 votes for re-election, but Republican Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel won by more than 700,000 over State Sen. Richard Richards.

The Republican Senate candidate against Salinger is George Murphy, a former actor, former song-and-dance man, who went into the executive side of the movie business and has been an active GOP leader for many years. He has been campaigning for the Senate seat for 15 months and although generally rated as a conservative has been ducking any direct identification with the Goldwater campaign.

Salinger, former press secretary to Kennedy and Johnson, is a native Californian, a former San Francisco newspaperman and Democratic political manager, who went to Washington about seven years ago to work with the Senate Special Labor Committee, the McClellan committee, and was taken by Kennedy in January 1960 as one of his inner staff.

Salinger has had trouble in forcing Murphy into discussion of other issues. But he won the Democratic primary against State Controller Alan Cranston and he is listed on the ballot as the incumbent senator.

A very heavy Johnson plurality —1 million or so—would be expected to sweep Salinger to re-election. Private claims by Democratic and Republican officials indicate that there is a dispute about the effects of a Johnson victory by only half a million.

In congressional races, Democratic Rep. James C. Corman is given the edge for re-election in the 22nd District against the GOP candidate, Robert C. Cline. Two other districts now held by Democrats, the 34th with Rep. Richard T. Hanna and the 37th with Rep. Lionel Van Deerlin, are rated marginal because of the normal Republican character of Orange County and San Diego.

H. O. Van Petten, a Democrat, is listed by his party as a probable winner against Republican Rep. Del Clawson of Compton. John V. Tunney, son of the former heavyweight champion fighter, Gene Tunney, is making a hard effort to unseat Republican Rep. Patrick Minor Martin in a normally GOP district.

There are no statewide races for governor or senator in Oregon this year. Republican Gov. Mark O. Hatfield was re-elected two years ago, and both the state's Democratic senators, Wayne Morse and Maurine Neuberger, are in midterm.

OREGON

Three of Oregon's four House seats are held by Democrats and all are locally considered certain of re-election. In the 1st District, veteran Republican Rep. Walter Norblad died after the primary, and the district Republicans chose a conservative candidate, Wendell Wyatt, to run. The Democratic candidate, R. Blaine Whipple, is given a chance to win.

WASHINGTON

Washington State is a classic example of the freedom with which far western voters switch from party to party. It has a Democratic governor, Rosellini, and two Democratic senators—but six out of seven congressional districts are held by Republicans.

Johnson is considered well ahead of Goldwater and Sen. Henry M. Jackson overwhelmingly ahead of his Republican challenger, Lloyd J. Andrews. Democrats appear confident of regaining the 7th Congressional District (Seattle) with a freshman candidate, Brockman Adams, against Republican Rep. William Stinson.

GOP spokesmen say that Rep. Jack Westland, seeking a seventh straight term, will win despite a hard fight waged by the Democratic candidate, Lloyd Meeds.

Gov. Rosellini is sharply challenged in his re-election battle by Daniel J. Evans, GOP leader in the state house of representatives. Incumbent governors, of both parties, have been having difficulty in re-election tries because of the closeness with which voters are hit by tax rises, road and school problems and similar local issues, and Rosellini is seeking a third consecutive term.

HAWAII-ALASKA

Republican Sen. Hiram L. Fong of Hawaii is in a hard re-election fight against Democratic Rep. Thomas P. Gill. In Alaska the only significant battle is the return engagement of Lowell Thomas, Jr., son of the travelogue and adventure personality, against Democratic Rep. Ralph J. Rivers. Johnson is rated ahead in both states.

Johnson, Humphrey Get N. H. Labor's Support

Manchester, N. H.—Delegates to the eighth convention of the New Hampshire AFL-CIO unanimously endorsed Pres. Johnson for re-election and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey for Vice President.

They acted after Pres. Thomas Pitarys, in his keynote speech, built up a strong case for the election of the Democratic candidates and detailed the reasons for organized labor's opposition to the Republican slate of Sen. Barry Goldwater for President and Rep. William E. Miller for Vice President.

Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America had told the convention that election of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket is "essential to the survival of the textile industry in New Hampshire." Textiles account for about 12 percent of all factory employment in the state, he pointed out.

Pollock accused Goldwater of "complete indifference to the problems of the industry and the plight of its employes." The GOP nominee is recorded as opposing one-price cotton legislation, he said, and "to this day, all attempts to get Goldwater to make a meaningful statement on textiles have been fruitless."

He contrasted the record of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration, citing one-price cotton legislation, regulation of cotton textile imports, accelerated depreciation allowances, a U.S. research program to seek new uses and new markets for textiles, and tariff protection against excessive carpet imports.

The convention adopted a resolution calling for a state minimum wage of $1.50 an hour. The present law puts the wage floor at $1.15 an hour, with an increase to $1.25 effective Jan. 1, 1965.

Other Legislative Goals

Other resolutions called for improvements in unemployment compensation and workman's compensation benefits to yield two-thirds of the claimant's average wage, compared to two-thirds of the state average wage as at present; implementation of the Civil Rights Act, and easing of curbs on immigration.

Speakers in addition to Pollock included AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Hugh Thompson and Assistant Reg. Dir. Franklin J. Murphy, and Ted Silvey of the National AFL-CIO staff.

Pitarys, Exec. Vice Pres. Joseph Moriarity and Sec.-Treas. Robert Hobart were re-elected to their eighth terms.

Plains States Seen Swinging to LBJ

Voters in Farm Areas 'Scared' By 'Radical' Goldwater Policies

By Robert B. Cooney

The Great Plains states appear to be swinging into the Democratic column for the first time since the Roosevelt sweep of 1936.

The stack of wheat, cattle and oil states—Kansas, Nebraska and the Dakotas—are small in electoral votes—20—but they may provide some of the larger meaning of the 1964 elections.

The most reliable polls in the area and first-hand soundings show Pres. Johnson running strong in Kansas, South Dakota and North Dakota. Nebraska, which topped the nation in giving Nixon 62 percent of its vote in 1960, is leaning towards Sen. Barry M. Goldwater.

Given the higher caliber of Democratic candidates in these states and nature and strength of the Goldwater fraction, a big Johnson victory may well have these effects: the Republican Party will be shattered to its grass roots; struggling Democratic organizations will be in business; hard-core conservative Republicans will be unseated by liberal Democrats.

These are all "right-to-work" states and there are 12 House seats in the four states with Republicans holding all of them. Democrats rated as having a chance of taking 5 or 6 of these seats are pledged to support repeal of Taft-Hartley Section 14b, which allows states to enact R-T-W laws.

Observers indicate Johnson would have to run strong—55 percent or more—to help many other Democrats over the top. A couple might do it on their own.

Surprising bonuses which have some chance of materializing include defeat and retirement from public life of such anti-labor, isolationist, conservative congressmen as Glenn Cunningham of Omaha and Don Short of North Dakota. Both are in difficulty, and face strong Democrats.

If the present picture holds through the election, and Johnson deals Goldwater a smashing defeat, it will confirm what has been rather apparent. The Goldwater forces have mounted an aggressive, vigorous campaign in the Plains states and the regular Republican organizations have been sidetracked and split.

This was pointed up most sharply in North Dakota. Sen. Milton Young (R), soon to turn 67, is campaigning harder than ever, by his own admission, and he is not even up for re-election. He is trying to save non-Goldwater Republicans and the regular party.

Young was one of the first to expose the John Birch Society in a heavily-documented Senate speech back in 1961, and just a few days ago, he said this in North Dakota:

"The curse of the Republican Party is that some far-right extremists in the John Birch Society are attaching themselves like leeches to the party."

The Birchites' chief objectives, Young warned his audience, are abolition of all farm programs such as rural electrification, price supports and reclamation projects. Young was immediately attacked by a Goldwater leader as a "Jekyl-Hyde" while the state GOP chairman appealed for unity throughout the Plains states.

There are cross-patterns which make it difficult even for homegrown observers to isolate and evaluate political factors. There are also disquieting subcurrents running, perhaps reflected in sizable "undecided" totals in polls. In Nebraska, the person in charge of running a telephone canvassing campaign summed up the response from voters in one word: "weird".

Farmers and ranchers have been unhappy over government farm programs and "unrest" was the word used for the situation in North Dakota. Wheat and beef prices have been down and unsteady. After the farmer referendum knocked out the government support program, the wheat-cotton bill was put through Congress which put back the price subsidy and added a formula through which farm income would be bolstered. The trouble may be, as in North Dakota, that the great majority of farmers wanted to continue wheat price supports but fell barely shy of the necessary two-thirds vote.

Goldwater scared the daylights out of farmers. Democratic candidates are reminding farmers of the Arizona senator's words, . . ."There can be no equivocation here—prompt and final termination of the farm subsidy program. I would get rid of the Agriculture Act."

That can scare farmers. Goldwater's statements on nuclear weapons also scared the farm population, according to veteran observers. In short, Goldwater is viewed as a radical rather than a conservative.

If there is a shift to Johnson as polls indicate, then other candidates on the ticket may be affected. There are arch-conservatives in this region whose voting records are identical to Goldwater's and who speak up for him.

Aside from the top of the ticket and the House races, the incumbent parties are expected to hold their seats in two Senate races and in four gubernatorial contests.

KANSAS

Biggest surprise in Republican Kansas, the nation's No. 1 wheat state, is the strength shown by Pres. Johnson in the vast 58-county farm district occupying the western two-thirds of the state.

Johnson got 54.5 percent and Goldwater 33.6 percent in a straw poll released 10 days before the election. The poll was taken by the Hutchinson News and two other papers in a balloting system known for reliability. It was the highest showing for any Democratic candidate in Western Kansas since the poll started in 1936.

Johnson has strong advantages in the state, which went 60 percent for Nixon in 1960. Religion is not a factor this time. Johnson is popular; he is looked on as a westerner and one who understands problems of the farmer.

The Kansas Wheat Growers' Association, whose president is a Republican running for the state legislature, has spoken out against Goldwater and the latter's attacks on the farm program and U.S. wheat sales to Russia.

With the GOP now holding a 5-0 advantage in House seats, capable Democratic challengers are given a chance of capturing two and possibly three.

Standing in line of fire on Goldwater is Republican Rep. Robert Dole, described by the Wichita Eagle as probably the most conservative legislator ever sent to Congress from this region. He took the seat vacated by conservative Wint Smith and openly embraces Goldwater.

Democrat Bill Bork could pull a stunning upset over Dole. Bork has been a county agent, farm director of the Hutchinson News and information director for a grain co-op.

In the gubernatorial contest, Rep. William Avery (R) is favored. Democrat Harry G. Wiles, a lawyer-businessman, however, is given "a chance."

NORTH DAKOTA

A strong Democratic-Nonpartisan coalition, with all-out backing from labor, promises to put this state in Johnson's column and reelect top Democrats. Johnson is expected to be strengthened by popular Gov. William L. Guy, the first Democratic governor since 1942 who won in the face of two GOP landslides in 1960 and 1962.

Democratic Sen. Quentin Burdick, who became the state's first Democratic senator in a close special election two years ago, is in a tough race but is expected to just pull through. He is opposed by Tom Kleppe, ex-mayor of Bismarck, who has set himself apart from Goldwater.

The farm price issue has been explosive in the light of unsteady wheat and beef prices. Goldwater had urged an end to price supports, but later tempered his position. This issue plays a role in the big western district, where state Sen. Rolland Redlin may upset veteran Republican Rep. Don Short.

In the eastern district, Rep. Mark Andrews is strongly favored. Sen. Milton Young (R) has been working hard to help Andrews stave off Democrat George Sinner. Two avowed rightwingers are running as independents, which could cut Andrews' vote.

SOUTH DAKOTA

Johnson will win South Dakota if the election results come close to reflecting his popularity shown in newspaper polls each month since July.

Lt. Gov. Nils Boe is favored to win the governorship over Democrat John Lindley, a former lieutenant governor. But it still appears close.

Rep. Ben Reifel (R), the first Sioux to sit in Congress, is heavily favored over George May. Rep. E. Y. Berry (R) is strongly challenged by Byron Brown, but is favored.

NEBRASKA

Nebraska, which led the nation for Nixon in 1960, appears to be in the Goldwater column. Nevertheless, a stunning congressional upset seemed conceivable. Omaha's Rep. Glenn Cunningham (R), after his fifth term and regarded as almost unchallengeable in the past, is in trouble. His opponent, Richard Swenson, a lawyer and brother of actress Inga Swenson, is running a strong race. Organized labor is united behind him as rarely before, he has the support of county courthouse leaders and active backing from classroom teachers and the Omaha Education Association.

The other two House races are put in the "possible" upset category, with Democrat Clair Callan opposing Rep. Ralph Beermann, and William Colwell campaigning by helicopter in the 39-county outstate district in an effort to upset the GOP incumbent, Rep. David Martin.

Sen. Roman Hruska (R) is considered a heavy favorite to be reelected as is Democratic Gov. Frank B. Morrison, who has enjoyed GOP support since farmers became angry with Republican farm policies in 1958.

Johnson Ticket Ahead In Key Border States

The border states appeared to be Johnson country as the campaign drew to a close. The civil rights issue has quieted down considerably, with indications of "backlash" sharply reduced while Negroes are expected to go close to 100 percent for the President.

With Johnson so clearly ahead, emphasis even on the part of Goldwaterites has shifted to state and local contests. The militant Goldwater and right-wing groups are now rather openly aiming to hold down the Johnson vote by urging whites to keep Negroes working so late they will be unable to vote and also planning to tie up polling places with excessive challenges.

This is how it looks in a few of the border states with key races:

OKLAHOMA

With Johnson conceded the top spot, attention swirls around the Senate race between state hero Bud Wilkinson and a vigorous Democrat, 33-year-old State Sen. Fred Harris. The contest is over the unexpired two-years of the seat held by the late Democratic Sen. Robert Kerr.

Wilkinson, though he has tied himself to Goldwater for the most part and though he signed a "right-to-work" petition two years ago, appears a winner. As one man put it, Wilkinson as coach of the University of Oklahoma's championship football teams, has been in every family's living room every Saturday for 17 years. Parents feel he has done a great deal for youth.

Organized labor is working hard for Harris, helped by the LBJ popularity which just scored 62 percent in a poll by a newspaper that backs Goldwater. The new Oklahoma Journal urged Harris' election.

Democrats are expected to retain the five House seats that they now hold. Democrat Douglas Martin is reported in an "uphill" fight to unseat the lone Republican, Rep. Page Belcher, who has a COPE record of 51 wrong votes and 5 right.

TENNESSEE

Tennessee is the only state where two Senate seats are at stake. Also up are 9 House seats, with Democrats now holding six of them.

Civil rights has diminished considerably as an issue, although it provides a backdrop. The Republican Party has been captured down to the precinct level, it is said, by Goldwaterites and white supremacists.

A highly reliable private poll taken about mid-October shows Johnson with 49 percent, Goldwater with 31 percent and 20 percent undecided.

For the unexpired two-year Senate created by the death of Estes Kefauver, liberal Democrat Rep. Ross Bass is considered a heavy favorite, strongly backed by organized labor, Negroes and lower economic groups. The private poll gives Bass 53 percent, with 27 percent for Howard Baker, Jr., son of the late Rep. Howard Baker. About 19 percent are undecided.

Sen. Albert Gore (D), seeking a third term, may face trouble but is still favored over Goldwaterite Dan H. Kuykendall. The private poll gives Gore 50 percent to 28 percent for Kuykendall, with 22 percent undecided.

In hot House races, Democrat George Grider is seen as a winner in the slugging match with businessman Robert James. Goldwaterite James defeated longtime Negro GOP leader George Lee for control of the Shelby County Republican Party.

Observers see a fighting chance to pick up a GOP House seat with Democrat Robert Summitt opposing William E. Brock III, wealthy candymaker.

of free enterprise, free unions, free government and the people of a democratic nation."

It said that Johnson's "understanding of the necessity for an expanding economy with maximum employment places him in the great tradition of forward looking American chief executives."

The industrial relations experts noted that "Pres. Johnson has limited the use of government intervention in labor-management disputes to the necessary minimum."

"He has demonstrated his ability to achieve the delicate task of asserting the rights of government, where the vital public interest is at stake," they added, "while at the same time encouraging, rather than deterring the negotiation of voluntary agreements between management and labor."

Vote!

ON TUESDAY, Nov. 3, a stillness will settle over the land; the cheers, the clangor and clamor of the campaign will fade away as Americans, in the solitude of the voting booth, make their decisions.

The most immediate question is how many Americans will make use of the privilege of a secret ballot—the hallmark of a democratic system of government—to chart the direction of the nation in the next four years.

Current estimates place the probable turnout between 70 and 75 million, a record figure that would top the 68.8 million who cast ballots in the 1960 election. The trend of voting in American presidential elections has been upward since the 1930s with the exception of the wartime election of 1944 and the Truman upset victory of 1948.

The 1948 election holds a lesson for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket and all its supporters, for the downturn of total votes cast in that contest has been analyzed as stemming from Republican over-confidence in a widely forecast victory for Gov. Thomas E. Dewey.

THE PROBABILITY of a record over-70 million turnout this year is encouraging, but it masks the essential problem of citizen participation in the decision-making process.

Participation in American elections has always been on the low side in comparison with other democratic nations. Even with the record turnout of 68.8 million voters in 1960, only 63.8 percent of the total number of persons of voting age actually cast ballots.

There are millions of Americans who are barred from voting because of movement from one area to another, disqualification for a number of legal reasons, discrimination and the difficulties of registration in many states.

But the single largest factor behind only roughly six out of 10 Americans of voting age actually going to the polls is a combination of cynical disinterest and general apathy.

IN 1964 there is hope for a sharp improvement in the total voter turnout. There are about 5 million more potential voters than in 1960. The recently adopted constitutional amendment abolishing the poll tax as a requirement for voting in federal elections should increase the size of the vote; another constitutional amendment will give residents of the District of Columbia the vote in the presidential election for the first time.

But it is essentially the vigorous nationwide campaigns, especially in the South, and the efforts of organized labor, civil rights groups and other community and civic organizations to get eligible persons registered and to the polls that provides hope for a massive tide of votes on Nov. 3.

If all of these factors operate favorably to produce a record number of votes, then there is every reason to believe that the American people will crush the Goldwater candidacy, reaffirm their faith in the principles and programs of the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations and send to Washington a liberal Congress to carry forward that program in the coming years.

Power of a Single Ballot Holds Lesson for Both Young and Old

EVERY TWO YEARS the clerk of the House of Representatives makes an official report on the statistics of the preceding election. Not a vote is missed, or even a write-in. Parties and candidates you never heard of have their votes tabulated.

The statistics account for the 68,836,385 votes cast in the presidential election of 1960. But, they also account for every individual vote that was cast. Not one was ignored as unimportant.

Yet in every election millions of Americans cast aside their votes as unimportant. They argue that there'll be a landslide for one candidate or another, so there's no point in bothering to vote. Or, on the other hand, they'll argue that such-and-such a candidate hasn't a chance so there's no use in voting for him, either.

At the same time, the official statistics every two years show with startling clarity the close margin by which many political victories are won and the immense importance of every vote.

The most dramatic examples of how one vote can affect an election have been cited repeatedly.

Pres. Kennedy, for instance, won the presidency by less than one vote per precinct. About half of 1 percent of the votes cast in Illinois and New Jersey swung 43 electoral votes into the Kennedy column. Without these votes, the election would have been thrown into the House.

To many people the "one-vote" argument sounds strained, something that happens once in a lifetime. It hardly seems possible that an election can be that close. Still, the 1960 statistical report shows that, repeatedly, a handful of votes has been the decisive factor.

Rep. J. Edward Roush (D-Ind.) won by just 2 votes out of 113,746 cast, necessitating a recount, which he again won.

Pres. Kennedy took Hawaii by only 115 votes out of 184,705.

Former Rep. M. Blaine Peterson (Utah) won by 68 votes out of 121,810.

Rep. Victor Wickersham (D-Okla.) won by 76 votes out of 136,308.

In the election of 1962:

The governor of Minnesota was elected by only 91 votes.

The governor of Rhode Island was elected by 398 votes, and the governor of Maine by 483 votes.

Minnesota's 6th District went Democratic-Farmer-Labor by only 384 votes while New York's populous 15th District went Democratic by only 383 votes.

Nor can it ever be forgotten that the late Pres. Kennedy won in 1960 by only 119,450 votes out of a total of 68,334,742.

A HANDFUL OF VOTERS in a handful of states could have changed that election and with it the history of the United States, if not of the

It is highly unlikely that Pres. Johnson's political opponents will ever let him forget that he was first elected to the Senate in 1948 by 87 votes.

For old-timers, there isn't too much news in statistics on close votes and the importance of not wasting a vote, but for the 10 million citizens who will be eligible to cast their first votes on Nov. 3, the lesson must be repeated again and again.

Pres. Johnson has proclaimed "National First Voters Week." In doing so he urged election officials, private citizens and citizen organizations to assist the new voters in every possible way.

He also urged the new voters:

- To go to the polls proudly, knowing that the duty they perform is the price of the privilege they hold.
- To exercise their franchise gratefully, realizing that it is essential to their future as free men and women.
- To make their choice carefully, understanding its importance to themselves and their fellow Americans.

The President's advice is good for all of us—old-timers as well as newcomers to the nation's polls. (PAI).

Progress by Workers No Accident—Humphrey

"I know of no other nation in the world where the working man can fulfill himself as he can in the United States," Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey said in a statement for the labor press.

"And I know of no other time in the history of man where the working man enjoyed the respect, the income, the opportunities and the dignity that he does today in this country.

"As you well know, all this hasn't come about by accident. We have had men of vision in the labor movement, in business and in government who appreciate the value of free collective bargaining in a democratic society."

Morgan Says:

A Moral Crusade Is in Trouble —Because It Wasn't Very Moral

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p. m., EST.)

CHICAGO—It's a pity that the simple virtues Herbert Hoover grew up with and embodied have not emerged as more influential guidelines of American political and social life.

From West Branch, Ia., to the Waldorf-Astoria is not so far as jets fly today but 90 years lay between his birth in one place and his death in the other and during those nine decades the man who served as the 31st President of the United States became a living symbol of integrity.

Morgan

While greedy men were profiteering on World War I he was distributing food to the starving Belgians and Russians. While figures in Teapot Dome and other scandals were stealing everything but the Capitol dome during the Harding Administration, Herbert Hoover's public reputation remained unsullied. Although by the judgment of hindsight he lacked the penetrating foresight to deal quickly enough with the debacle of the Great Depression, he did not cause it, as some of his detractors alleged, and he endured to be revered in the earned rank, as the New York Times put it, of the nation's eldest statesman.

In a paraphrase reminiscence of the ex-President's appearance at the Republican national convention of 1948—an occasion which was wrongly billed as the grand old man's swan song—the Wall Street Journal recalls that he warned that "we cannot have personal liberty under government without economic freedom, . . . that we cannot be profligate of our substance without courting disaster, and . . . that if we waste our substance and curtail our liberties we will be swallowed up by distant enemies bent on our destruction."

The remarkable thing about that pronouncement is not so much what he said but that 16 years after Herbert Hoover said it the country, materially and economically at least, is vastly stronger even though the government in that interval, under both Democratic and Republican regimes, following courses of which the ex-President was often sharply critical. He was troubled too about the nation's moral decay and now along comes Sen. Goldwater with an attempt to make morality in government a major issue of this campaign.

But so far the Republican presidential nominee has pushed this case with all the conviction and credibility of a bartender distributing leaflets for the Women's Christian Temperance Union in the Dead Eye Saloon in Dodge City. He seems to be a little bit out of character.

While he and his running mate call for a purge of the mess in Washington, Rep. Miller continues to be stalked by the shadows of conflict of interest. The Sunday after Goldwater in devoutly Mormon Utah accused the Democrats of "ignoring God," Pres. Johnson went to church; the senator did not.

In a nationwide television appearance pretaped at the Norman Tabernacle in Salt Lake City, Goldwater gave a kind of Sunday school lecture on the need for prayer in the public schools, implied that the Supreme Court decision ruling school prayers unconstitutional would lose us the cold war and, in effect, accused the Democrats of embracing atheism.

NOW THERE IS no doubt that many people across the land are sincerely troubled over the prayer issue but to pitch it as a kind of patent medicine cure-all for delinquency and a slippage of public morals is about as realistic as arguing that humming the Star-Spangled Banner will dampen the ambitions of the Communists.

Hypocrisy is the virus largely responsible for the ravages of the body politic in the moral area. If we acted on religious precepts half as strongly as we cling pompously to the pretexts of religion, the nation's conscience would be far clearer and we wouldn't need, as the Goldwater Republicans advocate, a constitutional amendment to undo a Supreme Court decision whose main purpose was to protect the sane and sacred concept of separation of church and state.

It isn't that crowds of callous Americans . . . are unconcerned about crime or the abuse of public trust. With care and thought and diffidence Goldwater might well have congealed public anxiety on these matters into a cleansing issue. Instead he chose the route of overstatement and, if he'll pardon the term, oversimplification. Lyndon Johnson may not be the most virtuous President in American history but neither did he invent original sin.

The American people may well want to hold the chief executive to account for a lot of things. But they do not appear to be in a mood to blame him for all the world's woes whereas great numbers of them seem disappointed in Goldwater as a mere echo of the choice they hoped for. . . .

Out here in the Midwest, where the conscience of such distinguished conservatives as Hoover and Bob Taft took shape, Goldwater's moral crusade is in trouble—possibly because it wasn't very convincingly moral in the first place.

Washington Reports:

Increase in White Collar Work Reflected By U.S. Job Service

THE U. S. EMPLOYMENT Service is not only seeking jobs for the jobless but for those who are now employed—not only for the unskilled but for the highly skilled, Louis Levine, its director, pointed out in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 radio stations.

"In recent years, as you know, professional, technical and managerial occupations have become increasingly important in the composition of the work force of this nation and in the job opportunities that are emerging," said Levine.

"In these occupations, there is a great deal of labor mobility. An engineer may seek a job today in California, though he is now working in Chicago, and tomorrow he may find employment in Connecticut.

"In this connection, the public employment service system becomes particularly important, because we have a network of some 1,900 offices throughout the country. Channels of communication, means of recruitment, means of meshing job market information and job opportunities with the qualifications of the individual can be carried on over broad geographical bases."

"Job markets in the U. S. are free labor markets," he continued, "in the sense that an individual exercises his own decision and initiative as to the means by which he will seek employment. . . . The object of the employment office is to match the hiring specifications with the qualifications of the job seeker, but the decision to accept employment on referral is entirely the worker's decision, and hiring is entirely the employer's decision."

LEVINE SAID that the decision as to whether the worker may or may not accept the job without being disqualified for unemployment benefits rests with unemployment insurance officials, according to state law, and not with the employment office.

In no case is there a fee, he pointed out, as in private agencies.

"We have gone into the whole subject of youth manpower services, including intensive counseling and vocational guidance services, occupational testing, referral to training and retraining programs," Levine said.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

EN ROUTE with Humphrey—The happy campaign, the sparkling campaign, in this long election period has been Hubert Horatio Humphrey's.

"Humphrey Leaves Them Laughing" was the headline over a New York Times story around the first week in October. And so he did, when he felt like it. The senator from Minnesota, toughened by experience in the Senate, conscious of the finger of destiny, has lost none of his familiar zest for honorable political combat.

One of his high moments came eight days before the election when he faced the hardboiled Democratic precinct captains of Chicago's Democratic organization—the heart of Mayor Richard Daley's so-called "machine"—and both "left them laughing" and immensely uplifted.

The Democratic candidate for Vice President has a great advantage over the gentlemen who took over the Republican party machinery after Sen. Goldwater's nomination. He knows that Chicago precinct captains are as patriotic as Arizona Republicans, and at least as honest and as devoted to the preservation of this country's basic principles as Johnny-come-lately Arizona and southern Republicans who have egged on Sen. Goldwater to cater to the alleged "white backlash," to traduce Pres. Johnson's personal sense of ethics.

"I believe that Franklin Roosevelt was right. I believed in the man. I believed in his program. I have no apologies for the work that was accomplished and the work that was undertaken," he told the precinct captains.

SEN. HUMPHREY'S campaign plane was a Lockheed Electra with great "HHH" initials painted boldly on its sides and below them the understated designation "The Happy Warrior."

The candidate for Vice President had his private quarters at the rear. But he is a gregarious man and he likes human contacts. He could take off his jacket and tie and wander along the aisle.

There were two Minnesota girls on the chartered plane, one time, as stewardesses employed by the airline. Humphrey invited their mothers aboard as his guests to fly part of the way from Minneapolis on the campaign trail. At Washington, D. C., airport, at 3 a. m., he commandeered some Important Person's chauffeur-driven black limousine and instructed the driver to take the young ladies home and then come back for the Important Person.

It was at the end of an 18-hour day. He had quelled hecklers at State and Madison Streets in Chicago, quelled them in Racine and Green Bay, Wis., and delivered on the campus of the University of Wisconsin at Madison a closely-reasoned appeal to the students and graduate students to use their intellects in the field of foreign policy.

A "HAPPY WARRIOR" is a fine phrase to describe Humphrey during the September and October days.

He enjoys campaigning and he enjoys the recognition he gained from Pres. Johnson and the Democratic National Convention that nominated him. The campaign, which is thankfully now ended, was fought through golden weather. He saw the palms of southern California and scented the wine-sweet air of the northern Midwest.

About the Goldwater presidential campaign he had this to say:

"We don't intend to let them demean America by talking about how bad we are, how weak we are, and how we have sold out to this and sold out to that. . . .

"American young people are no worse today than they ever were. They are better, they are smarter, they are more decent.

"American workers work hard and they produce more goods and better goods than ever before. And we don't need to be lectured by Sen. Goldwater about it."

The country, he said doesn't need any radicals—from the left or the right. "We don't need any Commies and we don't need any Ku Klux Klaners. We don't need any Birchites."

He "left them laughing" as he quipped that he would like to hear the word "that the emergency wards of your hospitals are filled with loyal Democrats fallen from fatigue and exhaustion" after the polls close Nov. 3. (Goldwater people bragged after the California Republican primary that "little old ladies in tennis shoes in Pasadena" had won for them.) Said Humphrey, it doesn't "build your character" to lose. Your character, he said, won't be hurt by "winning."

THE U. S. EMPLOYMENT SERVICE is a key agency in aiding the jobless to get work whether they are skilled or unskilled, youths or family heads, Louis Levine (right), its director, declared in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program. Harry W. Flannery was the interviewer.

How to Buy:

Turkey, the Poor Man's Meat, 'Reasonable' for Thanksgiving

By Sidney Margolius

YOU CAN LOOK forward to a reasonable Thanksgiving dinner. In fact, turkey—in heavy supply—is going to be a mainstay at many additional wage-earner dinners this fall and winter. It's interesting that poultry has become the poor man's meat, while meat to a large extent has become the luxury meal.

Otherwise, living costs are creeping up with more determination than has been noticeable for several years. Latest in the series of price hikes is an increase of 1-2 cents on bread in a number of cities, with bakers promising more hikes. One of the largest national bakers candidly says it has been trying to reduce discounts to retailers, but "we think that at this time price increases afford the greater opportunity for increasing profits." No double talk here about attributing the price hikes to "increased labor costs."

Other price increases have been announced on tires and on basic materials such as copper, other metals and roofing materials. Mattresses soon will cost 5 percent more as recent manufacturer boosts reach the stores.

Another source of concern is rising mortgage foreclosures. The Federal Home Loan Bank consolingly points out that the number of foreclosures is only about the same as in the late 1930's, and the rate, of course, is lower. But the fact is the number of families losing their homes this year has jumped 9 percent in one year, and is more than twice as much as in 1960.

Significantly for moderate-income families, the forclosure rate is much higher on the lower-price homes bought with small down payments under FHA mortgages, and also under VA, than under the conventional mortgages which require larger down payments.

November is a good month for clothing sales, with Veterans Day and subsequent sales offering reductions on coats and other outerwear. Here are buying tips:

Snow tires: While tire prices are rising, snow tires are not necessarily just an extra expense since they do conserve your regular tires, as well as providing better traction in soft snow (you still need chains on hard-packed snow and glare ice).

Children's wear: Once you get used to the idea of ski jackets, you realize that these are practical (as well as popular) for school and everyday wear. They provide warmth, yet are light in weight and usually are treated with water resistant finishes. Check the label to see if the garment has been treated for water-repellancy.

A MICHIGAN STATE University home economist, Barbara Stowe, tested seven types of jackets. She found jackets of cotton-rayon poplin lined with taffeta quilted to polyurethane foam and of nylon taffeta with a nylon pile knit lining, to be very satisfactory. These, too, were light in weight, did not shrink or stretch, especially if dry-cleaned, and were good insulators and windbreaks. In general she found that a jacket of a firmly-woven fabric with an inner lining of thick, resilient fabric provides most comfort in cold, windy weather, and that short-pile linings are more likely to retain neat appearance than long-pile.

Another helpful development is the wide availability of boys' slacks of 65 percent acrylic fiber such as Dacron and 35 percent cotton, in year-round weights, at prices around the $5 level.

Blankets: The U.S. Agriculture Dept. reports tests by the Minnesota Experiment Station found that all-wool blankets still are highest in warmth, and after repeated laundering retain their thickness better than those of synthetic fibers. The rayon blends were found to be soft and fluffy when new, but reacted poorly to launderings and were "highly flammable".

Wool blankets now are available with special shrink-proof finishes so they can be machine-laundered in warm water and retain their shape. In buying blankets look for close weave and a deep nylon hem. But the best values, especially for children, often are the so-called utility or camp blankets with whip-stitched edges.

FOOD BUYING CALENDAR: Best buys are the large turkeys. Not only is the price per pound usually lower, but the yield per pound his higher than from smaller birds. In red meats, beef is relatively reasonable. Egg production is heavier this year with prices relatively reasonable.

THE CASE FOR hospital insurance for the elderly under social security was aired in a public affairs special television program, "Rx for a Nightmare," presented by the National Council of Senior Citizens over the Columbia Broadcasting System network. Men and women from more than a score of walks of life appeared in the half-hour program, among them E. G. Marshall (left), star of TV's "The Defenders," who said he participated "as a civilian and not as an actor," and Dr. Benjamin Spock, world-famous authority on child-rearing.

'Rx for a Nightmare':

Great and Small Give Case for Aged Care

THE CLOTHES CUTTER from Baltimore waited uneasily "on the mark" in front of the television cameras.

His speech lighted up on the teleprompter—his own opinions on the need for hospital care for the aged transcribed as he had spoken them over the telephone a week earlier. Now in the studio where the program was being video-taped, the words seemed difficult and unfamiliar. Under the big lights, he tried to catch hold of the conviction that had given birth to the words.

"STAND BY, PLEASE," said the director—and the convention was there—in the words of the clothes cutter from Baltimore, the retired school teacher from Chicago, the tobacco farmer from Tennessee and the old man from the Bronx, who began to cry as he described how his health insurance policy had been cancelled.

One after the other, they explained briefly in their own words why old people need social security health benefits. Several doctors spoke. Dr. Benjamin Spock, whose "Baby and Child Care" is an all-time best-seller, introduced himself quietly as "a baby doctor from Cleveland."

Their personal stories made up a mosaic of real-life drama presented under the title "Rx for a Nightmare" over the CBS Television Network.

E. G. Marshall, senior lawyer of the "The Defenders" team, was the narrator. And the only actor in the show did not act this time.

Program participants were selected on the basis of recorded telephone conversations with producer-writer Millard Lampell during the week preceding the show. Lampell talked with scores of people across the country—famous and unknown people—whose names had been proposed by the National Council of Senior Citizens. He invited 20 of them to come to New York and repeat their statements about health problem of the aged over national television.

"We used an Alexander Graham Bell casting system," said Lampell, "and within 10 days we had found 20 people whose stories make up a real tapestry of Americana."

AARON JENNINGS, 64, flew the 1,500 mile round trip between Nashville, Tenn., and New York City to speak for less than a minute. He agreed to leave his farm in the TVA valley only if someone would take him to see "the lady in the water"—the Statue of Liberty—when he reached New York.

Max Block, 73, had not been to downtown Manhattan in 15 years, although he lives just a few miles away in the Bronx. He doesn't get around much because his wooden leg is old and unreliable and he "couldn't afford another if anything happened."

Lillian Herstein, 78, came in from Chicago to say a few words about the need for "a second Bill of Rights" including protection from the economic fears of old age and illness. Miss Herstein used to teach the Bill of Rights in the Chicago public schools. One of her pupils was Arthur Goldberg, who went on to become U.S. Supreme Court Justice.

The National Council of Senior Citizens, which claims a membership of more than 2 million, presented the program and urged its 1,800 affiliated clubs to arrange viewing parties and watch it.

CBS made free time available to both proponents and opponents of hospital care after the AMA had placed an order for a half-hour of network time as part of a multimillion-dollar pre-election propaganda campaign denouncing the health plan.

Wit Flashes, Epigrams Flower, But at Somebody Else's Table

By Jane Goodsell

A COUPLE of weeks ago, while browsing in a second-hand bookstore, I came across a how-to-do-it manual on the art of conversation. The chapter titled "How to Stimulate Interesting Table Talk" particularly appealed to me because I rather fancied the idea of operating as a latter-day Madame de Stael, in whose 18th Century salon wit flashed and epigram flowered.

I bought the book (which luckily was marked down to 49 cents) and studied it. It was full of helpful tips on how to stimulate lively debate and a free exchange of ideas by bringing up topics such as (1) news events; (2) current books; (3) provocative quotations; (4) controversial opinions, and (5) interesting and unusual facts.

Lately I've been doing just that, and the following dialogues are actual transcripts of the conversations inspired by my efforts:

"I came across an interesting piece of information the other day. Do you realize that of all the people in the world today only one-third eat with knife and fork? Another third use chopsticks, and the rest eat with their fingers . . ."

"I don't care much for Chinese food. The trouble is, it fills you up, but you're hungry again an hour later."

"Remember John Masefield's poem, 'Cargoes'?" It's always been a favorite of mine. It goes 'Quinquireme of Ninevah from distant Ophir, rowing home to haven in sunny . . ."

"Could I trouble you to pass the salt?"

"AS I RECALL, it was Shaw who said, 'My way of joking is to tell the truth. It's the funniest joke there is.'"

"Speaking of jokes, have you heard the one about the two old maids who went to Las Vegas? It seems there were these two. . . ."

"I was reading an interesting article on the effect of computers on national elections. It said that a situtation could arise in which a state like California, which is three hours behind . . ."

"California's a beautiful state, isn't it?"

"Peter de Vries made what seems to me a cogent comment on the present day decline in morality. He said that Hester Prynne in 'The Scarlet Letter' got an A for adultery, but today she wouldn't even rate a C-plus."

"The school our children go to doesn't give pluses and minuses."

Right Not Denied by T-H:

NLRB Backs Union On Picket Line Fines

Unions have a right not denied them by the Taft-Hartley Act to fine members for crossing their own picket lines during strikes, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled in an action brought by Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co. against the Auto Workers.

The company charged the union broke the law when it levied fines against strikebreaking members after walkouts in 1959 and 1962 by Local 248 at the firm's West Allis, Wis., plant and by Local 401 at the La Crosse, Wis., plant.

The NLRB in a 4-1 vote upheld a trial examiner's finding that the locals acted lawfully in levying fines ranging from $20 to $100 after trials of offending members—174 crossed picket lines to work in 1959, and in 1962 some 34 members were fined.

The unions imposed fines only on their own members, and no claim was made that they endangered the jobs or working conditions of those fined. The NLRB majority, saying it would be hard to find a subject of more importance to a union than the loyalty of its members during "a time of crisis," declared:

"The Act (T-H) does not deprive a union of all recourse against those of its own members who undermine a strike in which it is engaged. When the strike is lawful and the picket line is lawful, we cannot hold that a union must take no steps to preserve its own integrity."

Members Have Duties, Too

Member Howard Jenkins, Jr., wrote in a concurring opinion that Sec. 7 of the law assures each employe the right to refrain from engaging in concerted activities but does not relieve him of "duties and obligations undertaken" as a union member.

"It must be remembered that the same statutory language relied upon to protect the right of the individual employe to refrain," he added, "also protects the right of the group of employes to engage in the concerted activity here involved."

Member Boyd Leedom said in a dissent that "one of the indispensable factors in any employment relationship is the employe's willingness to come to work" and "it seems undeniable that such willingness is impeded by any penalty imposed because of it."

The AFL-CIO filed a "friend of the court" brief in the case, as did the National Association of Manufacturers.

IBEW Gives Strike Notice To Illinois Bell

Five local unions of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have served a strike notice on the Illinois Bell Telephone Co. and will insist that all contracts be tailored to local conditions, they announced after a Washington, D. C., conference.

The unions have 11,000 members in the company's inside and outside plant departments and a three-year contract expiring in a year. They have authorized a strike unless agreement is reached on a wage reopener by Nov. 19.

The company has offered a $2.50 to $5 "package" settlement but the unions want an offer based on local conditions, the effect of automation on jobs and the financial condition of Illinois Bell "as a result of savings made possible by reductions in the work force," said Maurice Murphy, IBEW director of telephone operations.

Job classifications and titles vary from company to company, Murphy said, and the IBEW locals have decided not to be bound by settlements arrived at in other states. He said IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman has assured the locals they will have the "solid support" of the IBEW's 800,000 members.

CERTIFICATE OF APPRECIATION was presented by Dir. Edward A. McDermott of the Office of Emergency Planning to his assistant for labor, Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Shown at the ceremony, are from left, OEP Assistant Dir. John E. Cosgrove, OEP Deputy Dir. Franklin B. Dryden, Keenan, McDermott, Dir. Edward L. Keenan of the OEP Resource Readiness Office, and his special assistant for labor, James H. Roddy.

Unions Urged to Seek Safeguards Against 'Indignity' of 'Lie Detectors'

Contract clauses protecting workers from the "indignity" of so-called "lie detectors" are suggested to unions in an article in the current issue of the American Federationist which examines the claims of infallibility made by many of their operators and sharply rejects them.

"The damage to an individual may be an accomplished fact before a judge or arbitrator can rule," says the article, a Collective Bargaining Report prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

"Failing a 'lie detector' test frequently brands a worker as guilty not only by the company but, unfortunately, also by fellow workers who may have accepted the 'myth of infallibility' created by the 'lie detector' purveyors."

The fact that a specific employer has not used the "lie box," or asserts it does not plan to, "should not persuade a union to neglect closing the door" before the operator seeks to sell his services, the Federationist points out.

"It may be much easier to negotiate a preventive clause than to convince a company to end its 'lie detector' program," it adds.

"There have been suggestions that unions join with management in working out 'rules of the game' governing the use of the poygraph in employment relations. The trouble is that, while some protective guarantees might reduce or even possibly eliminate some of the abuses . . . they cannot remove the basic inadequacies of the polygraph in its use as a 'lie detector.' "

An increasing number of employers, the article points out, are requiring workers and job applicants to sign waivers "voluntarily" agreeing to submit to screening tests and "lie detector" tests whenever the company asks, and "granting" the employer the right to discharge those who fail or refuse.

The federal government has been one of the biggest users; among others are major firms in steel, copper, autos, meat packing, food processing, oil, electronics, mail order retailing and supermarkets.

'Guilt' Reactions

The "lie detector" is based on the premise that people have "uncontrolled physiological reactions to feelings of guilt that can be measured electronically," according to the article. Included are changes in blood pressure and pulse, breathing rate, and the electrical conductivity of the skin.

The so-called experts purport to translate these changes into guilt or non-guilt reactions on the basis that "either the act of lying or the fear of being caught in a lie is upsetting and causes emotional disturbances," the Dept. of Research says.

". . . It is a fact that these reactions don't occur in all people at all times in the same way," it continues. "It may be true that with the majority of people the attempt to deceive will cause all or some of the measured reactions. . . .

"But even when a reaction is recorded there is no assurance that it was triggered by the act of lying or the fear of being caught in a lie."

Some people can control their physical reactions, the article notes, and people who do not know they are lying—for example, the insane man who declares he is Napoleon—do not have the reactions of a liar.

"Any conclusion that a squiggle on the machine's graph is proof that the examinee is being deceptive is without foundation," it says.

The article cites impressive testimony before congressional committees disputing claims that the "lie detector" can give "valid and reliable" results and questioning the professional qualifications of many, if not most, operators of the polygraphs.

Trainmen Ask Amendment of Rail Labor Act

Miami Beach — The Railroad Trainmen ended their 32d convention here after a month of sessions with adoption of a legislative program calling for amendments to the Railway Labor Act tailored to the needs of rail workers.

One goal of the brotherhood is an amendment to reduce the time required to process 1st Division cases before the National Railroad Adjustment Board and to make all such awards final and binding. Under present law, money awards may be appealed by rail managements with resulting prolonged delays, the BRT said.

The delegates also adopted a call by Pres. Charles Luna for improved wages and working conditions, including a supplementary pension, and an intensified public relations program to tell the story of railroad work.

The convention was the shortest in BRT history. It re-elected Luna, Sec.-Treas. W. E. B. Chase, National Legislative Dir. Al H. Chesser and other officers.

Delegates approved a policy of seeking merger of their union with the Conductors & Brakemen and the Switchmen or of entering into an all-out representational campaign for members.

Hosiery Workers Fill Board Vacancy

Meat Cutters' Institute Names Medical Director

St. Louis, Mo.—Dr. Goronwy Owen Broun, Sr., former dean of the St. Louis University School of Medicine, has been appointed medical director of Meat Cutters Local 88 Medical Institute.

Broun has been on the medical school faculty since 1924, is certified in the field of internal medicine and is a fellow of the American College of Physicians.

4th Hospital Goes Union in Jersey Drive

Orange, N. J.—A spirited organizing drive to end poverty wages at New Jersey hospitals and nursing homes continued its whirlwind pace last week when workers at Hospital Center of Orange voted 225 to 18 to be represented by Local 1199, Drug & Hospital Employes, of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

The victory was the fourth straight for Local 1188 since the campaign began in August. Earlier, the local won elections at St. Barnabas and Beth Israel hospitals in Newark and Clara Maass hospital, Belleville.

Pres. Leon J. Davis of the local also announced it had won bargaining rights at two more nursing homes employing 60 workers. They are Berkeley Hall Home, Berkeley Heights, and Workmen's Circle Home in Elizabeth.

Local 1199 is currently involved in negotiations for wage increases and other benefits for 1,100 newly organized workers at the four hospitals.

Targets in the continuing organizing drive are 25 hospital and nursing homes throughout the state.

School Guidance Staff Wins New York Pact

New York—School psychologists and social workers have approved their first union-won agreement with the New York City Board of Education.

It provides salary raises of $745 to $1,095, an additional $400 differential for those with doctor's degrees, a shortened work day and elimination of summer work.

Professional employes of the Bureau of Child Guidance, who joined Teachers Local 2—the United Federation of Teachers—approved contract proposals worked out in protracted negotiations, punctuated by a half-day work stoppage.

Plans for the mass resignation of the BCG staff on Oct. 21 were called off when agreement was reached in principle. Dr. Charles Miller, chapter chairman, said staff solidarity and support of the union were the keys to success in negotiations.

The new salary schedule establishes a new minimum of $7,945 a year and a maximum of $11,895, attained in 11 steps. It was agreed also that 50 percent of the raises are retroactive to July 1, 1964, and the remainder next Jan. 1.

The final contract draft will change the work day from 9 a.m.-5 p.m. to 8:30 a.m.-4 p.m., and eliminate all summer assignments for the guidance bureau.

AFT Pres. Al Shanker said the agreement proves that professional employes outside the teaching ranks can "attain the dignity and job improvements that flow from collective bargaining" through united union action.

Columbus Drivers Reject IBT Bid

Columbus, O. — Chain store drivers and warehousemen who left the expelled Teamsters two years ago have voted by an increased margin to stay in the AFL-CIO.

Voting in four units, the warehouse workers cast their ballots in a National Labor Relations Board election for directly affiliated Local 3027 and against the Teamsters by these margins:

Kroger Co., 90 for the AFL-CIO local, 19 for the IBT; A&P Stores, 44-19; Alber's Markets, 33-13; Food Hall, 8-6.

The affiliated local retained bargaining rights by a 75 percent favoring margin, as against some 66 percent in the original vote.

Close Races Expected in Many Of State Contests for Governor

North Dakota, Arkansas and North Carolina.

In the latter two states, tradition points to the certain election of the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, but tradition is no longer an ironclad rule of southern politics.

North Carolina, after a period of moderately liberal Democratic governors, now has a conservative Democrat, Dan K. Moore, running against a Goldwater-supporting Republican. Moore is favored to win, but it could be close.

In Arkansas, Gov. Orval E. Faubus has unexpectedly strong opposition in his bid for a sixth two-year term from Republican Winthrop Rockefeller, former chairman of the state's Industrial Development Commission. The GOP candidate is several degrees to the right of his brother, the New York governor, and has waged a colorful campaign, complete with hillbilly bands. Faubus is expected to win, but an upset is conceivable.

In Vermont, no longer rock-ribbed Republican, Democrat Philip H. Hoff, who won with 50.1 of the vote two years ago, is slightly favored in a close race with Lt. Gov. Ralph A. Foote. Although Foote is considered a moderate, his running mate is a leader of the state's "right-to-work" forces.

Washington's Gov. Albert D. Rosellini has strong opposition in his bid for a third term from Daniel J. Evans, a GOP moderate who early in the campaign looked like a winner. However, late reports indicate that Rosellini may have pulled even.

Delaware is another state where the Democratic candidate—Charles L. Terry, Jr., former chief justice of the State Supreme Court—appears to be catching up. He is now given an even chance of defeating GOP Atty. Gen. David P. Buckson.

Indiana Race Close

The Democratic candidate in Indiana is Roger D. Branigan, who describes himself as a "middle-of-the-roader" with "liberal leanings." He is in a very close race with Republican Lt. Gov. Richard O. Ristine, who cast the tie-breaking vote for a labor-opposed sales tax.

West Virginia sources now think Democrat Hulett C. Smith has moved into a slim lead over former Republican Gov. Cecil H. Underwood, but it's still quite close.

One of the hardest fights of any incumbent Democratic governor is faced by Illinois' Otto J. Kerner. He is generally accorded high grades on his accomplishments, but he faces a GOP "glamour figure," Charles H. Percy, board chairman of the Bell & Howell Co. and one-time "boy wonder" of the business world. Kerner may get the help he needs from straight-ticket voting for the Democrats.

If the Democrats have their troubles, so do the Republicans in several states where they are seeking to retain governorships.

Utah Republicans appear likely to lose the governorship their party has held for 16 years. Democrat Calvin L. Rampton appears to have maintained a modest but firm lead over Republican Mitchell Melich in a state where the Johnson tide is running strong.

The Rhode Island voting machine has a straight-ticket lever, and Democrats have high hopes that it will bring in Edward P. Gallogly over Republican Gov. John H. Chafee. Gallogly benefits by having Sen. John O. Pastore as well as Pres. Johnson on the ballot.

A leader of the "Draft Goldwater" organization, Richard Kleindienst, is the Republican gubernatorial candidate in Arizona and is given a slight edge over Democrat Sam Goddard. The race is close enough, however, so that the seat could switch.

Ordinarily Democrat Neil Staebler would be given only an outside chance to upset Michigan's Gov. George W. Romney. But the prospects of a big Johnson victory has raised Democratic hopes, obviously worried state GOP leaders. In a close vote, the candidacy of a Detroit Negro minister on the Freedom Now Party could cut into Staebler's chances.

Republicans have held the governorship of Montana for 12 years and incumbent Tim M. Babcock hopes to keep it that way. He faces a strong challenger, however, in Roland R. Renne, former assistant secretary of agriculture and a former president of Montana State College.

Republicans are expected to keep the governorships of Kanasas and South Dakota, but Democrats have not written these states off.

Struck Railway Barred From Rules Change

Jacksonville, Fla.—The strike-bound Florida East Coast Railway has been ordered by the U.S. District Court here to cancel all changes it made in rates, rules and working conditions and to reinstate and maintain the terms of an existing contract with the Railroad Trainmen.

Judge Bryan Simpson granted the BRT petition for a temporary restraining order against the road, which has been operating with strikebreakers and foremen since non-operating employes went on strike early in 1963 for a raise that all other Class I railroads previously had granted.

The FEC put unilateral changes into effect 13 months ago and the court here has twice ordered it to go back to the status before the strike. The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, hearing a company request for review, ruled that most changes by the FEC had been instituted "with no pretense at compliance" with the law and sent the case back to the lower court for further order.

BRT members have been observing the picket lines since the strike started. Delegates to the BRT convention at Miami Beach have made a $40,000 donation to the fund for distressed members on the Florida East Coast.

Steps Up Attacks:

Goldwater Counting On Big 'Silent' Vote

By John M. Barry

Sen. Barry Goldwater makes his final reach for the prize of the presidency seemingly resigned to his inability to grasp it.

As the Republican candidate stepped up his campigning in the last week before the election, he was known to feel that while he had a chance to defeat Pres. Johnson, the chance was not an overwhelming one.

Nevertheless, there was a general feeling among his staff that the Arizona senator was "on the upswing," and that the wide margins given Johnson almost unanimously by the polls failed to reflect what they termed a huge "silent" vote for their man.

In addition to his barnstorming jet plane tours back and forth across the country, Goldwater also was expanding his television appearances in the final week of the campaign, and there were tentative plans to wind up with a "family-type" TV presentation on election eve from his home in Phoenix.

The senator himself seemed almost relieved that the arduous campaign was drawing to a close, and it was learned that he hoped in the final days to stress "positive" aspects of his program.

But as the week developed no positive programs were forthcoming.

Instead, the senator intensified his attacks on Pres. Johnson and Sen. Hubert Humphrey, alternating with speeches assailing the Civil Rights Act of 1964 which Humphrey helped steer through a Senate filibuster. It was, in the eyes of some observers, a thinly-veiled appeal to the so-called white backlash element among the voters.

Attacks Humphrey

In a speech at Austin, Tex., later repeated at other stops Goldwater exhorted enthusiastic crowds of his followers to consider not only the rival candidates for president, but also the candidates for the vice presidency "who would stand one heartbeat away from the presidency," a phrase he repeated so often it formed a refrain.

He then devoted all but the last moment of his talks to a slashing attack on Humphrey as part of "the curious crew that surrounds the President" and for his association with the liberal Americans for Democratic Action. The ADA, Goldwater said, may be an anti-Communist, anti-fascist group, but he charged "they are also the only active group that I know of in the United States who openly espouse socialism, whether they say so or not."

The speech went on, assailing the ADA and Humphrey for what Goldwater said were their positions against censorship of pornography, for trade with Red China, for federal aid to education, etc.

Finally, as he concluded his talk stressing the importance of the vice presidency, the Arizona senator mentioned his own running mate, Rep. William E. Miller of New York.

'Type You Like'

"I can tell you that Bill Miller is a conservative of the type you Texans like," he declared.

At almost every stop on the campaign trail, Goldwater referred to Pres. Johnson as an "arm-twister," a man who consorts with "the bosses of big cities, big labor and big business," an "interim president" so power-hungry he wants to extend federal control down to local school boards.

When his avid followers responded with loud boos, the senator cautioned in fatherly tones that this shouldn't be done, that Johnson after all was President, "and we don't boo the office of the presidency."

The GOP candidate answers charges that all this amounts to mud-slinging and muckraking with the acknowledgement that his side has engaged in some of this. But it is known the senator feels that he, not Johnson, is the most maligned candidate in the nation's history. He feels that his positions on major issues such as social security and control of nuclear weapons have been distorted by the Democrats, and that this has hurt him severely in the campaign.

Silent on Labor —With Reason?

Sen. Barry Goldwater feels his campaign speeches have covered his programs and policies on every major issue except one—labor.

And the reason he hasn't expressed his views on labor in a full-scale policy address, it was learned, is that his campaign advisers have cautioned him against it.

Goldwater cast the only Senate vote against the generally moderate Kennedy-Ives labor reporting bill in 1959, arguing that its provisions were not strong enough.

Democratic Gains Predicted in House

Party's Large Senate Majority Seen Safe; Increase a Possibility

the conservative coalition. The division between supporters and opponents of the Administration's program has often been hairs-breadth close despite a 254 to 176 Democratic margin—257 to 178 if the five vacancies are awarded to the party last holding the seat.

The impact of Democratic gains could be greater than the net change in party lineup if the GOP captures several southern seats held by conservative Democrats who often vote with Republicans. However the Democratic pickup would have to be substantial—about 25 seats—to give the House a clearly liberal coloration.

The liberal-conservative division of the Senate after Nov. 3 could be affected by the nature of the party switches, as well as the number. Thus the defeat of several liberal Democratic senators by GOP right-wingers would have a greater impact than the replacement of an equal number of moderate Republicans by more liberal Democrats.

A consensus of reports from sources who have proved highly accurate in past elections and first-hand observations by AFL-CIO News correspondents give this picture of the congressional campaign:

EAST

From the northern tip of New England through the populous Mid-Atlantic area, marginal House seats held by Democrats have been strengthened by Pres. Johnson's presence on the ticket, while Republican seats have been weakened by the Goldwater-Miller candidacy.

While 54 of the 66 House seats held by Democrats in the 12 eastern states are regarded as "safe," only 27 of the 66 Republican seats are considered beyond the range of a Democratic victory. If a heavy majority of Republicans switching to Johnson go back to the GOP line in the congressional vote, the Democratic pickup would be limited to three or four. Otherwise, it could be substantially more.

The six Democratic senators up for re-election are all favored to win—in Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Rhode Island and West Virginia.

Republican Sen. J. Glenn Beall of Maryland is believed to be trailing Democrat Joseph D. Tydings. In New York, polls show Robert F. Kennedy now ahead of GOP Sen. Kenneth Keating, and Pennsylvania's Sen. Hugh Scott is in a close race with Democrat Genevieve Blatt. While Republican incumbents in Delaware and Vermont are considered ahead, neither is beyond the range of an upset.

SOUTH

In this 13-state area, Republicans have their best chance to make gains in both House and Senate, even though the Goldwater strength in Dixie now seems less formidable than earlier in the campaign.

Republicans now hold 14 of the South's 119 House seats. The GOP has candidates this year in 84 districts, 18 more than two years ago and 31 more than in 1960.

There are likely to be switches both ways, but the GOP is given a good chance for a net gain of two seats, conceivably more. The most likely inroads, however, are in districts where Republicans would be replacing conservative Democrats. On the other hand, Democratic candidates have a chance of unseating conservative Republicans in Kentucky, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia with liberal or moderate candidates.

The GOP is given a strong chance of capturing Democratic Senate seats in Texas and Oklahoma, with a possibility of taking one of the two Tennessee Senate races.

Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough, a staunchly liberal Texan, is opposed by George Bush, son of the former Connecticut senator and a self-described "100 percent" supporter of Goldwater.

In Oklahoma, Football Coach Bud Wilkinson is making his political debut by opposing Democrat Fred R. Harris for an unexpired two-year Senate term. Wilkinson is helped by the fact that separate ballots are used for the presidential and congressional voting, minimizing the carryover effect of the Johnson vote.

Tennessee Senator Albert Gore (D), seeking re-election, and Ross Bass, veteran liberal congressman seeking to fill the term of the late Estes Kefauver, are both considered ahead, but not safe from upsets.

MIDWEST

Reports from the 12-state midwest region point to Democratic inroads in the GOP's congressional strength. Republicans now hold 73 House seats to 52 for the Democrats. Without the help of the Johnson vote, the outlook would be for little change. But with the anticipated top-of-the-ticket carryover, Democrats have high hopes of picking up six to nine seats with a possibility of more.

There are strong chances of Democratic House gains in Nebraska, Indiana and Iowa and realistic hopes for some net gains in Ohio, Michigan and Minnesota. Both Iowa and Nebraska presently have all-Republican delegations and no seat in either state is considered fully safe.

Only one Republican Senate seat is up this year in the region, and Nebraska's Roman L. Hruska is expected to hold it. The Democrats have seven seats at stake and are considered ahead in six—Minnesota, Missouri, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and North Dakota, although Sen. Quentin N. Burdick there faces a close race. In Ohio, Sen. Stephen M. Young has a strong challenger in Robert Taft, Jr. The seat is considered the most vulnerable to a Republican takeover.

WEST

There are a number of closely contested elections in this 13-state region, where the Democrats now hold 40 seats, the Republicans 29.

Some switches both ways are possible, but the overall outlook is for a net Democratic pickup of two to five seats, with the possibility of more with a slight tilt in the vote.

Republican seats in Utah, California and Washington are considered particularly vulnerable.

Two of the six Democratic Senate seats are considered safe—in Montana and Washington—and Democratic incumbents are leading in Nevada and Utah. Sen. Gale McGee in Wyoming and Sen. Pierre Salinger in California face very close contests.

In the three Republican-held seats, none of the GOP candidates is regarded as a certain winner. In Arizona, Gov. Paul J. Fannin is given a slight lead for the seat vacated by Barry Goldwater but Democrat Roy L. Elson has kept the race close. The New Mexico race between GOP Sen. Edwin L. Mechem and Democrat Joseph M. Montoya is considered neck-and-neck. In Hawaii, the Democratic challenger, Thomas P. Gill, is given a very good chance of unseating Sen. Hiram L. Fong.

ILPA Sets Up Lecture In Memory of Liebling

The Intl. Labor Press Association, composed of publications of AFL-CIO unions, has announced establishment of an A. J. Liebling Memorial Lecture, to be delivered to the organization's convention each year by an outstanding figure in journalism.

The first lecture will be delivered by Samuel Lubell, whose political analyses are widely used in newspapers and on radio and television. He will speak Nov. 20 at the ILPA convention in the International Inn, Washington.

Liebling, whose critiques of newspaper performance—"the Wayward Press"—appeared in The New Yorker magazine over a period of about 20 years, died last December. He had addressed the 1961 ILPA convention in Miami Beach, precipitating such a lively discussion that the delegates voted to pass up lunch in order to continue it.

The idea of the memorial lectures originated with Leon Stein, editor of Justice, the Ladies' Garment Workers' paper, and currently president of ILPA. It was approved by the spring meeting of the ILPA executive council.

Announcement of the lectures was made in conjunction with the ILPA convention call. The sessions will run from Nov. 19 through 21.

Other convention highlights will include:

- Presentation of awards to winners of the ILPA's annual contest for member papers. The judging is done by the Nieman Fellows of Harvard University, some of whom will be present to discuss their choices.
- Three workshops on various aspects of readability and a fourth on radio and television techniques.
- An analysis of the 1964 election, and the legislative outlook in the 89th Congress, by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.
- A trip to the grave of the late Pres. Kennedy.

250,000 at Rally In Garment Center

More than 250,000 people poured into New York City's garment center Oct. 28 to hear Sen. Hubert Humphrey Democratic vice presidential candidate, exhort them to "remember E-Day, election day." The throng ran from 35th St. to 42nd St. on Seventh Ave., spilling over into the side streets.

Humphrey, giving a strong boost to the senatorial candidacy of former Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, termed the late President's brother "the architect of the civil rights bill," and urged support of Kennedy against incumbent Repubican Sen. Kenneth B. Keating.

Federal Aid to Schools Seen Still A Key Issue

Despite the "impressive record" of the 88th Congress in the field of education, much remains to be done, an AFL-CIO spokesman declared in a radio interview.

"One of the great unfinished tasks which Congress has in education is a program of thorough-going general aid to elementary and secondary schools," Jack Sessions of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education declared.

He was interviewed on Labor News Conference, the federation's public service program on the Mutual Broadcasting network.

Sessions pointed out that the inequality of educational opportunities among states and school districts is growing. Six years ago, he noted, there was a $300 gap between the per pupil expenditures of New York and Mississippi. Last year, New York was spending $465 more than Mississippi for each child's education.

There are individual school districts, Sessions said, which spend more than $1,000 per pupil on education—contrasted with less than $200 in Birmingham.

"We need money for school construction that we don't have now, and states and localities in many cases simply do not have the resources to provide the kind of education which our nation requires today of every child," he declared.

He hailed the enactment of the college aid bill, providing federal grants and loans to colleges, universities and junior colleges "to build new classrooms to house the swelling number of college-age young people."

Sessions praised the Vocational Education Act, which "for the first time provides the flexibility of structure that means vocational education will be realistically related to the jobs that actually exist in the world around us."

He cited "important gains" in amendments to the National Defense Education Act that make more money available in student loans and expand the program to include additional subjects.

Speaking of the practical prospects for enactment of a broader aid to education measure, Sessions said Congress will "have to find some formula which is going to give as much aid as constitutionally possible to the non-public schools."

Henry Kirsch Joins Staff of AFL-CIO

Henry Kirsch, who has served overseas with the Joint Distribution Committee since Jan. 1, 1957, has joined the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

A member of the Ladies' Garment Workers and formerly director of the Health & Welfare Dept. of the New York Joint Dressmakers Board, he directed JDC operations in Morocco for six years, in Italy for two years and in Tunisia for six months. The JDC is an international voluntary organization working in the areas of education, vocational training, community organization, public health and welfare.

Kirsch, who was graduated from Columbia University and obtained graduate degrees from New York University and St. Lawrence University, served as representative of the former AFL Free Trade Union Committee in Turkey and organized and headed the Labor Div. of the Free Europe Committee.

LBJ-Humphrey Hold Decisive Lead

New Record Seen In Voter Turnout

sationally, and the rise of the Republican Party in the South means a contest, rather than a walkover, for Democratic candidates from the White House to the statehouses in most areas of the Old Confederacy.

The champions of Sen. Barry Goldwater, the Republican candidate, were reported from many states to have a fervency and determination that seemed likely to guarantee actual voting by all or almost all of the senator's potential supporters.

Both Pres. Johnson and Sen. Humphrey spent the last two weeks of the campaign warning against "complacency," against "apathy," against the temptation to believe the public opinion polls and stay home on election day.

It appeared likely that a tremendous amount of ballot-splitting might take place on Nov. 3, with voters marking the names of Johnson and Humphrey or their electors for the top national posts but switching to the Republican column to cast ballots for U.S. senator or state governor.

Senate Races Close

Any guess at the size of the ballot-switching potential was obviously speculative, five days before the election. But Republican professionals in New York, Pennsylvania and California freely acknowledged that Pres. Johnson would carry their states by heavy majorities — perhaps record-breaking majorities—and still had hopes that Sen. Kenneth B. Keating (N.Y.) might win over former Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, that Sen. Hugh Scott (Pa.) might defeat Genevieve Blatt, that former movie song-and-dance man George Murphy (Calif.) might overcome Sen. Pierre Salinger, former White House press secretary appointed to fill the vacancy left by the death of Sen. Clair Engle.

Johnson and Humphrey, in their late campaigning, concentrated heavily in states where Democratic candidates for the Senate, the House and for governor seemed to need them.

The margins given the Johnson-Humphrey ticket by all respected public opinion surveyors, including those engaged by Republicans for private polls, seemed fantastic as the election neared.

Gains Limited

Democratic realists did not claim that prospective triumph for the top of the ticket meant a landslide for the party as such. They estimated a possible net pickup of House of Representative seats in the range of 10 to 25 "assuming that party losses to Republican forces in the South are held to two or three seats."

"If Goldwater and the GOP congressional candidates get more than two or three new seats in the South, our present minimum estimate of a net gain of 10 members would be out the window," one of them said.

A pickup of 20 to 25 House members with liberal convictions would be needed to give the Johnson Administration an adequate margin for its programs on social security hospital care, the Appalachia bill, renewal of the area redevelopment operation and expanded development of manpower training and retraining, and an expanded anti-poverty drive.

The presidential campaign was acknowledged to have been one of the sorriest on record, with scandal-mongering and personal smears having taken the place of reasoned debate on basic issues.

Finger on Trigger

Johnson and Humphrey discussed the overriding issue of war and peace and "whose finger" could be trusted on the nuclear trigger. They hit the Republican candidate, Sen. Goldwater, on his record as having voted against major proposals in both foreign and domestic policy while the majority of Republican senators were joining a majority of Democrats in voting for the proposals.

To Goldwater, this discussion apparently seemed a "smear," and he often insisted he was a "peace-monger" rather than a "war-monger."

The Republican campaign deteriorated more than a month before election day to personalized attacks on Johnson's character and associates, alleged and actual. The use of epithet and vituperation was surprising, and the senator's personal intervention was required to halt the announced screening on national television of a Republican National Committee film with heavy emphasis on scenes of sex and violence—both attributed by implication to Johnson—and of naked appeal to racist passions.

Goldwater seldom discussed the issues involved in the bills he had voted against.

His themes instead were generalized ones—of an "over-concentration of power in the federal government" and of personal assault on the President as an "arm-twisting, head-banging" zealot allegedly "power-mad for the sake of power itself."

Johnson retorted that Goldwater seemed to be running against the office of the presidency rather than for it. Humphrey said the Arizona senator seemed to want to take charge of the federal government in order to liquidate and dissolve long-established programs.

OUTSTRETCHED HANDS greet Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson in downtown Los Angeles, where an ILGWU placard at this point demonstrates support of his re-election. The President hit the most heavily-populated areas of Southern California, including Orange County and San Diego, in his final Pacific Coast campaign journey.

Jack Conway Appointed to Poverty Post

Jack T. Conway, executive director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., has been named by Pres. Johnson as director of community action programs in the Office of Ecnomic Opportunity, official name for the Administration's anti-poverty program.

He has taken a leave of absence from the IUD, expected to last for 60 to 90 days, to help organize and get into operation a program of financial and technical aid for the attack on need in urban and rural areas, on Indian reservations and among migrant workers.

He previously had been working with Sargent Shriver, OEO director, in planning the over-all campaign against want.

Conway, who is 47, was graduated from the University of Chicago in 1940 and did graduate work at the University of Washington. For 15 years prior to 1961 he was administrative assistant to Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers. He was deputy administrator of the Housing & Home Finance Agency from 1961 to 1962, and has served on many federal and local commissions, agencies and advisory groups.

Graphic Arts Unions Reach Rights Pact

Philadelphia—An agreement providing for the hiring of the first Negro apprentice in the pressrooms of a major printer here has been announced by the Graphic Arts Employment Committee.

The committee, set up last year by union and employer groups to promote fair employment practices in the printing industry, said an integration agreement has been signed by Cuneo Eastern Press, Inc., three AFL-CIO unions and the employment committee.

The pact establishes an apprentice system for pressmen and a method of referring trainees according to qualifications and seniority from the production force to the pressroom, with the cooperation of directly affiliated Local 520, Printing & Paper Trades Auxiliary Workers, AFL-CIO, and Locals 4 and 11 of the Pressmen.

Based on current seniority lists, it was agreed that the first Negro apprentice will be designated by the Joint Apprentice Committee and Cuneo. A training program also will be established by Local 520 to assist members in qualifying as apprentices and trainees in the various printing crafts at Cuneo.

Agreement signers included Eugene Casey of Typographical Local 2, committee secretary; Chairman James Jones of the Philadelphia AFL-CIO Human Rights Committee; Pres. Thomas Malin of Local 520 and Pres. Thomas A. Douglas of Local 4.

Others who helped achieve the agreement to resolve a complaint included AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Henry A. McFarland.

Teachers Local Sets Up Fund for Needy Students

Minneapolis—Teachers Local 59 here has created a student welfare fund to assist needy public school pupils and has set up an annual scholarship for University of Minnesota students.

Union Pres. Dale Holstrom said the first winner of a $300 scholarship is Melanie Steinman, selected by the university in accordance with the union's wishes.

AFL-CIO Cited for Help To Brazil Trade Unions

Activities of U. S. organized labor in Brazil are designed to help unions there become a bulwark in defense of freedom as well as to win higher living standards for their members, according to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Meany spoke briefly at a dinner given by Juracy Magalhaes, Brazilian ambassador to the U.S., honoring him and Mrs. Meany in appreciation of the aid the AFL-CIO has given Brazilian workers through the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Magalhaes had hailed the institute's social projects and educational programs.

The former include construction of large-scale worker housing and a detailed program to improve living and marketing conditions in the northeastern area centered on Pernambuco, which has been hard-hit economically.

The education program includes training in worker education and the development of democratic free trade unionism. Graduates of AIFLD training courses were named intervenors, or interim heads, of eight Communist-oriented unions following the ouster of the Goulart government by the new regime. Another AIFLD trainee recently was elected to the Brazilian Social Security Board.

Guests at the dinner included Robert Sayre of the White House staff; Assistant Sec. of State Thomas Mann; Assistant Sec. of Labor George L-P Weaver; Dr. Roberto Campos, Brazilian minister of economic planning; Ralph Burton, head of the State Dept.'s Brazilian section; Lincoln Gordon, U.S. ambassador to Brazil, and business leaders.

Meany is president of the AIFLD. Other institute officials from the ranks of labor attending the dinner included Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, AIFLD secretary-treasurer; Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks, a member of the board of trustees, and Serafino Romualdi, AIFLD executive director.

Annis Ducks Debate With Dr. Spock

The National Council of Senior Citizens accused Dr. Edward Annis, past president of the American Medical Association, of taking a runout rather than debate social security hospital insurance with Dr. Benjamin Spock, nationally-known baby expert.

Annis cancelled his appearance on ABC-TV's Issues and Answers program when he learned that his opponent would be Spock. He is quoted as declaring that he would not debate with another doctor because that would give the impression that physicians are "split" on the issue.

"The AMA cannot hide the fact that many doctors disapprove of the efforts of the iron-fisted AMA hierarchy to block social security health benefits for the aged," Pres. John W. Edleman of the senior citizens council declared.

Spock and three other doctors were among the participants in a nationwide television program presented by the council in support of the hospital care legislation.

Spock will appear as scheduled on the Nov. 8 Issues and Answers program. Sen. John G. Tower (R-Tex.) will present the negative arguments.

Nation Repudiates Extremist Appeal

By Willard Shelton

The people gave Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey a stunning triumph, a true landslide victory, in the Nov. 3 election—and dealt what will probably turn out to be a crippling blow to control of the Republican Party by the "choice not an echo" wing that nominated Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona.

The Johnson-Humphrey sweep was sufficiently broad to command comparison with the 1936 ratification of the New Deal in the second-term re-election of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Thanking the people for their votes from Austin, Tex., where he spoke after listening to the decisive election returns, Johnson appealed once again for the unity of the nation before the world.

The victory, he acknowledged, was "more than a victory of party or person" but a reaffirmation of "the achievements and policies that have emerged over generations from common American principles." He termed the triumph a "mandate" for a government serving all the people of all groups.

Humphrey in Minneapolis paralleled the President's acknowledgement that it was not a victory "participated in just by Democrats."

"Literally millions of people ordinarily of Republican persuasion saw fit to support the standard bearer of another party who is President . . . I want to thank those people," said the new Vice President-elect.

With rare exceptions, the tidal wave of votes was so strong that it engulfed prominent Republican candidates seeking new positions of leadership or seeking to retain long-established bases of influence in the great industrial, agricultural and commercial states that often vote Republican.

Senators Kenneth B. Keating (N. Y.) and J. Glenn Beall (Md.)—both considered in the party's moderate-to-liberal group—proved unable to survive the disaster. Both had long service in the House before moving to the Senate.

Rep. Robert Taft, Jr., seeking election from Ohio to the Senate seat long held by his father and considered originally an almost certain winner, was overwhelmed by a Johnson-Humphrey vote so massive that even substantial ballot-splitting was insufficient to deny a thin majority, and re-election, to veteran Sen. Stephen M. Young (D).

Percy Defeated

Charles H. Percy of Illinois, protege of former Pres. Eisenhower, chairman of the party's platform committee at the 1960 Republican National Convention, was smashed by the Johnson-Humphrey majority in Illinois, losing his bid for governor to Democratic incumbent Otto J. Kerner.

Democrats gained a net of two new Senate seats to add to their 66-34 edge, picked up an apparent net gain of 37 new House seats to pile on top of their 257-178 existing margin, won state legislatures they had not controlled for decades, visibly knocked out Republican candidates for statewide office by the dozens, probably broke or delayed the careers of beginning Republican candidates for local office. Democrats retained a top-heavy majority of state governors, losing a net of one to make the margin 33 to 17.

The Goldwater forces that triumphed at the San Francisco convention last July boldly declared that they would fight to retain control.

The senator, in a concession-of-defeat statement delayed for 15 hours after it was mathematically certain that Johnson and Humphrey had been elected, congratulated the President as a "fellow

37 Seats Netted:

Liberal Congress Takes Shape As Democrats Roll Up Gains

By David L. Perlman

The new 89th Congress will be the most liberal as well as the most heavily Democratic since the heyday of the New Deal.

Democrats rolled up a net gain of 37 seats in the House, despite Republican inroads in the South, for a 294-141 majority. In terms of Administration support, their pickup was even greater since several defeated southern Democrats voted consistently with Republicans.

Most marginal Republican seats in the East, Midwest and West fell to the Democrats—and so did a number of districts long considered "safe" Republican.

Democrats took 48 House seats away from Republicans, including seven in New York, five in Iowa, and four each in Michigan, New Jersey, Ohio and Washington. They lost 10 seats to Republicans, but seven of these were in the South.

In the Senate, with 26 seats at stake to only nine held by Republicans, Democrats scored a net pickup of two. This will give them 68-32 control of the Senate in January. (See story, Page 2.)

A few cliffhanger elections in both the House and Senate could change the numerical tally—but not the overall impact.

The magnitude of the House victory took most analysts by surprise. Massive ticket-splitting had been anticipated, and to some extent took place. But the tide of top-of-the-ticket votes was too strong to be stemmed.

The conservative coalition is not dead. But it has been bruised and decimated far beyond pre-election estimates.

Down to defeat went such GOP veterans as Ben F. Jensen, who had represented his Iowa district for 26 years. Swamped by the Johnson tide were Walt Horan of Washington, J. Edgar Chenoweth of Colorado and Earl Wilson of Indiana, all with 22 years of congressional seniority. Unseated in unpredicted upsets were Katharine St. George of New York and Thor C. Tollefson of Washington, 18-year veterans.

If the Johnson coattails swept aside long-entrenched Republicans in the North, so did the Goldwater coattails dislodge Democrats in three Deep South states.

Republicans captured five of the eight Alabama seats, ousting three incumbents with from 10 to 26 years of House seniority. A Goldwater Republican won a Georgia seat from a Democrat who, paral-

October Joblessness Holds at 5.2 Percent

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's jobless rate remained unchanged at 5.2 percent in October—with 3.3 million persons unemployed—the Labor Dept. has reported.

The government's summary job report said the changes in employment and unemployment between September and October were "mainly seasonal."

Total jobholders increased about as expected by 300,000 to 71.1 million, the report said. The rise occurred entirely in the non-farm sector, which totaled 66 million.

The non-farm total was 1.5 million higher than a year ago while farm jobs continued their long-term decline, falling off by 200,000 since October 1963.

Counted in the employment totals were 1.9 million in non-farm industries on short workweeks—part-timers who could not find full-time work. This total, however, was at its lowest October level since 1956.

Meany Sees Mandate For LBJ 'Great Society'

The American people have given their "overwhelming mandate" to the Great Society, a mandate that "can and must be fulfilled," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a statement on the Johnson-Humphrey landslide victory.

In wires to Pres. Johnson and Vice President-elect Hubert H. Humphrey, and in a general assessment of the election returns, Meany hailed the "unprecedented triumph" and said the AFL-CIO is "proud of the part our members played in this victory."

The election result, he added was a "victory by and for the American people—a demonstration to the world that sound, common sense and faith in the future are inherent elements in our national character."

In his wire to the President, Meany said "the American trade

Democrats Strengthen Grip on Senate

2-Seat Gain Indicated in Upper House

Democrats strengthened their already-firm grip on the Senate in an election year in which they had much to lose and little chance to gain.

The Democrats went into the election holding a 66-34 plurality in the Senate. But 26 of their seats were up this year to only nine for the Republicans. The Democratic seats included 13 snatched from the Republicans six years ago in a series of upsets.

Twelve of the Democratic Class of '58 were up for re-election this year—Clair Engle of California having died in office—and all 12 won a second term. Two of the group, Frank E. Moss of Utah and Quentin N. Burdick in North Dakota, accomplished the rare feat of running ahead of the President, and most came through with greatly increased pluralities.

Nevada Race Close

Nearly final returns showed Democratic candidates unseating three Republican senators. One Democratic seat—in California—was lost to the GOP. In the closest Senate race, Democratic Sen. Howard W. Cannon in Nevada had a slim 165 vote lead in the unofficial returns. If confirmed in the official canvas, this would result in a net gain of two seats for the Democrats—a 68-32 margin in the 89th Congress.

In the nation's most publicized senatorial race, Robert F. Kennedy defeated Sen. Kenneth B. Keating by nearly 800,000 votes—well below Pres. Johnson's massive plurality in the state, but more than the margin New York had given John F. Kennedy in the 1960 presidential election.

Maryland's 70-year-old Sen. J. Glenn Beall was unseated by 36-year-old Joseph D. Tydings, who polled more than 62 percent of the vote. Tydings is the son of a former Maryland senator.

Hard-Core Rightist Beaten

While both Keating and Beall are generally labeled "moderate" Republicans, the GOP lost a hard-core conservative when New Mexico's Sen. Edwin L. Mechem was defeated by Democrat Joseph M. Montoya.

Mechem's COPE voting record during his one Senate term was 9 wrong, none right. Montoya, who has served in the House since 1957, had a perfect voting record for the 88th Congress; a 37 right, 2 wrong record for his entire service.

While the Republicans succeeded in winning a California seat when actor George Murphy edged out Pierre Salinger, they fell far short of their hopes in other states.

The GOP had been supremely confident of beating Sen. Stephen M. Young in Ohio with Robert Taft, Jr.—and most observers agreed with pre-election polls that this would be the case. It wasn't.

Riding in the trough of a 900,000 Johnson plurality in the state, Young won a narrow victory, a stunning upset.

Republicans had also eyed hungrily the supposedly vulnerable Senate seats of Ralph W. Yarborough in Texas, Gale W. McGee in Wyoming, and an Oklahoma Senate seat in which the incumbent Democratic senator had been defeated in the primary. They got none of them.

Yarborough, considered in "deep trouble" by the pre-election experts, coasted to victory with a 300,000-vote plurality over Oilman George Bush, son of the former Connecticut senator.

By closer margins, McGee beat John S. Wold in Wyoming and Democrat Fred R. Harris in Oklahoma scored against Republican Bud Wilkinson, who gave up football coaching to enter politics.

The experts were right in Pennsylvania. They saw it as a close election—and it was. Sen. Hugh Scott barely kept his seat in a seesawing race with Democrat Genevieve Blatt. It was close enough so that the absentee ballot count could conceivably reverse the decision.

In Hawaii, Republican Hiram L. Fong won re-election over Thomas P. Gill in a race which had been rated a toss-up. Fong's victory came in the face of a massive 4-1 landslide for Johnson.

With few exceptions, the Democratic senators posted bigger winning margins than they ever had before. And Republican candidates, winners as well as losers, almost all ran behind past performances and pre-election predictions.

The Minnesota Senate seat of Vice President-elect Humphrey will be filled by appointment of a Democratic governor.

Democrats Score Major Gains In Michigan as Romney Wins

Lansing, Mich.—Precedents were shattered all down the line as Michigan Democrats scored their biggest election victories ever. Gov. George Romney escaped the flood of Democratic votes to emerge as the only Republican elected to statewide office and a potentially powerful figure in his party's national affairs.

Pres. Johnson's plurality over Sen. Goldwater was better than 1.2 million. Democratic Sen. Philip A. Hart won by close to a million votes and Atty. Gen. Frank J. Kelley and Sec. of State James M. Hare chalked up pluralities of 700,000 votes.

For the first time the new delegation Michigan will send to Congress will have a Democratic majority. Democrats picked up four seats to win a total of 12 in the state's 19 districts.

And for only the second time in history Democrats won control of the legislature; the other time was in 1932. Romney will be the first Republican governor to work with a Democratic legislature.

Democrats also swept all education posts on the ballot—eight on the new State Board of Education and two each on the boards of Michigan State and Wayne State Universities.

An unprecedented wave of ticket splitting produced an easy Romney victory over his Democratic challenger, Congressman-at-large Neil Staebler, who lost by some 350,000 votes. A job upsurge resulting from increased auto production and a state cash surplus produced by taxes enacted before Romney took office were given major credit for his winning margin which exceeded pollsters' predictions.

All Democratic incumbents were re-elected in the congressional races. They are Representatives James G. O'Hara, Charles C. Diggs, Jr., Lucien Nedzi, John D. Dingell and Martha W. Griffiths. John Conyers, Jr., and William D. Ford won in reshuffled Democratic districts which lost incumbents in primaries.

Democrats elected in former Republican areas are Wes Vivian, Paul Todd, Jr., John Mackie and Billie S. Farnum. Defeated Republican incumbents are George Meader, Victor A. Knox and August Johansen. Republican Rep. John B. Bennett died before the primary.

Democratic gains in the legislature and in Congress are attributed to one-man, one-vote reapportionment of districts effected this year.

Michigan voters rejected by a 2-1 margin a state law advocated by Romney to substitute the so-called Massachusetts two-ballot system for the present Michigan ballot which permits straight party votes for both presidential candidates and state officers.

Gains Point Toward Liberal Congress

Democrats Chalk Up Increase of 37 Seats

leling the position of some Republican candidates in the North, refused to say whether he supported Johnson or Goldwater.

The GOP even captured the only Mississippi district it contested. Rep. William A. Winstead had represented his district for 22 years. The last time he was opposed for re-election, in 1952, he won with 94.1 percent of the vote. His voting record in the 88th Congress was identical with that of Sen. Goldwater on the COPE scoreboard—all "wrong" votes. This year he was replaced by a Goldwater Republican.

But there was another side to the southern congressional shifts—which could add up to an overall gain for the Administration in terms of legislative support. Defeated in the Democratic tide in Texas were both of the state's Republican congressmen. Neither Bruce Alger nor Ed Foreman had ever cast a "right" vote on COPE's scoreboard. Their combined total of "wrong" votes was 50.

Few Democratic Upsets

There were a few setbacks for the Democrats outside the South, such as the defeat of Ralph Harding in Utah. But most of the Democratic seats which were marked as "in trouble" in pre-election tallies stayed Democratic.

Since the 1936 election, which produced an almost unmanageable 333-89 Democratic majority, the Democrats have ranged from a low of 188 House seats in 1946 to a high of 283 in 1958.

During most of this time, under both Democratic and Republican presidents, a coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans has effectively controlled Congress. The balance between Administration supporters and opponents in the four years of the Kennedy-Johnson Administration was precariously close on many issues.

Here is a tally of the congressional changes in states where House seats shifted parties:

Alabama—The party of Goldwater captured five seats. From eight Democrats to five Republicans, three Democrats.

California—One Republican seat to the Democrats; one Democratic seat to the GOP. Remains twenty-three Democrats, fifteen Republicans.

Colorado—Democrats gained two seats, making four-man delegation all Democratic.

Connecticut—Republicans lost their only seat. Six Democrats elected.

Georgia—Republicans picked up one seat in previously all-Democratic ten-member delegation.

Idaho—Republicans took one seat away from Democrats to split the two-man delegation.

Illinois—Democratic pickup of one seat to make it thirteen Democrats, eleven Republicans.

Indiana—A Democratic gain of two to make it six Democrats, five Republicans.

Iowa—A massive Democratic pickup of five seats. The previous 6 to 1 Republican majority now becomes six Democrats, one Republican.

Kentucky—A Democratic seat picked up from a conservative Republican. State now has six Democrats, one Republican.

Maine—Democrats picked up one seat, one Republican re-elected.

Michigan—New district lines make exact comparisons difficult, but the state's congressional delegation switched from eleven Republicans and eight Democrats to twelve Democrats, seven Republicans.

Mississippi—One supposedly safe Democratic seat new Republican; four other Democrats unopposed.

Nebraska—The formerly all Republican delegation is now two Republicans, one Democrat.

New Hampshire—Democrats picked up one of the two Republican seats.

New Jersey—A switch of four seats to the Democrats, making the delegation eleven Democrats, four Republicans.

New York—A big seven-seat gain for the Democrats to give them control of the delegation, 27 to 14.

North Dakota—One of the state's two Republican seats is now Democratic.

Ohio—A four-seat gain for the Democrats, to make it ten Democrats, fourteen Republicans.

Pennsylvania—Two seats switched Democratic. Delegation now fifteen Democrats, twelve Republicans.

Texas—The two Republicans lost to make all twenty-three Texas seats Democratic.

Washington—Democrats picked up four seats, kept the one they had. It's now five Democrats, two Republicans.

Wisconsin—Two seats switched Democratic, one seat switched Republican. The net gain of one seat makes it five Democrats, five Republicans.

Wyoming—Only one seat, but it switched Democratic.

South, Border States Turn Back Goldwater's Bid for Power Base

The 13 southern and border states turned back Sen. Barry Goldwater's bid to use the region as a springboard to the Presidency and essentially repeated the pattern of 16 years ago, when Southerners fielded a States Rights Party.

The 13-state region—including Texas, Oklahoma and Kentucky—gave Pres. Johnson 98 electoral votes to 47 for Goldwater, a higher margin for the Democratic candidate than Pres. Kennedy scored in 1960.

Goldwater carried the four states won by Sen. Strom Thurmond in 1948—Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina—plus, surprisingly, Georgia, which went Republican for the first time in its history.

The Goldwater victories in these five states helped the Republicans to pick up seven congressional seats—five in Alabama, one in Mississippi and one in Georgia. But the Republicans lost two seats they formerly held in Texas and one in Kentucky, giving the GOP a net gain of four in the region. The party retained the 14 seats it had won in earlier years.

The Goldwater southern strategy failed to produce results in the Senate races, where liberal Democrats won in Texas, Tennessee and Oklahoma. Nor did the Republicans succeed in winning the four governorships up in the area. Democrats scored easily in Texas, Arkansas, Florida and North Carolina.

New Lineup 101-18

The new House lineup for the South and border states in the 89th Congress will be 101 Democrats and 18 Republicans.

In the presidential race, although Goldwater added Georgia to the States Rights group, four states that had voted for Republican candidates in the past three presidential elections went into the Johnson column — Virginia, Florida, Tennessee and Oklahoma.

While the civil rights issue played the dominant role in the five states that went for Goldwater, voters returned to Congress members who had courageously voted for the civil rights bill—Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D-Tex.), Rep. Charles L. Weltner (D-Ga.) and Ross Bass, who won a two-year Senate term, the seat previously held by the late Sen. Estes Kefauver.

Despite determined Republican opposition, Yarborough, Weltner and Bass won along with Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) and Fred Harris, an Oklahoma state senator who took the measure of the GOP's Bud Wilkinson, the former University of Oklahoma football coach.

In House races in the region, Charles P. Farnsley, a former mayor of Louisville, defeated GOP Rep. M. G. (Gene) Snyder in Kentucky and Democrats Earle Cabell and Richard C. White defeated Texas Republican Representatives Bruce Alger and Ed Foreman.

The Republican gains were centered in Alabama, where the GOP picked up five seats of the eight at stake as the state went solidly for Goldwater. Actually, Alabama voters had no opportunity to vote for Johnson because there was no slate of Johnson electors on the ballot. The choice was the Goldwater slate or an unpledged slate initially set up by Gov. George Wallace before he scotched his own candidacy in favor of Goldwater.

The Republican pickups in Mississippi and George, while precedent-shattering for those states, reflected the spillover of the Goldwater vote.

In the other states of the region there was no change in the complexion of House membership, and Democratic Senators Harry F. Byrd (Va.), Spessard Holland (Fla.) and John C. Stennis (Miss.) won re-election.

Johnson's popular vote in the area was about 52 percent, despite the loss of the five states, topping the 49.2 percent Kennedy scored four years ago.

A major factor in the President's popular and electoral vote margin was the Negro vote, which turned out heavily as a result of an intensive registration and get-out-the-vote drive and Goldwater's opposition to the civil rights bill.

Analysis of the returns throughout the region indicated that the Johnson vote was strongest in the big cities while Goldwater strength was concentrated in the rural areas—traditionally heavily Democratic—and some of the new suburban areas.

Fair Housing Laws Lose; Maryland Backs Rights

State and local civil rights questions were given mixed treatment on ballots in three widely separated areas as repeal of fair housing laws was voted in California and Akron, O., and Maryland citizens approved extension of the state public accommodations law to all counties.

The California referendum went almost 2 to 1 in favor of Proposition 14, a constitutional amendment which would repeal state laws prohibiting discrimination in the sale or rental of housing and forbid enactment of similar laws in the future.

The measure, backed by real estate interests, had strong opposition from organized labor and liberal groups.

The opponents pledged immediate moves to seek a court ruling that the amendment is unconstitutional. While declining to have the proposition stricken from the ballot, the California Supreme Court nevertheless had expressed "grave" doubts over its constitutionality.

By a margin of about 30,000 ballots, Maryland voters made the public accomodations law effective on a statewide basis, extending it to the 11 counties excluded from coverage when it was enacted under the system which permits individual counties in the state to exempt themselves from certain types of state legislation.

The law prohibits denial of service on grounds of racial discrimination in restaurants, hotels, motels and other places of public accomodation.

Federal Law Governs

Maryland is, of course, covered by the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964, but in states having their own public accomodations laws, discrimination cases are first handled by state agencies and state courts, with subsequent recourse available in federal courts.

Akron residents voted repeal of a city fair housing law similar to California's. It had been enacted by the city council last July. With about three-fourths of the ballots counted, the margin for repeal was running about 4-3.

VICTORY SMILES adorn two Tennessee Democrats, who won Senate seats, and their wives. From the left, Rep. Ross Bass, his wife, Mrs. Albert Gore and Sen. Gore. Bass won a two-year Senate term over Howard Baker (R) and Gore was re-elected in a race with GOP nominee Dan Kuykendall.

Only 5 Shifts:

Democrats Maintain Majority, 33-17, As GOP Picks Up Lone Governorship

Political stars rose and sank in the 25 gubernatorial contests, though the number of party switches was the smallest in years. Only five states switched, with a net gain to the GOP of one statehouse. Democrats won 17 of the contests and, with holdovers, the party ratio is now 33 Democratic governors to 17 Republicans.

Massachusetts, Washington and Wisconsin—all states which gave from 62 to 76 percent of their votes to Johnson and big pluralities to Democratic senatorial candidates—replaced Democratic governors with Republicans.

Arizona, which stayed with Goldwater, and Utah, which voted moderately for Johnson, switched from Republican to Democratic governors.

The two most closely watched gubernatorial elections—in Michigan and Illinois—brought no change in incumbents but did affect the political prestige of the candidates.

Michigan's Republican Gov. George W. Romney, who refused to endorse Goldwater, won a second term by a comfortable 335,000 votes in the face of a Johnson plurality of more than 1 million and a majority nearly as great for Democratic Sen. Philip A. Hart.

Romney enjoyed a brief boomlet as a potential GOP presidential candidate this year and his triumphant emergence from the Republican debacle presumably will boost his political stock.

In Illinois, Charles H. Percy may still have a political future. But the defeat of the former "boy wonder" of the business world by Gov. Otto J. Kerner was a disappointment to Republicans. He tried to straddle the fence between support of Goldwater and appeal to anti-Goldwater independents—ran 200,000 votes better than the GOP presidential candidate, but 200,000 votes behind Kerner.

In other states:

ARIZONA—Sam Goddard, liberal former state Democratic chairman, upset a key Goldwater associate, Richard Kleindienst to take the state for the Democrats with 53 percent of the vote.

ARKANSAS — Gov. Orval E. Faubus had an easier time than expected winning a sixth term from Republican Winthrop Rockefeller with 58 percent.

DELAWARE — State remains Democratic with Charles L. Terry winning a close race the Republicans had hoped to take.

FLORIDA — An easy win for Democrat Haydon Burns. A 58 percent margin.

INDIANA — Indiana voters elected a Democrat to succeed a Democratic governor, a rarity in this normally Republican state. The winner is Roger D. Branigin by 56 percent.

IOWA—Democratic Gov. Harold E. Hughes ran ahead of Pres. Johnson to win with 69 percent.

KANSAS — William H. Avery, who gave up a House seat, was favored to keep the statehouse Republican. He did, but just barely.

MASSACHUSETTS—It takes a lot of ticket-splitting to overcome a Democratic plurality of more than a million votes in the presidential and senatorial columns, but Republican John A. Volpe succeeded. Volpe, a former governor, narrowly defeated Francis X. Bellotti who had earlier upset incumbent Gov. Endicott Peabody in the Democratic primary.

MISSOURI — No problem for Warren E. Hearnes to keep the state Democratic with 62 percent of the vote.

MONTANA—Republican Gov. Tim M. Babcock won re-election in a close contest with Roland Renne.

NEBRASKA—Democratic Gov. Frank Brenner Morrison was easily re-elected with a 60 percent plurality.

NEW HAMPSHIRE — Gov. John W. King, who became the first Democratic governor in 40 years in 1962, will serve a second term with an astonishing 67 percent plurality.

NEW MEXICO — Gov. Jack M. Campbell, Democrat, had no trouble winning re-election by a 60 percent margin.

NORTH CAROLINA—No upset here as Democrat Dan K. Moore, somewhat to the right of incumbent Gov. Terry Sanford, won with 56 percent of the vote. Sanford was ineligible for another term.

NORTH DAKOTA—Democrat William L. Guy, who made news when he first was elected in Republican North Dakota, was the favorite and came through with a 56 percent margin.

RHODE ISLAND — Voters in this state can mark a straight ticket ballot—if they wish. But few did. While Pres. Johnson was winning 81 percent of the vote, and Sen. John O. Pastore was leading the ticket with 83 percent, Republican Gov. John H. Chafee won re-election with a comfortable plurality.

SOUTH DAKOTA—Nils A. Boe kept the statehouse Republican with 52 percent of the vote.

TEXAS—Democratic Gov. John B. Connally led the ticket to win with 74 percent of the vote.

UTAH — Democrats elected a governor for the first time in 16 years, Calvin L. Rampton by a 57 percent plurality.

VERMONT — Eyebrows were raised two years ago when Philip H. Hoff became the first Democratic governor in 100 years. His plurality then was 50.1 percent. This year it is 65 percent.

WASHINGTON—The tenure of Democratic Gov. Albert D. Rosellini came to an end after two terms. While Democrats were capturing everything else in the state, Republican Daniel J. Evans took 56 percent of the vote for governor.

WEST VIRGINIA—This "close one" didn't turn out to be so close as Hulett C. Smith kept the state Democratic with a 55 percent margin.

WISCONSIN—Democratic Gov. John W. Reynolds couldn't quite make it as Republican Warren P. Knowles took this close one.

Middle Atlantic Sweep Pays House Dividends

Democratic candidates collected rich dividends from Pres. Johnson's sweep of the populous Mid-Atlantic states, a political bellwether region which has swung with the winner in recent presidential elections.

While Johnson was collecting the 112 electoral votes of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, West Virginia, Delaware and the District of Columbia, Democratic candidates took two Senate seats and 13 House seats away from Republicans. In the process, they won control of both houses of the New York Legislature for the first time in 30 years and gained control of the Pennsylvania House.

Robert F. Kennedy, considered an underdog at one stage of his senatorial campaign, defeated Sen. Kenneth B. Keating in New York by some 800,000 votes—a landslide in any ordinary election year, although well below Pres. Johnson's record-breaking 2.5 million plurality. And a close friend of the Kennedy family, Joseph D. Tydings, was an easy victor over Maryland's Sen. J. Glenn Beall.

In other area races, two Republican senators won re-election by sharply reduced margins and two Democratic senators were returned to office with greatly increased pluralities. Democrats held on to governorships in West Virginia and Delaware which had been listed in the "doubtful" column in pre-election surveys.

7 New Seats

In New York State House races, the Democrats had been given an even chance to win the 5th District on Long Island with Herbert Tenzer. They did. But they also went on to defeat Rep. Stephen B. Derounian in the 3rd District, which the authoritative Congressional Quarterly had termed "the most staunchly Republican on Long Island." The new Democratic congressman is Lester L. Wolff.

The Democrats also unseated Rep. Katharine St. George, who had represented the Newburgh area for nine terms, with John G. Dow; six-term Rep. J. Ernest Wharton in the Poughkeepsie area with Joseph Y. Resnick; nine-termer Rep. R. Walter Riehlman of Syracuse with James M. Hanley, and in a "safe Republican" suburban Buffalo district, five-termer John R. Pillion lost to Richard D. McCarthy. Richard L. Ottinger upset three-term Rep. Robert L. Barry in the Yonkers area.

There were surprises, too, in New Jersey's congressional races. The Democratic victory of Paul J. Krebs of the Auto Workers in Newark had been expected, that of Thomas C. McGrath, Jr., over Rep. Milton W. Glenn in Atlantic City viewed as a possibility. But James J. Howard went on to win the Monmouth County area 3rd District and Mayor Henry Helstoski of East Rutherford unseated Rep. Frank C. Osmers, Jr.

Sen. Harrison A. Williams, Jr., (D) won re-election by more than 650,000, running close to Johnson.

Pennsylvania's Senate seat has been tentatively retained by Republican Hugh Scott, but nearly 130,000 still-to-be-counted absentee ballots could switch this cliffhanger to Democrat Genevieve Blatt.

In the York area, Democrat N. Neiman Craley, Jr., upset Rep. George A. Goodling, and in the Erie district, Joseph P. Vigorito unseated Rep. James D. Weaver.

Delaware returned Republican Sen. John J. Williams but elected an underdog Democratic gubernatorial candidate, Charles L. Terry, Jr.

West Virginia re-elected Democratic Sen. Robert C. Byrd by a big margin and Democrat Hulett C. Smith easily won the governorship in what had been expected to be a close race.

The District of Columbia, voting for the first time, cast 167,778 votes for Johnson to 28,503 for Goldwater, the nation's largest percentage plurality for the President.

Injunction Granted In Studebaker Case

South Bend, Ind.—The Auto Workers announced that the U.S. District Court here has granted a preliminary injunction preventing Studebaker Corp. from halting life and insurance payments for 3,226 Studebaker retirees while the courts consider the issue.

The UAW said it has posted a $3 million bond to cover the potential liability of Studebaker for the continuation of the health security program.

The union declared in a suit filed Oct. 20 that its contract protects the retiree until he dies, is re-employed by the company or is hired by some other firm offering similar benefits. Studebaker, which closed its auto plant here last December, claims its responsibility ceased when the contract expired Oct. 30, 1964.

Cruikshank Predicts:

Hospital Care Heads Agenda for Congress

Hospital insurance for the elderly under social security and improvements in benefits will be the first order of business when the new Congress meets in January and "will pass early" in the coming session, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Nelson Cruikshank predicted in a nationwide radio broadcast.

"You won't be up against the gun on adjournment," he explained. "If it is made the No. 1 issue, which the President promised, if it is put in that early, you won't be up against the deadlock of adjournment which forced the issue . . . this year."

Cruikshank's forecast was made on the AFL-CIO public service program, Labor News Conference, heard on the Mutual Broadcasting System. He was interviewed by Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post and John Herling of the National Newspaper Syndicate.

The forces working for enactment of hospitalization under social security in the last session of Congress did not have the "same kind of leeway" they will have in the coming session, Cruikshank said.

"Priority was given the tax provision and the tax cut," he said. "I don't object to that and I think that most people wouldn't; that was a highly important piece of legislation to get through. But it meant that this issue came down toward the end of Congress when you faced a deadline and it gave a certain advantage, it put certain cards in the hands of the people who didn't want it enacted.

Situation "Different"

"Now, if it is No. 1 when Congress comes back in January, you will have an entirely different situation."

Cruikshank called it "a fair statement" when asked by Herling if he thought that Chairman Wilbur Mills of the House Ways & Means Committee "kept Congress from working its legislative will" on hospitalization under social security.

He said that "certainly" both the social security tax rate and the amount of wage subject to tax will have to be raised to finance hospitalization protection, increased benefits or both.

If the same proportion of wages were subject to tax now as in 1935, when the Social Security Act became effective, he said, the base would be $12,800 a year instead of $4,800.

"And if we kept the tax in the same proportion to wages as in 1935, without raising the rate," he added, "you would have enough to pay for the whole hospital cost."

Wage Gains Won by UTW In Tennessee

Johnson City, Tenn.—New three-year agreements won by the United Textile Workers of America provide gains in wages, fringe benefits and contract protection for workers in the synthetic yarn industry, the union has announced.

New contracts, won by UTWA Local 815 in Lowland, Tenn., from the American Enka Corp. and by Locals 2207 and 2614 in Elizabethton, Tenn., from Beaunit Mills, Inc., were ratified by overwhelming margins at packed membership meetings, the locals reported.

The new Enka agreement calls for a 6-cent hourly wage increase Aug. 2, 1964, and again on Oct. 17, 1965, and a wage reopener Oct. 15, 1966; changes in the pension agreement including a hike from $1.50 a month per year of credited service to $2 a month; retirement at any age for total disability, and improvements in job bidding, job classifications, hospital benefits and health payments.

At Beaunit Mills the locals won a wage boost of 10 cents an hour effective Sept. 1, 1964, and another 6 cents Sept. 1, 1966, along with wage adjustments in the polymer unit; pension improvements like those at Enka, and language changes including a clause limiting subcontracting.

STAFF REPRESENTATIVES from six districts of the Steelworkers in Ohio discussed ways of making the Civil Rights Act workable at a conference in Columbus also attended by local union delegates from Dist. 27, the host district. Shown speaking is USWA Legislative Rep. John Sheehan. Others, from left, are Dir. Donald Slaiman, AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Boyd L. Wilson of the USWA Committee on Civil Rights; USWA Staff Rep. Ernest L. Clifford; Warren Pate of the Ohio AFL-CIO; Exec. Sec. Francis Shane, USWA Committee on Civil Rights, and Dir. John S. Johns of USWA Dist. 27, who presided.

Consumer Prices Rise Seasonally

The Consumer Price Index, following a seasonal trend, rose two-tenths of 1 percent in September as food and clothing prices edged higher.

The index stood at 108.4 percent of its 1957-59 average. This meant that the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 period was priced at $10.84 in the latest tally.

At the same time, take-home pay of factory workers also moved to a new high. The weekly paycheck for a worker with three dependents, after deduction of federal income and social security taxes, averaged $92.98. This was 40 cents more than the previous high, set last June.

Seafarers' Taxi Local Tops Detroit Teamsters

Detroit—Transportation Services Local 10 of the Seafarers swamped the ousted Teamsters for the second time in four months in a bid to represent 2,000 Checker Cab drivers here and now faces a third National Labor Relations Board election.

The Seafarers, who represent 6,000 Chicago cab drivers and 2,000 in St. Louis, originally petitioned for an election here in the spring of 1962 and are girding for another vote late in December.

The latest tally by the NLRB showed SIU Local 10 with 394 votes, Teamsters Local 902 with 219, neither union 224, and 129 challenged ballots. That means a third election with Local 10 the only union on the ballot.

The AFL-CIO affiliate, in balloting last June, got 391 votes to 260 for the Teamsters and 189 for neither. But 312 votes were challenged and the NLRB voided the election after upholding a company objection to a marked sample ballot used by the Teamsters during their pre-election campaign.

An intensive drive by Local 10 during a 10-day period preceding the second election produced a favoring margin of 47 percent of the unchallenged ballots, with little likelihood the challenged votes would convert the plurality into a majority.

Members and officers of Transportation Services Local 777, Chicago, participated in the whirlwind organizing campaigns here.

Drive Dates to 1962

The Checker organizing drive began in the spring of 1962 after management prepared to reduce the schedule of commission payments for drivers. Labor board hearings consumed more than a year and another delay was necessary until a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in another case last March finally paved the way for a June vote.

Local 10 whipped the Teamsters in a separate vote here two years ago covering Checker Cab garage mechanics. The vote was 57-2 for the SIU affiliate. Efforts to negotiate a contract for the mechanics have been stalled while the drivers' election moved along its slow course.

Meany Heads U.S. Delegation Visiting Japan

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany is leading a fraternal delegation of American trade union officials to the merger convention of three Japanese labor centers in Tokyo, Nov. 11. The three merging labor organizations are Zenro, Sodomei and Zenkanko, whose combined total membership on completion of the merger will be roughly 1.5 to 1.75 million members.

In the delegation are David Dubinsky, president of the Ladies' Garment Workers Union; George M. Harrison, chief executive of the Railway Clerks, and James A. Suffridge, president of the Retail Clerks, all AFL-CIO vice presidents; and Jay Lovestone, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Mrs. Meany, Mrs. Suffridge and Virginia Tehas, Meany's secretary, are also making the trip. The trip had been planned since July, when a Japanese group headed by Seiji Amaike, secretary of the Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei Kaigi), visited the United States to invite Meany and a delegation of AFL-CIO officials to attend the merger convention.

The AFL-CIO delegation was to leave Nov. 5 and stop briefly in Hawaii before proceeding to Tokyo.

Rail Supervisors Ask Reduced Working Time

Miami Beach, Fla.—The 27th convention of the Railway Supervisors called for a six-hour day and a five-day week at its closing sessions here.

It did so in a report submitted by Pres. James P. Tahney which was approved unanimously by delegates representing mechanical, maintenance of way, communications and other supervisory employees on most of the nation's railroads. They came from virtually every state.

Tahney, reviewing a program keyed to a railroad industry undergoing technological and other revolutionary changes, also proposed:

- Supplemental pensions, made mandatory by the "increased cost of living." "Such pensions," he said, "are being accepted at a tremendous pace in non-railroad industries."
- Eleven paid holidays, currently there are seven. To these would be added the employe's birthday.
- Improvements in vacation provisions which would be changed to provide three weeks after one year and four weeks after five years, plus one additional day for each year of service after 15 years.
- Higher salary differentials for the second and third shifts.

The ARSA president also pointed up the necessity for a wage schedule geared to the rising cost of living and commensurate with the increased skill and responsibilities required of supervisors.

"A wage schedule which would meet these essentials and a program of improvements encompassing the proposals outlined here would fit the needs of railway supervisory employes in a changing industry," Tahney said.

The three-day convention reelected R. R. McGuire as financial secretary-treasurer and Fred Riehl, E. J. Bradley and E. C. Krebs as vice presidents. McGuire and Krebs reside in Chicago, Riehl in Oakland, Calif., and Bradley in New York City. Tahney and the other officers were not up for election at this convention of the union, which staggers terms of its officers.

ARSA, a member of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, observes its 30th anniversary Nov. 14.

Pilots' Forum Studies Air Safety Research

Chicago—Capt. Paul E. Soderlind, manager of the flight operations research division of Northwest Airlines, was presented with the 1964 Air Safety Award of the Air Line Pilots at the union's 11th annual Air Safety Forum here.

Soderlind was honored for studies, research and flight testing in the operation of jet aircraft in turbulence which resulted in the development of improved procedures to increase safety. His work has been recognized throughout the world.

At an aeromedical session Dr. Stanley R. Mohler, chief of aeromedical research for the Federal Aviation Agency, declared crew fatigue should receive greater consideration in investigation of airplane accidents.

ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby in the opening forum cited flight crew fatigue as one of the most pressing problems facing air transportation. The others, he said, are all-weather flying safety and more adequate airports.

Whether the goal of all-weather flying can be attained must be determined one step at a time, according to Capt. R. C. Gerber, a member of the ALPA All-Weather Flying Committee and a Pan American Airline pilot.

"To explore the problems and the possibilities of achieving the ultimate goal," he said, "a step-by-step approach of gradually lowering the ceiling and visibility minimums is necessary and each step in the lowering process must be accomplished by the provision of adequate ground aids, airborne equipment and associated requirements that have been thoroughly evaluated and tested at higher minimums before actual commercial operations are commenced at the lower limits."

Promotion of further development of an "arrester" system restricted to emergency use was stressed by Capt. Joseph Meek of Delta Air Lines at a session on airport development. The "arrester" facilities, to halt a plane landing too fast or suffering brake failure, would be similar to those used on Navy aircraft carriers.

Advances being made in airport fire fighting and rescue facilities were described by Capt. B. V. Hewes, who said that primary findings indicate a high rate of survival in crashes in the vicinity of airports.

The Mandate

THE STUNNING VICTORY of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey was a national consensus of the essential good sense and solid judgment of the American people and an overwhelming vote of confidence in everything that's wrapped up in the phrase "let us continue."

The Johnson-Humphrey landslide was all-encompassing. Each of the varied groupings that together make up America joined in the decision. All sections of the country—even the South—endorsed the programs and positions of the Democratic candidates.

The result is to strengthen the nation as never before; to cast aside the racists, the phony moralists, the peddlers of nostalgia wrapped in cotton-candy simplicity and to face up honestly to the difficult complexities of our times.

THE NATION has given a clear mandate to Pres. Johnson to move ahead with programs for more jobs, better housing and schooling and medical care, a major assault on poverty and all the other elements that are part of his plan for a Great Society.

It has given a mandate, too, despite the limited success of Sen. Barry Goldwater in the South, for firm enforcement of equal rights under the Civil Rights Act and has destroyed the somewhat sordid concept of a "backlash" against those who battle for basic moral standards.

It has made clear beyond question or doubt that in an age of nuclear weapons it will select leaders who have the wisdom, understanding and responsibility for coping with survival or destruction.

And in ringing terms of almost staggering pluralities it has denounced the extremists who would despoil freedom and democracy as it has come to full bloom in the United States.

THE AMERICAN LABOR movement has played a proud and determined role in helping build and shape the national consensus for Johnson and Humphrey. As an intrinsic part of the fabric of American society, trade unions understood early and well the nature of the challenge posed by the Goldwater-Miller candidacies. They responded with all their energy and resources to preserve the great advances of the past 30 years and to pave the way for new advances in the years to come.

To the millions of trade unionists who marked their ballots for Johnson and Humphrey there is the quiet satisfaction of having voted for a better tomorrow for all Americans, of having helped extend the concepts of social and economic justice, of having helped preserve an atmosphere of freedom and equality and democracy.

It has been a job well done for the nation and for the future of free, strong trade unionism.

Katzenbach Says:

A 'Rising Tide' of Civil Rights Goal of Labor, Administration

The following is excerpted from an address by acting Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach to the recent Indiana AFL-CIO convention in Indianapolis.

YOU, AS MEMBERS of the labor movement, well know the power of propaganda—it has been used against you often enough.

In 1920, the eight-hour work day was described by one of the nation's most prominent businessmen as a "systematic anti-industry campaign, waged by the insidious elements of economic suicide, both within and without the ranks of radical socialism."

In 1936 a member of Congress declared that a minimum wage proposal was "regimentation of industry and it makes the Secretary of Labor the absolute dictator of all wages."

A year later the Fair Labor Standards Act was under consideration and another member of Congress predicted: "The minute you give the federal government authority to set wages and hours and establish conditions of employment you destroy the labor movement."

The labor movement and the republic have survived these dire predictions. Labor triumphed in its efforts to achieve humane hours, decent wages, and safe working conditions. The nation was not fooled, at least not for long, by fright or propaganda. Nor is it today.

Nevertheless, last spring and summer, we were treated to a new example of the same technique. In an effort to defeat the Civil Rights Act of 1964 we saw newspaper ads describing the act, in two-inch headlines, as a "Hundred-Billion Dollar Blackjack." We heard flat statements that the act would give so-called "federal inspectors" the power to dictate job seniority, racial balance in labor unions, and preferential promotions for minority group members. We heard absolute declarations that the act would make the Attorney General "a virtual dictator of America's manners and morals."

The language, like the language used to oppose earlier reform legislation, not only lacked restraint, but also lacked fact.

So much nonsense, so many untruths were uttered about the Civil Rights Act that I sometimes wondered if they were talking about the same act that Congress was considering.

This propaganda barrage, in the end, failed in its effort to block passage of the Civil Rights Act. But it nevertheless succeeded in raising some enduring doubts in the minds of many people.

In our efforts to set the record straight, we have been greatly helped by the AFL-CIO and particularly by its president, George Meany, who has stated unequivocally that "the AFL-CIO is for civil rights—without reservation and without delay."

I believe we have reached the time when we cannot simply talk about the "civil rights problem." Equal opportunity is no more a Negro problem alone than fair wages are a concern of the workingman alone.

Our great economic and social concerns are not issues of black and white. They are human issues. No American—black or white—should live in a rat-infested slum. No American—black or white—should attend a second-rate school. No American—black or white—should be without work if he is willing and able to work. And no American—black or white—should have to work for a wage that is not a decent, living wage.

IT IS THESE realistic, human problems that the Administrations of Pres. Kennedy and Pres. Johnson have worked to solve. There are many examples of these honest attempts to cope with real problems.

Pres. Johnson's war against poverty is a symbol of our determination to build a better America.

Another example is the program started by Pres. Kennedy to prevent juvenile delinquency by offering new opportunities to young people in the slums.

The Administration recognizes the effect that slum living has on people of all ages, and is conducting the most extensive program of slum clearance and housing assistance in history.

The Dept. of Justice, under former Atty. Gen. Kennedy, initiated an unprecedented campaign against crime. In his administration of the department, convictions of racketeers rose from 18 in fiscal 1961 to 354 in fiscal 1964.

This Administration enacted a tax cut that will mean more spending money for the working man and continued growth to the economy—an economy that has never been more healthy.

It is because the labor movement has fought and won great battles in the past that it can so selflessly help others fight their battles today, knowing that the victories of one group are the victories of all. There is a saying that Pres. Kennedy sometimes quoted: "A rising tide lifts all the boats."

It is to continue America's rising tide that we—you in the labor movement and the Administration—are committed. We go forward not with fear and confusion, but with fact and confidence

Morgan Says:

Chinese Puzzle of Propositions Corrupts the Democratic Ballot

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

NOW COMES the final outrage, the ultimate indignity. The Australian ballot, conceived to preserve the democratic system via the secret vote, is being corrupted. Instead of offering a clear choice between candidates, a simple method of voting propositions up or down, the ballot in too many states has become a Chinese puzzle, the solution of which requires an encyclopedia, the local telephone book, a law degree and time—say half a day—for research.

Morgan

But there was neither the room nor the time in the polling booth for the conscientious citizen to utilize this necessary equipment in the thoughtful exercise of his right of franchise. The result: numerous mistaken votes and countless ruined ballots.

This bureaucratic nonsense is a threat to the open society. Voters of the republic, I say, arise! We've got nothing to lose but our chains of confusion.

Take, for example, the ballot in Illinois, an orange-colored monstrosity the size of a bath towel, soggy with the names of candidates for at least 198 separate offices. Because of an unresolved hassle over redistricting, candidates for the 177 seats in the state House at Springfield had to run at large, not just in their home constituencies. You could have voted the straight Republican or Democratic ticket, but that took care of only 118 candidates—the number each party put on its respective slate. If you voted the party line but then desired to cast the 59 remaining votes to which you were entitled, you had to pick them individually—from the list of the opposing party. Whatever you did, Illinois law allowed you only five minutes to do it in.

Louisiana asked its voters to ballot on 41 separate amendments to the state constitution. The forty-first read as follows: "Amendment to Article X, of the Louisiana constitution to add thereto a new section 10.1, to authorize the imposition of an additional seven-mill tax by the city of Kenner for garbage collection and disposal services."

Georgia led the nation with 117 separate proposals on the ballot, 28 of which asked for revenue to attract new industry. As if they realized this burden of propositions—not to mention selection of the national ticket and 75 state officials—was going to slow down the voting, Georgia lawmakers perversely decided to speed up the process. For the first time they wrote into the election code a voting time limit; where voting machines operate, it was one minute. Just to make things jim-dandy at the precincts, the voter did not mark his selection; he had to cross out the proposals he did not want. One incorrect mark on the Georgia ballot could void a whole section.

Democracy marches on. The 24th amendment to the U.S. Constitution makes it illegal to require a voter in federal elections to pay poll taxes and as a result more Negroes in the South voted in 1964. But poll taxes on a state level still have not been outlawed and in Virginia, for instance, unless you remembered to pay them by an obscure and little-publicized date, you could have found yourself denied a ballot.

THE LABELING—or the lack of it—on the ballot can be dangerously confusing. The minions of Harry Flood Byrd made sure of his re-election to a sixth term in the U.S. Senate from Virginia. With that tenure of office his name is widely known. But this time there were six people running against him, including a Republican named Richard A. May. Nobody, including Byrd, was given any party designation on the ballot but the senator's name was at the top of the list and May's was buried several names down.

Where the legal mind conniving for confusion excels is in the drafting of propositions. On the Texas ballot was a constitutional amendment which would "remove the authorization to transfer not exceeding 1 percent annually of the total value of the permanent school fund to the available school fund." You need more than a third-grade education to penetrate the significance of that one.

Perhaps the prize for deliberate deception should go to the California real estate lobby and other backers of Proposition 14. This would destroy California's fair housing laws, notably the Rumford Act, by constitutional amendment. By a clever psychological juxtaposition, to vote yes to protect the Rumford Act you had to vote no on Proposition 14. The confusion was compounded by the fact that a quick reading of the wording caused many California voters to conclude it was civil rights legislation and they were preparing to vote for it when actually the proposition dealt a crushing blow to civil rights.

Heaven deliver us from the perfect society but surely we can afford to repair the imperfections that besiege and bedevil the normal exercise of the secret ballot so extravagantly.

Washington Reports:

Appalachia Bill Priority Urged For New Session of Congress

THE APPALACHIA BILL, caught in the logjam of unfinished business at the end of the last Congress, should be a prior subject for action when Congress convenes in January, a Republican and a Democrat asserted on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 radio stations.

"This shall certainly be my objective," declared Rep. W. Pat Jennings (D-Va.). "I think it will be one of the first 'musts,' since the governors of the 10 states [in the area] asked the government to act in this region as in the Tennessee Valley Area."

"We ought to get at this bill promptly after we come back in January," Rep. Robert J. Corbett (R-Pa.) said. "Resources of all kinds—human and natural—meanwhile are lying there going to waste in the midst of misery and poverty."

Jennings said that a special measure to cover Appalachia is necessary, in addition to the Economic Opportunities or Anti-Poverty Act, because specific activities are needed in this by-passed region between the prosperous East and Middle West.

Roads are necessary, he said, to get goods and people in and out. Without them industry will not move in, although there is a huge labor surplus, and agricultural goods cannot be taken to markets.

UNEMPLOYMENT in the area is highest in the nation, Corbett reported, because of the automation of coal mines and abandonment of timber and other farming. Housing and health conditions as a result, he added, "are about the worst you can find anywhere.

"Perhaps as many as three-fourths of the houses lack plumbing or have very inadequate plumbing," he said. "To make matters worse, there is a shortage of doctors and dentists. Tuberculosis is widespread, communicable diseases of all kinds are well above the national average."

Jennings said the area has "some of the most beautiful scenery in the world, but there are no roads to get to it."

"Tourism could in itself be a profitable operation if we had arterial roads to bring visitors in," he maintained. "We're within one day's drive of the prosperous East and West."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THERE "WILL BE a real Republican comeback in the congressional races two years from now," said Rep. Charles A. Halleck of Indiana, GOP House floor leader, in commenting on the indicated net Democratic gain of 37 seats as a byproduct of the Goldwater disaster. Republican National Committee Chairman Dean Burch, an Arizona lawyer who once worked in the senator's Washington office, found the 1964 wreckage of the Republican Party as a national party "encouraging in several respects" and invited all those who had viewed Goldwater's nomination as an invitation to party suicide to join with him for more of the same.

A few more such "encouraging" victories and such promises of future "real comebacks," and the party of Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, Willkie and Eisenhower could become a fragment, a permanent "fraction of a faction," to adopt the phraseology of Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, the Vice President-elect.

Republican House membership dropped, under Goldwater's leadership, to 141—less than one-third of the total of 435. Senate membership, even counting the late-changing Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, dropped to 32—less than one-third of the total of 100. The Democratic Party picked up 47 House seats in the 1958 election year of the "social revolution," as former Republican Rep. Wint Smith of Kansas called it, and held on to 24 of them through the next two elections. Now it has added 37 more. The Nov. 3 balloting swept to defeat scores of state and local GOP candidates in areas they ordinarily would have won.

SEN. GOLDWATER and Burch suggest that they will try to hang on to leadership. It may require a savage battle to dislodge them—but dislodged they will be, for there is no vitality in a Republican Party that misreads the temper of the times as they did.

A limited and self-centered group, exploiting accidents and apathy disabling Goldwater's natural rivals within the Republican Party, managed to nominate the Arizona senator. There was, unbelievably, an extraordinary self-delusion that the mood of sparsely-populated Arizona's Goldwater wing, of disgruntled white leaders of a few Gulf Coast states still sick with their unwillingness to cope with the moral issue of human rights, was the mood of the nation.

The senator once suggested that the only thing to do with the Atlantic Seaboard states was to "saw them off" and let them drift away. But can anyone think that Gov. Rockefeller of New York, if nominated, would have lost all the states east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio and Potomac River, including the Atlantic Seaboard, all the states west of the Mississippi except Arizona, and all but five of the 13 southern and border states?

For the record, this observer believes that Pres. Johnson with slight slips in the heat of battle conducted an honorable campaign, waged on genuine issues and with no need for defensiveness on major policy matters. Sen. Goldwater was continuously and self-consciously defensive, because he found he could not possibly campaign for the presidency on positions he had claimed to occupy when he offered "a choice not an echo."

THE SENATORS at a news conference said, after the election, that Republicans in the moderate-to-liberal category would not "vote, or work I should say, for the top of the ticket." This was, he said reproachfully and blaming everything on others, "in direct contrast to times when the conservatives did not win at the convention when we would go out and work our hearts out for the more liberal or moderate members of the party."

That's not the way we used to hear it. We used to be told that the only reason the GOP lost elections was that "millions" of "real Republicans" were sitting on their hands, repelled by "me too" candidates, and that only the nomination of a "real Republican" would entice these mythical "millions" out of their sulks.

The field is open for candidates to replace Burch, with powerful Republican governors and state leaders appalled at the disaster that overtook their party. One obvious possibility is Ohio's Republican State Chairman and National Committeeman Ray E. Bliss, who fought six years ago to keep the Ohio GOP from identifying itself with a right-to-work proposal, who argues that modernized programs and more sensible organization efforts might lure city and suburban voters to think more highly of the GOP.

MUST LEGISLATION before the 89th Congress should include the Appalachia bill to aid the 10-state area along the Appalachian range, Rep. Pat Jennings (D-Va.), left, and Rep. Robert J. Corbett (R-Pa.) declared on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

How to Buy:

Here Are Some of the Answers On What to do About College

By Sidney Margolius

THIS IS THE TIME high school juniors take preliminary college exams, seniors wonder what college to apply to, and parents wonder how to pay the bill.

This reporter recently had the opportunity to observe a unique college-counseling session for member families run by New York Local 6 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes. The interest and determination of these moderate-income families to get higher education for their children was noticeable.

Equally noticeable was the dedication of the experts who gave a special helping hand to these families—Dean Charles C. Cole, admissions officer at Lafayette College and chairman of the College Scholarship Service, who administers the union's scholarship program, and Richard D. Rooney, financial aid officer of Oberlin College.

This union gives several scholarships a year to some of the brightest of its members' children. But the annual counseling session is of even wider usefulness. It reaches more people and provides expert advice that is not always available.

One of the most significant features was Cole's effort to encourage the youngsters and parents who came to the meeting. It is a fact that sometimes motivation is as important as money in getting to college. The Educational Testing Service found that while 32 percent of capable boys failed to enter college for financial reasons, 29 percent did so because of "lack of interest".

Actually, "lack of interest" may mask other lacks, such as discouragement about the money. But a New Mexico study of limited income students did find that early efforts to counsel youngsters on the importance of higher education are as vital as financial aid itself.

COLE ADVISED getting an early start on planning—even to sending for college catalogs in the sophomore year of high school to make sure you take the right courses to fulfill admissions requirements.

Here are representative questions the parents and youngsters asked:

"Who should go to college?"

Many people enjoy productive lives without going to college, Cole advised. Too, not everybody has the interest or drive. But many factors, including growth of technical occupations, make it more and more necessary to secure some higher education, and to help young people develop their capabilities.

"Is it hard to get into college?"

Cole advised that the nation's 2,000 colleges divide into three groups:

- The highly selective, consisting of about 200 colleges that have more applications than places. Many colleges in the East and in large cities especially are crowded, although some still have room.
- The moderately-selective colleges, a numerous group offering a student with a 75-80 average a good chance of admittance.
- Open-door colleges, admitting nearly any high school graduate with a reasonably good record.

Junior and community colleges are growing rapidly, Cole reported. They provide educational opportunities for three groups especially:

- Youngsters who are not scholarly but want some education beyond high school.
- Another group uses the community colleges to get the first two years at lowest cost.
- A third group uses the community colleges to get specific vocational training.

"Will the four-year colleges accept transfer credits?"

Many four-year colleges will give transfer credits in subjects which the college covers but may not in some others. If you take a general course at the junior or community college, most of your credits should be acceptable.

"What about evening courses for a youngster already working?"

This is a growing way of getting education, Cole advised. Usually it takes six or seven years to complete colleges this way.

"What about an applicant who is turned down?"

Two placement centers can help a youngster who has had no acceptance, say, by May, Cole said. These are the College Admissions Center, 610 Church St., Evanston, Ill., and the College Admissions Assistance Center, 41 East 65th Street, New York 21, N. Y.

"Can part-time work help pay expenses?"

Student earnings still are an important means of helping to finance college, Rooney advised. Students often can earn $200-$300 during the school year, and $400 or more during the summer.

After Progress in '64:

AFL-CIO to Seek More Housing Aids

THE FEDERAL HOUSING LAW of 1964 is basically an extension of previously existing legislation but it marks important progress.

Here are some of the things it does:

- It provides $1.5 million mostly in loan guarantees to help Americans get what Pres. Johnson called "an opportunity to live in a decent home and in a safe and decent neighborhood."
- It offers help for families in run-down or urban renewal areas who find it almost impossible to get financing for home repairs or who are forced to find new homes often at prohibitively higher rentals.
- It gives the Federal Housing Administration wider latitude to help middle-income families become home owners by increasing federal insurance on home mortgages. It would help home owners who are hit by heavy assessments to pay for such improvements as new sidewalks, sewers and other public improvements.
- It would help families which inadvertently find themselves owners of new homes that develop all sorts of defects that builders fail to remedy. In some cases homes have slid off foundations, have been undermined by floods, have developed cracks in the walls—all frequently representing a major tragedy unless builders can be forced to fix things up.
- It would extend financial aid to home owners who for one reason or another—unemployment or illness are important causes—find themselves unable to meet the payments on their mortgages. Frequently workers have lost their homes when lenders foreclosed on them. Under the new law, mortgages can be redrawn and help extended over the distressed period. The AFL-CIO has been trying to get such provisions enacted into law for the past 20 years.
- It continues housing aid for the elderly and extends it to rural areas which were barred in the past.
- It steps up public housing construction from 35,000 to 37,500 units a year, not much when compared with the need.
- It provides financial help for construction of public low-rent housing for farm labor and permits immigrant farm labor living permanently in the United States to occupy such housing. This is in line with the AFL-CIO program which seeks higher standards of housing for all farm labor.

HOWEVER, much remains to be done and the AFL-CIO Housing Committee is determined to renew the fight for a more adequate housing bill during the very first days of next year's 89th Congress.

Groundwork should be laid now for the enactment early in the next session of a comprehensive new housing and community development program that would measure up to the growing national housing needs and bring good homes and modern living conditions within the reach of every American family.

Changes 'Seasonal':

5.2% Jobless Rate Persists in October

The unemployment picture reflected no recent improvements, though it is better than a year ago.

The key seasonally adjusted rate has ranged between 4.9 and 5.3 percent for the past six months, the Labor Dept. noted, "consistently below the levels prevailing throughout 1962 and 1963." Last year, the jobless rate ranged between 5.5 and 5.9 percent.

The 5.2 percent rate for October means 52 of every 1,000 persons in the labor force were actively seeking work and could not find it.

The jobless rates for teen-agers and adult workers were practically unchanged between September and October, the Labor Dept. said, but were better than a year ago.

The teen-age jobless rate of 14.4 percent compared to 15.7 percent a year ago. The rate for married men—the family breadwinner group—was 2.8 percent compared to 2.9 percent a year earlier. Adult men were at 4 percent and adult women at 5 percent, both slightly improved.

An exception, however, was the higher-level unemployment of men 20-24 years old. These were the men who probably were counted among the teenage jobless and still have a high rate of unemployment, a Labor Dept. spokesman said. The jobless rate of the male 20-24 age group spurted from 8.2 percent in August to 9.0 in September and 9.1 in October; a year ago the rate was 8.5 percent.

Worst-off Unimproved

The long-term unemployed—those jobless 15 weeks or longer—also remained unchanged at a total of 800,000. This total was 150,000 lower than a year ago, the report observed, with the improvement taking place among those unemployed six months or longer—the so-called "very long-term" jobless.

The total labor force was up by a quarter of a million—about the expected seasonal change—to 77.1 million, the report said.

The Labor Dept., which prefers to look at labor force changes over a period of time rather than month-to-month, pointed out that the total labor force in the four months since July averaged 1.1 million above the same period a year ago. This is somewhat less than the average over-the-year rise of 1.4 million shown for the first half of 1964.

Actually, the figures appear to be averaging out for the year about in line with the Labor Dept.'s long-term projections.

R-T-W Laws Seen Causing Strife, Chaos

A veteran mediator and former White House trouble-shooter, John R. Steelman, has warned that so-called "right-to-work" laws "would set back our progress in labor-management relations by half a century."

Steelman, a former director of the U.S. Conciliation Service and assistant to Pres. Harry Truman, said laws forbidding union shop agreements "serve no useful purpose" and would lead to "chaos in our industrial relations."

In a statement released by the National Council for Industrial Peace, Steelman said enactment of "right-to-work" laws "inevitably brings strife and bitterness into the highly favorable state of labor-management relations we have achieved."

He noted that work stoppages set a new postwar low last year, and commented: "This, together with the fact that more than 71 percent of the contracts between management and labor contain union security clauses as a result of true collective bargaining shows that the present formula for industrial relations is working well."

HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS from Washington and vicinity had their questions on labor answered by Pres. George Meany (speaking, top photo) at a session in AFL-CIO headquarters sponsored by the School Press Conference Series Association.

LABOR'S RESPONSIBILITIES in the community were aired at a three-day conference conducted by the Greater Waterbury (Conn.) AFL-CIO in cooperation with the Labor Education Center of the University of Connecticut. Participants included John Glynn (left), acting director of the Labor Education Center; Mayor Joseph F. McNellis (center) of Waterbury and Pres. Richard Woodruff of the local AFL-CIO.

Labor Safety Unit Maps Driver Retraining Plan

Chicago—A program of retraining for older motorists whose driving skills may have been eroded by the years was given first priority by the Labor Conference of the National Safety Council at its meeting here.

John D. Connors, executive secretary of the AFL-CIO Committee on Safety & Occupational Health, who took office as chairman of the Labor Conference, named Larry Sheffe of the Auto Workers chairman of an ad hoc committee to implement the program.

Safety on the highways was emphasized at the NSC session because of the steady increase on traffic deaths. The conference also voted to continue the Labor Day Safety Campaign, which this year drew more than 6,000 requests from local unions for packets of safety material.

Connors, who had been vice chairman of the Labor Conference, succeeded Victor E. Whitehouse, safety director of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Rep. J. George Eichman of the Machinists was elected new vice chairman. Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers was re-elected NSC vice president for labor.

In his report to the NSC congress, Whitehouse stressed the desirability of establishing safety departments in the AFL-CIO and international unions.

At a session on radiation Alan F. Burch, assistant research and education director of the IUOE, called for a flexible approach to safety standards as more knowledge of the biological effects becomes available. Intl. Rep. Edward J. Legan of the IBEW stressed the need of cooperation by both employer and employe to keep exposure to a minimum.

Chicago Accidents Cut

A driver training program has helped the Chicago Transit Authority to cut public accident rates by 40 percent over the last 10 years, John Baker, CTA superintendent of employment and training, told the conference. CTA drivers are members of Amalgamated Transit Div. 241.

Discussions also were held on air pollution in industry, the health and safety aspects of automation and industrial noise and hearing protection, successful union safety programs and "what to do when the bag breaks"—safety moves when a container of toxic or explosive chemicals breaks.

Interracial Group Cites Equity Chief

New York — Pres. Frederick O'Neal of Equity, the actors' union, and Mayor Arthur J. Holland of Trenton, N. J., have been given the annual James J. Hoey awards of the Catholic Interracial Council of New York for their "outstanding contributions to interracial justice."

USWA Wins Election Held 2 Years Ago

The Steelworkers have been certified, after a delay of 2.5 years, as bargaining agent for workers at the Alamo Iron Works in Corpus Christi, Tex.

Over the employer's objections, the National Labor Relations Board directed that ballots cast by the employes Apr. 25, 1962, be opened and counted. The tally showed that the 52 eligible voters cast 31 for the USWA and 21 against, with 3 challenged.

The challenged ballots were insufficient in number to affect the results. Thereafter the firm filed timely objections and the board ruled 3-0 that there was no merit in the employer's objections.

The ballots had been impounded after the original April 1962 vote pending a ruling on the employer's objections to another election, held Oct. 11, 1961, at the same firm's plant in San Antonio, Tex. Then the union filed unfair labor practice charges, according to the NLRB, and resulting hearings delayed a final decision and the union's certification as a bargaining agent.

The NLRB said union charges were disposed of in a settlement agreement reached last Mar. 31. Under it the Alamo firm posted notices agreeing not to interfere with employes' union rights and putting seven laid-off workers on a preferential hiring list for 180 days.

General Motors Pacts Ratified by IUE Locals

New national and local agreements between General Motors Corp. and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers have been ratified by nearly unanimous votes of all affected IUE locals at membership meetings, the union has reported.

Close coordination between the IUE and the Auto Workers during 14 weeks of negotiations was called the key to a contract with major gains for 25,000 IUE members. IUE Pres. James B. Carey and UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther called the coordination "unparalleled."

All of the improvements listed by GM workers as most important in a pre-negotiations poll were won, according to IUE-GM Conference Board Chairman Homer Pierce and Sec. William R. Pierce. Among them were:

- Basic pension benefit of $4.25 a month per year of service, with early retirement at age 60 at benefits up to $400 a month for 30 years' service.
- Workers now retired will get an increase in pension benefits of $1.45 per month for each year of service. New provisions for widows of workers have been added.
- Wages are increased by 2.5 percent but no less than 6 cents an hour in 1964 and 1965, and by 2.8 percent with a minimum of 7 cents an hour on Sept. 5, 1966.
- A special increase of 2 cents an hour in 1964 and again in 1966; an inequity fund equal to 2.5 cents an hour for each local; transfer of 9 cents an hour from the cost-of-living "float" to base wage rates; nine paid holidays, an additional week's vacation, insurance betterments, and other contract improvements including a special Christmas bonus.

UAW Seeks To Wrap Up Settlements

Detroit—Prospects for early settlement of contract disputes between the Auto Workers and two auto manufacturers were called uncertain here as local negotiators intensified their efforts to come to terms with Ford Motor Co. and General Motors Corp.

UAW Ford Dept. Dir. Ken Bannon visited Ford locals in Buffalo, Cleveland and Chicago before reporting to union Pres. Walter P. Reuther and other UAW officers at a Nov. 5 meeting for a decision on union policy toward Ford.

GM workers who struck Sept. 25 have returned to work at plants where local agreements have been reached—all but about four. Ford workers stayed on the job, but some 12 locals have not to come to terms on local issues and may vote to strike.

The national pacts won by the UAW provide substantial gains for 575,000 workers at Ford, GM, Chrysler Corp. and American Motors Corp. These include major improvements in wages, pensions and working conditions.

New Leaflet Explains Welfare Plan Bonding

A detailed explanation of regulations on bonding protection for employe welfare and pension plans under the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act has been made available by the Labor Dept. in a new booklet aimed at aiding administrators of such programs.

Titled "Fidelity Bonding," it provides the answers to most of the questions asked of the department in letters and at public meetings. Copies of the 43-page booklet may be obtained without cost from local representatives of the Office of Labor-Management & Welfare-Pension Reports or by writing that office in the Labor Dept., Washington, D. C. 20210.

GLANCE OF VICTORY was exchanged by Sen. Humphrey and Mrs. Humphrey (right) as the Democratic majority grew. Between them in the Vice President-elect's Minneapolis headquarters on election night is Mrs. Hubert Humphrey III.

Salinger Loses to Murphy:

Johnson Sweeps West Coast, Democrats Gain House Seats

The five-state Pacific Coast empire and its close-by southwestern states joined the country in producing a Democratic sweep for the ticket headed by Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey with only a few significant variations.

Sen. Barry M. Goldwater of Arizona managed to win the five Electoral College votes of his home state by a thin margin while all others—California, Oregon, Washington, Hawaii, Alaska and Nevada—went heavily for Johnson-Humphrey, adding 65 electoral votes to the tremendous Democratic total.

Sen. Pierre Salinger, former White House press secretary appointed to fill a vacancy after winning the Democratic nomination last June, lost by about 170,000 votes to George Murphy, former actor, who waged a tactically faultless campaign. Murphy was considered to have gained an advantage by remaining silent about a state referendum outlawing fair housing laws, which Salinger openly opposed.

Sen. Hiram Fong (R) won a second six-year term by defeating Rep. Thomas P. Gill (D) in Hawaii despite an overwhelming vote for Johnson and Humphrey. Gill's House district remained Democratic when it was won by Mrs. Patsy Mink.

In the only two states electing governors this year—Arizona and Washington—the parties swapped victories.

Incumbent Democrat Albert D. Rosellini was beaten in his try for a third successive term in Washington, losing to Republican Daniel J. Evans, GOP leader in the state House of Representatives, despite a smashing Johnson plurality and heavy losses suffered by Republican House members.

Goldwater Aide Beaten

In Arizona, however, Democrat Sam Goddard, who lost narrowly to Republican Paul J. Fannin two years ago, upset a former field director of the Goldwater pre-convention forces, Richard Kleindienst. Fannin ran for Goldwater's abandoned Senate seat and won it from Roy L. Elson, former administrative assistant to the state's veteran Democratic Sen. Carl Hayden.

Goddard's victory was considered especially significant in establishing Democratic control of the state government in Goldwater's home state.

In Washington, Sen. Henry W. Jackson was overwhelmingly re-elected and Democrats took four House seats from Republicans—giving the party a 5-to-2 margin in the state. New Democratic victors were: Lloyd Meeks, 2nd District; Thomas S. Foley, 5th; Floyd V. Hicks, 6th; Brookman Adams, 7th. Republican incumbents beaten were Jack Westland, Walt Horan, Thor Tollefson and William Stinson.

In California, Democrat John V. Tunney defeated GOP incumbent Rep. Patrick Minor Martin in the 38th District but Edwin Reinecke, Republican, beat incumbent Rep. Tom Bane in the 27th.

Sen. Howard Cannon held a slim lead in Nevada over Republican Paul Laxalt. In Oregon, where there were no statewide races, three incumbent Democrats were re-elected to the House. Wendell Wyatt won for the GOP in the district held by the late Rep. Walter Norblad, also a Republican.

Left uncertain, in late returns, was the race in Alaska of Republican Lowell Thomas, Jr., against Democratic Rep. Ralph J. Rivers.

Rocky Mountain States Give LBJ Clean Sweep

Denver, Colo.—The Rocky Mountain states redeemed themselves from their pre-San Francisco Birchite reputation by going solidly for Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey in Tuesday's election.

In New Mexico, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Montana and Idaho, all 25 electoral votes went by sizable margins to LBJ, in sharp contrast to Nixon's sweep of the region in 1960 and to the generally conservative results of the 1962 congressional and gubernatorial races.

Sweep in Senate Tilts

In the Senate contests, all four seats went to the Democrats. Frank Moss in Utah, Gale McGee in Wyoming, and Majority Leader Mike Mansfield in Montana all were handsomely re-elected, and in New Mexico Joe Montoya moved up from the House easily for a net gain of one seat.

In addition the region gave the Democrats a firm nine out of 13 House seats for a net gain of three. In a major upset, the Wyoming at-large seat went to Democrat Teno Roncalio, who defeated incumbent Republican William Henry Harrison, the son and grandson of former presidents.

One of Idaho's two Democratic seats fell to a Republican as two-term incumbent Ralph Harding trailed George Hansen by a narrow margin. Utah Democrats gained a seat with David King returning to Congress from the 2nd District. Both New Mexico seats remained Democratic and Montana's split delegation remained unchanged.

Two of the three gubernatorial races went to the Democrats. Jack Campbell was re-elected by a substantial margin in New Mexico, and Calvin Rampton recaptured the state house after 16 years in Utah. In the Montana gubernatorial race, incumbent Gov. Tim Babcock, a Goldwater supporter, eked out a narrow victory over Democrat Roland Renne.

Colorado provided the real congressional upset with four out of four seats going Democratic, including the 3rd District where freshman state legislator Frank Evans trounced 22-year incumbent Edgar Chenoweth. Redistricting by a GOP legislature failed in its intent of ousting House Interior Committee Chairman Wayne Aspinall of the 4th District, who swept to a 2-to-1 victory.

In the new Denver-suburban district, State Sen. Roy McVicker defeated one-term Republican Don Brotzman, a strong vote-getter in the past, successfully linking him to Goldwater's candidacy.

Utah's surprise was the strong race by Moss, who won his second term and led Johnson by a 10,000-vote margin.

State legislative results were inconclusive in early returns, but strong Democratic upturns showed in several of the states. Right-to-work advocates appeared to have made some gains in New Mexico, however.

Labor, Liberals Hold Margin in California

Los Angeles—Pres. Johnson's lopsided victory included California, the most populous state in the nation, and put the state in the Democratic column for the first time since 1948.

But the sweep was not complete for labor and liberals, although on balance most observers agree California is in the liberal category despite a large contingent of extreme right-wing, vocal activists.

On the positive side was the whopping Johnson victory, with labor-liberal Democrats maintaining their margin in both Congress and the state legislature.

This was balanced against the defeat of Sen. Pierre Salinger by GOP Actor George Murphy.

Also on the loss side was the vain labor-liberal fight to prevent amendments to the state constitution which ban state anti-discrimination laws in housing and repeal California's full-crew laws for railroads.

There will be little change in the makeup of California's congressional delegation of 23 Democrats and 15 Republicans.

The impact of the election on California Republicans was less disastrous than it was nationally, with extreme right groups clinging to their role as leaders of the GOP here.

The effect on California Democrats was still unclear but Democratic Gov. Edmund Brown has probably improved his position because he, like organized labor, had been closely identified with Johnson in the campaign. His rivalry with Salinger in the Democratic primary was well known, but the governor and labor gave strong support to the former White House press secretary after the primary.

The Murphy-Salinger race must be viewed with these key facts in mind:

- Although, labor, Brown and Salinger's primary opponent, Alan Cranston, supported him strongly in the general election, it was conceded that the wounds of the primary battle were not healed completely, and this hurt the Democratic candidate.
- Murphy, regarded by the labor movement as, if anything, more conservative than Goldwater, nevertheless managed to avoid the effects of the Johnson landslide by refusing to endorse or work for Goldwater. Thus, many Californians regarded Murphy as a moderate Republican and Salinger as an "outsider," since he had been a resident of Virginia as presidential news secretary until he came back home to run for the Senate.
- Murphy refused to take a stand on the controversial measure to prevent anti-discrimination housing laws, while Salinger denounced the measure as contrary to all principles of civil rights.

Union observers agree Salinger's stand on the issue was morally correct, but that because of the confusion on the measure, Murphy gained politically.

The ballot measure, known as Proposition 14, may mean only a temporary victory for the real estate lobby, however, because California's Supreme Court has already indicated doubts about its constitutionality. An appeal to the courts has been started in an effort to remove the new constitutional provision.

The issue is also important nationally. A group calling itself the Association for the Protection of American Rights announced it will sponsor a "Freedom Amendment" to the U.S. Constitution modeled after the new California constitutional provision. Proponents of the measure freely concede they mean "freedom to discriminate" against members of minority groups when they seek such legislation.

Ticket-Splitting Plains States Go for Johnson

Pres. Johnson has swept the four Great Plains states—the Dakotas, Nebraska and Kansas—for the first Democratic victory there since FDR in 1936.

The wheat and cattle region produced one other surprise: Democratic challengers cracked the 12-0 House seat monopoly of the Republicans by winning 2 seats.

Generally, the voting patterns indicated some ticket-splitting though GOP strength held strong.

Of four governors' chairs being contested, evenly split between the parties, each party retained its two seats. With two Senate seats up, both the Republican and Democratic incumbents won re-election.

This is how the contests turned out in each state:

North Dakota—Democratic Gov. William L. Guy, with two two-year terms behind him, won the new four-year term over State Rep. Donald M. Halcrow.

Sen. Quentin Burdick, who became the state's first Democratic senator in a special election two years ago, won a full term in a close victory over Tom Kleppe.

An upset was scored in the big western district, with State Sen. Rolland Redlin ousting veteran Republican Rep. Don Short. The state's other House seat, in the eastern district, was retained by Rep. Mark Andrews (R) as he won over George Sinner.

South Dakota — Republican Lt. Gov. Nils A. Boe won the governor's chair vacated by the retired Gov. Archie Gubbrud, beating former Lt. Gov. John F. Lindley (D), and the GOP held its two House seats.

Nebraska — This Republican state, which went bigger than any other for Nixon in 1960, held out late into election night before moving into the Johnson column.

Democratic Gov. Frank B. Morrison, who usually wins Republican votes, was an easy third-term victor over 72-year-old Lt. Gov. Dwight W. Burney. Sen. Roman L. Hruska (R) had no difficulty in winning over Raymond W. Arndt.

A major House upset occurred in Lincoln's 1st District, with Clair Callan (D) beating arch-conservative Republican Rep. Ralph Beermann.

Republicans held the state's other two House seats. Rep. Glenn Cunningham won re-election, staving off a strong challenge from Richard Swenson. In the huge outstate district, Rep. David Martin held on in a close contest with Democrat William Colwell.

Kansas—Rep. William H. Avery (R) moved up from his House seat to win the governorship vacated by Republican John Anderson, beating Democrat Harry Wiles.

In the House races, Democrats failed to crack the GOP monopoly.

The two Democrats given the best chance to take GOP seats fell short. In the fight for Avery's seat, Chester L. Mize (R) bested John D. Montgomery. In the southeast Joe Skubitz (R) won a second term by beating off Reb Russell (D).

In the 58-county western district, conservative Republican Rep. Bob Dole won as he held off a strong challenge from William Bork. Rep. Robert Ellsworth (R) won handily over A. Clayton Dial and Rep. Garner E. Shriver (R) defeated former State Rep. Jack Glaves.

A. T. Hare Named To BSEIU Post

Arthur T. Hare has been elected 6th vice president of the Building Service Employes to fill an office vacated by the death of Thomas Kelly. Hare was president of BSEIU Local 6 in Seattle, Wash., and headed the union's Western Conference since 1948.

The union said Kelly's post as secretary-treasurer of BSEIU Local 250 in San Francisco has been taken by Timothy Twomey, local president. Elected to the latter position was Ed Collins, Local 250 business representative.

LBJ Takes All 6 States:

New England Sweep Sets Historic Mark

By John M. Barry

Pres. Johnson scored a smashing triumph in New England as he became the first Democratic presidential candidate in history to sweep all six states with their 37 electoral votes, capturing nearly 70 percent of the popular vote in the process.

The President's margins over his Republican challenger, Sen. Barry Goldwater, ranged from 3-2 in New Hampshire to more than 4-1 in Rhode Island. He took Vermont, a state which never before had given its Electoral College votes to a Democrat, by nearly 2-1.

The heavy pluralities for Johnson helped Democrats to pick up three congressional seats in the region and retain control of governorships in New Hampshire and Vermont. The party lost its hold on the Massachusetts State House, however.

A state-by-state rundown:

Connecticut—With Johnson winning all but 11 of the state's 169 towns and cities, Sen. Thomas J. Dodd almost matched the President's margin as he won re-election over Republican John D. Lodge, a former governor and brother of Henry Cabot Lodge.

The state will send an all-Democratic six-member delegation to the House, following defeat of the lone Republican, Rep. Abner W. Sibal, in the Johnson-Humphrey tidal wave. Sibal's successor in the 4th District is former Rep. Donald Jay Irwin, who had strong labor backing.

Maine — Democratic Sen. Edmund S. Muskie easily won a second term over conservative Rep. Clifford G. McIntire, and a liberal COPE-supported Democrat, State Party Chairman William D. Hathaway, captured McIntire's old seat over a militant Goldwater supporter.

Tupper Wins in Maine

Rep. Stanley R. Tupper, first Maine Republican to win the backing of the state COPE, won a new term after divorcing himself from the top of the GOP ticket.

Massachusetts — Splitting their ballots over local issues, Bay State voters gave Johnson a plurality of 1.1 million but rejected the bid of Democratic Lt. Gov. Francis X. Bellotti for the governorship in a tight race with former Gov. John A. Volpe. Bellotti had won a primary victory over the incumbent governor, Endicott Peabody.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, youngest brother of the late President, swamped his Republican rival to win re-election while still hospitalized from injuries suffered in an airplane crash last June. The state's lineup of seven Democratic and five GOP House members remained unchanged.

New Hampshire—Gov. John W. King, who in 1962 became the first Democratic governor in 40 years, matched Johnson's margin as he won a second term. The Democrats also scored an upset in ousting one of the state's two GOP congressmen. Former Laconia Mayor J. Oliva Huot defeated Rep. Louis C. Wyman, an ultra-right-winger, in the 1st District.

Rhode Island—Republican Gov. John H. Chafee scored a surprising triumph for a second term, surviving the Democratic tide that gave huge victories to Johnson and Sen. John O. Pastore and returned incumbent House members John E. Fogarty and Fernand St. Germain.

Vermont—Philip H. Hoff, first Democratic governor in more than 100 years, was re-elected by the same 2-1 margin Johnson scored. But the Democratic shift did not extend to other key races as Sen. Winston L. Prouty and Rep. Robert T. Stafford kept their seats in the Republican column.

Illinois Gives Huge Margin To Johnson

Chicago—The clink of the levers on the voting machines tolled a requiem to Sen. Barry Goldwater's hopes to claim the "Land of Lincoln" as Pres. Johnson topped the 847,000-vote margin of former Pres. Eisenhower in 1956.

Johnson carried 73 of the state's 102 counties, capturing 71 percent of the vote in heavily Democratic Chicago. He trailed Goldwater by 3 percentage points in the suburbs, but nailed down more than 54 percent of the ballots in usually Republican downstate areas.

Labor Helps Kerner

The avalanche of votes for Johnson plus a groundswell of labor activity at the precinct level brought victory for incumbent Democratic Gov. Otto Kerner by more than 210,000 votes. The landslide buried any 1968 presidential aspirations of Charles Percy, an Eisenhower protege whose heavily financed campaign was damaged by his on-again, off-again relationship with the Goldwater-Miller ticket.

The Johnson-Humphrey sweep switched the state's congressional delegation from a 12-12 standoff to a 13-11 edge for the Democrats. The supposedly "safe" 19th district, centering on the heavily industrialized Rock Island-Moline area, elected Gale Schisler, a political novice on leave from his job as principal of a small town high school, over Republican Rep. Robert McLoskey.

In Chicago, the Democrats easily held on to their nine seats, returning six incumbents and seating three newcomers. Sidney R. Yates, 9th District representative from 1948 to 1962, was returned to the House. He was defeated in his race for the Senate against Minority Leader Everett Dirksen in 1962.

LBJ Paces Democrats to Victory In GOP's Midwest Heartland

The historic midwestern strongholds of Republicanism toppled like dominoes as Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson won an overwhelming triumph in the eight-state area running from the Appalachian Mountains to the tier of states just west of the Mississippi River.

Johnson picked up 129 Electoral College votes—nearly half of the 270 he needed for a bare majority—in this upper central region that used to be the GOP's historic heartland, the party's foundation of strength when the Republican leader was the late Sen. Robert A. Taft.

The Johnson vote margins over his Republican challenger, Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona, ranged from nearly a million to more than a million in the huge industrial and agricultural states of Ohio, Illinois and Michigan, and the Democratic tide elected or re-elected governors, senators and members of the House.

The only real Republican victor in the region was Michigan's Gov. George W. Romney, who repudiated Goldwater publicly at the annual Governors' Conference last June, tried to force modifications of the GOP platform at San Francisco in July, and then ran an independent race, refusing to push for the national ticket. Bucking an almost unbelievable Johnson indicated plurality of 1.2 million, Romney managed to win re-election over Democratic Rep. Neil Staebler by about 350,000.

The Johnson sweep helped re-elect incumbent Democratic Senators Philip A. Hart in Michigan, Vance Hartke in Indiana, William Proxmire in Wisconsin, Eugene J. McCarthy in Minnesota, Stuart Symington in Missouri.

It helped Democrats knock Republicans out of 17 of the 66 House seats they previously held in the eight-state area, leaving Democrats with a bulge of 64 to 49 for the region instead of the 47-to-66 deficit with which they entered the Nov. 3 balloting.

Gov. Harold E. Hughes, a strong candidate in his own right, was re-elected in Iowa over State Atty. Gen. Evan Hultman, and Indiana Democrat Roger D. Branigin defeated Richard O. Ristine to succeed incumbent Democratic Gov. Matthew Welch, who was ineligible to seek a second consecutive term.

The Johnson sweep in Ohio was so massive—Vice Pres. Nixon won the state in 1960 by about 273,000 votes but the Johnson-Humphrey ticket triumphed this year by more than a million—that it may have helped re-elect incumbent Democratic Sen. Stephen M. Young over the hard challenge of Rep. Robert Taft, Jr., son of the late senator.

Taft, who at one time was heavily favored, trailed Young by about 13,000 votes with almost all the unofficial tally counted, and withdrew an earlier "victory" statement, saying he would wait for the official tabulation.

Sweeney Beats Bolton

Rep. Oliver Bolton, who gave up his 11th District seat to run for Taft's place as representative at large, went down to defeat before Democrat Robert E. Sweeney of Cleveland, and the GOP also lost 3 other House seats to the surging Democrats.

Only in Wisconsin was the Johnson victory not sufficiently large to save an incumbent Democrat running for statewide office. Republican Lieut. Gov. Warren P. Knowles won by a narrow but decisive margin over incumbent Gov. John Reynolds, who was beset with the familiar local tax, school and highway problems that have made governors of both parties highly vulnerable in recent elections.

The "sleeper" state was Iowa, where the tide led by Johnson and Gov. Hughes defeated five of the state's six Republican House members, but Democrats also picked up four seats in Michigan, one net in Wisconsin (redistricting had abolished a Democratic district), one in Illinois, and two in Indiana as well as four in Ohio.

Ranking Democrat elected to Wisconsin state office was 28-year-old Bronson La Follette, who defeated incumbent Atty. Gen. George Thompson.

2 Legislatures Won

Democrats won the state legislatures in Michigan and Indiana, picked up strength in other state legislatures, swept the boards in some cases for statewide office.

Elected are the following new Democratic House members in areas previously held by Republicans:

Illinois—Gale Schisler, 19th District.

Indiana—Leo H. Hamilton, 9th; Andrew Jacobs, Jr., 11th.

Iowa—John R. Schmidhauser, 1st; John C. Culver, 2nd; Bert Bandstra, 4th; Stanley L. Greigg, 6th; John R. Hansen, 7th.

Michigan—Weston E. Vivian, 2nd; Paul H. Todd, 3rd; Raymond F. Clevenger, 11th. In addition, John C. Mackie won in a newly created 7th District.

Ohio—John L. Gilligan, 1st; Rodney M. Love, 3rd; Walter H. Moeller, 10th; Robert E. Sweeney, at large.

Wisconsin—Lynn E. Stalbaum, 1st; John A. Race, 6th, former GOP Rep. Glenn Davis returned, replacing a retired Democrat.

union movement, which worked for you with enthusiasm and determination, is proud that it placed its trust in you." He continued:

"We now look forward to working with you on the legislative front in carrying out the high purpose you have eloquently enunciated—in seeking to achieve the Great Society which the American people so resoundingly endorsed at the polls."

In his wire to Humphrey, he declared "we are delighted that the American people as a whole share the boundless confidence we have had in you since the beginning of your career in the Senate."

Meany's statement stressed that the major emphasis of the federation's Committee on Political Education (COPE) is on registration and get-out-the-vote drives.

"We have never doubted," he said, "that America would continue on the progressive road if only American voters came out in sufficient numbers. Obviously our confidence was justified."

Of the future, Meany noted the programs set forth by the President and Humphrey during the campaign, declaring "these are the goals labor has long sought. The people have given their overwhelming mandate to the Great Society. That mandate can and must be fulfilled."

Nation Rallies to Johnson, Humphrey; Landslide Sweeps Aside Extremist Bid

Democratic Victory Recalls New Deal

politician" on the "wonderful job" he had done in putting together his majority, but claimed in a press conference that what he called his own "conservative cause" had suffered no "hurt."

The Republican Party, he declared, must "cling to and strengthen [the] philosophy I represent." The moderate-to-liberal traditional Republicans who had found themselves unable to support him wholeheartedly, he said, were not the kind of leaders "we can build a Republican Party on" because "their concepts, in my opinion, have no difference at all with Democratic concepts."

Dean Burch, installed as Goldwater chairman of the Republican National Committee, issued a statement praising the senator for putting his defeat into "proper perspective" and declaring that election results were "encouraging in several respects."

Rep. William E. Miller, Goldwater's running-mate, abrasively rejected the beginning chorus of moderate-to-liberal Republicans demanding Burch's ouster and a reshaping of party machinery to represent its true range of opinion.

To most political observers, the scope, range and depth of the Johnson-Humphrey victory made the Goldwater-Burch-Miller reaction—an apparent pretence that nothing serious had happened—almost as nightmarishly unrealistic as the nature of the campaign that had ended in the party's disaster.

The Johnson-Humphrey triumph was almost total. Thanks to the electronic computers now brought to a peak of useful analysis of voting trends, it was possible to discover that all conceivable classes and groupings of Americans—by age or by economic rating, by residential area or ethnic derivation, by race or religion—participated heavily in the repudiation of Goldwater's "choice not an echo" and voted a mandate to the President and the new Vice President-elect.

Labor's forces carried out a register-and-vote campaign of unprecedented scope. Negro citizens, registered in record-breaking numbers, voted overwhelmingly against the senator who had denounced the civil rights bill as unconstitutional and unenforceable except by a "police state." So did a large majority of the white majority.

Goldwater fought on the defensive against issues that worked heavily against him, claiming repeatedly that he had been "for" social security, that he was a "peacemonger." But he had voted against the test-ban treaty, he had voted against expansion of the social security system to meet broader needs, he had given the impression to many voters of "hip-shooting" and reckless phrases.

City Majorities Up

The great cities rolled out, with few exceptions, greater Democratic majorities than they had given in 1960; the percentage of the Democratic vote climbed among high-income and upper middle-class suburban dwellers as well as among union and non-union workers; it climbed among farmers and homemaking women and climbed in the small-town rural areas.

The presumed "backlash" to the civil rights issue, vigorously exploited by Republicans in their code-term references to "violence in the streets," simply dissolved into nothingness—not on a state level, necessarily, but emphatically in the election of national leaders and members of Congress.

New England went solidly for the Democratic ticket. The Mid-Atlantic States, the Midwest, the Plains States, the Mountain States, the Pacific Coast states, even the South and Border States, gave huge majorities to Johnson and Humphrey.

The Democratic presidential margin was an indicated total of more than 42 million votes to fewer than 26 million for Goldwater and Miller, an indicated division approaching 61.5 percent.

The victory was more decisive than either of former Pres. Eisenhower's, than Roosevelt's in 1932, 1940 or 1944.

Nixon Did Better

Even in the section where Goldwater won five of his skimpy bag of six states—the South and Border States—he did less well than former Vice Pres. Richard M. Nixon in 1960, when a religious issue was added to bitter-end resistance to civil rights advances.

The hard-fought, exceedingly narrow election of 1960 was almost a sweep for Nixon west of Mississippi River. But after four years of the Kennedy-Johnson program, Goldwater assailing that program managed to turn the western regions into a Republican total disaster area, salvaging only his home state of Arizona by a thin majority.

The Big Seven industrial states—those with 21 or more Electoral College votes—all went for Johnson-Humphrey. So did seven of the eight next most populous states, those with 12 to 17 Electoral College votes.

All the midwestern Upper Central states, all the Mountain states, all the Pacific Coast states were won by the Democratic leaders.

Goldwater won the Republican nomination in California last June 2 by capturing the GOP primary against New York's Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller by fewer than 60,000 votes from more than 2 million cast. He was drowned on Nov. 3 when California gave Johnson and Humphrey a majority that might be as high, in final figures, as 1.3 million out of more than 6.7 million ballots.

The "southern strategy" that was the key to Goldwater's entire campaign—both in the pre-convention period and in the election itself—collapsed into wreckage. It was argued, and accurately, by the hot-eyed zealots who master-minded the campaign to win the nomination for the senator that they could build on some 260 southern delegates, add the Rocky Mountain small states, add California and a few traditional midwestern states, and dominate the convention.

These planners—Peter O'Donnell of Texas, Jean Tool of Colorado, Burch himself, John E. Grenier of Georgia among them—also mapped a drive to duplicate this coup to capture the Electoral College. But everything came unhinged. Only five of the 13 southern and border states could they win; Kentucky, Oklahoma, and six states of the Old Confederacy voted for Johnson and Humphrey; everything else they dreamed of voted for Johnson and Humphrey except Arizona.

Victories Won by 60 to 80 Percent Of Candidates Endorsed by Labor

Candidates endorsed by organized labor won from 60 to 80 percent of the Senate, gubernatorial and House races in the Nov. 3 election.

The highest percentage of victories for labor-supported candidates was scored in the Senate contests, where 25 of 31, or 80 percent, of the aspirants backed by unions won election or were leading in close races.

In the gubernatorial contests 14 of 22 candidates carrying labor endorsements were victorious for a 63.6 percent result.

In the U.S. House of Representatives labor endorsed 350 candidates and 233, or 66.5 percent, were elected or leading as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Endorsements by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE) are made at the state and congressional district level except for the presidential race, where endorsement of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket was made by the AFL-CIO Executive Council and the General Board.

In a few races candidates carrying support of unaffiliated unions, such as the Mine Workers, or the backing of groups of AFL-CIO unions, such as the rail unions, were elected although not endorsed by state or congressional COPE organizations. In only a handful of the Senate, House and gubernatorial elections did labor organizations differ on formal endorsements.

Endorsements by unions are based primarily on the records or espoused programs of the candidates in terms of a wide number of economic, welfare and labor issues, as well as foreign policy and civil rights.

There were some 116 House seats where labor did not formally support either candidate and four Senate and three gubernatorial contests where there was no endorsement.

The 1964 results showed a continuing improvement in the success of labor endorsed-candidates over the past four years. In the 1960 House elections, labor-backed nominees scored about 55 percent; in 1962 the figure moved up to 60 percent; and last Tuesday the results approximated 67 percent.

Sanchez Wins By Landslide In Puerto Rico

San Juan, P.R.—Roberto Sanchez Vilella has been elected governor of Puerto Rico succeeding Gov. Luis Munoz Marin, who did not choose to run for a fifth term.

Sanchez was the candidate of the Popular Democratic Party, which Munoz founded 26 years ago. The party won the right to name its choice for residential commissioner in Washington, D. C., and also elected mayors of all towns except this one, where the municipal council selects the mayor. The island has 76 towns.

The final vote for governor was: Popular Democrats 479,479; Statehood Republicans 277,182; Christian Action Party 25,095; Independence Party 21,905; others 1,364.

Munoz was Puerto Rico's first elected governor. Sanchez has been a close associate for nearly 20 years.

Liberal Tide Sweeps States, Reverses Four-Year Trend

3 Union Groups Unite:

Japanese Merger Hailed by Meany

Tokyo—The new Japanese Confederation of Labor was welcomed into the family of national labor centers by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who told the founding convention here that its formation marks "a milestone on the road of free world labor progress."

"Viewed in the light of the tense world situation," he said, "it is most urgent for the Japanese workers to build a united and democratic strong trade union movement—a movement dedicated solely to promoting social justice, freedom and peace."

3-Way Merger

The JCL was formed by merger of three central bodies, Zenro, Sodomei and Zenkanko, will represent more than 1.5 million members, and will affiliate with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Meany headed an AFL-CIO delegation to its founding convention that included Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks, and George Harrison, chief executive of the Railway Clerks, all AFL-CIO vice presidents, and Intl. Affairs Dir. Jay Lovestone.

Meany in his speech outlined the role of the free trade union in a troubled world and briefly discussed what the AFL-CIO is attempting to do in the United States.

"Whether mankind will live in peace, prosperity and freedom depends largely on the will, determination and capacity of free world labor to help defend and extend freedom and social justice," he declared, "and to pursue a practical and realistic rather than an impractical and bombastic policy in its striving for peace.

"No one can exaggerate the importance of the trade union movement in modern society. Democracy cannot live anywhere without an effective free and democratic trade union movement. At the same time, we emphasize that there can be no

3rd Dispute Clouds Rail Bargaining

A contract dispute over a new Presidential Emergency Board recommendation that 30,000 rail firemen and enginemen are entitled to a wage increase has added to the uncertain railroad bargaining situation, which already has involved 400,000 off-train workers.

Board No. 164 unanimously recommended to Pres. Johnson that 160 major U.S. railroads negotiate contracts with the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen raising wages by 18 cents an hour over a two-year period for firemen and hostlers, retroactive to Jan. 15, 1964, and by $1.75 a day for engineers represented by the union—the latter to match a raise given last June to the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

The recommendation brought labor and management back to the bargaining table for an exchange of proposals based on the board report. The parties have 30 days to reach agreement, but after that they may strike or impose a lockout.

Also in Washington, 11 unions representing 400,000 non-operating railmen continue their efforts to win agreement from management

15.5 Million Votes:

Record LBJ Margin Spurs Party Gains

By Willard Shelton

Nearly complete returns from the Nov. 3 election give Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson a popular vote margin of 15.5 million, the highest in history. The President's stunning triumph helped the Democratic Party to win a net increase of 38 House members and two senators and to upset Republican control of several state legislatures.

The President's margin was produced in a total vote of more than 69 million Americans. Although that figure set a new record, it was only slightly above the 68.8 million who voted in 1960 and fell substantially below the 72 million who would have voted had the 63.1 percent of 1960 been equaled.

Only two House seats and one Senate seat remained undecided a week after the election—the Senate contest between incumbent Sen. Howard W. Cannon (D) and Paul Laxalt in Nevada, the House contests between Rep. Ralph J. Rivers (D) and Lowell Thomas, Jr., in Alaska and between Rep. Carleton J. King (R) and Joseph J. Martin in New York's 30th District.

Legislative Outlook Brightens

By David L. Perlman

The outlook for liberal legislation at the state level is the brightest in many years as Democrats won majorities in legislatures long controlled by conservative Republicans.

A nationwide Democratic tide was aided by court-ordered reapportionment in several states. It cost Republicans their majorities in both houses of six legislatures and one house in at least seven other states. The lone Republican gain was the pickup of the Oregon lower house.

Pattern Reversed

The victories reverse the trend of the past four years which saw Democratic gains of 1958 whittled away by Republican pickups.

An AFL-CIO News survey found state labor leaders generally optimistic about improvements in unemployment and workmen's compensation laws, enactment of state minimum wage laws or increases in existing laws, better schools and other labor goals. In Indiana, Democrats pledged to repeal of "right-to-work" won both houses of the legislature for the first time since 1936 and elected a governor.

A court-written reapportionment helped the Democrats win control of both houses of the Michigan legislature for the first time since 1932. And new seats added by reappor-

Meany Foundation Slates TV Drama

The third annual television drama produced under the auspices of the George Meany Foundation will be broadcast over the NBC-TV network at 1:30 p.m. (EST) Sunday, Dec. 13, it was announced by Joseph D. Keenan, treasurer of the foundation and an AFL-CIO vice president.

This year's play, "Ballad of Isaac and Jacob," is built around the issue of automation, particularly in terms of its impact on the concept of work as a social good.

The George Meany Foundation is an arm of the Herbert H. Lehman Institute. Its annual TV programs are incorporated into the Eternal Light series, presented weekly by NBC and the Jewish Theological Seminary.

Labor Counts Both Gains, Losses In 'Mixed Bag' of Ballot Questions

Voters picked and chose among scores of referenda issues on state election ballots and the result was a mixed bag of advances and setbacks for labor's position.

On the plus side, South Dakota voters repealed a Republican-sponsored law which reduced unemployment benefits for many workers. Arkansas adopted a permanent registration system, New Hampshire approved a reapportionment plan, and a number of states approved labor-supported bond issues for schools, roads and recreation facilities.

A major setback was repeal by three states of full crew laws, which railroad unions say are needed to assure safe operation. Repealer votes in Arizona, California and North Dakota were ascribed by rail unions to "fall-out" from the continued "featherbed" propaganda of the railroads and heavy spending for "saturation" advertising. The results are expected to bring renewed campaigns against similar laws in 12 other states.

Maryland's approval of a statewide public accommodations law was overshadowed by California's constitutional amendment barring laws prohibiting discrimination in sale or rental of housing.

Oregon labor saw the initiative it had petitioned on the ballot go

Memphis, Tenn.—Reports that 1964 has been a boom year for musical instrument makers preceded adoption here of an intensified organizing and collective bargaining program at the fourth annual conference of POMI—the National Piano Organ & Musical Instruments Council.

Delegates from 22 local unions, meeting at the Hotel Peabody, voted to step up efforts to organize the "open shop" plants remaining in the industry.

They voted also to continue the close working relationship that has led to more effective collective bargaining and greater benefits for organized workers in the industry.

The conferees discussed methods of protecting union workers against the threat of plants that "run away" to low-wage areas, and agreed to resist any layoffs that may result from the industry's use of imported piano actions and other non-union parts.

This report was made on industry conditions:

- Americans now own more than 40 million musical instruments as against 23 million in 1950.
- Amateur music-making is skyrocketing, and so is industry income. Sales of instruments, sheet music and musical accessories during 1963 surpassed the combined dollar value of all spectator sports, cameras, comic books and playing cards.
- Music by non-professionals was second only to reading among the public's leisure-time activities.
- Retail sales of all music products were 7.3 percent higher in 1963 than in 1962. Dollar volume of $680 million may rise to $700 million this year.

Piano Sales Jump

The conference heard reports that more pianos have been sold in the last five years than in any similar period since the 1920s and that piano manufacturers predict sales of 250,000 units for 1964, an increase of 10-15 percent.

Sales in the organ and fretted instrument industry continue to rise, with guitar sales at $40 million in 1962 and 1963 sales up 40 percent. It was reported band instrument makers predict a rise of 19 percent in sales this year, the conference learned.

The delegates also reported that expansion, mergers, and diversification continue to trouble the industry. The trend of larger firms to buy out family-owned plants is a continuing problem, as is the establishment and relocation of highly-automated plants in unorganized low-wage areas.

Excise Tax Repeal Urged

Dir. Fred Fulford reported that the council has asked to testify before the House Ways & Means Committee to urge repeal of the 10 percent excise tax on musical instruments and, to achieve the goal, is cooperating with the national AFL-CIO, the Musicians, and industry groups.

Fulford, who is secretary-treasurer of the Furniture Workers, said his union has launched an organizing campaign among 1,000 workers at four Chicago area plants of the Hammond Organ Co.

The delegates studied a detailed analysis of 31 union agreements and reported on negotiations. Speakers included Fulford, Chairman James Cerofeci, who is president of UFWA Local 102 in Long Island City, N. Y.; UFWA Vice Pres. Carl Scarbrough of the host Local 282, and Don Daugherty of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

The conference re-elected Fulford, Cerofeci and Sec. Bernard Griffeth of Machinists Local 1553, Rockford, Ill. Also elected were Vice Chairman Paul Monachino of the unaffiliated Piano Workers, East Rochester, N. Y., and six board members.

Delegates were present also from locals of the Carpenters, Rubber Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Auto Workers, Steelworkers, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Federal Local 21108, Hagerstown, Md.

'Don't Buy' Ban Helps to Settle 3-Month Strike

Cleveland, O.—Successful settlement of a three-month strike against the Auer Register Co. here has been announced by the Furniture Workers.

UFWA Local 450 ended its walkout with a new three-year agreement protecting wages and working conditions achieved during 22 years of formerly harmonious relations and uninterrupted production.

The union also ended a nationwide "don't buy" campaign against Auer products. Largely contributing to the outcome, it said, was the "consumer education" program of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., all-out support by the Cleveland AFL-CIO and many other union bodies, and the courage of the workers themselves.

The new agreement, besides preserving wage and other gains, also called for dismissal of all workers hired since the start of the strike; immediate reinstatement of all strikers with full seniority and other rights; withdrawal of all charges against the union and its members by the management.

The walkout resulted, the union said, from an ultimatum by new Auer management that would have frozen the wages of present employes for three years and reduced minimum classification rates by 54 to 81 cents an hour.

Meany Bears Greetings:

Japanese Federation Hailed as Milestone

free trade unions in any country without democracy. . . . Democracy and dictatorship never mix. There is no such thing as a democratic dictatorship or a dictatorial democracy.

"Free trade unions are a vital element in the democratic way of life. As such, they have nothing in common with dictatorships. When free trade unions enter into joint actions with the front organizations set up by the Communists or their fellow-travellers, totalitarian movements are strengthened and the democratic ideal is blurred."

Freedom Basic to Unions

Unless a trade union is free, he asserted, "it cannot protect and advance" its members' interests.

"What is more," he added, "only a truly free trade union can be socially responsible for its membership and loyally serve the nation as a whole. If the trade unions of any country want to remain free, they must guard against falling under the control of any foreign or domestic political party or government. When a union is subverted by Communists or their followers, it cannot be responsible or realistic. It loses its perspective."

The "responsible" union, Meany declared, helps "increase the volume of production" and at the same time insists that the workers "get their rightful share of the wealth they produce." The "task of conquering poverty" he went on, confronts the labor movement of every country, but "even the best" social legislation "can never be a substitute for strong free trade unions" though it "can help much."

Also to be faced head-on by labor bodies—as the AFL-CIO is doing at home—are the problems posed by automation, the struggle to wipe out racial discrimination, and the fight "against the remnants of the old and the menace of the new colonialism, Communist imperialism," he said.

Meany recalled that the friendship between the Japanese and American people "did not begin yesterday." Each country and its labor movement has its own problems and difficulties, he said, but they also face common problems.

"I am sure that close and expanding cooperation between the Japanese and American labor movements," he said "would go a long way towards insuring a relationship between our countries based on mutual confidence, equality and justice."

Reciprocal Trade Backed

At a news conference before his speech, Meany declared the AFL-CIO supports a liberal trade policy and believes in reciprocal trade with free peoples in all parts of the world.

Workers, regardless of their country, have common interests and face common problems, he said, emphasizing the importance of free trade unions joining hands to seek improved working conditions.

The AFL-CIO supported Pres. Johnson in the election campaign "because it believed in what the President stood for," he said, stressing that it is not tied to any political party.

U.S. Ambassador Edwin O. Reischauer entertained the AFL-CIO delegation at a breakfast.

Meany Views Election As Victory for Progress

Honolulu, H. I.—The election results constitute "a victory for those who believe in progress" and a "defeat for those who advocate a return to the 19th Century," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said at a news conference here.

The vote was "much more" than a victory for the Democratic Party and a personal triumph for Pres. Johnson he said, and added:

"I think it's a good thing for the country. I think it's a good thing for the free world."

He said he saw no evidence of any "white backlash" in the Democratic landslide. The "grievances" that developed after enactment of the Civil Rights Act had faded into "local differences" which did not reflect anti-Negro reaction by the time the voters got to the polls, he said.

Meany stopped here en route to Japan for the inaugural congress of the new Japanese Confederation of Labor. Accompanying him were three AFL-CIO vice presidents—Pres. James A. Suffridge of the Retail Clerks, Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers, and George M. Harrison, chief executive of the Railway Clerks—Dir. Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs, Mrs. Meany, Mrs. Suffridge and Virginia Tehas, Meany's secretary.

Met by Governor

They were met at the airport by Gov. John A. Burns, Sen. Daniel Inouye, Rep. Spark M. Matsunaga, all Democrats; AFL-CIO Rep. A. S. Reile and delegations of union officials and members from all parts of the islands. Meany was guest of honor at a luau to which the party was welcomed by Pres. James Dooley and Exec. Sec. Harry Boranian of the Honolulu AFL-CIO.

At his news conference he expressed the hope the tax cut will increase employment and discounted the fears held by some that wage hikes might touch off an inflationary spiral.

"Production is increasing all the time," he pointed out, "and we think that wages should increase, too. By keeping up purchasing power, we can help the employment situation."

He added that a shorter workweek, "in the final analysis, is the only answer to unemployment."

Factory Hiring Sets 5-Year High for Month

The rate of new hiring by U.S. factories in September was at the highest September level since 1959 and the layoff rate was at the lowest level for the month in almost 10 years, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported.

The total factory hiring rate dropped from 51 per 1,000 to 45 in September, a more than seasonal decline, the BLS said in a monthly report. The layoff rate and the quit rate were both at 15 per 1,000.

A MEMORIAL WREATH is placed at Punchbowl National Cemetery in Hawaii by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany on behalf of the Hawaii AFL-CIO during the federation president's stopover in the 50th state en route to the founding convention of the new Japanese Confederation of Labor in Tokyo.

GM Pacts Wrapped Up:

Auto Strikes Seek Industry 'Pattern'

Detroit—The Auto Workers reached contract settlements covering all 350,000 General Motors Corp. employes Nov. 9 but took to the picket lines to win improved terms for another 55,000 members employed at Ford Motor, Mack Trucks, Inc., Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co. and other auto, truck and parts plants.

Local working conditions were the major issues at nine Ford plants with 25,000 workers, but a full range of unsettled contract matters brought strikes on varying deadlines at Mack, Allis-Chalmers, White Motor Co. and among 6,400 skilled trades workers in Detroit tool and die shops.

Two assembly plants in St. Louis and Louisville reached local settlements with the UAW, but seven others stayed out while negotiations continued here with local and national Ford officials.

Dir. Ken Bannon of the union's Ford Dept. said some Ford plants have refused to grant conditions that other plant managements have agreed to. Local agreements have been reached by 69 bargaining units but the union set a strike deadline at 18 unsettled units and later sanctioned strikes at nine.

100,000 Still Working

The union came to terms with Ford on a national contract Sept. 18, but warned then and later that local plant agreements would have to be settled. Ford has 124,000 UAW-represented employes, and some 100,000 remained at work while contract terms were reduced to writing.

The UAW won major contract gains from GM after a national strike ending Oct. 26. But strikes over local issues continued until agreements were reached with the last of 130 GM plants.

Some 6,000 UAW members struck Mack Truck when a contract extension expired and management refused to make an economic offer.

The union wants a new contract based on the industry "pattern" won by the UAW. Issues include working conditions, work rules changes, seniority, and correction of area wage differentials. Mack plants are at Allentown, Pa., Bridgewater, N. J., Hagerstown, Md., and Cortland, N. Y.

At Allis-Chalmers, nearly 11,000 employes struck for contract terms like those won in October from Caterpillar Tractor and other farm implement firms. Plants are at West Allis, Wis., Springfield, Ill., LaPorte, Ind., La Crosse, Wis., and Cedar Rapids, Ia. National negotiations resumed in Milwaukee as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Nearly 4,000 UAW members walked out at White truck plants in Cleveland and Exton, Pa. The old contract, scheduled to expire Sept. 15, had been continued on a day-to-day basis. The union said management has offered to meet the Chrysler contract "pattern" if the union changes incentive pay, seniority and other contract protections of 25 years' standing.

Talks with the Detroit Tooling Association for 6,400 workers in 59 job shops were broken off Nov. 9 and the UAW set up picket lines. Later, Local 155 reached agreement with one non-assocation employer on a 63-cent "package" of wage, pension and fringe benefits, the union said.

JOURNEY'S END in 1964 negotiations is reached by Vice Pres. Louis G. Seaton of General Motors Corp., shown handing signed agreement to Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, right. Union negotiators won major benefits in new national agreement and improved working conditions in local plant pacts. Last of 130 GM plant managements to settle with the UAW was Fisher Body plant in Atlanta, Ga.

Three Disputes Affect 430,000 Rail Workers

on another emergency board proposal. That board, on Oct. 20, proposed a three-year contract with wage raises of 9 cents an hour each year, protection against layoffs, and increased fringe benefits.

Six of the 11 unions represent railroad shopcrafts—the Machinists, Boiler Makers, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, Railway Carmen, and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. They have a separate case involving wages alone, and decided to meet Nov. 16 in Chicago to discuss serving a strike notice and setting a deadline.

Any one of the three disputes could lead to a work interruption, but the unions are still hopeful of a settlement based on the needs of workers for economic benefits in keeping with their railroad prosperity and protection against further job shrinkage.

Chairman G. E. Leighty of the committee representing the 11 off-train unions said railroad jobs have shrunk from 2 million in 1920 to 700,000 now while railroad revenue units have increased by more than 50 percent.

Negotiations are at a critical stage, said Leighty, who is president of the Railroad Telegraphers. Talks could continue right up to a Nov. 19 deadline or even beyond, if an agreement seems within reach, he said. The deadline is 30 days from the date the emergency board made its report to the President on ways to end the dispute short of a strike.

Some of the unions are dissatisfied with the size of the recommended increase, and believe it should be at least 8 cents higher. The employers are reported unhappy with the board's recommendation that workers who lose jobs because of a decline in business are entitled to severance pay or recall to work when conditions permit.

Job Formula

The unions have offered a formula similar to one reached recently with two railroads in the event of their merger, the Pennsylvania and New York Central. The formula provides that jobs may be lopped off when business declines by more than 5 percent, but must be resumed when business picks up.

Board proposals in the non-op dispute were patterned after a recent agreement between managements and six shopcraft unions, but also included expanded job protection provisions.

In the dispute over wages of firemen and enginemen, the railroads contended that firemen on freight and yard diesel locomotives are not entitled to an increase because another panel set up by Congress in 1963 gave the railroads the right to lay off those firemen.

A board headed by Ronald W. Haughton, arbiter, disagreed with the employers, finding that "the right to continue working until retired, discharged for cause or otherwise removed from the working list by 'natural attrition' does not suggest that road freight and yard firemen must gear their standards of living to 1961 wage levels for the rest of their working lives."

The ruling on firemen came in November 1963 as the climax of a five-year dispute over management efforts to eliminate crewmen it said were unneeded. The BLF&E holds that firemen are necessary in every engine cab as helpers and lookouts and points to an increased rate of accidents in 1964.

The long dispute over the firemen held up settlement of other contracts involving many of the 23 rail unions, labor spokesmen said. Each dispute takes a year or more to settle, and meanwhile other reopening notices are served.

Shoe Unions Win Key Pacts In Joint Talks

St. Louis—Almost identical increases of 13.9 cents an hour in wages and other benefits have been won by two unions of shoe workers for 21,600 employes of two leading firms.

New two-year agreements were negotiated by the United Shoe Workers and the Boot & Shoe Workers in joint talks with the Brown Shoe Co. and International Shoe Co.

The Brown pact covers 4,000 USWA members in 15 plants and 4,600 Boot & Shoe Workers in 17 locations. Ratification meetings are being held at union halls in Arkansas, Illinois, Mississippi, Missouri and Tennessee.

The contract with Brown provides 2 percent rate increases on Jan. 1, 1965 and a year later, with an additional 2 percent to be added Jan. 1, 1965, to lower-paid jobs; an increase in retirement benefits to provide a maximum of $52.50 a month; group hospitalization, holiday and piece rate improvements, and 32 non-monetary changes.

At International, the new contract benefits 9,000 USWA members in 27 plants and 4,000 Boot & Shoe members in nine factories, located in Arkansas, Illinois, Kentucky and Missouri. It is subject to membership ratification.

It calls for general wage increases averaging 12 cents an hour, effective last Oct. 1 and extending to Sept. 30, 1966. Also provided are improvements in pension benefits, group insurance, an eighth paid holiday, "spot" wage increases for some workers, and 35 union-sought contract changes.

Utility Strike Dispute Goes To U. S. Court

Ft. Dodge, Ia.—The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has won a legal skirmish with the Iowa Power & Light Co. over the utility company's right to prevent a strike by court injunction.

Judge William C. Hanson of the U.S. District Court here has ruled that his court is the proper forum for an injunction suit brought by the power company against the IBEW and its Local 499.

The suit involves a dispute over the terms of a collective bargaining agreement between the union and the company. Management claimed the IBEW had breached the contract, and got a county court injunction against a strike without giving the union notice or a chance to be heard.

The union declared strike action was lawful because the contract had expired. The Iowa AFL-CIO convention supported its position on Oct. 1. The convention urged enactment of a state law prohibiting such injunctions, and cited the ruling by the Pottawattamie County Court as an example.

Pending action by the Iowa legislature, the IBEW moved to have the suit transferred from county to federal court, and succeeded. The union said the ruling is significant because the Norris-LaGuardia Act restricts federal court power to issue injunctions in labor disputes.

Legislative Program Set By Rhode Island Labor

Providence, R. I.—The Rhode Island AFL-CIO, reporting success in its register-and-vote campaign on behalf of labor-endorsed candidates, will work for establishment of a state consumer council, amendment of the state labor relations act to protect all types of workers, and widened coverage of state and federal minimum wage laws.

Meeting here for the third biennial convention since merger, some 560 delegates from more than 280 unions saluted the late Pres. John F. Kennedy in a memorial tribute and took a series of actions designed to improve state labor effectiveness.

Assistant Labor Sec. Esther Peterson, who gave the Kennedy memorial address at the opening session, said the most fitting tribute to Kennedy was the election of able candidates and the defeat Nov. 3 of the extremist point of view.

The convention re-elected Pres. Thomas F. Policastro and Sec.-Treas. Edwin C. Brown for another two-year term; returned three trustees without opposition, and chose 40 of 43 executive board candidates by secret ballot.

Delegates voted to increase the board from 35 to 40 members to give more representation to smaller unions. They authorized the appointment of a board committee with power to make endorsements of political candidates in future, with the proviso that no committee members may "hold or seek" political office.

The officers reported that prior to the Nov. 3 election, the state labor body distributed more than 350,000 items of political information including voting records, bumper stickers and pamphlets; assigned many members to polling places on election day; added hundreds of new voters to the registration lists, and helped elect a state assembly that would be aware of worker needs.

Convention speakers included Pres. James B. Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Hugh Thompson; Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes; Pres. Salvatore Camelio of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO; and Franz Daniel, New England coordinator for the federation's Industrial Union Dept.

William Ladyman Fills CLC Post

Ottawa, Ont.—William Ladyman of Toronto, a vice president of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers since June 1963, has been appointed a general vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress.

He succeeds the late William Jenoves of Toronto, a vice president of the Bricklayers, who died recently. Born in England, Ladyman came to Canada at the age of 16 and joined IBEW Local 1037 in Winnipeg, Man., in 1932. He held local and district offices until 1948, when he was appointed an international representative.

CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin said action to fill the regional vice presidency left vacant by the death of Roger Provost, Montreal, was deferred until a later meeting of the Executive Council.

Air Line Union Beats Off Raid By Teamsters

Chicago—A raid by the expelled Teamsters on the Air Line Employes was beaten back in an election among nearly 2,000 clerical, reservation and station employes of National Airlines.

The vote, announced by the National Mediation Board, was 977-842 in favor of ALEA, which has been certified as bargaining agent for another two-year term.

Union officers, calling the defeat "stunning," said the Teamsters spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to raid the ALEA's bargaining rights. Union Pres. Victor J. Herbert expressed thanks for support extended the ALEA during the campaign by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who had said the best interests of National's employes would be served by "continued adherence to the ALPA." He added:

"This raid is typical of the disruptive tactics employed by Teamster leaders in the effort to offset the effects of their bad reputation among informed working people, and their declining support among their own members."

The Air Line Employes, affiliated with the Pilots, represents more than 6,000 employes of 17 airlines. The Teamsters were expelled from the AFL-CIO in 1957 on findings of domination by corrupt leadership.

Metal Trades Sign Pact At Kittery Navy Yard

Kittery, Me.—The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Council and the Kittery Naval Shipyard have signed a first contract covering more than 5,000 ungraded, non-supervisory employes.

The agreement covers such areas as hours, leave, safety, training and grievances.

The Way Is Open

THE BRUISING DEFEAT suffered by the conservative coalition emerges as the single most significant factor of the congressional elections.

This coalition of Dixiecrats and conservative Republicans has stymied and defeated progressive legislation and policies since its formation in 1938. It has blocked or forced the scuttling and serious compromising of programs under every President since Franklin D. Roosevelt. It has been especially effective in the U.S. House of Representatives.

And it is in the House that the effectiveness of the conservative bloc has been seriously impaired by the Nov. 3 elections.

The new House in the 89th Congress will have 295 Democrats and 140 Republicans, the largest Democratic margin since 1936. The 68-32 Democratic margin in the Senate also is the largest since the landslide Roosevelt victory of 1936.

THE EXISTENCE of the conservative coalition cutting across party lines has made party division an uncertain measure of the progressive or liberal nature of a Congress. But, again, in the 1964 elections, the victories and defeats were clearly measurable.

The Democratic pickup of 38 seats was scattered throughout the nation except in the Deep South. The new members ran almost unanimously as Kennedy-Johnson Democrats, pledged to support the Administration's programs. They are outside the scope of the coalition's narrow, conservative and at times reactionary views.

The Republican gain in the South—a net of four—was simply a question of replacing Dixiecrat members of the coalition with conservative Republican members. But the heavy Republican losses outside the South, in nearly all cases, were in the ranks of the GOPers who were key members of the coalition.

The Republican congressional members who escaped the Johnson-Humphrey landslide included moderates or liberals, many of whom linked up in the past with liberal Democrats to oppose the conservative bloc.

The Dixiecrat-GOP coalition suffered a severe defeat in the elections, but it is not dead. It is difficult to estimate its strength overall, but reliable political observers agree that it lacks the power to block Administration-supported programs.

THE DECIMATION and weakening of the conservative coalition opens the way for long overdue congressional reform of rules and procedures, a move blocked in the past by the conservatives who used the antiquated organization of Congress as a base of operations against progressive and liberal legislation.

The 26-year reign of the Dixiecrat-GOP grouping in the House has run its course. The way is now open for consideration and passage of legislation long stymied or emasculated, or not even offered for fear of a thumbs-down from the coalition.

The momentum of a liberal, progressive victory must not be allowed to expend itself in aimless bickering. The conservative coalition in past years has shown a remarkable ability to maneuver and regroup. It must not happen in the 89th Congress.

'Choice' Was Clear:

1964 Election Results Destroy Myth of Latent Conservatism

OF ALL THE MYTHS that have distorted American politics for the past 30 years, the most persistent is the one that there were millions of citizens who failed to vote because they were never given a real "choice" between liberalism and conservatism.

Sen. Barry Goldwater built his campaign on that myth with his promise that he would give the American people "a choice, not an echo."

"Me, too" candidates were excoriated by conservative Republicans on the ground that they were really "New Dealers" and "Fair Dealers" at heart and were unworthy of conservative support.

Over and over again the American people were told that Democratic victories did not reflect the real will of the American people.

Sen. Goldwater won the Republican presidential nomination almost entirely on the basis that he represented the new voice and the new philosophy that would bring out of the political woodwork millions of frustrated conservative voters.

The 1964 election has smashed that myth beyond repair by any method of political reckoning.

If there are millions of American voters who haven't been going to the polls because they had no real choice, where were they on Nov. 3?

If there are millions of American voters who have been waiting for the chance to vote for a "real" conservative, why didn't they vote for Barry Goldwater, who became a national figure entirely on the basis of his extreme conservatism? Instead, they gave him a bare 26 million votes as compared with 41 million for Pres. Johnson and the 34.1 million they gave "Me, too" candidate Nixon in 1960 and the 35.5 million they gave "Me, too" Pres. Eisenhower in 1956.

Purely on the basis of numbers, it is clear that there is no sizable frustrated right wing vote in the country awaiting prayerfully its conservative deliverer. In fact, on the basis of the actual election statistics, the Republican Party threw away up to 10 million votes simply by nominating a man whose appeal was clearly directed to the mythical millions.

New England and the Middle West have long been strongholds of Republican power. Yet they turned their backs unmistakably on the champion of the far right. Vermont, for the first time in more than a century, rejected the Republican presidential nominee, while Ohio—the stronghold of the late Sen. Robert A. Taft, "Mr. Republican" himself—rejected Goldwater overwhelmingly.

Such Republican moderates as Romney of Michigan and Scott of Pennsylvania—and even defeated Keating in New York and Taft in Ohio—ran more than a million votes ahead of Goldwater. Most of the 50 Republican seats lost in the House were held by Goldwater supporters. The GOP's few House gains were made almost entirely in the Deep South on a purely racist issue.

IN FACT, somewhere along the line, Goldwater himself obviously realized that he couldn't win on a campaign based on repudiation of the social legislation of the past 30 years. He went into the New Hampshire primary gaily downgrading social security. Then when he was humiliatingly defeated, he suddenly became an ardent champion of the social security system. Obviously he didn't fool many people; New Hampshire again rejected him, this time by a 64 to 36 percent margin.

That Goldwater and his extreme right wing followers were overwhelmingly repudiated by the American people is the clearest lesson of the election. The moderates within his own party—the men who were tossed out so cavalierly at the Republication convention—now have the task of rebuilding their party.

The 1964 election has proved conclusively, also, that you can't beat a positive program with a non-program. The Goldwaterites got the kind of platform they wanted—airy generalities based on right wing cliches. Almost two-thirds of the American voters rejected them, their candidates and their non-program.

It is now up to the Republican moderates to take the party back into their own hands and come up with a program that will answer the needs of the American people in the atom age.

At least they can start with the myth of the millions of latent right wing hidden voters out of the way. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Biography of a Slum Building Poses a Question of Priorities

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

I WANT TO REPORT on the biography of a building, and unfortunately it is not bathed in the bright, intriguing adventures of Vicki Baum's Grand Hotel. This building was erected nearly 60 years ago as an edifice of hope at 311 East 100th Street in New York City's East Harlem. But it quickly became and has remained for generations a creaking tenement, an open, running sore on the face of the Great Society, a stinking slum.

Morgan

This rich and powerful country is, and always will be, beset with problems. Today they range from a malfunction in the photographic probe of the planet Mars to a clogged drain in the kitchen sink. But the question of priorities is important. Soaring triumphs in outer space cannot be logically achieved or long sustained by a nation a fifth of whose people exist in rotting homes, the slums of America's cities and towns. It would be an edifying, if horrifying, exercise if every non-slum dweller in the land, and that includes most of us, could visit 311 East 100th Street in East Harlem.

We are losing the battle against the encroachment of ghastly blight in housing. To win, it requires urgent, coordinated efforts by government at every level and this will never be achieved unless the public is aroused. We won't be aroused unless we are shocked into looking beyond the opulence oozing around us and see for ourselves the conditions in the slums. If a personal visit is impossible the next best step I can think of at the moment is to read the biography of 311 East 100th Street. Its life-and-death story is contained in a new book, Let In the Sun. It was written by a New York World Telegram & Sun reporter named Woody Klein.

Klein knows what he is talking—and writing—about. He has reported on the criminally-corrupting decay of big cities for a decade.

What is a slum anyway? "More than anything else," Klein writes in Let In the Sun, "the thing that depressed me and made me want to quit my assignment at the end of each day . . . was the overpowering stench of the slums. It comes from decades of overpopulating a building, from the nauseating mishmash of uncollected garbage, decayed food . . . rotten wood, rat dirt, and the sweat of human flesh steaming through the airless hallways. It creeps out of the walls and poisons the air you breathe; it seeps into your skin and crawls into bed with you at night; it infests the streets and sidewalks of the neighborhood. After [the first] month of enduring this misery, I began to understand what the word slum meant."

Then in more intimate detail he goes on to tell the outrageous, shameful story of the tenement house on East 100th Street.

"What disturbs me more than anything else," writes Klein, "is not that the slum exists—almost every schoolchild knows it is there—but that most of us have developed such a tough skin that we don't even feel it any more."

We soon will, though, at the present rate of decay. "The slums are spreading so fast that city planners can't provide enough decent housing to keep up with the present rate of deterioration." Slums cost municipalities seven to 10 times the tax earnings they yield. Thirty-eight million Americans live in slums today. By 1975 that figure will be 45 million."

WHO IS TO BLAME? First, Woody Klein finds government officials and the landlords guilty because they abused the power to create and maintain this "home." "Second, the tenants are guilty because they have failed to uphold the sanctity of this home. Third, the community workers are guilty because they have failed to reach deep enough into the dark rooms of this house and bring sunlight to the people inside."

What to do? Klein broaches a 10-point program: a housing manager for every major municipality; strict enforcement of building and health laws by a properly staffed central inspections department; update urban renewal and tax legislation so the federal housing coordinator can render uniform help and so the profits will be taken out of slums; protect a community's "character" by building on vacant land and expanding neighborhood conservation and rehabilitation programs; mobilize youth, including those living in slums, to help kindle a spirit of self-help among slum-dwellers; relocate welfare families from privately owned slums to rehabilitated municipally-operated dwellings; bring civic groups into the housing program; vastly expand public housing; require all private sponsors of government-supported housing to activate racial integration; encourage labor and business to finance and construct more housing for their own membership or employes.

That's a large order. But so is shooting the moon. Is the project to "Let In the Sun" on 38 million slum dwellers less important?

Washington Reports:

Peace Corps Creates Conditions To Eliminate War, Says Shriver

THE PEACE CORPS may show us the way to win the peace in the second half of the 20th Century, Sargent Shriver, its director, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 radio stations.

"Winning the peace this time is going to be more complicated than winning previously, because there is no substitute for peace today and we cannot use the threat of war," Shriver told the Catholic Association for Intl. Peace, which gave him its annual peace award.

To the extent that the Peace Corps represents the late Pres. Kennedy's "attitude toward life, toward our country, and the world, I think it is penetrating much deeper and creating better conditions for international peace than many of us ever dreamed it could," he said.

He quoted a Bolivian leader's explanation of the corps' success: "It's because they come to help us, to live with us, to learn from us, not just to teach us. They learn our language, our culture, our politics, even our religion. And when faced with a problem, they try to find a Bolivian answer. They don't try to impose American ideas on us. In the past, we were opposed to suggestions from outside, but we open our minds and hearts to the Peace Corps volunteers."

SHRIVER gave a number of examples of Peace Corp receptions:

In Panama, where Panamanians hid volunteers from marauding mobs seeking North Americans.

In Tanganyika, where the volunteers were invited to join demonstrations against South Africa.

In Lima, Peru, where volunteers live with the poor on the side of a garbage mountain in the same kind of cardboard and tincan shacks, and one was elected to the board of directors of the slums.

In Afghanistan, where the Peace Corps is the first group to be invited anywhere in the country, instead of being confined to the capital city as the United Nations, the Red Cross and others.

Shriver said he was told that the Arab countries would not accept Jewish volunteers.

"Then we just won't go," he said he replied. "Today, the Peace Corps is operating in four nations connected with the Arab League. In every one we have Jewish volunteers, and we haven't had an incident yet."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE VOTE TABULATIONS reveal that a smaller percentage of people of voting age cast ballots in the recent election than the 63.1 percent taking the trouble to go to the polls four years ago. This is attributed to some degree to a so-called "pattern" of recent years that shows fewer voters turning out when one of the candidates for President is the White House incumbent.

The overall estimate that only 60.6 percent of Americans of voting age went to the polls this year does not give a complete picture, however. The large industrial states did considerably better than that; so did some of the New England, Atlantic Seaboard, midwestern and Rocky Mountain States.

It was smallish voter turnouts in the southern states that dragged down the national average.

Only North Carolina and Tennessee went above 50 percent—North Carolina, 52.2 percent and Tennessee 51.2 percent. Mississippi, where Negro citizens are not registered in large numbers, was lowest with only 33.2 percent of its voting-age population casting ballots; next lowest, with 34.1 percent, was Alabama, where electors pledged to Pres. Johnson were not allowed on the ballot.

South Carolina showed a percentage of 38.5 and Georgia 39.4. Virginia managed to get 40.9 percent of its voting-age residents to the polls, Arkansas 43 percent, Texas 44 percent, Louisiana 47.1 percent, Florida, 49.9 percent.

Even allowing for this, the national average permits no complacency. Barely six of 10 persons 21 years of age and over (in four states the voting age is earlier) cared enough to go to the polls. Some millions, of course, are in transit and some are ill; some are felons who have lost voting rights. But the number of deliberate non-voters obviously is enormous and in our kind of country it is perennially disturbing.

THE REPUBLICAN financial managers ended up the campaign with a surplus—not the $2 million originally suggested or even the $1.2 million calculated later, but apparently something around half a million dollars. This may be enough to give a leg up to the new party managers—if and when coming—but it also lends credence to the story that Sen. Goldwater learned about Oct. 23, 10 days before the election, that the fight was all over and he wasn't going to be elected.

The fight was over, for practical purposes, when the senator's operators refused to allow any changes in the party platform drafted by them in San Francisco, when the convention howled down Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (N.Y.) for attempting to get some changes, when the senator himself uttered his arrogant "extremism is no vice" phrase defying those moderate-to-liberal elements in the party he clearly had to have in order to have a chance for election.

It was certainly over when Johnson chose Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota as running-mate—a fully matured, experienced and much respected Democratic leader, the architect of the civil rights bill in the Senate, knowledgeable in foreign affairs. The contrast with Goldwater's choice, Rep. William E. Miller (N. Y.), who had never served on either the Foreign Affairs or Armed Services Committees of the House, was enormous.

It can be acknowledged, however, that in the last 10 days of the campaign Goldwater noticeably slowed down, performing only the minimum of campaign activities needed to maintain a pretense, and it may be that he had just got the word.

A SURPLUS in the bank is not the most important thing a major political party needs after an election debacle.

It needs fresh ideas, fresh faces, a willingness to concede that it made a mistake in a disastrous experiment, a willingness to start rebuilding from the ground up toward the creation of a revitalized national party offering the voters a conceivably acceptable alternative to the other major party in power.

SARGENT SHRIVER, director of the Peace Corps, declaring that the corps has changed the image of the United States all over the world, called it the possible key to winning the peace. Shriver received the annual award of the Catholic Association for Intl. Peace, whose president, Dean William Moran, Jr., is seated at his right. Excerpts from the talk were carried on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service radio program.

Legislative Outlook Brightens in States

Liberal Tide, Reapportionment Produce Upsets Across Nation

tionment was a major factor in enabling the Democrats to win the Iowa Legislature for the first time in 30 years and capture the Wyoming lower house they had last held in 1958.

Partial returns strongly point to the election of all 118 Democratic at-large candidates for the Illinois House, leaving the Republicans only the 59 seats remaining for the minority party. The unique statewide election, requiring a mammoth special ballot, was ordered by the courts when the state failed to meet a reapportionment deadline. Voters could mark a straight party slate for 118 candidates and vote for up to 59 of the opposition slate, or pick and choose in whatever manner they wished.

Both Houses Won

It was the heavy Johnson vote which was credited with sweeping the Democrats to control of the New York Legislature for the first time in 30 years and to victory in both houses of the Maine Legislature—a feat last performed in 1910.

Both houses of the Utah Legislature switched to Democratic and the Democrats picked up one house of the previously all Republican legislatures in Colorado, North Dakota, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin. They took the Montana Senate, and may have won the Nevada Senate. They broke a tie to gain a majority in the Alaska House and achieved a tie in the Ohio Senate.

In making their first net gain in control of legislatures since 1958, the Democrats sharply reduced the number of all-Republican states, where both houses and the governorship were controlled by the GOP. There were 11 such states going into the election. Now the number is down to four.

The Democratic inroads will also be significant in reapportionment battles to come. The court's one man, one vote ruling still leaves considerable leeway in establishment of districts, and a party in control of both the legislature and the governorship can be counted on to make the best of its opportunity for future political advantage.

States in which significant legislative developments took place are listed below. Recounts or delayed tallies may change some of the numerical totals of party breakdowns but are not likely to affect party control.

Alaska—The House, previously split 20-20, now becomes 28 Democrats, 12 Republicans. Democrats added two in the Senate for 17-3 control. Victories of COPE-endorsed candidates are seen opening the way for labor goals, including expansion of community colleges, increased unemployment and workmen's compensation, and anti-strikebreaker legislation.

California—The John Birch Society fielded eight candidates running under the Republican label and elected one to the State Senate—John G. Schmitz of Orange County. The Senate remains 2-1 Democratic; Republicans picked up three seats in the lower House, which becomes 49-31 Democratic.

Incorporation papers have been filed for a new "right-to-work" committee, although the president of the national committee is quoted as saying that the unit is being set up for a "long range program" and not an immediate attempt to ban the union shop. The 1958 "work" referendum was a major factor in the election which gave the Democrats control of California's legislature and governorship.

Colorado—A 41-24 Republican majority in the House has been changed to a 43-22 Democratic majority. Republicans continue to hold the Senate, but a Democratic upset winner was Joe Donlon, business manager of Local 113 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who became the first Democrat ever elected from the Colorado Springs area.

Connecticut—The state's legislative election was cancelled by court order after a special session adjourned in September without being able to reach agreement on reapportionment. The divided legislature—Democratic Senate and Republican House—must come up with a temporary reapportionment formula by Jan. 30 or the courts will do the job.

Delaware—Democrats strengthened their control of both houses.

Illinois—Anticipating Democratic control of the House, 118-59, labor sees hope for a state minimum wage act and improvements in workmen's and unemployment compensation. The GOP retains the Senate, despite a three-seat Democratic pickup.

Indiana—Democrats won both houses by big margins for the first time since 1936, 77-23 in the House and an apparent 37-13 edge in the Senate. The State AFL-CIO reports that the Democratic legislators are pledged to repeal of Indiana's "right-to-work" law, with the drive to begin as soon as the legislature convenes.

Iowa—Another dramatic turnabout, as the Democrats took both houses for the first time in 30 years. With seats added in a partial reapportionment. a Senate Republican majority of 38-12 was transformed to a Democratic 35-24 margin, and the House, previously 79-24 Republican, became 100-24 Democratic.

While many of the new Democrats are from rural areas, labor sees "a very good chance" for improvements in social insurance benefits, writing a fair reapportionment plan and "doing something about the state's 'right-to-work' law." Twelve of 13 union members who ran for the legislature were elected.

Kansas—Republicans maintain control despite a Democratic pickup of five seats in the Senate, nine in the House.

Maine—A massive turnabout as Democrats captured the legislature for first time in 54 years. Previously heavily Republican, it is now 29-5 Democratic in the Senate, 79-72 in the House. Labor reports the outlook is "very good" for its program, with the "right-to-work" threat dead.

Massachusetts—While voting in a Republican governor, Massachusetts citizens elected a more strongly Democratic legislature.

Michigan—The labor-led fight for reapportionment of the Michigan Legislature, finally achieved through court action, paid off handsomely. The Senate is at least 23-15 Democratic, a switch from 23-11 Republican. The House became 72-38 Democratic, a turnabout from 58-52 Republican. While Gov. Romney won re-election, Democrats captured all other state posts. They control both houses for the first time since 1932. Among newly elected Democrats are two Michigan AFL-CIO staff members—Coleman A. Young and Robert Dingwell.

Missouri—An already heavy Democratic margin in the House became even more so with a pickup of at least 21 seats.

Montana—Democrats picked up control of the House by a substantial margin and held the Senate.

Nevada—The previously Republican Senate is now 8 Democrats, 8 Republicans and one independent—a former Republican who had tried unsuccessfully to run as a Democrat. The House remains Democratic, but has been dominated by conservatives in past sessions.

New Hampshire—This formerly heavily Republican legislature is still Republican, but by reduced margins as the Democrats picked up at least five seats in the Senate—with an outside chance of winning two more in recounts—and 29 in the House. For the first time the governor's council is Democratic, 4-1. Its function is to ratify gubernatorial appointments.

New Mexico—Despite a Republican pickup in the House, Democrats maintain legislative control. But party divisions here are not an accurate guide to liberal-conservative strength and a major battle is shaping up over proposed "right-to-work" legislation.

Bills to outlaw the union shop were only narrowly defeated in 1963 and 1959, and a new group called "New Mexican Right to Work, Inc.," has submitted a charter application signed by 350 sponsors. The group said it will press for action when the legislature convenes in January.

New York—It has been 30 years since the Democrats last controlled the New York Legislature, and nearly as long since they had a majority in even one house. The chief factor in this long Republican rule had been a malapportionment heavily favoring traditionally Republican areas. The massive Democratic vote Nov. 3 changed a 33-25 Republican majority in the Senate to 34-24 Democratic, and an 88-65 GOP margin in the lower house to 88-62 Democratic. Among those defeated were the Republican leaders of both houses.

Ironically, this turnabout came on the eve of a special reapportionment session of the lame-duck legislature, which Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) said he will convene in December. This would allow the defeated Republicans to draw up the new district lines.

The State AFL-CIO strongly protested the move, wiring Rockefeller that "the present legislature no longer represents the choice or the will of the citizens of New York."

North Dakota—Democrats won control of the House for the first time in history, 65-44, and picked up eight seats in the Republican-held Senate. "Outlook for labor's program much better," the State AFL-CIO reported.

HAWAII VOTERS sent Mrs. Patsy Takemoto Mink to Congress. The 37-year-old Democrat, a member of the State Senate, is the only woman among this year's freshman class of congressmen.

THE CAMPAIGNER who helped pile up Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's million-vote margin in Massachusetts was his wife, Joan, he declared from the Boston hospital bed where he is recovering from a broken back suffered in an airplane crash.

Nebraska — The moderate-to-conservative unicameral legislature is nonpartisan, and under federal court order to reapportion. In re-electing Gov. Frank B. Morrison (D), Nebraska voters gave him a Democratic lieutenant governor and state treasurer, replacing Republican incumbents. The new lieutenant governor is Phil Sorensen, brother of the late Pres. Kennedy's key aide, Theodore C. Sorensen.

Ohio—Democrats cut heavily into GOP majorities, winning a 20-20 tie in the Senate and picking up 13 House seats to reduce the Republican margin to 75-62. The legislature is in a special session called before the election to handle congressional redistricting. However, in view of the reduced GOP margin for the 1965 legislature, it is likely that the Republicans will seek to adopt a legislative reapportionment, which requires a three-fifths vote and then must be submitted to referendum.

A major upset in the election was the defeat of Senate Republican Leader C. Stanley Mechem, a 12-term veteran from Columbus, by Charles L. Pancake, president of Local 1466 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The State AFL-CIO sees little prospect for positive gains in the new legislature, but believes the liberal strength will be sufficient to block harmful or regressive legislation.

Utah—Another complete turnabout as Democrats took the legislature from the Republicans, 15-12 in the Senate and 39-30 in the House. Much of labor's program, the State AFL-CIO reports, is reflected in the Democratic state platform.

Oregon—The Oregon House. previously Democratic but actually run by a coalition of Republican and Democratic conservatives, is now 32-28 Republican, a pickup of three for the GOP. The Senate is 19-11 Democratic, a drop of two in the party's majority. Despite the defeat of the labor-sponsored workmen's compensation initiative, some improvements in benefits are expected. Congressional redistricting is expected to bring a major fight. The legislature overall is judged "not too friendly" to labor.

Pennsylvania—Democratic capture of the House, 115-91, will spur a drive to amend the harsh unemployment compensation law passed last spring and bring an effort to ease the high 5 percent sales tax. It also assures the defeat of any "right-to-work" move in the legislature. The Senate remains Republican but, in the Pottsville area, GOP State Sen. Paul L. Wagner, a 26-year veteran, was upset by Albert Nagle, president of the Schuylkill County Labor Council and a member of the Aluminum Workers.

South Dakota—Republicans control but Democrats picked up 8 Senate seats and 14 House seats. The 16 Democratic senators and four of the 19 Republican senators had COPE endorsement.

Tennessee—Slight GOP gains were at the expense of conservative Democrats. In a key race, the first Negro elected to the legislature since 1876 defeated the head of the state's Goldwater Labor Committee.

Texas—Despite further losses by the small Republican minority, the legislature remains under conservative domination. Labor sees a fight to prevent doubling of tuition at state colleges, and to block a higher sales tax and removal of exemptions on food, drugs and work clothing. It considers it "almost inevitable" that reapportionment will come from federal court action and not from the legislature.

Washington—Election of 67 percent of COPE-backed candidates in the House and 81 percent in the Senate encourages labor despite Democratic loss of the governorship. In the previous House, eight Democrats had joined with the GOP minority to form a coalition which stalled labor's program. With a Democratic pickup of at least five seats in the House, regular Democrats are expected to regain control. A John Bircher from Spokane failed to win a second term. The legislature is under court order to adopt a reapportionment plan as its first order of business.

West Virginia—Democratic pickups make both houses "substantially more liberal" with the outlook for labor's program "excellent," State AFL-CIO says.

Wisconsin — Democrats picked up six seats in the lower house to win 52-48 control, two in Senate lessen the GOP margin. The state previously had a Democratic governor with a Republican lieutenant governor and attorney general. Now it's just the reverse. Democrats picked up the secondary state offices while losing the governorship.

Wyoming — Republicans, who had pushed through a "right-to-work" law in the last legislature, lost control of the lower house for the first time in six years as the Democrats picked up all seats added through reapportionment to win 34-27. GOP control of the Senate was cut to a single vote.

15.5 Million Votes:

Record LBJ Margin Spurs Party Gains

The solid Democratic House majority of 295 to 140 Republicans looked adequate to support rules changes that would strip conservative committee chairmen of their power to bottle up legislation urged by the national Administration.

It was not clear what form these changes might take—whether by adding the speaker of the House and one or two other Democrats to the Rules Committee long dominated by conservative Rep. Howard W. Smith of Virginia, by reviving the "21-day" rule allowing legislative committee chairmen to bring up their own bills if Smith refused to allow them to move through the Rules Committee, or by some other step.

Power Reduced

Certain facts, however, were clear:

- The blockading power of the ancient conservative Republican-conservative southern Democratic coalition in the House was bent if not broken.

The catastrophic defeat of Sen. Barry Goldwater carried with it defeat for conservative Republican members of the House rather than liberal members. The replacement of five Democrats in Alabama, one in Georgia and one in Mississippi by Republicans added no compensatory strength to the coalition; the southern Democrats knocked out of their places were themselves members of the conservative bloc.

- Republican Floor Leader Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) was left with a decimated handful of troops, so that the maximum 140 votes he might contribute to coalition drives is less than at any time since 1938. He cannot deliver all of these.

- Substantial changes will take place in committee memberships even if Democrats do not take advantage of their increased majority to claim more places on legislative committees.

Goldwater, stepping out of the Senate, will be replaced as ranking Republican member of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (N.Y.), with Sen. Winston L. Prouty (Vt.) moving up to No. 2. Prouty will be ranking GOP member of the District of Columbia Senate committee, succeeding Sen. J. Glenn Beall (Md.), who was defeated.

Three Republican members of the tax-writing House Ways & Means Committee are gone: Representatives Victor A. Knox (Mich.), Bruce Alger (Tex.) and Steven B. Derounian (N.Y.) all were defeated by their constituents.

On the House Appropriations Committee, both Rep. Ben F. Jensen (Ia.) and Rep. Walt Horan (Wash.) were defeated and Rep. Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) moves up to the spot of ranking Republican.

On House Public Works both Democratic Chairman Charles A. Buckley (N. Y.) and Rep. Clifford Davis (Tenn.), third ranking, were defeated in the primaries; the new chairman will be Rep. George H. Fallon (Md.).

Of lesser immediate committee significance was the defeat of Republican Rep. Jack Westland (Wash.), who was fourth-ranking GOP member on Interior & Insular Affairs. Westland led the House group of some 50 Republicans pledging allegiance and support to Goldwater, in advance of the party's primary in California, as prospective nominee. The voters knocked him out.

In the aftermath of the Republican election disaster, many in the GOP called for the scalps of National Committee Chairman Dean Burch, handpicked for the post by Goldwater, and John E. Grenier of Birmingham, who organized an 11-state solid bloc of southern Goldwater delegates for the convention, then saw most of the states with a preponderance of Electoral College votes move to Johnson.

Burch said he would call a meeting of the national committee early in January to discuss all issues, including that of his chairmanship. The nation's 17 GOP governors planned a conference for early in December.

State Ballot Questions Yield Gains, Losses

down to defeat as voters rejected the move to improve workmen's compensation benefits and set up an exclusive state insurance program.

Listed below are states where referenda actions were of more than local interest:

Arizona—State's full crew law repealed. A labor-supported constitutional amendment was adopted permitting the legislature to make school aid payments on the basis of need.

Arkansas—Voters approved a labor-supported amendment abolishing the poll tax as a requirement for voting in any election (although tax remains in effect as a revenue measure) and establishing a permanent registration system. Registration permitted up to 20 days before an election and a voter remains on the books so long as he votes at least once every four years.

California—In addition to adopting labor-opposed propositions barring fair housing laws and repealing full crew laws, voters approved labor-supported bond issues for beaches, parks and state construction. They defeated a labor-opposed attempt to set up a privately-operated state lottery monopoly and barred pay television, on which the State AFL-CIO took no position.

Maryland—In line with labor endorsement, voters retained a statewide public accommodations law and established annual legislative sessions with a modest boost in pay for legislators. Previously the state has had biennial general legislative sessions, with a short budget session in the interim year.

Massachusetts—Approved four-year terms for state officers, starting in 1966, and gave legislature power to appoint successors in emergencies—all labor endorsed. Adopted over labor opposition requirement for two-thirds vote in both houses to pledge credit of state. Rejected a pay raise for legislators, but approved, in a city referendum, a raise for Boston police.

Michigan—By a 2-1 margin, voters rejected a labor-opposed "Massachusetts ballot" for Michigan elections which would have eliminated a straight ticket voting box. It was passed by the legislature but petitioned to referendum, which prevented it from taking effect this year.

New Hampshire—Approved labor-supported constitutional amendment reapportioning legislature on population basis. Proposed pay raise for legislators received majority, but failed of needed two-thirds.

New York—Two labor supported housing issues defeated. One would have authorized an additional $165 million bond issue for slum clearance loans to cities and added $7.5 million a year to the state's subsidy to help keep rentals down. The other, a constitutional amendment, would have made public housing more flexible by extending it to "persons whose housing needs cannot be met by unaided operation of private enterprise."

North Dakota—Railroad full crew law repealed.

Oregon—Labor-sponsored initiative to improve workmen's compensation benefits and establish exclusive state insurance fund lost by nearly 3-1. However, opponents have said they will support all features except the exclusive state fund in the legislature. Oregon voters abolished capital punishment; labor took no position.

South Dakota—An intensive labor campaign helped bring repeal of a law reducing both amount and duration of jobless benefits for many workers. Allegedly designed to curb benefits for seasonal and construction workers, it actually would have hit any worker who had been unemployed during the same period of the previous year, regardless of cause.

Washington—All bond and financing proposals endorsed by labor were approved—to acquire outdoor recreation land for public use, to build schools and to construct a new juvenile institution to replace two inadequate facilities now being used.

West Virginia—Adopted by 4-1 margin labor-supported "better roads amendment" authorizing up to $20 million a year in bond issues for the next 10 years to meet state's share of federal highway funds.

Liberal Victories Boost Support for 14b Repeal

Additions to liberal strength in the 89th Congress "may open the way for repeal of Section 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act" which permits states to adopt so-called "right-to-work" laws, the National Council for Industrial Peace declared.

The council, in an analysis of the Nov. 3 elections, said the "right-to-work" issue was "very important" in the overwhelming defeat handed Sen. Barry M. Goldwater, an advocate of repressive, anti-union legislation.

The NCIP noted that the National Right-to-Work Committee made a maximum effort on Goldwater's behalf, and that the issue of union security became a national issue because of the Republican candidate's "strong and consistent advocacy of the crippling legislation."

The Democratic Party platform flatly pledged repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act section permitting "right-to-work" laws.

Every state in which laws to bar labor and management from negotiating union security provisions were an issue showed large majorities for Pres. Johnson, the council said. These included Maine, Vermont, Delaware, Kentucky, Oklahoma, Montana, New Mexico, California and Washington.

State Repeal Also?

Results in the election of a number of state legislatures raised the hope also for possible repeal of state "right-to-work" laws, the council said, especially in states such as Indiana, Wyoming and Utah.

The council pointed also to Pennsylvania, where the National Right-to-Work Committee has been pushing for a state law for the past two years. A heavy Democratic vote was registered for the Johnson-Humphrey ticket in the state and the Democratic Party won control of the lower house of the legislature.

During his career in the Senate, Goldwater introduced legislation to create a national "right-to-work" law as well as other punitive and restrictive anti-labor measures.

Mexico City Housing To Open Nov. 17

The John F. Kennedy Memorial Housing Project in Mexico City, completed for the Graphic Arts Workers under the auspices of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, will be opened Nov. 17.

Its 96 buildings will house 18,000 persons. Its construction, part of the AIFLD's program of helping to further free democratic trade unionism in the Western Hemisphere, was made possible by a $10 million, 20-year loan by the AFL-CIO and some of its affiliates placed through the investment guarantee plan of the Agency for Intl. Development.

Office Union, Shipping Line In New Pact

New York—The Office Employes, in negotiations observed by an African white collar union officer, reached agreement with American Export Isbrandtsen Lines, Inc., on a three-year contract providing major gains for company office workers.

The observer was General Sec. Babs Alade Animashaun of the National Bank of Nigeria staff union. Present at the invitation of union and management, he said he was "impressed" by the high standards of the negotiations.

The new pact replaces an agreement with an Oct. 31 termination date. It provides three general wage increases of $4 a week each year; an automatic system of increments within grades with a minimum and maximum salary; a welfare fund, promotional increase system, and improved vacation and sick leave clauses.

The contract provides a sizeable tuition-aid program for employes taking job-related courses. Under the pact, a minimum salary of $66.33 a week for messengers in the current agreement becomes $74.33 on the second anniversary date of the contract. It was agreed also that the maximum current salary of $196.41 a week for staff assistants will rise to $204.41 on the second anniversary date.

Two Unionists Among New Congressmen

Two active trade unionists are among the newly elected congressmen—both Democrats who won seats long held by Republicans.

Paul J. Krebs, an international representative of the Auto Workers, won in the Newark, N. J., area's 12th Congressional District, which had been held by Republicans for 26 years. Krebs, who for six years was president of the former State CIO, won with 52 percent of the votes the seat vacated by retiring Rep. George M. Walhauser (R).

In Wisconsin's 6th District, Machinist John A. Race of Fond du Lac became the first Democrat to represent the district since 1938.

In a district labeled "safe Republican," he received 51 percent of the vote to upset 7-term Rep. William K. Van Pelt, a member of the GOP's right wing who voted against the Civil Rights Act. Race is chairman of the IAM bargaining and grievance committee at the Giddings & Lewis Machine Tool Co. and is a past president of his local.

Meany Assails Extremists As Peril To U.S. Freedom

Rail Crafts Reject Pay Proposal

Chicago—Unions representing 140,000 shopcraft workers on 187 U.S. railroads have rejected a Presidential Emergency Board proposal for an across-the-board wage increase as "inequitable" and have set 6 a.m. Nov. 23 as the deadline for a nationwide walkout.

"Only if railroad management changes its course and negotiates a satisfactory settlement" before the deadline can a strike be avoided, said Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. at a press conference here.

A seven-member board headed by Richardson Dilworth, former mayor of Philadelphia, recommended to Pres. Johnson Oct. 20 that management settle an 18-month dispute over wages by giving shopcraft workers and five other crafts an increase of 9 cents per hour for each of three years, or as near that figure as possible on a percentage basis.

The shopcrafts, in negotiations with employers, contend their wage levels have fallen behind those of similar employes in other industries and therefore the board's recommendation was inadequate.

The employers' committee has "not only declined to consider" any further increase for skilled workers but "has not made a commitment to accept even the board's recommendations," said Fox.

5 Other Unions

Federal mediators continued their efforts to help settle the shopcraft dispute and another involving wages, working conditions and job protection for the five other non-operating unions—the Railway Clerks, Railroad Telegraphers, Signalmen, Maintenance of Way Employes, and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

Fox gave this background of the shopcraft dispute:

The employes involved are as a group the "most highly skilled in the railroad industry"—Machinists, Boiler Makers and Blacksmiths, Sheet Metal Workers, Railway Carmen, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the Firemen & Oilers. All but a few are skilled trades workers.

Pay Out of Line

Despite their skills, wages of the group have been adjusted over the years on a flat cents-per-hour basis with the result that pay rates of skilled mechanics have fallen, Fox said, "far below those of similarly skilled employes in outside industry."

This year, for the first time in many years, the shopcrafts launched their own wage movement and "consistently and vig-

FRANCES PERKINS, who set up the Bureau of Labor Standards when she was secretary of labor, was the guest of honor at the bureau's 30th anniversary observance. Her well-wishers, from left, are Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.), Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler.

Iona College Speech Hits 'Infection'

New Rochelle, N.Y.—Attacks by extremists on the integrity of American institutions and leaders under the guise of fighting communism were vigorously assailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as he received an honorary doctor of laws degree from Iona College.

"I can conceive of nothing more divisive of our national strength, nothing more dangerous to the preservation of freedom, no greater service to the cause of our enemies abroad," he declared.

"If the day should come that they infect enough of our citizens to have a controlling effect upon our choice of national leaders and national policies, we shall be face to face with disaster.

"Equally dangerous is complacency and indifference."

Sources of Strength

He called on the nation to preserve and build "our primary sources of strength" in the struggle for freedom—"our moral values, our concern for our brothers, and our freedom to seek and act upon the truth no matter where it leads."

"Let us not, in fear and frustration, borrow the faults of our adversaries," he urged, "the paranoid delusions, the suspicion and distrust, and the weakness for easy answers and demagogic appeals which vent their hostility not upon the real enemy, but upon our own representatives and fellow citizens."

Some 500 members of the college faculty and student body were present for the special convocation at which Meany was honored. It was the first of a series of acedemic ceremonies marking the 25th anni-

Tribute to Kennedy:

Housing Era Dawns For Mexican Labor

By Al Zack

Mexico City—For 3,104 Mexican families, dawn on Nov. 17 signified something much more than just another beautiful, sun-kissed day. It signified the dawn of opportunity. For that was the day on which the John F. Kennedy memorial housing development was dedicated, the dawn of a new era in workers' housing in Latin America.

These 3,104 families, most of them from the ranks of the Mexican Graphic Arts Workers Union, were seeing the tangible results of a nine-year-old dream.

In 1955, the Graphic Arts Workers decided to do something about the housing conditions under which they lived. In 1964 they had accomplished their dream, because, said Senator-elect Robert F. Kennedy (D-N. Y.) they had "creativity and courage" and the "partnership of the AFL-CIO."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, who represented AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and the Executive Council, told the dedication audience that the occasion marked "an historic step in the development of social progress between labor organizations in this hemisphere."

"Today we see the dreams of some become a reality and the spirit of solidarity united in a common cause in the climate of brotherhood," he said.

More Than Housing

The John F. Kennedy memorial housing project is much more than just another housing project. It is a major tribute to the Alliance for Progress and the man who fought for it, the late President of the United States.

It began with the dream of workers who wanted to live in decency and who were determined that their children should have a better world than they had known. It culminated

Labor Dept. Bureau Hails 30-Year Gain

The Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Standards marked its 30th anniversary with a proud glance backwards and an optimistic look into the future.

Speakers from labor and government predicted a new resurgence of state legislation protecting workers as a result of reapportionment of legislatures on a one man, one vote basis.

The result, Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther F. Peterson said, will be "more understanding of worker problems by legislatures more representative of urban and suburban populations."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler concurred in part. But in remarks prepared for the bureau's all-day anniversary conference, he warned that the needed improvements won't come about without "great battles." It will take, he said, "attention, aggressiveness and pressure" from labor and its allies.

Guest of honor at the anniversary observance was Frances Perkins, secretary of labor during the Roosevelt Administration. She belied her 82 years as she recalled vividly the conditions which had prompted her to set up the new unit in the Labor Dept.—to do a job that no one else was doing.

Miss Perkins spoke of workers dying of undiagnosed silicosis, being poisoned by radium and lead, working long hours for low pay, being cheated of wages by employers, living in states with no workmen's compensation laws. While a few states, such as New York and Wisconsin, had effective

Three Union Leaders On Automation Unit

Three AFL-CIO vice presidents have been nominated by Pres. Johnson to serve on a 14-member commission created by the 88th Congress to study the impact of automation and recommend policies for use of new technologies.

Named to the National Commission on Technology, Automation & Economic Progress, subject to Senate confirmation, are Vice Presidents Joseph A. Beirne, Albert J. Hayes and Walter P. Reuther, presidents of the Communications Workers, Machinists and Auto Workers, respectively.

Chairman of the commission is an economist, Pres. Howard R. Bowen of the University of Iowa. He formerly served as president of Grinnell College and was on the faculty at Williams College and the University of Illinois.

The commission is broadly representative of business, labor and the public with members who are expert in economics, engineering, sociology, industrial relations and the law.

The unit, under the legislation creating it, will submit a final report to Congress and the President by Jan. 1, 1966.

The 1963 AFL-CIO convention had called for such a commission to spell out "ways in which the

Jobless Rate Stays at 5.2% For October

By Robert B. Cooney

The non-farm job picture showed "continued strength" in October, the Labor Dept. has reported, although the extent of the job gain was blurred by the General Motors strike.

Non-farm payroll employment totaled 59.8 million for the month, about the same as in September. But manufacturing employment fell about 250,000 more than expected —"a direct effect of the auto strike," said a Labor Dept. spokesman.

Since the monthly detailed job report is based on employer payroll data, strikers are not included in employment totals because they are off the payroll; neither are they orously urged a separate consideration of our case."

Shopcrafts Set Strike, Reject Rail Pay Report

Management just as vigorously urged that the shopcraft wage proposals be studied along with two other pending disputes involving non-operating employes.

The President then, for the first time in history, appointed a seven-man emergency board "with the obvious intent that it hear the three cases separately and concurrently through the use of panels." Fox added:

"The board itself noted this to be the President's purpose but brushed it aside as 'impractical.' Thus the hoped-for separate consideration was denied us and the evidence upon which we relied in support of our case was ignored" by the Dilworth board.

The shopcrafts declare a railroad mechanic now is paid just less than $2.75 an hour while rates of similar craftsmen in other industries "generally are in excess of $3 an hour and, in the construction industry, more than $4 an hour."

The emergency board gave no consideration to this inequity, said Fox, and recommended another flat across-the-board increase for all non-operating employes. It recommended further that, with respect to the shopcrafts, a 9-cent hourly increase "should be in percentage terms . . . so as to recognize the special problem of these skilled craftsmen whose rates are low compared to those in outside industry."

"This places the shopcrafts in an impossible position" because they would have to correct the "recognized inequity" in rates of skilled workers by correcting it at the expense of the lesser-skilled workers and placing rates of the lower-skilled below those of employes with similar skills in the other non-operating groups, as Fox sees it. He concluded:

"Our duty to the employes . . . leaves us no choice except to fix a strike date under the authorization" voted by members of the shop unions last April. "We stand prepared to make a fair and equitable settlement. We deeply regret any inconvenience this may cause the public."

Fox said he will notify other union heads of the strike deadline and ask their cooperation. The only major railroads not involved would be the Southern Railway and the Florida East Coast, operated by strikebreakers for 22 months.

Whaling Men Win Right to Union Election

Members of the crews of the whaling ships Sioux City and Lynn Ann may vote in an election asked for by the National Maritime Union, the National Labor Relations Board has decided.

Contrary to the regional director and the employer, the board ruled that the crewmen are employed by the company and not by the captains, and therefore may be represented by a union in collective bargaining.

The case involved Robert Casebeer and Herman Foland of San Francisco, who operate the Golden Gate Fishing Co. The employer is in the business of catching whales on the high seas, and owns, equips, maintains and insures two whaling vessels.

The employer claimed, and the NLRB regional director agreed, that the captains are independent contractors who hire the crew. The board disagreed, finding that, while the captains control the selection and size of the crews and have full discretion as to the actual catching of whales, the owner pays the crews, has full claim over all whales caught, and otherwise acts the part of a true employer.

A secret ballot election was ordered within 30 days.

Cleveland Adopts Strikebreaker Curb

Cleveland, O.—A law banning professional strikebreakers and their agents from operating in the nation's eighth largest city was signed by Mayor Ralph Locher (D) here after its passage by City Council. Several score communities have enacted similar laws.

Councilman Arthur Kruczyk, who sponsored the law, said violators may be fined up to $1,000 and may be jailed up to six months for each offense. The measure, supported by the Cleveland AFL-CIO and other groups, is designed to protect the rights of union members.

Two Unions Reach Pacts With Rails

Chicago—One on-train union has voted to approve a wage increase offered by railroad managements and another has reached tentative agreement on a similar offer.

Pres. Charles Luna of the Railroad Trainmen said his union's general chairmen have approved wage and vacation improvements offered by Chairman J. E. Wolfe of rail management.

BLFE Meets Nov. 30

Pres. H. E. Gilbert of the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen said he and Assistant Pres. M. W. Hampton will meet with general chairmen here Nov. 30 to vote on ratification of the terms of the proposed agreement.

The BRT agreement calls for increases of $1.75 per basic day for yard and road conductors; $1.44 a day for yard helpers and road brakemen; and corresponding increases for dining car stewards, yardmasters and other BRT-represented employes of Class 1 railroads.

All increases are retroactive to last July 12 in a contract which has two years to run. A fourth week's vacation will go to workers with 20 or more years of service, effective Jan. 1.

Gilbert said the BLF&E agreement covers 28,000 firemen, engineers and hostlers and generally parallels the wage increases recommended by Presidential Emergency Board No. 164. Also it provides up to four weeks of vacation.

Under the offer, engineers will get a wage raise of $1.75 per basic day retroactive to June 1. Other BLF&E-represented workers will get increases of 9 cents an hour or 72 cents a day retroactive to last Jan. 15, and another 9 cents next Jan. 1.

Credit Union Rolls Top 15 Million

Madison, Wis.—Credit union membership in the United States passed the 15 million mark for the first time in October, showing an increase of 400,00 since Dec. 31, 1963, according to CUNA Intl., formerly the Credit Union National Association.

With Wage Raise:

Tobacco Union Wins Reduced Workweek

Norfolk, Va.—The Tobacco Workers have negotiated a shorter workweek, a lower retirement age and a pay raise for 6,500 employes of the American Tobacco Co. in three states.

Union Pres. John O'Hare predicted that the new agreement will soon become the pattern for the industry, as it normally is the pacesetter. Already, he said, the 8.25 percent hourly wage increase in the agreement has been extended to 3,700 union members at Liggett & Myers plants under a prevailing wage clause in the Tobacco Workers contract.

The three-year American Tobacco contract provides:

- A reduction in the workweek from 40 hours to 37.5 hours.
- An 8.25 percent hourly wage increase, which will result in an approximately 2 percent raise in take-home pay after adjustment for the shorter hours.
- Reduction in the retirement age for a full pension from 65 to 62 and an increase in the retirement benefit formula which will provide a bigger pension for those retiring next year at 62 than that received previously by employes who retired at 65.
- Additional classification pay adjustments of 5 to 15 cents an hour for some 50 jobs.
- Two days' funeral pay for a death in a worker's family.
- An increase in sick pay from $35 to $40 a week for up to 24 weeks.

The wage increases were retroactive to Nov. 2, and the other contract changes will take effect Jan. 1, 1965.

The historic shorter workweek agreement was hailed by management as well as labor.

"By reducing the workweek," American Tobacco Co. Pres. Robert B. Walker declared, "the company is sharing with our employes the benefits provided by increased automation and thus is in keeping with the trend of the times."

TWIU Vice Presidents Howard W. Vogt, George Benjamin, Homer Cole and E. G. Harvey assisted in negotiations. Local union presidents on the negotiating team were Leslie D. Branch, Richmond, Va.; David C. Overman, Durham, N. C.; Radford G. Powell, Reidsville, N. C., and Fred S. Moran, Louisville, Ky.

During the negotiations, the company reaffirmed its intention to continue to make all technological adjustments through attrition, without layoffs.

White Collar Alliance Set On Airlines

Three AFL-CIO "white collar" unions with more than 20,000 members have announced they are joining forces "to combat and solve mutual problems in the airline industry."

In a joint statement, the presidents of the Railway Clerks, Air Line Employes and the Air Line Dispatchers said they are banding together:

- To keep "undesirable" elements from gaining a foothold in the industry.
- To help organize the industry's many unorganized white collar workers.
- To defend themselves against the airlines' mutual aid pact.

"This large craft and class of airline employes," said Railway Clerks' Pres. C. L. Dennis, Dispatchers' Pres. Robert Commerce and ALEA Pres. Victor J. Herbert, "have been neglected too long. It is our intention to insure them a just place in the airline 'family' regarding job security, wages and working conditions." Another objective, the three chiefs said, will be to eliminate duplication of activities.

The ALEA, affiliated with the Pilots, recently defeated a raid by the expelled Teamsters on members working for National Airlines. The affiliated union won certification again as bargaining agent for nearly 2,000 clerical, reservation and station employes.

Free World Auto Unions Urged to Link Strength

Frankfurt, Germany—The free world's 1.5 million auto workers must use their combined strength to help win a full and fair share of "the wealth they produce," UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther told the opening session here of a world automotive conference called by the Intl. Metalworkers' Federation.

Only by so doing, said the president of the Auto Workers, "can we . . . take human welfare out of competition on the world automotive market."

Presiding as president of the IMF's automotive department, Reuther reported his union has just won "the greatest gains ever achieved by us in a single set of negotiations" and offered to help raise the living standards of all automotive workers.

Reuther told delegates from 30 nations that the giant international corporations that employ them "know no national boundaries and are not inhibited by national loyalties" and their policies have a significant impact upon the welfare of all free world citizens.

It is "imperative," he declared, "that they be made to temper their pursuit of profits with a measure of social responsibility." Requiring them to do so, he added, "is a task not only for governments but for the free labor movement as well."

Reuther pointed out that through centralized control, auto corporations attempt to play each national group of workers against others by threatening that all will lose work if they move "too rapidly to raise their wages and living standards."

"All this makes it imperative," he said, "that we harmonize wages and social benefits by raising the living standards" of those workers who are not "getting their fair share" of the wealth they produce.

The conference will hold separate meetings for delegates from each major corporation. It will also exchange information on wages, social benefits, working conditions and management policies to "lay the groundwork for closer future cooperation," said Reuther.

'Work' Foe, Wife Die in Auto Crash

Albuquerque — Henry Kiker, chairman of the New Mexico Council for Industrial Peace, and his wife Barbara died Nov. 12 in an auto accident en route to Santa Fe.

ONE WEEK BEFORE his assassination, Pres. John F. Kennedy looked at a model of the proposed Mexican workers' housing project, to be financed by the AFL-CIO and some of its affiliates under the Alliance for Progress program, and found it good. With him and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany are William C. Doherty, Jr., (left) and Capt. Robert Clay of the Social Projects Dept. of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

THE $10 MILLION PROJECT looked like this as it went throught the final stages of construction. The development, between downtown Mexico City and its airport, was sponsored by the Graphic Arts Workers Union of Mexico and consists of 96 pleasant new buildings, such as those above, a shopping center and other structures necessary for community life. The project was dedicated this week with Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne representing the AFL-CIO.

Labor-Aided Kennedy Memorial Opens New Mexican Housing Era

in a breathtakingly beautiful project of 94 four-story buildings of two and three-bedroom apartments, colorfully arranged around central parks, with each apartment planned for a maximum of light and air and view. It began in poverty; it will end in ownership. Each of the apartments is being purchased on a 20-year plan. The major financing, $10 million worth, came from the unions of the AFL-CIO.

Workers' Dream

Between the dream and the reality came years of trial and headache. The workers initially assessed themselves 6 percent of each paycheck, an average of 15 pesos or about $1.10. With this money, they bought land. But construction costs far outran this assessment and, seven years later, their ambition and their plans had not been translated into reality.

Then, the brand-new American Institute for Free Labor Development, a brainchild of the AFL-CIO, entered the picture and undertook to find the $10 million financing. The technical and financial problems were many, but they were successfully overcome with the loan that was fully guaranteed by the U.S. Agency for International Development.

It was precisely the kind of support program Pres. Kennedy had envisioned in his Alliance for Progress.

On Nov. 15, 1963, exactly one week before the assassination, Meany showed Pres. Kennedy a scale-model of the project. The youthful President was elated. A few minutes later, speaking to the AFL-CIO convention, he hailed the project as a model of what he hoped could be accomplished in people-to-people, worker-to-worker undertakings in the Western Hemisphere.

Death Intervened

Ground for the project was broken in early December 1963, but instead of the atmosphere of gaiety with which the planners had expected, there was an atmosphere of deep grief. For John Fitzgerald Kennedy was dead.

The members of the Graphic Arts Union, by a spontaneous, unanimous vote, decided to name their project after the martyred President.

So, on Nov. 17, 1964, when the project was dedicated and the first unit was occupied, the chief speaker was the brother of the late President, himself just elected as a senator from New York.

Robert Kennedy, speaking in slow and measured tones and obviously personally affected by the moment, recalled that this project "was one of the last matters my brother thought about before his term as President was ended."

Kennedy, the senator-elect said, had "a special affection for the people of Mexico City because of the greeting they had given him and he strongly hoped to return to Mexico." But, he added, "he had a special feeling and affection for this project; it was of great interest and concern to him."

The senator explained that it was not only the creativity and the courage of the people involved in Mexico City; "it was the enlightened support given to it by the AFL-CIO, always a leader in social welfare gains in our country."

15,000 at Dedication

The 15,000 persons who crowded into the square under a brilliant, cloudless blue sky included many of the families who would soon make their homes in the white concrete buildings, marked by brilliant color splashes and great expanses of windows to let in Mexico City's bright sunshine and sparkling breeze.

Beirne a day earlier had translated the project's meaning from dollars into personal terms. He told a news conference at the Mexico City Press Club:

"To really understand what this means, you have to see where these people lived and how much they have improved themselves and their families."

Of the AFL-CIO's participation, Beirne said:

"We translated what we said about brotherhood into action. In other words, we put our money where our mouth was."

The long-range planning in the project is apparent from a few statistics. Eighty-one percent of the land has been left open for gardens and recreation areas for children. Four schools will be erected on the project grounds. Several shopping centers and a theater will be built later.

The complexities of financing this unique arrangement, which Sen.-Elect Kennedy called "only a start in mankind's fight for a better world for our children," were solved through the cooperation of the Confederation of Mexican Workers and the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT).

The Mexican government and its National Housing Fund (FOVI) also played a major role in bringing the project into being.

But none of these would have been possible, as speaker after speaker emphasized, if the Graphic Arts Workers hadn't dared to dream nine years ago of decent homes.

Antonio Vera, secretary-general of the Graphic Arts Workers of Mexico, recalled for the dedication audience the dreams of this 5,000-member of local union.

The President of the United States, Lyndon B. Johnson, in a special message read by U.S. Ambassador Fulton Freeman, paid tribute to those dreams. The project, he said, was not only a fulfillment of their dreams, but of those of the man whose memory it honored.

"John Fitzgerald Kennedy, early in his term as President, envisioned a closer relationship between the peoples of the Americas. He saw clearly the hopes and aspirations, not only of his own people, but of the peoples of all the Americas. Holding this ideal, he set in motion the idea of the Alliance for Progress which these ceremonies so vividly typify."

Then Johnson, echoing the views expressed repeatedly by all of the participants in the ceremonies, looked to the future:

"This housing project is more than just mortar and wood, more than foundations and walls. It is a symbol of what free men working together can achieve."

Others to Follow

Predicting it would be followed by other housing projects throughout Latin America, Johnson said:

"What has been accomplished here has been achieved through a spirit of cooperation which can lead to the realization of even greater things for all the nations of this hemisphere."

In that spirit, the President of Mexico, Adolfo Lopez Mateos, unveiled the plaque which officially dedicated the John F. Kennedy Memorial Housing Project.

It was, as Robert Kennedy and Beirne had said, "only a start" toward what must be and can be accomplished in the Western Hemisphere. But it clearly was, in Robert Kennedy's words, "a memorable promise for the future, a magnificent tribute to my brother."

SYMBOL OF COOPERATION between free labor in the United States and in Mexico is this plaque. The Graphic Arts Workers Union named the development after the late Pres. Kennedy following his murder.

'Racist' Concepts Laid To Real Estate Boards

The successful fight of the National Association of Real Estate Boards and its California affiliate to win voter approval of Proposition 14 in the recent election has "opened a Pandora's box of evils that "will sustain and extend racial ghettos and increase racial tensions and conflict," the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing has predicted.

"By misleading the people of California into believing they were protecting private property rights, the promoters of this referendum have actually moved to undermine the economic, social and political stability of the entire community," the committee said in a statement signed by Pres. Charles Abrams, Chairman Algernon D. Black and Exec. Dir. Edward Rutledge.

"It is clear that the federal government cannot enter into partnership with a state which has written housing discrimination into its constitution—thus California may deny itself the vast economic benefits of urban redevelopment."

The committee declared that the "cynical role" played by the NAREB and the California Real Estate Association "runs counter to the basic policy of our government, to the commitment of our people, and to the prevailing posture of the American business community."

The promoters of the amendment, which struck down the state's non-discrimination housing laws and amended the state constitution to prohibit such legislation in the future, were described as "the only major segment of American business that seeks, despite their protestations, to impose a 'superior race' concept" on the country.

The committee is composed of 37 major civil rights, civic, religious, labor and minority group organizations. Dir. Donald Slaiman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights is a member of the board of directors.

Meantime, at the 57th NAREB convention in Los Angeles, Pres. Ed Mendenhall, of Hight Point, N. C., praised California voters for approving Proposition 14. He declared that private property rights are more important to basic human rights than are the civil rights of minority groups.

Steel Union Adds Units In Quebec Zinc Mines

Montreal, Que.—The Steelworkers won bargaining rights in two more units in Quebec's new $100 million zinc mining and refining industry when miners at New Hosco and Orchan, near Matagami, voted overwhelmingly for the union.

The USWA already had won an election in the Noranda Mines smelter at Valleyfield and have applied to represent employes of Matagami Lake Mines.

Mondale Set For Humphrey Senate Seat

Minnesota Attorney Gen. Walter F. Mondale will be appointed to the Senate for the two years remaining in the term of Vice Pres.-Elect Hubert H. Humphrey.

Gov. Karl F. Rolvaag said he will name the 36-year-old attorney general who won a second term two years ago with one of the biggest pluralities ever given a statewide candidate.

Humphrey said he will resign from the Senate this year so as to allow his successor to be sworn in as a member of the 88th Congress — thus gaining valuable seniority over newly-elected senators who will take office in January.

Mondale, who set up a consumer protection service and exposed charity frauds during his tenure as attorney general, came to national attention during the Democratic Party convention this year when he played a key role in working out a compromise solution to the delegate claims of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party.

Humphrey praised Mondale as an "unusually able public servant" and predicted that he will become an "outstanding" senator.

SIU Appoints Meyer To Washington Post

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers has announced the appointment of Thomas L. Meyer, veteran seaman and union official, as the SIU's Washington representative.

Meyer is 54. He began sailing as an engine wiper, was a ship's electrician until 1952, and since has been Baltimore port agent and then SIU business agent in San Pedro, Calif.

government can meet its responsibility to share the costs and to alleviate the losses of automation job displacement" and to "pioneer in the social, political and economic aspects of automation to the same extent that our science and industry have pioneered in its physical aspects."

The act setting up the commission prescribes four major areas of study:

- A general assessment of the role and pace of technological change.
- A forecast of the impact of technological change during the next 10 years, including specific effects on occupations, industries and geographical areas as well as the over-all effects on the nation's economy, manpower, human values, etc.
- A consideration of the unmet community and human needs to which modern technology might be effectively applied.
- An exploration of the most effective means of channeling technology into promising directions and the relationship between government and private investment in applying new technology.

Specific Movers Sought

In addition to recommending appropriate policies for labor and management to follow, the commission has been asked to recommend specific steps that should be taken by federal, state and local governments in meeting their responsibilities in supporting technological change and to help prevent and alleviate the adverse impact of change on displaced workers.

The other members nominated by the President are:

Patrick E. Haggerty, president, Texas Instruments, Inc.; Philip Sporn, retired president, American Electric Power Co.; John I. state labor departments and a body of social legislation, most state agencies had little authority, inadequate funds and small staffs.

The establishment of the federal bureau, Miss Perkins said proudly, was "one of the original guns fired in the war on poverty."

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Bureau Dir. Nelson M. Bortz, several state labor commissioners, former Labor Dept. officials and experts from labor and industry took part in the program.

In panel discussions:

- Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. stressed that states need, in addition to comprehensive safety codes and legislation, "competent staff, including fully trained safety inspectors who are well paid and not subject to political appointment or removal."

Noting the great gap between states, Gritta cited Mississippi's expenditure of only 5 cents a year for each worker to promote occupational safety, and Oregon's $2.33 per worker expenditure. While each safety inspector in Oregon oversees conditions of 9,000 workers, Mississippi has only one safety inspector for each 400,000 workers.

- Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes called for both federal and state action to expand coverage of labor standards, including minimum wage laws, to more workers. The service trades, he pointed out, are both an expanding field and one whose workers "most need the protection of various kinds of minimum standards." He told the gathering:

"If anyone deserves the special attention of all government—federal, state and local—it is precisely the service workers. Yet they are the people who have been left out most often when standards legislation has been passed."

Schnitzler told the conference that "the gap between the accepted goals of workmen's compensation and the actual protection provided injured workers is far too wide."

Contract Benefits Cited

He pointed out that union contracts provide benefits which ignore state boundaries—on wages, retirement and working conditions. But, he noted, if members of the same union employed by the same company are injured on the job, their compensation would vary widely according to the state workmen's compensation law.

In most states, he added, "there are more game wardens to protect wild animals than there are safety inspectors to protect our working citizens."

Pay Up 4 Percent In Transit Pacts

Hourly wage scales of local transit employes rose by 4 percent under union contracts between July 1, 1963, and July 1, 1964, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics has reported. The increase was 11 cents for operators of surface cars and buses, 12 cents for those on elevated and subway systems.

Rates rose during the year for more than 98 percent of the 63,000 employes in the bureau's annual survey of union scales in cities of 100,000 or more population. Scales averaged $2.74 for surface operators, $2.94 for elevated and subway operators.

Locals Propose Steel Pact Goals

New York — Guidelines for Steelworkers' negotiators were outlined here at a meeting of 700 local union leaders who voiced their opinions on what 500,000 members hope to get from the 11 basic steel firms in forthcoming negotiations.

At the close of a two-day session, Pres. David J. McDonald told newsmen that plant-level committees will seek to settle local issues first and then will open talks on national issues about Dec. 15.

The union's 170-member Wage-Policy Committee sat in on the meetings to get grassroots reactions before formulating proposed contract improvements.

Asks 'Coalition of Conscience':

Randolph Lists Goals In Civil Rights Fight

Chicago—A. Philip Randolph called for a "coalition of conscience" to achieve the goals of the civil rights movement as he addressed 750 unionists attending the 10th Labor Conference on Civil Rights here.

Randolph, an AFL-CIO vice president and head of the Sleeping Car Porters, said these goals are:

- A war on poverty going beyond the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. "Billions must be spent on housing, public works and schools," he said.
- Quality, integrated education for all American children.
- New laws to assure Negroes their voting rights if the Civil Rights Act of 1964 fails to do the job.

Elements Listed

Randolph said the "coalition of conscience" should include the civil rights organizations, labor groups, the major church organizations and others interested in the cause of human freedom.

The conference, sponsored by the Jewish Labor Committee and endorsed by the Chicago AFL-CIO, presented a plaque to Randolph "in recognition of outstanding leadership in civil rights and labor movements."

Civil Rights Awards presented at the conference luncheon included trophies to the Federation News, publication of the Chicago AFL-CIO; Gilbert Cornfield, member of Teachers Local 189 and a labor attorney; Machinists Lodge 113 and Chicago Fur & Leather Workers Local 45F.

Scroll awards were given to the Chicago Union Teacher and Interval, publications of the Chicago Teachers Union; No. 1 News, magazine of Chicago Flat Janitors Local 1; Mrs. Tobie Schein, Chicago Teachers Union; Painters Local 237; and Bakery & Confectionery Workers Local 1.

New Project Announced

Thomas E. Faul, secretary-treasurer of the Chicago AFL-CIO, announced that the central body has approved a new civil rights project —legal aid for individuals who have civil rights complaints but cannot afford to engage attorneys. He said the Chicago AFL-CIO is selecting a panel of lawyers for the project.

Morris Bialis, a board member of the Chicago AFL-CIO and a vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, was conference chairman. He declared that any attempt to cut off funds of the Illinois Fair Employment Practices Commission will be met by stiff labor opposition. State Sen. John A. Graham (R) has threatened to scuttle FEPC appropriations in the 1965 General Assembly.

Jacob Siegel, chairman of the Jewish Labor Committee, said that Pres. Johnson now has a mandate from the American people to implement the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Randolph declared that the civil rights movement is working to enforce the new law. He expressed gratification at the landslide received by Johnson and pride in the role played by Negro voters.

"The Negro has developed a new sense of his political power," Randolph said. "He must use that power as does labor—to defeat his enemies and elect the friends of justice."

Workshops Held

Five conference workshop sessions covered national and state civil rights legislation, immigration, employment, local union civil rights programs, housing and community facilities.

The conference urged:

- Full enforcement of state and federal civil rights laws.
- Full labor support for changes in immigration laws introduced by the late Pres. John F. Kennedy.
- Continued local union and community action to help immigrants adjust to a new life here with special attention to informing newcomers of their union and community rights and responsibilities.
- Support for the Illinois Fair Employment Practices Commission, with more funds and staff.
- Union support in the General Assembly for more state matching funds for Manpower Development & Training projects.
- Use and support of the Chicago Apprenticeship Information Center.
- Establishment of local union civil rights committees.
- Implementation of the Hauser and Havighurst reports on the Chicago school system to speed up integration and improve the quality of the education offered.
- Use of union pension and welfare funds for investment in low-cost, integrated housing and loans for mortgages on integrated housing.

White Collar Pay Study Finds 2-5 Percent Rise

A survey of more than 1 million employes in private industry shows that salary levels rose 2-5 percent in the year ending last February-March for most of the clerical, technical, professional and administrative jobs studied, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Among the larger groups studied, increases in salaries averaged 2.8 percent for accountants, 2.9 percent for clerical workers and engineers, 3.3 percent for chemists, 3.6 for engineering technicians.

The survey was made by the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics and will be used as a basis for comparing federal salaries with the general pay levels in private industry. About 75 selected occupational levels were included.

BLS reported that, for the three-year period beginning in February or March 1961, average salary levels rose from 7.7 to 11.7 percent for the 12 groups surveyed.

Median increases were 8.3 percent for clerical levels, 9.9 percent for lower-professional and administrative levels, 10.4 percent for fully experienced workers.

Among all work levels, average monthly salaries ranged from $259 for filing clerks to $2,024 for attorneys in charge of legal staffs for business firms. Salaries for engineers varied from $612 a month for college graduate-trainees to $1,707 for those dealing with highly complex engineering programs.

For accountants, the range was $520 to $964 a month; attorneys, from $604 for trainees to $2,024; stenographers, from $356 for general stenographers to $402 for seniors.

Iona Confers Honorary Degree:

Extremists Scored by Meany As 'Divisive' Threat to Nation

versary of the founding of the college by the Christian Brothers of Ireland.

The Iona president, Rev. Brother Richard B. Power, in conferring the honorary degree, praised the AFL-CIO president as "an intrepid fighter against communistic and other corrupting influences in the labor movement and an insistent voice for interracial justice."

The doctoral citation, delivered by Rev. Brother Leo R. Downey, chairman of the philosophy department, acclaimed Meany as a "staunch champion of the world's working men" and an "implacable foe of corruption and communism."

In his address, Meany drew a parallel between the objectives of the college and of the AFL-CIO, and stressed the need for education in today's increasingly complex world.

The college, he said, is built on the proposition that education is a basic need if each individual is to realize his full potential and make his maximum contribution to society.

"You have sought to minimize the economic barriers to a higher education and to make it available without regard to race, creed or color," he continued. "And you have maintained the principle that higher education in its true meaning must enlarge the perception of moral values and personal responsibility for the course of human affairs.

"American labor embraces the same aspirations and seeks the same goals."

He recalled that the first unions made universal free education one of their prime objectives, and that ever since, organized labor has been seeking to extend opportunities for education, improve its quality and quantity, and eliminate social and economic barriers to its fullest utilization.

"Adequate education is a prime condition to survival in this complex modern world," Meany declared. "The future of our democracy and the continued existence of human freedom depend upon an informed public, capable of reasoning among a bewildering array of constantly shifting alternatives."

The changes going on in the world, he emphasized, call not only for the elimination of illiteracy in its traditional sense, but also of "social and political illiteracy, the illiteracy of bias and prejudice and the illiteracy of indifference."

"We can never go back to simpler and more placid times," he said. "Nor can we afford to make believe that we have no responsibilities as individuals for the course of national or world events.

"It is futile to struggle blindly against the realities of modern life or to deny their existence. We must learn to live proudly and intelligently with these complexities and with our responsibilities as citizens of a free democracy.

"This requires education in its best and highest sense, and education grounded upon those principles which do not, or should not, change—the moral and ethical values of humanity and the duty of a man to his brother."

In recent years, Meany pointed out, communism has lost much of its appeal as a forerunner of escape from poverty and oppression. As a result, he maintained, the free world has a "splendid opportunity" to expose it as a fraud instead of a system of human betterment, "and to further demonstrate the superiority of democracy, under freedom, as the means to achieve the higher goals of mankind."

"We are doing so today," he declared, "in moving to eliminate the remnants of racialism and to enlarge and protect the civil rights of all of our citizens without regard to creed or color. We have embarked upon a far-reaching effort to find and correct the causes of poverty and to expand the horizons of opportunity for all Americans.

Friends in Need

"We have taken the lead in supporting the aspirations of the newly-emerging nations for freedom, national development and human progress. Our representatives visit and work with these people not as agents of subversion and chaos or the vanguard of empire, but as friends in need, with no other aim than to help in the realization of their goals under freedom.

"These are great tasks and great opportunities."

The U.S. labor movement, Meany pledged, will do its share to help the country meet the challenges of the age positively and constructively.

"We rely upon teachers such as you have here, who have devoted their lives to the cause of education," he concluded, "and upon the students who are the beneficiaries of such teaching, to help provide the inspiration, the dedication and the capacity for leadership required for the survival and progress of freedom at this vital time in history."

Clothing Workers' Film Given Public Premiere

New York—The Clothing Workers' award-winning 50th anniversary film, "The Inheritance," is being given its first commercial showing, a limited three-week run at the Carnegie Hall Cinema.

On hand for the premiere were film actor Robert Ryan, who is the narrator, and folk singer Judy Collins, who brought some of the songs from the soundtrack back to the stage live after the showing.

Originally commissioned for the ACWA's 50th anniversary celebration this year, the film expands beyond the story of the growth of a single union to unfold the history of organized labor in this country over the past 60 years.

It is a tribute to the millions of immigrant workers who poured into America at the turn of the century. Looking at the world through their eyes, "The Inheritance" documents their struggle against poverty, misery, and unbelievable deprivation and their continuing search for freedom in a fast-changing world.

In time, the film spans the period of more than a half-century from the immigration sheds of Ellis Island to the civil rights struggle in Birmingham. It moves through the birth pains of the ACWA, the tumultuous strikes of the steel and coal workers in the 1920s and '30s, through World Wars I and II, to the relative industrial maturity of the present day.

Film Award Winner

"The Inheritance" is the work of film and television producer-director Harold Mayer. It recently won a Gold Ducats award at the Intl. Film Festival in Mannheim, West Germany.

Millard Lampell did the script, and George Kleinsinger composed and conducted the original musical score. The soundtrack features the voices of noted folksingers including Lampell, himself, who was one of the original members of the Almanac Singers.

Completed with the full cooperation of the ACWA executive board, the film drew upon the specific experience of the union's three top officers: Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum, and Executive Vice Pres. Hyman Blumberg.

Conference Awards Cite Labor Safety Programs

Chicago—Labor safety awards for outsanding efforts in 1963 were presented here to seven unions and four union leaders.

Awards in the form of plaques were given the winners by Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers during the National Safety Council's 52d annual convention and exposition.

Wharton is the Council's vice president for labor and head of the labor conference, which established the labor awards program in 1961 to recognize superior contributions by the labor movement.

Harry Read memorial awards, named in honor of the late assistant to the AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer, were presented to the following:

Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Local 8-12058 of Niagara Falls, N. Y., for a well-rounded safety program; Bakery & Confectionery Workers Local 3 of Long Island City, N. Y., for a successful program with continuity; the Washington, D. C., office of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers for a full-time safety program; Operating Engineers Local 150, Chicago, for over-all programs stressing safety training; Machinists Lodge 851 of Joliet, Ill., for active participation in community safety programs, including the promotion of seat belts; Goodyear Local 2 and Firestone Local 7 of the Rubber Workers in Akron, O., for programs emphasizing training.

Individual Winners

Citations for individual effort in accident prevention were won by William McCullough of Ontario Hydro Employes Local 1000, Toronto, Ont., the first Canadian award winner; Murray Miller, health-safety coordinator for Bakery Local 3 of Long Island City, N. Y.; Safety Dir. John R. Kumpel of the Rubber Workers, Akron, O., and Safety Dir. Lloyd D. Utter of the Auto Workers, Detroit.

Overtime Sought For Pharmacists

The Retail Clerks have filed a suit in U. S. District Court for the District of Columbia asking that Drug Fair-Community Drug Co., Inc., be ordered to pay overtime and penalties to nearly 200 pharmacists.

The union said it filed the suit on behalf of its Local 400 after a substantial number of pharmacists charged the firm had violated overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act which became effective last Sept. 3.

The suit was said to be the first of its kind in the retail field. The act provides that an employer who breaks the law is liable for "liquidated damages" equal to the underpayment.

Auto Workers Narrow Disputes at Ford Plants

Detroit—The Auto Workers reached a strike-ending "pattern" agreement with the Allis-Chalmers farm implement firm and then concentrated on settling the last two local level agreements at Ford Motor Co. plants.

UAW Pres. Walter P. Reuther told newsmen on his return from a world automotive congress in Frankfurt, Germany, that he hopes for a quick settlement of disputes over work loads, overtime and other local working conditions at Ford.

The last two plants involved were the Ford manufacturing plant at Sterling, Mich., with 6,200 workers, and the Wayne, Mich., assembly plant with 3,000 UAW-covered employes. They were among the nine that struck over local issues. All others have reached agreement, the union said.

The strikes involved only 22,000 of Ford's 124,000 workers but the firm laid off 90,000 others when shortages of axles and other parts developed.

The Allis-Chalmers agreement was recommended by UAW negotiators for ratification by 11,500 workers in five plants. Won after a 10-day strike, it provides wage, pension and early-retirement gains won in previous auto and agricultural implement contracts.

Wages and working conditions of more than 16,000 additional UAW members are at stake in three other strikes. The union has won two settlements in the walkout of 6,400 members against 59 tool and die shops here. Unsettled are strikes of 6,000 members at four Mack Truck plants and 4,000 White Motor Co. workers at three locations.

First Negro Named Flight Dispatcher

Arlington, Va.—The Air Line Dispatchers have announced the promotion of member Ted Nelson of Utica, N. Y., to the position of flight dispatcher for Mohawk Airlines.

ALDA said Nelson is the first Negro to dispatch for an American air carrier since the federal government first laid down the requirements for licensed dispatchers 26 years ago. The union said the calling requires a high degree of professional knowledge and skill along with the ability to withstand severe pressures, including in-flight emergencies.

Report Studies Clerical Jobs For Women

The girl looking for her first job or the housewife returning to the labor force can get a steer in the right direction from a new study, "Clerical Occupations for Women—Today and Tomorrow," just made public by the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept.

The clerical field, it declares, is undergoing "the most significant change since the invention of the first office machines" due in part to "automation and other technological trends." The nation gives employment to 10 million clerks, it says, of whom 7 million are women. By 1975 the total is expected to reach 14 million.

The study discusses job opportunities, duties, educational and skill requirements and earnings in 21 occupations, including seven in which two-thirds of the jobs are held by women—secretary, stenographer, bookkeeper, typist, cashier, telephone operator and office machine operator.

In the decade between 1950 and 1960, the median age of the woman clerical worker rose from 30 to 36 years, the study shows. However, it continues, women over 45, "and even some over 30," still find it more difficult to get jobs than younger women although employers "have rated older workers high in reliability, emotional stability and loyalty to the job."

The number of Negro women in clerical work increased from about 74,000 in 1950 to about 182,000 in 1960—three times the growth rate for white women in clerical jobs, the report says.

The Year Since Dallas

THE YEAR that has passed so quickly since that horrible moment in Dallas is in its way the nation's own testament to John Fitzgerald Kennedy.

In his thousand days the young President, representing a new generation of Americans come of age to leadership, brought a courageous vision of America and the world as it could be and clothed this vision with vigor and eloquence and style.

His "let us begin" rallied a nation to new directions that brought it out of the desert of economic recessions. His New Frontier gave the world a new respect for America's democratic leadership and its ability to bring an easing of world tensions.

John Kennedy's vision was a long one, the vision of a man who understood the world he had grown up in and the nature of the changes that were being wrought in the second half of the Twentieth Century. He had hoped to lay the groundwork for his programs and policies in the early years of his Administration with a view to consolidation and advancement in the anticipated second term of his leadership.

Then came the completely inexplicable assassin's bullet in Dallas on Nov. 22, 1963, and the vision was shattered for the moment in the drumrolls of a funeral march.

BUT THE FLAME never went out. Lyndon Baines Johnson's "let us continue" brought to fruition the Kennedy vision of equal rights for all men, of new economic policies designed to provide continuing wellbeing for the nation, of a wide range of programs to extend and improve the ideals of social justice and equal rights in a democracy.

And then, earlier this month, the nation passed judgment. It rejected with an almost awesome margin of votes the challenge to the vision and the policies of the young President and to Lyndon Johnson's extremely successful implementation and extension of those policies.

The verdict of the people was "let us continue" so that John Fitzgerald Kennedy's eloquent vision would move closer to realization; so that the country itself would become his memorial.

Pres. Johnson's magnificent victory was a fulfillment of John Fitzgerald Kennedy and also a new beginning as the President charts a course toward a Great Society of peace and prosperity and justice with special emphasis on the underprivileged one-fifth of the nation that is not sharing in the well-being, in the opportunities of a relatively affluent country.

THE MEMORY of John Fitzgerald Kennedy is fresh and vibrant as the nation mourns on the first anniversary of his death. For the nation well remembers the words of his inaugural address:

"In the long history of the world, only a few generations have been granted the role of defending freedom in its hour of maximum danger. I do not shrink from this responsibility—I welcome it. I do not believe that any of us would exchange places with any other people or any other generation.

"The energy, the faith, the devotion which we bring to this endeavor will light our country and all who serve it—and the glow from that fire can truly light the world."

Labor Mourns:

Anniversary of Kennedy's Death Recalls Great Loss to World

The following is excerpted from a statement by the AFL-CIO Council on the death of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy adopted at an emergency meeting Nov. 26, 1963.

THE INCREDIBLE LOSS of Pres. Kennedy has put a stunned world in mourning.

Taken from our midst in madness and violence was a young man of stature and strength, a man with a zest for life, who had gaiety and wit and wisdom beyond his years. And even more, taken from us was a leader of greatness and courage and compassion—a humanitarian whose love of his fellow man was broad beyond belief.

All who love freedom and their fellow man now mourn. Aside from his immediate family, none mourn him more than the working people of this world, the voiceless millions bowed with grief. Only a handful of them knew him personally. But to all he was their leader, their champion, their friend.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy earned their confidence, their trust, their friendship. He gave them courage and a sense of destiny. He led them toward great victories over adversity that only a man of compassion could understand.

Most of all, John Kennedy understood the degradation and humiliation that millions of Americans of different race and religious belief know in too many parts of our land. A descendant of immigrants, a communicant of a religious faith that also knew persecution, Pres. Kennedy put his heart and strength into the struggle for civil rights.

More than any President since Abraham Lincoln, whose fate he shared, John Kennedy brought to America understanding of the struggle, appreciation of the plight of the victims of discrimination and segregation, determination that America must —and would—win this battle against hatred.

And never did John Kennedy lapse into the smugness of victory. No success meant relaxation to him. He knew always that there were new goals ahead, new victories needed, new enemies of mankind to be conquered.

The prosperity which marked his 1,031 days in office was only a source of partial satisfaction to him. As he told us only a week before his martyrdom, partial prosperity is not enough; there can be no satisfaction while millions go jobless

That was typical of John Kennedy for across the whole spectrum of American life—economic and social—John F. Kennedy stood for progress. He had no low horizons. He had faith in the limitless capacity of America and of Americans. He was a realist in both foreign and domestic affairs and he faced the realities without fear.

It was that very courage which, when the Soviets challenged us with their Cuban missiles, brought the world through one of its most perilous periods. The surprised respect which that crucial event won from the Communist world, and from our allies as well, may well go down in history as a turning-point in mankind's struggle for peace and freedom.

FOR EVEN as we Americans thought of him as our leader, John Kennedy was much more than that. He was not only a national leader but a world leader. He had the respect of presidents, prime ministers and kings; and somehow he had also won the faith and confidence of the world's people, in Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America alike.

There are few men in any age—men who can combine in themselves the fresh eye of youth with the wisdom of experience; the warmth of instinct with the coldness of necessity; the scholar's grasp with the politician's astuteness—men who dare to dream great dreams and yet dare to be practical as well.

John Fitzgerald Kennedy was such a man and, because he was, our sorrow is all the greater.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council speaks for workers everywhere in mourning the loss of this great and beloved man, a loss all the more terrible for the manner in which it was suffered. We extend to his widow, whose magnificent courage during these tragic days has won the admiration of all; to his children, to his parents and to the other members of his family our most profound condolences.

To his memory, we pledge our unstinting devotion to the building of the world of which he dreamed—a world in which mankind can be free yet safe, a world in which brotherhood is fact for all men.

Morgan Says:

Dangerous Holiday Weekend A Time to Eye Highway Signs

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

YOU MAY NOT BE superstitious, but on the long holiday weekend it would be a wise idea to believe in signs. Highway signs. And the inescapable signs of the time showing that traffic deaths are increasing at an alarming rate.

A New York Times editorial noted gravely some weeks back that in just the first six months of this year 21,280 persons were killed in highway fatalities, a rise of 12 percent from 1963.

Morgan

"The statistics," said the Times, "are more disturbing when matched against the long-term trend. For two years in a row, 1962 and 1963, there was a nationwide increase in the mileage death rate —that is, the number of deaths per 100 million vehicle miles of travel. In 1961 this mileage death rate had reached an all-time low of 5.2, an encouraging long-term decline from 18.2 from 1923-27. Unless the balance of 1964 shows a large, unexpected improvement in safety—and the second half of the year is, for various reasons, usually more deadly than the first half—the full year toll can be expected to set a record surpassing the 43,600 deaths of 1963.

"Safer cars, safer highways, safer drivers, more careful pedestrians—these are about all we have to rely on for reducing death on the road. Government, by modernizing highways of built-in greater safetly, has spared thousands of lives. But the process is necessarily slow.

"The man behind the wheel has it almost exclusively within his power to make an immediate improvement in the death rate. But the pedestrian could, by looking out for himself, save a good many lives too. Nearly a third of those killed so far in New York State (for example) were on foot."

Such statistics of slaughter make warfare resemble a marble game on a vacant lot by comparison. The total U.S. casualties in South Vietnam, deep personal tragedy though each one represents, cannot begin to match the mechanical murder and suicide on U.S. roads—and it is too easy for us to forget that personal tragedy is involved in these figures, too. Besides those killed, reflect on the thousands maimed for life.

I am not at all sure that our $40 billion superhighway program embraces sufficient safety factors to combat the problem effectively. How can a solution be a satisfactory solution if, as the Times points out, the mileage death rate continues to climb?

The new turnpikes and expressways are curving, in a sense, in a vicious circle. With the lunging rise of the human population, the automobile population is bound to soar too, at least as long as the economy does not falter. Repeatedly the experience of the traffic experts has been that a new thruway or beltway or arterial attracts more traffic without necessarily easing to any marked degree the jams on other routes.

RECORDS REVEAL that high speed is the most lethal cause of accidents, yet cars on the new big highways are traveling faster and faster. That raises another problem. At such high speeds route signs have to be bigger and bigger if a driver is to catch his turnoff soon enough—and safely enough not to menace the rushing flow of traffic in other lanes. Dusk or rainfall at a major highway interchange produces a blurring nightmare that Henry Ford could never have envisioned.

Another hazard that the heavier traffic on king-size highways intensifies is headlight blindness.

Superhighways cost $1 million a mile or more now. Add to that the cost of landscaping the medians which separate the going from the coming streams of cars as a buffer against head-on collisions and a screen against headlight glare. Add another item of improved directional and route signs and the lighting thereof and you confront a problem of rocketing expenditures that will make the popular exercise of the 1960s of attempted federal budget-balancing look like an equation in second-grade arithmetic.

There is a certain fascinating madness to all this. One vital support of the American economy is the production of steel for the production of cars.

This requires the construction of more and more highways to put them on so that the more and more people who buy them can get to the office and the supermarket more handily and escape more quickly on holiday weekends to the countryside which is rapidly being bulldozed away to make room for wider thoroughfares which quickly become new bottlenecks, increasing the lethal hazards to the motoring public which is trying to speed home to watch TV or scramble to the hinterland for a little respite from the monoxide fumes and the monstrous tieups which nobody would dream of doing without.

'Domestic Peace Corps' Seen Vital Part of War on Poverty

WANTED: Men and women over 18 for difficult work in grim surroundings. Must be willing to live in slums. Long hours guaranteed. Pay, $50 a month and living allowance.

That's an ad for VISTA, Volunteers in Service to America, a kind of domestic Peace Corps, as projected by an imaginative reporter.

VISTA is an integral part of the President's war against poverty, Glenn Ferguson, a former Peace Corps official now recruiting for VISTA, explained on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 radio stations.

Volunteers in the war against poverty, he said would be high school graduates of any age boom 18 to 80 who can provide day-care, assist elderly citizens, provide recreational or community development assistance, teach plumbing, carpentry, or other building trades, and teach pre-school youngsters. They would receive training of from four to six weeks, serve 12 months, and live in the area they serve.

Ferguson said that VISTA recruits will be an essential part of Community Action programs, working closely with community organizations set up under the program, and with local and state public agencies.

He said VISTA does anticipate that its recruits will face physical or other dangers.

"I think the greatest danger is the question of adjustment," he went on. "Very few Americans who are not among the one-fifth who need help—who are not in the poverty cycle—understand the reality, psychology and posture of poverty. We will seek in the training period to give volunteers from middle-class America some idea of this way of life to reduce the difficulty of adjustment.

VISTA DIFFERS from the Peace Corps, said Ferguson, in that "we are asking Americans to help Americans, to work in a country they supposedly understand, where the people accept the basic tenets of democracy. The reality will be that the volunteers will be exposed to situations which they don't understand. The level of frustration will be high."

The VISTA program, he suggested, may help influence more Americans to be nurses, social workers, public program people, groups now in short supply.

"There are still too many Americans today in terms of these needs, too few who respond to this kind of challenge," he declared.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

(Willard Shelton is on vacation. His column will be resumed in the issue of Dec. 5.)

RIGHT WING extremists who have been blanketing the country with propaganda and who played so vicious a role during the presidential election are being challenged by two highly responsible organizations.

One of them is the National Council for Civil Responsibility, which is monitoring radio and TV programs of 10 leading right wing organizations and will issue a digest of their contents.

The council is headed by Dr. Arthur Larson, former assistant to Pres. Eisenhower, and is supported by the Public Affairs Institute, a non-profit research organization in Washington.

The council will send transcripts to any organization or person subject to radio attack. There are more than 7,000 radio and TV programs weekly put out by right wing groups such as the Manion Forum, America's Future, Church League of America, White Citizens' Council and the Rev. Carl McIntire.

"We plan to challenge the spokesmen for the radical right with their own words," Larson said. "For too long they have filled the air with noxious propaganda, but there has been no physical record."

THE COUNCIL is sending a five-minute "antidote" to the right wing broadcasts called "Spotlight on Extremism" to more than 30 radio stations. It also has published a pamphlet.

Among its members are Pres. Al J. Hayes of the Machinists; Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers; Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Pres. Jacob Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, and Pres. Charles Cogen of the Teachers.

Monitoring of the right wing propaganda is being done by Group Research, which for some years has specialized in research on the right wing.

Another organization which has shown deep concern over the growth of right wing propaganda is the National Council of the Churches of Christ, made up of 31 of the leading Protestant denominations in the country. The council has come under frequent fire from right wing extremists and fundamentalist sects that accuse it of "modernism."

In its publication, Information Service, the church group has made a comprehensive review of material on the nature, methods and objectives of right wing extremists and their propaganda and organizations. Calling attention to the role of the extremist groups in the presidential election, the council declared that the challenge now "is to the basic philosophy of democracy and to government itself as we have known it."

INFORMATION SERVICE carries reviews of three major books on extremist organizations: "The Strange Tactics of Extremism," by Harry and Bonaro Overstreet; "Danger on the Right," by Arnold Foster and Benjamin R. Epstein; and "The Christian Fright Peddlers," by Brooke R. Walker. The service also includes a review of an article on the John Birch Soicety by the Rev. Robert A. Graham, S.J.

"This special issue is devoted to exposure of an ugly fact in present-day American life—methodical attempts to destroy our country's democratic processes and its free institutions by irresponsible extremists and their network of groups," said Fletcher Coats, director of the National Council's Office of Information.

"Particular reference is made in this study to what appears to be savage and often hate-fed extremist attacks on the nation's organized churches and their boards and agencies, including the 31-denomination National Council of the Churches of Christ.

"It is now time to draw attention to this situation that affects all Americans as a national community, and to expose the nature and extent of organized groups which would radically modify our free institutions and social processes, and bring about a closed American Society." (PAI)

VISTA, the domestic Peace Corps now being recruited for the war against poverty, offers Americans an opportunity to help Americans, Glenn Ferguson (right), a recruiter, said on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program. The interviewer is Harry W. Flannery.

How to Buy:

Buying Insurance for Students Calls for Long, Careful Scrutiny

By Sidney Margolius

WE'RE GETTING more inquiries about insurance than any other consumer question that worries families, with the exception of food costs. The reasons for the confusion are understandable: families feel impelled to buy many different types of insurance; most people are not experienced in buying it, and the great variation in policies covering the same risk adds to the perplexity; and insurance is subject to "hard" selling.

If you are considering insurance as a form of saving, you need to compare how large a fund other types of saving would accumulate in the same period. If you are buying as a form of protection, you must compare with at least two other insurers to see what their policies offer in relation to cost.

The latest mail-order campaigns seem to be centered on life insurance for students and on specialized health insurance plans, including insurance for non-drinkers and accident insurance for seniors.

Mrs. M. D. asks about an insurance plan for students that she is considering "investing in" for her daughter, now in her second year of college. The cost seems "ridiculously low" but she has "seen too many offers that did not live up to the advertising."

In this plan, the company charges $40 a year for $10,000 of term insurance. At age 28, the policy automatically becomes $10,000 of straight or whole-life insurance (which includes cash value), and the premium jumps to $149 for men and $135 for women.

Another reader, Mrs. A. C., asks about a similar "college insurance" plan that many of her friends and she are interested in but that "sounds too good to be true." This plan charges $20 a year for the first four years, for $10,000 of insurance for students under 24. Then the policy converts to whole-life insurance and the cost jumps to $150, with dividends which may reduce it.

These plans, while they are still on a term basis, undoubtedly are inexpensive. That's because term insurance at this age usually is cheap to buy because of the low mortality of this age group.

The costs of these policies when they convert to straight or whole-life (also called ordinary life) also are not out of line with charges by other insurers for similar insurance, although we have seen a few that are lower.

But the real questions are does a youngster actually need life insurance, especially a girl, and especially this much; and can this insurance really be considered the best investment for a youngster when other forms of saving can accumulate a bigger fund?

The cash-surrender value is what you really need to compare. For example, in one of these policies, the cash value at the end of three years of the whole-life plan is only $62. In comparison, putting $135 a year (the girls' rate) into a savings account paying just 4 percent interest (many credit unions and savings associations pay more), would amount to $438.

THIS IS NOT to say that the insurance company has kept all the rest of the money. It has taken some for its selling and administrative expense but it also has provided you with insurance during this period.

Similarly, in the second plan you would pay in $980 during the first 10 years for the policy combining insurance and savings, but the cash value at the end of the tenth year would be only $290.

Some people feel that an insurance-plus-cash value policy forces them to save. In that case, it is urgent to compare cash values among different policies of the same whole-life type. Even though some companies may charge the same premiums as others, there may be a significant variation in cash-surrender value.

On the score of the insurance part of these policies, it does not seem useful to insure the lives of girl students with no dependents. There may be more purpose to insure boys who subsequently will have families to protect. It may do no harm to take out such insurance during the student years, especially since this guarantees that the student will have insurance later no matter what his health and insurability are at that time. Then, before the low-cost term insurance converts to the higher-cost whole-life policy, you can review whether you want to continue, or are in good enough health to get other term insurance and use other forms of saving.

From Soup to Nonsense:

Do You Realize You're Living With Tomorrow's Antiques?

By Jane Goodsell

SOME DAY, in some dim and distant future a hundred or so years from now, people will view the 20th Century as the olden times. The Jet Age will take its place in the history books, and it will seem as remote as the Jeffersonian Era.

Contour chairs and fluorescent light fixtures will be sold in antique shops, and our descendants will view contemporary (to us, that is) pop art as period pieces. Our great-great-great granddaughters will plant ivy in our quaint old electric casseroles, and boast to each other of the adorable old-fashioned plastic coffee mugs they picked up in out-of-the-way antique shops.

"You know how difficult it is to find genuine 20th Century plastic," they'll say. "It's terribly rare."

Our clothes—our stretch pants and bulky sweaters and madras sports shirts—will look as out-of-date as knee breeches and hoop skirts; and our drip-dry fabrics of orlon and dacron and viscose rayon will seem as quaintly old-fashioned as linsey-woolsey.

Our miracle drugs—tranquilizers and antibiotics—will seem as outdated as sulphur and molasses is today. Our spectacular 1965 cars with their disc brakes and recessed front grilles and tilted steering wheels will be as obsolete as the Stanley Steamer. Our descendants will shake their heads in wonderment and murmur, "Imagine what it must have been like to drive one of those relics!"

EVERYONE WILL GASP in amazement at the low cost of living back in 1964 when you could buy a car for less than $3,000 and filet mignon cost only $1.79 a pound.

A few split-level houses will be preserved as historic monuments. Ladies, appropriately garbed in picturesque 20th Century costumes, will lead schoolchildren through them on guided tours. The children will exclaim in astonishment at our funny old sunken bathtubs, our quaint television sets and our old-time electric can openers. An occasional artifact, as unfamiliar as a stereopticon is to us, will puzzle them into asking, "What's that?"

"That," the guide will explain, "is an authentic reproduction of an old-fashioned motorized barbecue. Your great-great-great grandparents probably used one very much like it."

That's posterity for you. Deflating, isn't it?

UNION INDUSTRIES Information Center, an exhibit hall and trade center designed to serve as a clearing house for information on union-made products, has been opened at 20 E. 15th St., New York City, by the Union Label & Service Trades Council of the metropolitan area and the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. of the State AFL-CIO. Survey Shows:

Consumer Attitude More Optimistic

CONSUMERS JUDGED both their personal financial situation and the general business outlook in a more confident and optimistic manner in September than three months earlier, University of Michigan Survey Research Center reports.

An unusually large number of middle and upper income families reported salary or wage increases during the summer, but the greatest improvement in attitudes was in the long-range economic outlook.

"It was concluded from past survey findings that the anticipation of the tax cut strengthened consumer confidence," the report says. "Yet the actual reduction of tax withholdings which took effect in March 1964, was not received with enthusiaism since most people felt that the amount of increase in their take-home pay was quite small and made no great difference to them.

"While those feelings persisted during the summer, consumer sentiment improved in this period. The frequency of increases in before-tax income was very high prior to September 1964; the American people on the whole were aware of prosperous economic conditions; a substantial proportion also knew that good times have endured for a fairly long time; the notion that a new recession would recur soon was held by fewer people than in earlier years."

Between June and September 1964 the proportion of family units (income between $5,000 and $20,000) expecting good business conditions during the next five years jumped from 39 percent to 45 percent.

"THE FREQUENCY of expenditures on cars, other durables, or additions to homes appears, according to survey data, to be related to favorable developments in salaries or wages rather than to awareness of benefits from the tax cut," the report states.

Survey evidence on accelerated debt repayments was obtained. A relatively large proportion of respondents reported that in 1964 they repaid installment debt faster than scheduled.

In summing up the consequences of its findings, the report concludes:

"Since consumer sentiment has become more optimistic, decisions to embark on major expenditures should become more frequent. Recent debt repayments and increases in savings also point to greater readiness to spend. A further increase in the rate of saving does not appear probable. The prospects are that the economy will be stimulated by substantial consumer demand during the Christmas season and also in the spring of next year, when fiscal policy will provide a much smaller new stimulus than in the spring of this year."

'Rx for a Nightmare' Presented on Film As People Speak Up for Hospital Care

WALTER NEWBURGHER

"You have to be J. P. Morgan to afford" insurance.

LILLIAN HERSTEIN

"Social Security . . . we take it for granted."

The televised appeal for social security hospital insurance that hit with such impact when it was shown during the presidential campaign is now available for rental or purchase by labor and other groups.

Entitled "Rx for a Nightmare," it was produced for the National Council of Senior Citizens and presented on time made available by the Columbia Broadcasting System TV network after an American Medical Association program denouncing the social security plan.

The NCSC presentation was simple but powerful. It consisted of more than a score of people telling in their own words why they think Congress should enact a law providing old-age hospital protection—a thread woven into the fabric of drama by the narration of E. G. Marshall, television actor who regularly stars in "The Defenders" and who told the audience he was not acting, but participated "as a citizen."

The program brought together the great and the obscure—those who had led the fight for the program, such as Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N.M.), and those who see in it a personal safeguard against disaster, demoralization and even death.

Among the less-knowns were not only elders but younger people. Melvin Denlein, Baltimore clothing cutter, for example, explained to the TV audience that he had "just an average man's salary" to provide for his two children and his 71-year-old father.

"If my father gets sick—I mean, if he was to get really hit with a hospital bill," he asked, "well, who'd take care of it? It'd have to be me. Something like that—it would kill everything. It would hit my future and my children's future. I'm up to here now. One more thing and I'd drown."

What Denlein meant was pointed up by two physicians. Said Dr. John Knowles, director of Massachusetts General Hospital, Boston:

"First-rate medical treatment is expensive. And it's going to get more expensive. It has gone past what the ordinary citizen can deal with by himself—most of all, if he's elderly."

"If it's an elderly patient and I know he can't afford it, I can forget to send him a bill," said Dr. Benjamin Krugman, for 25 years a family doctor in Paterson, N. J. "But when I have to send him to a hospital, that is it—there's nothing I can do."

One of the senior citizens who appeared on the program was Max Block, 73-year-old retired fur merchant from New York who carried private medical insurance for 40 years—and then put in a claim when he had a coronary attack. The policy was cancelled when the next payment was due.

"At my age, he said, "the kind of insurance I need, you have to be J. P. Morgan to afford it."

Marshall as narrator summed everything up pretty succinctly: "Medical care for the aged isn't just a problem for grandpa, out there watching the kids in the playground, or grandma back in the kitchen," he said. "It touches us all."

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has copies of "Rx for a Nightmare" for sale and for rent, and is urging local unions and central bodies to place orders promptly so the film can be shown to labor and community audiences before Congress turns to consideration of social security hospitalization when it convenes in January.

The film includes sound, is 16 mm. wide in black and white, and runs for 26 minutes. The rental price is $3, the sale price $50. It may be ordered from the Film Division, AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D. C. 20006. The department is preparing a discussion guide for use with "Rx" which will be distributed without charge to renters or buyers.

TV Appeal for Elderly Built on Human Drama

The case for hospital insurance for the elderly under social security was built up from the raw material of drama by Millard Lampell.

Lampell's is a name long associated with liberal causes and their documentation. He is the author of "The Lonesome Train," folk cantata often heard as part of radio memorials to Presidents Franklin D. Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy. He wrote "No Hiding Place" for the Eastside-Westside television drama series, winning a Sidney Hillman Award and the Anti-Defamation Award. In all, he has won nine such honors including the coveted Peabody Award. He adapted John Hersey's novel, "The Wall," into a Broadway play.

LAMPELL

When he undertook to make "Rx for a Nightmare," he determined to piece together an anthology of stories that demonstrated the need and desire for hospital care under social security.

The National Council for Senior Citizens supplied him with a long list of supporters in all parts of the country. He got on the telephone and talked to them, transcribing the conversations as people of all ages and in all stations of life detailed the "why" of their backing.

Twenty stories were put together, like the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle. The people who supplied them were taken to New York, and on television repeated them in the words they had used over the telephone.

"Rx for a Nightmare" has the impact that only honesty can produce, Lampell asserted. He added:

"Some viewers found it hard to believe its authenticity—because the characters said such beautiful things—but authentic it was, as authentic it had to be in order to conform with Federal Communications Commission regulations governing free time broadcasts."

Bolling Asks House Democrats To Clean Up Committee System

Rep. Richard Bolling has called on his Democratic colleagues in the House "to chase the conservative foxes out of the liberal chicken coop."

The Missouri congressman said the time is ripe to crack the power of nominal Democrats who vote like Republicans and who use their key House committee posts to block Administration programs.

Bolling, a leader of his party's liberal wing, urged that seniority be made second to party loyalty and responsibility in making committee assignments and choosing committee chairmen.

He proposed more power for the speaker and for the House Democratic caucus. The election results gave Administration Democrats both the mandate and the numerical strength to make "whatever reforms are needed," he said, to correct the abuses which have developed under the present system of "legislative feudalism."

The most recent AFL-CIO convention also called for congressional rules reform at the start of the 89th Congress. Until it is achieved, the federation said, "America will be trying to resolve its automation and atomic age problems with a horse-and-buggy legislative mechanism."

Seniority is "a valid, just and workable principle in many areas of human activity," the AFL-CIO said, but not in Congress. The House committee structure, under both Democrats and Republicans, "is in the hands of rural congressmen who represent a distinct minority in America's population."

Bolling made these specific suggestions in a letter to House Democrats:

- The speaker of the House—or the Democratic leader when the GOP controls the House—would have the exclusive right to nominate Democratic members of the Ways & Means Committee and the Rules Committee. The speaker would also propose the chairmen of all committees.
- The Democratic caucus would either confirm or reject the nominees. If his choices were turned down, the speaker would then propose substitute names.
- The Democratic members of the Ways & Means Committee, as at present, would constitute a committee on committees and nominate Democratic members of other committees. However, the caucus would have the right to reject any nominee by majority vote.

Bolling said seniority would doubtless remain the method of selecting most committee members. He stressed, however, that "the implied threat of party discipline . . . would give pause to the member who would bolt his party's program."

Author of Book

Bolling, a member of the House Rules Committee, has written a book on the need for congressional reform which will be published in February. He presented his proposals in advance of publication because, he said, since the election "the warm winds of reform have been gently circulating in the halls of Congress."

He suggested that the present seniority-based system, developed in a move to correct the once-absolute power of the Speaker, went too far the other way.

"Men whose political philosophies more nearly reflect the Republican position have been allowed to rule important committees simply on the basis of a long tenure in Congress," he declared.

By way of contrast, Bolling noted, "the Republican Party has shown itself to be more responsible in this area than we Democrats." GOP members of the three most important House committees—Appropriations, Ways & Means, and Rules—nearly all reflect the conservative point of view.

No Risk Seen

He acknowledged that abuses of leadership power had taken place under strong, centralized leadership. But he said the provision for rejection of the nominees to committees by the full Democratic caucus would overcome this risk.

Under his proposals, Bolling said, "the party leader would become the true leader of a legislative team . . . His ability to veto or to replace a man completely out of step with his party viewpoint would nevertheless be subject to ratification by the majority of the members of his party. It would place final legislative responsibility where it belongs—on the majority of the Democratic Party."

Johnson Urges Speed On Aged Hospital Care

Pres. Johnson has told House Democratic leaders he wants early action on two priority bills—social security hospital care for the aged and Appalachia development.

Both measures were passed by the Senate last year but left hanging in the House. With the cooperation of committee chairmen, they could be reintroduced and sent to the floor without a repetition of lengthy hearings held during the 88th Congress.

The President also asked Speaker John W. McCormack and Majority Leader Carl Albert to draw up a list of other leftover bills which can be moved early in the session. The 89th Congress convenes Jan. 4.

Although a new Congress normally spends its first weeks getting organized, the President made it clear that he would like to see the early-session pace stepped up to clear the deck for new legislative proposals he will submit.

Albert told newsmen that he and McCormack gave the President an optimistic forecast about both the hospital care and Appalachia bills. When asked by reporters if June was a likely target for House passage of the hospital care bill, Albert said he hoped for action before then.

Earlier, House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills had promised to bring the hospital care proposal up in his committee soon after Congress convenes if the President so wished. Mills opposed including hospital benefits as part of social security last year, but indicated that he might consider supporting a program under which the benefits would be provided through a separately-financed fund.

The proposed program of large-scale aid to the 11-state Appalachia region had House committee approval this year, but didn't reach the floor because Administration leaders couldn't count the votes to pass it. The election results, with a massive 38-seat net gain for the Democrats, make approval by the 89th Congress virtually certain.

Another holdover measure, sidetracked last year for lack of votes, was a bill to give additional funds to the Area Redevelopment Administration.

Earlier, the President had said he will ask Congress to repeal or reduce "nuisance" federal excise taxes amounting to at least $550 million. He has not yet spelled out which taxes he will seek to eliminate.

The New Senate

Senators, including holdovers, who will take office in January are listed below. The re-election of Sen. Howard W. Cannon [D-Nev.] is still in doubt, subject to recount. Walter F. Mondale is listed as a senator from Minnesota on the basis of Gov. Karl F. Rolvaag's announced intention to appoint him to the unexpired term of Vice President-elect Hubert H. Humphrey.

Message to Peruvian Business:

Meany Calls Unions Vital to Free Society

Lima, Peru—A "strong, independent democratic trade union movement" is an "absolute essential" to the existence of a free government and can play a major part in creating and maintaining a free society, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany said in a speech read for him at the 5th Inter-American Conference of Business Executives here.

"Your interest, perhaps, revolves around the preservation of private enterprise," he said. "Yet it should be apparent to all, in every free country, that private enterprise is not enough in itself. There must be, for example, a broad system of social security, using the term in its general sense. Such a system can be partly established by collective bargaining, but our experience has convinced us that its basic structure must be established by law. . . .

"Government action is sometimes decried as 'government interference.' But it is our profound conviction that government has an obligation to promote and maintain economic prosperity for all the people—for everyone."

The labor movement he advocated as a factor in a free society, he said, must be one "free from management domination; free from government control, and free from corruption and communism alike."

"I think it is fair to say," he added, "that many in the free world do not thoroughly understand this point; and it is certainly true that the free world has not, as a whole, adequately utilized trade union movements as partners in the struggle against totalitarianism."

Economic growth, industrial development, private enterprise "and all the rest" are not ends in themselves, Meany maintained, but "means to a greater end—a better life for all."

"This is what we in the AFL-CIO have in mind when we seek to encourage the development of free, democratic, independent trade unions in nations around the world and in Latin America in particular," he told the business executives.

Organized labor in the United States, he asserted, does not seek to impose any preconceived political or economic system upon any one, "but we do seek to encourage free collective bargaining" because the negotiated agreements that result "contribute immensely" to national progress as well as to the individual enterprise.

Labor's Power for Good

Meany attributed the rise of the U.S. economy from its depression low in the 1930s to the present, with its gross national product around $600 billion a year, to the labor movement's achievement of power "to negotiate better wages and working conditions year after year," and to the government's adoption, "urged forward by the labor movement," of laws that protect the worker from exploitation and improve his material status. These developments, he asserted, are the basis for business and industrial prosperity in the U. S. today."

"To put it another way," he continued, "the workers in any country should be able to buy what they produce, if that country is to have any assurance of continuing prosperity. . . . They should be able to buy food, clothing, automobiles, electrical appliances, etc.—and have enough left over to buy homes and to educate their children. This is the source of economic growth and economic stability."

Meany's speech was read by Felix Loli Cepero, secretary general of the White Collar Workers Federation of Peru and a member of the Chamber of Deputies.

October Jobless Rate Still 5.2% As Economy Maintains Pace

counted as unemployed. In contrast, the earlier summary job figures counted strikers as employed since these statistics are based on household surveys; whoever is home is simply asked whether working-age family members are employed or unemployed.

With other industry divisions showing over-the-month job gains, the steady improvement in employment in 1964 continued. But, as the earlier summary report showed, the improvement has not been great enough to dent high-level unemployment.

The key seasonally-adjusted jobless rate held at 5.2 percent in October, unimproved from September. The jobless rate had been pared down from 5.6 percent in January to 4.9 percent in July, but it has edged upward since then.

Active Work-Seekers

A total of 3.3 million persons were unemployed in October, actively seeking work but unable to find it. Of this total, 800,000 were jobless 15 weeks or longer.

On the employment side of the picture, the Labor Dept. reported:

"Manufacturing employment fell about 250,000 more than seasonally in October as several durable goods industry groups showed the effect of the automobile strike.

"After seasonal adjustment, employment was down 190,000 in transportation equipment, 40,000 in fabricated metals and 10,000 in primary metals. The employment trend in the machinery industry continued upward despite the strike.

"In non-durables, food processing showed an employment drop of about 60,000 from September; this decrease and movements in the other non-durable goods industries were about in line with seasonal expectations."

In the non-manufacturing sector as a whole, the job gain totaled 185,000 on a seasonally-adjusted basis. The strongest gain was in state and local government, which rose by 100,000 as the last of the schoolteachers returned to their jobs.

The transportation and public utilities industry showed a drop of 15,000, concentrated in railroads and motor freight and reflecting secondary effects of the auto strike.

Because of the large number of workers involved in the auto strike and their relatively high wages and overtime, the overall averages in several indexes were depressed.

Average hourly earnings of factory workers fell by 3 cents to $2.53 in October. Weekly earnings declined by nearly $1 to $103.

The factory workweek rose by 6 minutes to 40 hours, 42 minutes, with divergent trends in individual industries. In durable goods, the workweek dropped because of the auto strike. In non-durable goods industries, the workweek jumped over September because some employes took unpaid leave on Labor Day, which fell in the survey week and lowered the hours total.

In summary, despite the effects of the auto strike on the statistics, a Labor Dept. spokesman said the October report reflected "continued strength" in line with the steady job gains of the past year.

In a separate report, the Labor Dept's October survey of 150 major job centers showed 31 areas with "substantial unemployment"—6 percent or more jobless. This total was unchanged from September and remains at a low for the past five years.

Ft. Wayne, Ind., was the only major area which showed enough improvement to be reclassified; it was moved into the 1.5 to 3 percent jobless category.

Consumer Rights Cited To Ad Agency Parley

New York—Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, under fire from some advertisers for her activities as Pres. Johnson's adviser on consumer problems, carried the fight to a meeting of the American Association of Advertising Agencies. In a speech before more than 250 top executives who had invited her views, she disclaimed allegations that she had indiscriminately attacked the advertising industry or business generally, and praised advertising for what it has done.

"It is not my intention to leave you with the impression that everything I have said about advertising has been praiseworthy," she added. "It has not. I have objected to some aspects of current advertising and I have stated my objections in no uncertain terms. Generally, this criticism has been in two areas—the areas of claims and of taste."

Consumers, she said, have a right to expect that advertisers, through newspapers, magazines, package inserts, labels and radio and TV programs, will provide them with "the information they need to shop comparatively and to make rational choices."

"Consumers also have a right to expect advertisers to back up their claims," she said. "Isn't it cause for concern that even in our medical journals, advertising for prescription drugs drifted into a situation where our ethical standards eroded in the face of fierce competition? They eroded to the point where Congress approved controls which would never have been considered if these excesses had not become apparent.

"My friends in the regulatory agencies tell me that this danger still exists, particularly in the area of proprietary drugs. I am not here to tell you that Pres. Johnson is about to propose new legislation on this subject, but it would seem obvious that now is the time for the advertising industry to redouble its efforts to ensure that new legislation does not become necessary."

She emphasized that "we, in Washington, are all for self-regulation" by industry so long as it aids consumers, and she expressed the belief that any legal problems can be worked out.

In the "great grey area of taste," Mrs. Peterson repeated past warnings that consumers are about to "revolt against humbug" and are "developing defenses" against "the massive assaults that are made on the human intelligence by some of today's most conspicuous advertising."

The remedy, she declared, is up to the advertising industry, because "government cannot legislate good taste."

Mrs. Peterson Defended Against Admen's Attack

American business should give Mrs. Esther Peterson an award instead of attacking her activities as Pres. Johnson's special assistant for consumer affairs, Dir. Leo Perlis of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities declared in a radio interview.

She should get the award, he said in a spirited defense of her work in behalf of consumers, because "what she has been trying to do . . . is to avoid the unfair competition which legitimate American business is getting from illegitimate American business."

"If you have some fakers and frauds perpetrating their business upon the people," he added, "it is not only to the disadvantage of the consumer but to the disadvantage of legitimate business. I don't think that Mrs. Peterson is interested at all in hurting business. She is interested in helping the consumer first and also helping the legitimate businessman."

Perlis' support for Mrs. Peterson, who also is assistant secretary of labor, came on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public service program heard on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Reporter's Question

The issue was raised by Duane Emme, of Labor newspaper, who with Tom Coman of the Bureau of National Affairs, questioned Perlis. Emme noted that the Advertising Federation had accused her of creating " 'unwarranted suspicion of American business' because she has brought out examples of misleading practices," and asked for Perlis' views.

The Advertising Federation's stand on Mrs. Peterson was expressed by Mark F. Cooper, president and general manager, in a memo to member firms and affiliates accompanying a reprint of an editorial in Printers' Ink, advertising trade magazine. The editorial posed a rhetorical question, "Is she ignorant—or is she deliberately pitting consumers against advertisers for her own purpose?" It described her as "the most pernicious threat to advertising today" and claimed there was no need for a consumer movement because of general prosperity and federal regulatory agencies.

Mrs. Peterson has conducted four regional conferences for consumers in which the AFL-CIO played a leading part, Perlis said in the broadcast, adding:

"She has done a considerable amount of good in bringing to the attention of the American people the need for a greater effort in protecting the consumer."

Perlis outlined AFL-CIO activities in behalf of consumers and briefly discussed consumer legislation pending in Congress.

AFL-CIO Aide on New FDA Panel

Ann Draper, research associate in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research and a consumer specialist, is one of 18 members of a new National Advisory Food & Drug Council named to consult with the Food & Drug Administration.

In announcing the appointments, Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Anthony J. Celebrezze said the council fills a major recommendation of the second citizens advisory committee on FDA organization and policies and will make available to the FDA "the knowledge and experience of an outstanding group of citizens."

Domestic Force Available:

UCLA Study Denies Need for 'Braceros'

Los Angeles—A new study by the University of California at Los Angeles has exploded the argument of big growers that Americans will not do farm work and some other way must be used to bring in Mexican nationals when the present "bracero" import program expires Dec. 31.

The UCLA study shows that nearly one-half of the unemployed workers in this area will take farm jobs under decent pay and conditions.

"The survey indicates," said the UCLA report, "that there is a sizable potential supply of domestic farm laborers among urban workers in Los Angeles."

The report said 48 percent of jobless workers interviewed were interested in farm work under certain conditions. These include higher wages, better family housing, coverage under unemployment insurance, access to federal training programs and use of labor referral centers.

Trade union, church and welfare groups welcomed the UCLA report. The survey and study were carried out at the request of the California Dept. of Employment.

Charges Demonstrated

"It demonstrates conclusively what we have charged: that the growers' program to recruit replacements for braceros has been a sham," declared W. J. Bassett, executive secretary of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor.

A spokesman for the growers called the report a "blueprint for disaster for California agriculture."

The growers claim they have carried on a "massive" campaign to recruit American replacements for braceros but have failed. They say Americans will not do "stoop" labor and so Mexicans must be brought in. Their efforts are now centering on utilizing immigration procedures and temporary permits.

The growers attacked the UCLA report as "unrealistic" and repeated the claim that California farm workers were the highest paid in the nation.

Bassett pointed out that the UCLA report refuted the growers' claims. The study showed other areas not using Mexican nationals had wage scales as high or higher than California's. Bassett said the claimed hourly average wage of $1.31 an hour was shown to be "meaningless" and added:

"As low as this average is—and it includes foremen, year-round workers and others—it is still wrong because it implies farm workers earn that much. They don't because they don't work regularly."

Newly-released figures from the state Dept. of Employment reported the average annual wage of farm workers as totaling $1,355 last year and this included non-farm income, Bassett noted. He said only 27,900 persons earned $4,000 or more from farm jobs in the entire state in 1962.

Rev. John G. Simmons, chairman of the Emergency Committee to Aid Farm Workers, said that "we affirm and the study confirms that agricultural labor most certainly can be found in California." Simmons said this can be done by assurance of steady work, a decent minimum wage, free transportation between jobs, family housing and extension of social welfare legislation.

Grogan Bars 4th Term As Mayor of Hoboken

Hoboken, N. J.—AFL-CIO Vice Pres. John J. Grogan, president of the Shipbuilders and three-term mayor of Hoboken, has announced he will not seek a fourth term.

Grogan, first elected mayor in 1953, said the pressure of other activities was the basis of his decision to leave the mayor's office.

More Jobs Needed, Johnson Declares

"Unemployment is still far too high . . . and educational opportunities must be increased," Pres. Johnson declared at White House ceremonies marking a change in the membership of his Council of Economic Advisers.

Citing the benefits gained from the tax cut and the continuing stability of prices, the President said that gains have been many "but we're still not satisfied." The economic situation can be improved, he added, "only if America continues to be prosperous."

His comments came as Gardner Ackley took over as chairman in place of Walter W. Heller, who resigned to return to teaching at the University of Minnesota. Arthur M. Okun, CEA staff director, was sworn in as a member of the council. The third member is Otto Eckstein.

Seven top-ranked actors and singers make up the cast of "Ballad of Isaac and Jacob," which will be seen on NBC-TV at 1:30 p. m. (EST), Sunday, Dec. 13, it was announced today by Joseph D. Keenan, treasurer of the George Meany Foundation and an AFL-CIO vice president.

Broadcast dates and times may vary outside New York and will appear in local program listings.

The singers are Ronnie Gilbert, for 15 years the lead singer of The Weavers, who has won additional laurels since that quartet broke up last year; Will Holt, now appearing in "That 5 A.M. Jazz," which he also wrote, and who previously starred in "The World of Kurt Weill," a top off-Broadway production; and Barry Kornfeld, who is with Max Morath and the Original Rag Quartet.

The actors are George Voskovec, currently starring in "The Physicists" on Broadway, whose other credits include appearances in Richard Burton's "Hamlet," "The 10th Man," "Big Fish, Little Fish," the motion picture "12 Angry Men" and numerous other stage, screen and television productions; David Hurst, who has won an Obie—for best off-Broadway actor—and the Clarence Derent award for best Broadway performance by a non-featured actor; Burt Brinkerhoff, who has been featured in many films and in Joshua Logan's Broadway production, "Blue Denim"; and Court Benson, a veteran radio performer.

The upcoming TV play, written by Millard Lampell, deals with the human impact of automation. It is the third annual presentation of the George Meany Foundation, all of which have been incorporated into the Eternal Light series presented weekly by NBC-TV and the Jewish Theological Seminary.

The George Meany Foundation is an arm of the Herbert H. Lehman Institute.

High Japanese Officials Confer with Meany

Tokyo—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany met with Prime Minister Eisaku Sato and Minister of Labor Hirohide Ishida before leaving Japan after a visit highlighted by his appearance at the founding convention of the new Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei).

The new trade union central body was formed by merger of the Japanese Trade Union Congress (Zenro) and the Japanese Federation of Trade Unions (Sodomei), which dissolved, and four affiliated unions of the National Council of Government & Public Corporation Workers' Unions (Zenkanko), which remains intact and will continue in existence.

The three central bodies set up a loosely merged confederation (Domei Kaigi) in 1962, but retained their separate identities.

Domei is a free, democratic confederation with 22 unions representing 1.8 million members. Elected as its top officers were the leaders of Domei Kaigi—Chairman Kumazo Nakachi and Sec.-Gen. Seiji Amaike. It will be the second largest labor federation in Japan, exceeded only by the General Council of Trade Unions of Japan (Soyho), which represents 3.9 million workers.

Before he left, Meany also discussed problems affecting the labor movement with officials of four Japanese union central bodies—Domei, Sohyo, the National Federation of Industrial Unions (Shin-Sanbetsu) and the Federation of Neutral Trades Unions (Churitsu Roren).

Meany Hails Johnson

In a luncheon speech he told the Foreign Correspondents Club that the AFL-CIO supported Pres. Johnson in the recent election campaign because of his Administration's good record.

"The Johnson record is better than any we have seen since the Roosevelt days," he declared.

The results of the election, he asserted, show that Americans have rejected extremism in any form.

He pointed to Johnson's "unique approach" during the campaign, when the Democratic contender emphasized the need of helping those Americans who constitute the 20 percent poverty class instead of stressing the nation's prosperity.

The correspondents questioned Meany at some length on liberalization of foreign trade, a major concern of Japan. He cited AFL-CIO support of moves to lower tariff barriers and pointed out its long-time backing of reciprocal trade legislation.

Entertainment Unions Map World Parley

New York—Plans for expansion of activities of the Intl. Secretariat of Entertainment Trade Unions were advanced at a meeting here of spokesmen for U.S., European and Latin American unions.

Pres. Herman Kenin of the Musicians acted as chairman of the preparatory committee session, which set up an agenda for an international congress scheduled for Brussels in March. It will include the fostering of job opportunities, the monitoring of exchanges of performers across national boundaries, the impact of Telstar and comparable developments, and policy determinations on worldwide performance right for artists.

Among those attending the meeting here were Richard F. Walsh, president of the Theatrical Stage Employes and of the Inter-American Entertainment Workers Federation, with headquarters in Mexico City, and Stanley Ballard, its treasurer and also secretary of the AFM.

A. J. Forrest of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions; T. L. Littlewood, chairman of the British Association of Broadcasting Staff, and Irving Brown, ICFTU representative at the United Nations, also were present.

Union leaders from the U.S. who attended included AFM Treas. George V. Clancy; Pres. Frederick O'Neal and Exec. Sec. Angus Duncan of Actors' Equity; Exec. Sec. Donald E. Conaway of the Television & Radio Artists; Harold Hoffman, eastern chief of the Screen Actors and the Screen Extras; Albert Hardy, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Arthur Horth, Broadcast Engineers; Exec. Dir. Hy Faine of the American Guild of Musical Artists; Milton Weintraub of the Theatrical Press Agents & Managers, and Harold Berg, general counsel of the Variety Artists.

Panel Backs Steps to Avert 'Crisis' Talks

The National Labor-Management Panel voiced "enthusiastic support" for efforts to avoid crisis bargaining by anticipating problems and seeking to resolve them before they become critical.

The panel of six union and six management officials was set up by the late Pres. Kennedy last year to advise the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

In a preliminary report to Mediation Dir. William E. Simkin, the panel said it is working on recommendations for new bargaining methods designed to assure industrial peace.

Other areas it will study include:

- The effects on collective bargaining of a multiplicity of mediation activities by various federal, state and local government agencies.
- The qualifications and salary levels of federal mediators.
- The advisability of establishing regional labor-management advisory panels.
- How to identify national emergency disputes and special measures that might be taken to resolve them.

Labor Members

Labor members of the panel are: Pres. H. S. Brown of the Texas State AFL-CIO; Exec. Dir. Jack T. Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Pres. C. J. Haggerty of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Thomas E. Harris, AFL-CIO associate general counsel; Pres. John H. Lyons of the Iron Workers, and Marvin J. Miller, assistant to the president of the Steelworkers.

CSA Slates Regional Staff Conferences

AFL-CIO Community Services Activities has begun a series of regional meetings for full-time staff workers that is scheduled to cover all parts of the country.

The first session, in cooperation with the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO, was held Nov. 16 in Harrisburg. State meetings, also in cooperation with state central bodies, have been set for Nov. 23 in Columbus, O., and for Dec. 16 in Indianapolis, Ind.

Arrangements are under way for a New York meeting on Jan. 12, 1965, to cover the New England states, New York state, New Jersey, Maryland and the District of Columbia. On Jan. 19 a session has been planned in New Orleans for the southeastern states and Texas. Meetings for the Middle and Far West will be scheduled later.

Discussions at all meetings center on such matters as continuing relations with other bodies, including local united funds and chests, program implementation at local levels, staff communications and training.

AFL-CIO Asks 'Giant Step' On 1965 Legislative Goals

Vol. IX — Issued weekly at 815 Sixteenth St., N. W. Washington 6, D. C. $2 a year — Saturday, November 28, 1964 — No. 48

Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C.

FIRST PRIORITY on labor's legislative program is repeal of Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells a news conference. This is the section permitting states to outlaw union shop agreements through "right-to-work" laws.

Bids Congress Act In 14 Major Areas

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO called for a "giant step forward" toward Pres. Johnson's Great Society in 1965 by enactment of a broad legislative program that would bring an "end to poverty and deprivation in our time."

The mandate given the President in the Nov. 3 election must be translated into "practical reality," the federation's Executive Council declared in adopting a legislative program for the 89th Congress covering 14 major areas of American life. (Text on Pages 6 and 7.)

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a news conference at the conclusion of the one-day council meeting in Washington that the first priority in the program will be to restore free collective bargaining by seeking repeal of Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act, which allows states to enact so-called "right-to-work" laws.

These laws and the section of Taft-Hartley making them possible, he said, are pointed at the right of workers "to maintain effective unions." He added that he believes there are "sufficient votes" in the new Congress to secure repeal of 14b, noting that repeal is called for in the Democratic Party platform to which Johnson is committed.

To implement the broad-ranging legislative program for 1965, the council issued a call to all affiliates and central bodies to attend a legislative conference to be held in Washington Jan. 11-14, 1965, at the Mayflower Hotel.

The council declared that the measures it is proposing are neither "novel" nor "visionary," but "practical down-to-earth measures" designed to make a "massive investment in America" and take "a giant step forward on the road to a society that will enable all our citizens to realize their full potential."

The statement stressed that the AFL-CIO believes "that government, the instrument of the people, should use its powers to attack and to solve the people's problems." As to those "who question whether the nation can afford a better life for its people," the council declared:

"America cannot afford anything less. Poverty, unemployment, discrimination and ignorance are intolerable in a society that has the resources to wipe them out.

" . . . what we are proposing is a massive investment in the future of the nation—an investment the country can easily afford, and one that is essential to its destiny and to the future of freedom on earth."

In addition to the No. 1 priority to repeal Sec. 14b of the Taft-Hartley Act, the council called for action to:

- Eliminate inequities and resolve contradictions in the nation's basic labor-management law.
- Provide a national hospital insurance system based on social security principles for those over 65, increase social security benefits, establish a federal system of reinsurance for all private pension plans, enact federal standards to improve the unemployment compensation system.
- Cover all workers under the minimum wage law and increase the wage to $2 an hour; cut the standard workweek to 35 hours and provide for double time pay for overtime.
- Aid elementary and secondary schools to help them meet all needs, including construction; provide substantial federal aid to schools serving children from low-income areas; give comprehensive assistance to college students; aid the growth of community junior colleges with additional funds.

Strike Deferred by 3 Others:

3 Rail Shop Unions Reach Settlement

Chicago—Three railroad shopcraft unions reached contract settlements here and three others deferred a Nov. 23 strike deadline at the request of Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

The Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers agreed to resume negotiations Nov. 30. They represent some 50,000 skilled craftsmen who are fighting for wages closer to rates enjoyed by comparable workers outside the railroad industry, the unions said in a joint statement.

Reaching agreement with the major U.S. railroads were the Boiler Makers, Railway Carmen and Firemen & Oilers. They signed contracts in line with terms recommended Oct. 20 by a Presidential emergency board.

The contracts, affecting 90,000 workers, provide wage increases of 9 cents an hour each year for three years; another 2 cents in the third year; an eighth paid holiday, and longer vacations for 20-year workers.

Wirtz told the remaining shopcrafts that, in view of progress made toward settlement in talks called by the National Mediation Board, "I urge in the public interest continuation of the status quo for a sufficient period to permit further negotiation and mediation."

The three unions said they would be "happy to comply" since "it appears for the first time that there is some hope of settlement" and also because they have been reluctant to inconvenience holiday travelers.

Five other non-operating unions, and a number of operating unions, had agreed earlier to settle for terms similar to those recommended by the presidential panel headed by Richardson Dilworth, former mayor of Philadelphia.

The Clerks, Railway Telegraphers, Maintenance of Way Employes and Dining Car Employes, affiliated with the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, signed contracts improving wages, vacations and holidays along the lines recommended by the panel. The Signalmen, who settled their wage terms last May, signed for "pattern" health, welfare and vacation betterments.

The drive of the shopcrafts for improved wages began May 31, 1963, when they proposed immediate increases of 10 percent plus 14 cents an hour, plus subsequent annual increases of 3.5 percent and

1964 Pacts Hike Wages Average 3.2%

Unions won wage increases averaging 3.2 percent for 2.2 million workers in the first nine months of 1964, the Labor Dept. has reported.

Most contract settlements improved one or more supplementary benefits in addition to wages. In some cases, notably Auto Workers contracts with Ford and Chrysler, the increases in benefits "substantially exceeded" the boost in wage rates but were not itemized by the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Johnson Hails Labor's Role In Election

No group "worked harder" than organized labor for the victory of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket and "I am grateful," Pres. Johnson told AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

The President, replying to Meany's wire of congratulations on his election victory, pledged "every effort . . . to justify the faith that members of the AFL-CIO and their fellow citizens placed in us."

Meany read the letter at a news conference held at the conclusion of the one-day Executive Council meeting in Washington at which he told reporters that the federation's Committee on Political Education (COPE) was preparing a comprehensive analysis of the election. He said that "COPE this year did an outstanding job, the best job it has ever done."

Queried on labor's evaluation of the "white backlash" and its virtual elimination as a key issue in the national election, the federation president said the AFL-CIO took the position that a continuing emphasis of the important national issues would override the "backlash" issue which is essentially a question of local concerns and local problems.

Meany told reporters, in reply to another query, that he did not believe that there would be an appreciable change in relations between labor and the business community despite their common support of Johnson in the campaign, because business still has a basic affiliation with the policies of the Republican Party and it will "take a few more years and a few more Goldwaters" to change the situation.

Higher Bank Rate Hit As Threat to Prosperity

The AFL-CIO called on the Federal Reserve Board to reverse its action in raising the discount rate from 3.5 to 4 percent and stop gambling with the pace of the nation's economic advance.

The federation's Executive Council said the Federal Reserve Board's action will increase costs, force prices upward and curb economic activity at a time when such curbs "can slow down the advance of sales, production and jobs."

The strength of the dollar, the council declared, "depends mainly on the strength and prosperity of the American economy at home. If a serious problem of short-term capital outflows is expected, such outflows should be curbed directly rather than to gamble with the pace of economic advance, particularly at a time of persistent high unemployment."

The FRB action, the council said, "will do very little, at best" in stopping the outflow of private capital to other nations. The board said its action was dictated by the rise in the discount rate in Great Britain which would attract American short-term funds and worsen the U. S. balance of payments situation.

Biscuit Plant Workers Win 16-Cent Gains

Chicago—Wage increases totaling 16 cents an hour and major pension and welfare improvements have been won by the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers for 2,800 employes at five plants of the United Biscuit Co.

The new two-year agreement provides fringe benefits valued at an additional 8 cents an hour. Among them are pensions up to $150 a month, improved major medical coverage for workers and their dependents, and a ninth paid holiday.

First-Year Benefits

A 9-cent wage hike will go to workers as of Nov. 1. Other benefits in the first contract year consist of a 3-cent increase per hour in company payments into the health and welfare fund, for a total of 13 cents, to provide full payment of hospital bills; Dec. 31 as a paid holiday; and classification adjustments providing for increases over and above the general pay hike.

Next Nov. 1 the contract provides an additional 6 cents an hour in wages; a 3-cent per-hour increase in company payments into the national pension fund for a total of 16 cents an hour; another 1-cent increase in company payments into the health and welfare fund.

The $150 retirement benefit was achieved for the first time for workers in the biscuit industry, the ABC said.

The union also achieved an improved funeral leave clause; safety clauses affecting all five company plants—Philadelphia, Melrose Park, Ill., Denver, Cincinnati and Macon, Ga. Numerous local issues also were settled.

Youth Agency Staff Wins 1st Contract

New York—State, County & Municipal Employes Local 1707 has won a first contract with major gains for 300 clerical, professional and maintenance employes of Mobilization for Youth, anti-poverty and anti-juvenile delinquency project on the lower East Side.

Two half-day work stoppages preceded a settlement ratified by union members. Benefits include a $225-a-year wage increase retroactive to July 15; a 35-hour workweek; severance pay at two weeks for each year of service; vacations of 20 to 25 working days, and other improvements.

TWO WINNERS in journalistic contest of the Intl. Labor Press Association are congratulated by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz. Top awards for editorial excellence are accepted by Clifford A. Scotton, left, on behalf of Canadian Labor, and by Jerry Dale for the staff of UAW Solidarity.

Top Newsmen Choose Best Labor Papers

The best of the labor press is very good indeed.

That's the opinion of the Nieman Fellows—a group of top newspapermen chosen to spend a year of study at Harvard University. Five of them served as judges for the annual journalistic awards contest of the Intl. Labor Press Association.

They found UAW Solidarity, monthly newspaper of the Auto Workers, "consistently packed with a variety of first-rate writing," enlivened with "pictures of interest and quality." It won first in editorial excellence among international union publications using newspaper format.

Canadian Labor took equivalent honors among magazines. The publication of the Canadian Labor Congress has "sophistication and depth," the judges said. It has "a heartening boldness . . . and it is easy to read."

These and other awards were presented by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz at a banquet held during the ILPA convention.

First award for state and local central body publications went to the Oregon Labor Press, described as "a model for small papers." The best local union publication in newspaper format was the 65'er, published by New York Dist. 65 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, which the judges said provided readers "with informed opinion and analysis on current issues." In magazine format, the Hotel & Club Voice of New York Local 6, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, was described as "outstanding in every respect." One judge wrote that his greatest pleasure in judging the contest was the discovery of this magazine.

While praising the "layer of excellence" among the best of the labor press, the judges found shortcomings as well, commenting: "Many papers vigorously criticize the commercial press for its shortcomings—then fail to make any effort to fill the 'news gap' they have pinpointed."

First Place Winners

In addition to the editorial excellence awards, first place honors were given in the following categories:

International publications—Best front page, newspapers, Government Standard; best front page, magazines, Catering Industry Employe; best editorial, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Union News; best cartoon, Labor newspaper; best feature article, RWDSU Record; best regular column, Pulp & Paper Worker; best photo, UAW Solidarity.

Tally Gives Cannon Margin of 43 Votes

Carson City, Nev.—The complete unofficial tally of votes in the Nevada senatorial race gave Sen. Howard W. Cannon (D) a 43-vote victory over Republican Paul Laxalt. There were 134,629 votes cast.

At ILPA Convention:

GOP Must Change, Union Editors Told

The Republican Party will have to abandon the Goldwater philosophy if it is to survive its election defeat, Samuel Lubell told the Intl. Labor Press Association convention.

Lubell, who spends the months before each national election talking to voters, said flatly: "The American people aren't going to vote our welfare system out."

The GOP's only hope for a comeback, he said, is to emphasize reform and improvement, instead of radical change.

Lubell delivered the first A. J. Liebling Memorial Lecture to an audience of some 200 labor editors. The annual lecture series was set up by the ILPA as a tribute to a witty, penetrating critic of the commercial press. Liebling was also, ILPA Pres. Leon Stein pointed out, a friend of the labor press and a memorable participant in the association's 1961 convention.

The union editors examined the role of the labor press in the election campaign and discussed their responsibilities to the labor movement.

Kenneth Fiester, ILPA secretary-treasurer, and Irving Fagan, field secretary, praised the election coverage in a pre-convention newsletter.

"You never did a job so thoroughly or so well as you did in this campaign," they told the editors.

The editors put their publications on the dissecting table in a series of workshop sessions and invited experts to probe for weaknesses.

Prof. Dorothy F. Williams of Simmons College warned them against long, involved sentences.

Columbia University Journalism Prof. Melvin Mencher lectured on newspaper layout and design.

Pangs of Publishing

Roscoe Born, senior editor of the National Observer, touched on all the problems of putting together an attractive, readable newspaper in describing the launching of a new publication.

Harry Flannery, AFL-CIO radio coordinator, urged union editors and public relations directors to explore radio and television to tell labor's story. He discussed large-scale programs of international unions and low-cost broadcasts of local unions.

Flannery also described joint sponsorship of programs by central bodies and several local unions and outlined the AFL-CIO's schedule of network broadcasts.

A feature of the convention was a background briefing by AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller. The off-the-record program was set up to give labor editors a perspective to help them evaluate the news which will be coming from Capitol Hill.

At a business session, delegates:

- Voted to hold biennial conventions immediately preceding national AFL-CIO conventions. A conference and workshop will be held in the off-years.
- Strongly supported Esther Peterson, Pres. Johnson's special assistant for consumer affairs, against attacks by advertisers. The resolution praised Mrs. Peterson for having "fearlessly stood her ground in the face of an unprecedented campaign by Madison Avenue to silence her and curtail her activities."
- Voted to oust from membership the Union News, publication of Jewelry Workers Local 225 of New York. The action followed an investigation of the publication's advertising solicitation methods.
- Urged that the American public be permitted to see the highly praised documentary on the late Pres. Kennedy produced by the U.S. Information Agency.
- Approved an interpretation of the ILPA Code of Ethics which obligates member publications to "serve the best interests" of the AFL-CIO. The convention held that support for any attempt by a rump or unaffiliated group to split membership away from an AFL-CIO union is a violation of the ethics code.

Delegates made a special visit to Kennedy's grave and left a wreath in tribute to his memory.

Special Award Voted 'Times' Supplement

Labor editors presented an award of their own at the annual convention of the Intl. Labor Press Association.

The ILPA executive council voted a special award to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations for the 44-page New York Times magazine advertising supplement titled, The Hands That Build America. It told the story of the AFL-CIO and was distributed as part of the Sunday edition of the Times during the federation's 5th convention last year.

Public Relations Dir. Al Zack and Kenneth Fiester accepted the award at the ILPA convention banquet.

Detroit Pressmen End Long Newspaper Strike

Detroit—A compromise settlement sent members of the Printing Pressmen back to work at the Free Press and News here after 19 weeks on the picket lines.

The two dailies recalled 4,100 workers Nov. 23 and resumed publishing the day before Thanksgiving Day. At the same time the Detroit Daily Press, interim strike newspaper, laid off a staff of more than 100 and ceased publication.

The strike began July 13 in a contract dispute between the publishers and two locals of the Printing Pressmen—Pressmen's Local 13 and Paper & Plate Handlers' Local 10. The latter local approved new contract terms Nov. 12 but one issue separated the Pressmen and the publishers—the size of the crew needed to run the News's new eight-unit presses. The Pressmen held out for 16 men, the employers for 15.

Pressmen's Local 13 Pres. Freeman Frazee proposed, and the parties agreed, to meet with Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers at Solidarity House, UAW headquarters here. At midnight Nov. 1, they approved this compromise, reached after discussion with the UAW president and federal and state mediators:

For the first year of a 45-month contract, the crew will number 16 men; then it becomes 15 unless the Pressmen decide to carry the issue to final and binding arbitration, with a decision to be handed down within the final three months of the one-year period.

Local 13 members voted 210-14 to approve contract terms which included wage increases of $4.55 a week the first year, $3.75 the second, a wage reopener the final year, health and welfare benefits and other improvements.

The mediators' panel was headed by Walter A. Maggiolo of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Ford Disputes Settled, Contract Benefits Hailed

Detroit—The Auto Workers signed a new three-year agreement providing major benefits for 125,000 Ford Motor Co. employes, and ended two other strikes with substantial gains for more than 6,000 other workers.

The Ford contract signing followed ratification of local agreements by the last two of nine plants struck early in December. UAW Ford Dept. Dir. Ken Bannon credited the "teamwork" of UAW members for the accomplishment of contract goals.

The new contract, he said, fulfills the commitment UAW delegates made at the union convention last March. It provides early retirement, improved vacation pay, two additional holidays, increased relief time—all to reduce work time and create job opportunities — along with wage increases and more humane production standards.

Settlement of a separate Ford strike was announced by the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Members of IBEW Local 1377 ratified a three-year contract after a 31-day strike at Ford's Cleveland engine plant and foundry.

Another strike settlement sent 6,400 tool and die workers back to 59 Detroit job shops after a two-week walkout. Members of UAW Locals 155 and 157 voted 1,897-474 to ratify new pacts providing wage hikes of 26-35 cents an hour; 1 percent more vacation pay; and improved pension, health, insurance and other benefits for skilled trades workers and retirees.

Council Presses '65 Legislative Goals

Bids 89th Congress Act in 14 Key Areas

- Promote urban renewal and aid low-cost public housing as well as housing for those of moderate income; appropriate adequate funds for mass transit; establish a Department of Housing and Community Affairs in the Cabinet.
- Continue and expand federal grants for community facilities, including air and water pollution, highways, hospitals, health facilities and airports.
- Advance the concept of regional planning set out in the Appalachia program in handling the problem of depressed areas, and provide a new federal initiative in the conservation and development of natural resources.
- Provide for grants and loans for community mental health centers, direct service group practice plans, modernization of existing hospitals and aid for students in the health professions.
- Appropriate more funds for the anti-poverty program, specifically the Equal Opportunities Act and the Manpower Development & Training Act.
- Eliminate excise taxes on goods and services generally used by all Americans, close tax loopholes, revise the tax system to ease the burden on low-income groups and to prevent "the indiscriminate rebate of federal taxes to the states with no restrictions on the use of such funds."
- Enact legislation to protect the consumer on installment buying, packaging, drugs, and create a federal consumer information service; guard against all forms of "fair trade" laws.
- Prevent importation of Mexican farm laborers and improve the conditions of migratory farm labor by including them under national labor and social insurance laws.
- Continue support for trade expansion if a mechanism to protect workers and businesses adversely affected can be made to work; incorporate fair labor standards in world trade; continue support for foreign aid programs; use American flag ships in transporting aid projects.

Meany told reporters at the news conference that Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz had spent an hour with the council discussing legislation in the upcoming Congress. He characterized the discussion as "very good."

In answer to queries, Meany said that in addition to correcting an inequity in national labor law, repeal of 14b and therefore state "right-to-work" laws would affect the economy of the states where they exist, states marked by low wages, a high degree of poverty and other problems.

On hospital insurance for the elderly, he said the AFL-CIO was committed basically to the "vital principle" that the health problems of the aged can only be handled under the social security system and the federation would support legislation establishing this principle.

Better Education Goal

On aid to education, Meany said the federation's goal was to help all American children to get a better education.

And on the reported proposal to give federal funds to the states without qualification, Meany said the AFL-CIO is flatly opposed to the plan and had made its views known to Pres. Johnson. The federation, he said, is not against federal help for the states but is opposed to "giving them funds without strings."

The federation president told reporters that before his death Pres. Kennedy indicated the proposal for a shorter workweek required more study and appeared to be changing his position of opposition. Pres. Johnson and Sec. Wirtz have the same approach currently, Meany said. He added that he believes that a shorter workweek is "inevitable" in the face of changing economic conditions.

Johnson Hails Labor's Role In Election

said he knew that American labor would work as hard in helping build the Great Society as it did in the election and that he is grateful for this support.

The text of the President's letter:

"Your telegram of congratulations on behalf of the AFL-CIO was deeply appreciated. You can be sure that Senator Humphrey and I will exert every effort at our command to justify the faith that the members of the AFL-CIO and their fellow citizens placed in us.

Full Labor Support

"During the campaign the American labor movement gave us its full support. Certainly no group worked harder for a Democratic victory. For that I am grateful. And I know that the American labor movement will work as hard to move forward against those common enemies—poverty, unemployment, ignorance and prejudice—that we must defeat if we are to build in this America of ours a Great Society. For that also, I am grateful.

"Again, thank you for helping to achieve a victory, a victory which I consider less mine than it is a victory for hope and a brighter future for each American as we all work together to make tomorrow better than today."

Metal Trades Win Pact at Space Center

Greenbelt, Md.—Major gains in working conditions and grievance procedures were negotiated by the Washington Area Metal Trades Council for 225 employes of the Goddard Space Flight Center here. It is the first contract the National Aeronautics & Space Agency has signed covering a group of its employes.

The Metal Trades agreement provides for arbitration of grievances, recognition of shop stewards, twice daily rest periods and cleanup time before lunch and the end of a shift.

Other features include rotation on shift work, a 72-hour notice prior to a shift change, two consecutive days off, a promotion plan and a declaration that management will be guided in the assignment of work by mutual agreements between unions on jurisdiction.

The contract, covering all hourly-paid workers at the space center, also gives the Metal Trades Council representation on shop safety committees.

The Metal Trades negotiating team was headed by Robert W. Fauntleroy, secretary of the Washington area council.

TRIBUTE WAS PAID AFL-CIO George Meany as "an intrepid fighter against communistic influences within the labor movement" when he received an honorary degree of doctor of laws during an academic convocation at Iona College, New Rochelle, N. Y. Conferring the degree is the college president, Rev. Brother Richard B. Power (left), and assisting with the doctoral investiture is Dr. Joseph G. Dwyer (right), chairman of the school's division of arts.

Unions Seek Job Talks At Closing Defense Units

Unions representing workers at U.S. defense establishments have called for immediate talks at national and local levels about the future of 63,000 employes whose jobs will be abolished in an economy move.

The Defense Dept. announced that 95 military installations will be shut down, including two big naval shipyards. Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara promised that new jobs would be found for most of the workers—those with civil service career status. And he said retraining would be provided and moving expenses paid if necessary.

The AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., which bargains for the largest group of the workers affected, urged that readjustment measures be developed in consultation with the unions. The department said this would be "the surest way" to minimize the impact of the closings and ensure retraining geared "to the best interests of the workers involved and communities in which they reside."

"Of real concern," the department said, "is the loss of community purchasing power and the many jobs in the communities which have been generated by payrolls and purchases of the activities involved."

Maritime Proposal

Another AFL-CIO trade department proposed that the skills discarded by the government be used to build America's merchant marine.

Exec. Sec.-Treas. Peter M. McGavin of the Maritime Trades Dept. commented:

"Instead of shutting down the Brooklyn Navy Yard to save money, the secretary of defense should have arranged to have it turned over to private shipbuilding companies with enough orders for new merchant ship construction to revitalize the American merchant marine."

The men whose jobs are being abolished in the two closed shipyards, he said, "are highly trained" and "equipped to produce the shipping America urgently needs."

Most of the close-downs will be accomplished gradually, depending on the backlog of work and expansion of other facilities.

Three Rail Shop Unions Sign Pacts

a cost-of-living "escalator" clause. The railroads counter-proposed a wage cut of 10 cents an hour for half the affected workers to finance a wage increase for the others.

The shopcrafts argued before the wage board and in negotiations that a flat raise of 9 cents an hour would not recognize the special skills of the workers they represent, whose wages, they said, have not kept pace with those of workers in outside industry.

Wage Raises In 1964 Pacts Average 3.2%

changes totaled 20.5 cents or 8.9 percent of straight-time average hourly earnings in unionized manufacturing plants. Combining this with the increased cost of major supplementary benefits, the BLS said workers gained about 28 cents an hour or 10 percent more in total benefits.

About 1.1 million workers affected by contract settlements before Oct. 1, 1964, were in manufacturing industries, where the average wage-rate hike was 2.5 percent. These included more than 200,000 workers at Ford and Chrysler, where the first-year general wage increase was diverted for supplemental benefits by agreement with the UAW.

But the auto industry contracts provided for wage inequity adjustments in the first year, said BLS. It added that the take-home pay of Ford and Chrysler employes also increased by an average of 3 cents an hour because the companies agreed to take over the workers' payment of part of the premiums for life, sickness and accident insurance.

Other major settlements negotiated in manufacturing in the period studied were in meat packing and petroleum.

Another finding of the survey was that some 45 percent of 1.2 million workers in the nonmanufacturing industries got wage boosts averaging 2.5 to 3.5 percent. Most were in the trucking industry, with some in the telephone field.

About an eighth of the nonmanufacturing workers, including locomotive engineers and bituminous miners, got increases of 6 percent or more. The average adjustment in the industries studied was 3.1 percent, said the BLS, which added that the last previous increase for the miners had been in 1959.

LBJ Urged to Broaden Curbs on Housing Bias

The National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing urged Pres. Johnson to take a "second step" to prevent race or religious bias in federally-aided housing.

Two years ago, Pres. Kennedy took the first step. He issued an executive order barring discrimination in new FHA or VA-insured housing.

The committee, made up of labor, religious and civil rights groups, asked Johnson to extend the order to cover housing financed by any federally-regulated agency.

Specifically, this would include housing financed by "conventional" loans from banks or savings institutions which are federally-supervised or whose deposits are insured by agencies set up by the government.

Charles Abrams, president of the committee, told newsmen the order also should be expanded to cover FHA and VA housing built before Nov. 20, 1962.

He pointed out that the present order, although "a landmark" when it was issued, covers less than 25 percent of housing affected by federal financial assistance or support.

The committee said housing segregation "is tied directly to slums and slum conditions, to segregated schools, to inequities in employment, to the poverty which haunts millions of Negro Americans and other minorities."

Abrams warned that the National Association of Real Estate Boards has built a "war chest" to launch a nationwide drive against state and local fair housing legislation.

Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, is a vice president of the anti-discrimination committee. A number of other union officials, including AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman, serve on the board.

Labor Aids Victims Of Vietnam Flood

The AFL-CIO Executive Council is sending $5,000 to the Vietnamese labor movement to aid the victims of the recent floods in the Southeast Asia country.

Federation Pres. George Meany announced that the funds are being cabled to George Baldanzi, president of the United Textile Workers now in Vietnam, for presentation to Tran-Quoc-Buu, president of the Vietnamese Confederation of Labor.

Labor and the Great Society

IN ITS STATEMENT on AFL-CIO legislative goals for 1965, the Executive Council said that on Nov. 3 the American people gave their mandate "to the program of progress Pres. Johnson has called the 'Great Society.' "

The President first gave voice to his concept of the future in an address to the 102d commencement of the University of Michigan in May. He described his idea of the Great Society as one of "challenge constantly renewed, beckoning us toward a destiny where the meaning of our lives matches the marvelous products of our labor."

We must, the President said, "elevate our national life" and "advance the quality of American civilization."

"To achieve this, he said, "the entire urban United States" must be rebuilt and "we must act to prevent an ugly America—polluted air, water and food, disappearing fields and forests, overcrowded recreational areas."

In this new concept of America, the President said, "we must give every child a place to sit and a teacher to learn from" and "poverty must not be a bar to learning and learning must offer an escape from poverty."

He said the nation needed "new concepts of cooperation" that would include "a creative federalism between the national capital and the leaders of local communities." And the President sharply disagreed with those "who say this battle cannot be won, that we are condemned to soul-less wealth."

The nation has the "power to shape the civilization we want," he declared, adding that a number of "working groups" would be named to prepare programs and solutions to the many and complex problems.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL points out that creating the Great Society means essentially adapting the ideals and aspirations of the founders of the nation to the second half of the 20th Century; that the measures needed to bring about the great future "are far less revolutionary than the idea upon which this nation was built—the idea that 'all men are created equal.' "

The only requirements, it says, "are the courage, determination and imagination to support what needs to be done." These requirements are at hand to bring about what the council says is "an attainable reality."

The vision of a Great Society as projected by Johnson is not just for union members, the council notes, or just for wage-earners. It is for "every American, and indeed for all mankind."

TO MAKE the vision a reality, to translate an idea into an act of Congress, requires the same outpouring of support that rejected in November the radical assault on the social and economic structure built over the past three decades.

It requires a determined, unceasing effort to make clear to the lawmakers that "an end to poverty and deprivation in our time" is within reach; that the people have truly spoken.

The AFL-CIO is pledged to use all of its resources, in Pres. Johnson's words, "to make tomorrow better than today," to implement the goals it has set forth, to have the government—the instrument of the people—"use its powers to attack and solve the people's problems."

Translating the Mandate

Despite the Election Rout:

Far Right Back at Its Old Game Of Reaction, Attack, Division

THE LANDSLIDE by which American voters returned Pres. Johnson to the White House, along with his very liberal running mate, Hubert Humphrey, was a stunning defeat to "extremism" as a major issue and for Barry Goldwater personally; but it did little to affect the continuing activities of the right-wing movement. The popularity contest went overwhelmingly against the right wingers, but they still own all the marbles they had when they entered the game, even though some of their political idols were retired.

In fact, the far right showed a new high-water mark in political activity and is now free to go back to its same old game of reaction, attack, suspicion, organization and division. After all, the right wing works every day, not just at election time, the same as others. In fact, their forces are now freed from activity aimed at getting immediate votes. Five general observations seem to be supported by the election results:

1. Extremism, as a major political issue, has been soundly defeated. The issue was drawn quite clearly even before the Republican Party chose its candidate at the San Francisco convention. New York's Gov. Rockefeller made a case against Goldwater as an extremist for nearly a year before the California primary, where Goldwater clinched his ultimate control of the GOP.

2. But there will be a resurgence of conservatism, if not extremism. The basis for this observation is articulated by the editorial comment of a die-hard conservative newspaper, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat: "The one-sided election should not obscure the fact that there is a true resurgence of conservative thought in America which failed to show itself as vast numbers of moderate and conservative Republicans simply could not bring themselves to vote for Goldwater."

3. The extent of the right-wing take-over is not generally realized. Even after Goldwater won nomination on the first ballot, many people could not realize that an apparatus, as well as a philosophy of conservatism, was operating within the GOP. As the campaign progressed, and Goldwater men threw their weight around, this became more obvious; but the real depth of penetration is not yet fully known.

Bits and pieces of the story involve Goldwater's chief speech writer, Karl Hess, a veteran of several right-wing movements. However, there are many parts which have not yet been examined. For example, a half-hour of prime TV time for Goldwater was allotted to two famous Hollywood personalities, Ronald Reagan and John Wayne, who are not generally identified with the right wing but have been active in it.

Reagan is best known as a GE-sponsored personality and speaker at groups such as chambers of commerce and the Farm Bureau, but he has also been active with Dr. Fred Schwarz, has solicited membership in Young Americans for Freedom, and has presented such favorite right-wing themes as income-tax repeal. Wayne has also appeared on Schwarz programs and is on the advisory board of H. L. Hunt's Life Line Foundation.

4. Tactics branded as dirty are likely to continue. Side-line observers agree that this was one of the dirtiest campaigns in history, but few of them have thought about the continuing nature of the tactics they deplore. With few exceptions, these tactics will continue substantially, for they are the tactics of the far right more than of this specific campaign between Democrats and Republicans. Aside from run-of-the-mill name calling, the major activity complained of this year was publication of three paperback books and a tabloid—not by official campaign headquarters, but by established radical rightists. This is new.

Fair Campaign Committee Director Bruce Felknor criticized this development in "dirty books," which reached a circulation of some 17 million. "Never have campaign documents of such sheer bulk been distributed in such mass," he concluded. "The burden of the big three was to make out Lyndon Johnson to be totally corrupt; to make the Democratic Party out to be selling out to the Reds; and—possibly most significant—to make liberal Republicans out as the co-conspirators of the Democrats in advancing the cause of world communism. Embroidery on this already scurrilous fabric is the usual work of haters and lunatics, whose publications, anonymous and signed alike, dirty every campaign."

5. The legislative targets of the right wing should fare better. Next to the size of Johnson's landslide, the big news of the election to politicians was the net gain of about 40 seats in Congress by the Democrats. This alone indicates that Johnson will be able to get more of his "Great Society" program passed; a closer analysis shows that the conservative end of the political spectrum in the House took a substantial beating in comparison with the liberal end. (Group Research Report.)

Morgan Says:

The Legend of John F. Kennedy Promises to Become Universal

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

THERE UNDOUBTEDLY are corners of the world where the cold shoulder of calloused uninterest or looks of outright hostility are turned toward this anniversary of grief. But they are hard to find. The legend of John F. Kennedy is everywhere and there are no signs of its diminishing.

On the Dutch island of Curacao, off the northern edge of South America, this recent traveler found a plethora of Kennedy mementoes, both touching and hideous, added to the standard stock of tourist souvenirs.

Morgan

Books by and about the late president were prominent in shops in Caracas. The newstand in a resort hotel at Macuto, on the Venezuelan coast, featured a movie magazine in Spanish, the color cover of which was shared by Jacqueline Kennedy and Elizabeth Taylor, apropos of an article inside about the trials and tragedies of their respective lives.

Radio Trinidad recently broadcast a three-stanza calypso dedicated to John-John and the life ahead of him. On the Virgin Island of Antigua, in the British West Indies, there is a crude sign on the road to English Harbor which reads, "Welcome to Everybody's Kennedy Club." A year ago New York City's biggest airport was simply "Idlewild." Flying into John F. Kennedy Intl. Airport on the evening of Nov. 22, 1964, somehow struck a painfully poignant note at the end of the first anniversary of a day that should never have been.

Now that the tributes have been paid, the prayers said, the sermons intoned, the tragedy relived, the memories are as fresh and pungent as a pine forest at high noon and the mementoes are as cherished as rare gems. Will it be ever thus? Who can say? The fascinating question of the moment is, why already such an extraordinary impact on the world by a young man in such a brief if blazing orbit?

A distinguished man of letters was searching privately for the answer the other day. Here, he mused, was a rich young man, son of a powerful and calculating Boston Irish father who had been openly despised by many—for his business methods, his lack of belief in the strength of the stubborn British courage against Hitler, or for something else. And when young Jack burst upon the public scene, nobody took him very seriously.

Between his brief and unsuccessful reach for the Democratic vice presidential nomination in 1956 and his triumph with the grand prize in 1960, he and his wife were on almost every magazine cover in the land. But who could be so young and handsome, who could be so beautiful and bewitching and breathless as Jack and Jackie and expect seriously—as Roman Catholics to boot—to gain the White House? John F. Kennedy did win, in one of the closest elections in the history of the republic. But in the months ahead, his legislative program hardly got off the ground. Then, in a blinding instant, everything was transformed.

SUDDENLY THE COUNTRY and the world were mourning the loss of a prince they had not yet bothered to crown. Perhaps, the American man of letters reflected, here had been the embodiment of promise. The promise of grace and style and wit to counter some of the more ghastly vulgarities of American life. The promise of courage and boundless young energy against the towering problems, domestic and foreign. The promise of intelligence and respect for the human mind against the stupid and the cynical and those anguished souls who suspected the ennobling power of knowledge, perhaps because they possessed so little of it themselves.

There is often much wisdom in simple explanations.

A handsome young taxi driver named Neville Nathaniel, sitting beside a flaming bougainvillea bush above an Antigua beach, remembered that day a year before.

"Everything on the island came to a standstill," he said. "I couldn't work. I gave my calls to another man. All through the night, Antigua was one big wake."

The day they buried the President, Nathaniel and his family went to four different memorial services. Today if an Antiguan child is naughty he may be labeled "Khrushchev." If he's good, he may be rewarded with the approving comment that he is behaving like John Kennedy.

"He was a good man," Nathaniel said, "who thought about people. That is my feeling and I will never get it out of me. I cannot believe yet that he is dead."

I spent an hour recently watching a screening of the TV videotape of the Kennedy inauguration. There was craggy old Robert Frost admonishing us in poetry that we had been withholding ourselves from "our land of the living."

Pres. Kennedy "gave himself outright." No wonder that Neville Nathaniel and I and countless others find him still living in that imperishable dedication.

Washington Reports:

'Pep', Sleep Pills Being Pushed By Crime Rings, Larrick Says

ORGANIZED CRIMINALS have entered into a new form of drug traffic with the so-called "pep" pills and sleeping pills, George P. Larrick, commissioner of the Food & Drug Administration, declared in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service program, Washington Reports to the People, heard on more than 700 radio stations.

"The efficiency of the Narcotics Bureau, in making it difficult to get the hard narcotics, has driven these people to buy these other drugs," he said. "We encounter more violations in this field than in the other fields in which we work."

He called for legislation that would require records to show "how much of each is manufactured, and to whom how much is sold."

Over 1 million pounds of food are taken off the market by FDA investigators each month, Larrick reported. He said these include:

"Foods that are stored in warehouses where they are exposed to rodents and insects. Packaged goods that have spoiled, maybe because they were in a wreck, have been improperly stored, too close to heat, or when prepared, were not of proper quality, and decomposed."

HE ADDED that this situation is improving, because "the food manufacturing industry, as a whole, values its reputation, and workers in the plants take pride in what they produce."

Larrick confirmed that some artificial sweeteners are being investigated, because of their growing use and the fact that some doctors have raised the question of their safety in large amounts.

"We do not, however, have any affirmative evidence to make us question their safety," he said.

He said the establishment of an office like that of Esther Peterson as assistant to the President on consumer affairs, and of a House Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs has aided in FDA work.

"It has centered attention on problems," he explained. "It has given us people who are knowledgeable, with whom we can discuss our problems and get advice."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

(Willard Shelton is on vacation. His column will be resumed in the issue of Dec. 5.)

BARRY GOLDWATER, obviously stung by his defeat, was quick to come up with scapegoats: the press, radio and television.

In his so-called "concession" statement he labeled "the whole Fourth Estate a sad, sorry mess."

His prime targets, however, were newspaper columnists and commentators, suggesting that they "should hide their heads in shame."

The Columbia Journalism Review has made an in-depth study of such charges and has concluded that "the campaign attacks on the news integrity of all media as a class have been unfair, irresponsible and, in some cases, vicious."

For years Democrats have complained about the one-party press. It is a fact that in recent elections up to 1964, never did more than 17 percent of the daily newspapers endorse the Democratic candidate.

This year, the Democrats had a slight lead over the Republicans in endorsements at the presidential level, although it is questionable whether these endorsements were carried to lesser offices.

THE REVIEW says that cases of "injustice in news reporting . . . have been rare and exceptional. In general, Sen. Goldwater's activities and utterances, like the President's, have been reported generously, honestly, and literally."

Goldwater's unresolved problem was that no recent presidential candidate has equalled him in imprecise use of the English language, oversimplification, and seeming self-contradiction.

Erwin Canham, editor of The Christian Science Monitor and former head of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, had this observation about the Arizona senator:

"In 35 years of political reporting and editing, I have never met a public figure who is more difficult to cover fairly. You have to work very hard to protect the man against his own indiscretions."

AS TO NEWSPAPER columnists, are they the flaming liberals Goldwater would have us believe?

The Review carries an analysis of newspaper columnists and their use by publishers, as compiled by Ben H. Bagdikian.

He refers to a 1959 study of 711 newspapers. There have been some changes in names, but the general complexion of the columnists remains the same. George Sokolsky and Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt have since died. Others, like Charles Bartlett, Evans and Novak, Barry Goldwater and William Buckley, had not entered the field. The ratings were:

Very liberal—Eleanor Roosevelt.

Liberal—Walter Lippmann, Doris Fleeson, John Herling.

Mildly liberal—Joseph Alsop, Marquis Childs, Robert Allen and Paul Scott, Drew Pearson and Ralph McGill.

Mildly conservative—Roscoe Drummond, Ray Tucker, Walter Winchell.

Conservative—Ruth Montgomery, Walter Trohan, Constantine Brown, Raymond Moley, Robert Ruark, Holmes Alexander, Victor Riesel, Bob Considine.

Very conservative—George Sokolsky, David Lawrence, Westbrook Pegler, Fulton Lewis, Jr., Paul Harvey, Fulton Sheen, George Benson.

This shows conservative columnists outnumbering liberals. The study also determined that if a paper carried columns with a 2-to-1 ratio for one point of view, it had an imbalance.

Of the 599 papers using columns:

- 335 (circulation: 24,643,000) had an imbalance favoring conservatives.
- 143 (circulation: 10,799,000) had an imbalance favoring liberals.
- 121 (circulation: 7,799,000) had balanced columns.

This picture gives conservatives an almost two-and-a-half to one break in the use of columns. Updating it with the new columnists and omitting those not writing today would show substantially the same results. (PAI)

PROTECTION of the foods you eat and the drugs you take was discussed by George P. Larrick (left), commissioner of the Food & Drug Administration, in an interview with Harry W. Flannery on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

AFL-CIO Legislative Goals for 1965—

Following is the statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on 1965 legislative goals at its Nov. 24 meeting:

THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE has never been more clearly evident. On Nov. 3, American voters overwhelmingly voiced their confidence in the social and economic structure that has been built, step by step, over the last 32 years.

They forthrightly rejected a radical assault on that structure.

They decisively proclaimed their desire to move on from a good present to a great future.

They gave their mandate to the program of progress Pres. Johnson has called the "Great Society."

Now it is incumbent upon all who joined in that mandate to translate it into practical reality.

Basically, this means adapting the ideals and aspirations of the Founding Fathers of the Republic to the America in which we live—America in the second half of the 20th Century.

The ideals and aspirations have not changed. Liberty, equality, opportunity are still the American dream. But the nation itself has changed to a degree that the wisest men of 200 years ago did not and could not have conceived.

The United States has burgeoned from a sparse scattering of farms and villages along the Atlantic coast into a vast urban and industrial complex, spanning the continent, extending half way across the Pacific and reaching north beyond the Arctic Circle.

The 2.5 million Americans of 1776 have become over 190 million today. Today's Americans—most of them—live in the city, not the country. They work in business and industry, not on farms. With the same unquenchable spirit, the same energy and the same ingenuity that characterized their forefathers, they have made the United States the richest and most productive land the world has ever known.

But for too many Americans this wealth and this production is a remote ideal. They do not share in it; they live in misery and want.

More than one in five of America's families suffer the indignities of unemployment, poverty and slums. America's major problem, unemployment, remains unsolved, despite the record 46 months of continuing rise of economic activities.

These ugly aspects of our social order will not simply disappear by the wave of a magic wand. Indeed, there is a danger that they can fester and poison our entire society.

The rising demands of our youth, of Negroes and of disadvantaged Americans of all races and creeds for jobs and economic opportunity cry out for positive responses. This is our challenge.

Today we have the opportunity to meet that challenge, to take, in 1965, a giant step forward on the road to a society that will enable all our citizens to realize their full potential. And this giant step forward can be taken through enactment of the measures the AFL-CIO has long urged.

These are not novel measures. They are not visionary measures. They are practical, down-to-earth measures.

They are far less revolutionary than the idea upon which this nation was built—the idea that "all men are created equal." Yet they are essential if the goals of 1776 are to be realized today.

The only requirements are the courage, determination and imagination to support what needs to be done; to make a massive investment in America, one that this nation's immense productive potential can take in stride, one that truly brings within reach an end to poverty and deprivation in our time.

Let us first summarize our goals.

We believe in the total elimination of poverty in America.

We believe that this requires, first, jobs at good wages for all who are able and willing to work; and second, a social insurance program that protects young and old alike from the economic hazards which are no fault of their own.

We believe in full and equal opportunity, full and equal rights, for every American in every phase of life, regardless of race, creed, color or national origin.

We believe this equality can be brought about only if there is full employment.

We believe that free collective bargaining is an indispensable element in the search for economic justice and personal liberty for workers.

We believe in the wise use of America's riches to create a richer life for all Americans.

We believe that government, the instrument of the people, should use its powers to attack and to solve the people's problems.

We believe that progress toward these goals can be made in the 1965 session of the Congress by the measures set forth below.

Restoring Free Collective Bargaining

The importance of free collective bargaining to the living standards of workers and to the economic stability of the nation has been recognized for three decades; the encouragement of collective bargaining, through all this time and through all the changes in labor-management legislation, remains the stated policy of the United States.

Thus it is evident that free labor and free management should be able freely to agree upon mutually acceptable terms of employment. They should, therefore, be free to negotiate a contract making union membership a condition of employment.

Experience has proven the adverse effects of the unique provision of the Taft-Hartley Act making it possible for the states to forbid such voluntary labor-management agreements. Sec. 14(b) allows the states to outlaw the union shop as such, regardless of the wishes of the workers and their employers. It cedes a negative jurisdiction to the states in an area which the federal government has otherwise properly preempted.

This is an unwarranted intrusion upon the rights of organized workers and their employers to negotiate mutually acceptable agreements. It offends the basic principles of federal-state relationships and should be repealed.

National Labor Legislation

There are other provisions of existing federal labor law that directly conflict with the established policy of the United States to further collective bargaining. These provisions restrict the right of workers to organize, to picket and to strike. They urgently require revision.

Three major bills relating to labor-management relations have been enacted since 1935. Some of their provisions overlap or are contradictory, causing needless complications, uncertainty and court appeals. We urge prompt action to eliminate inequities and resolve contradictions in basic labor-management law.

Social Insurance

The Social Security System's contribution to American life has touched virtually every family in the nation. Possibly more than any other social program, it has operated to ameliorate and prevent poverty. It has improved the quality of everyday life for millions.

The worst threat to old-age security today is the high cost of illness. The general design of a workable remedy became clear beyond doubt in the 88th Congress—a national hospital insurance system based on social security principles for those over 65. Now the 89th Congress must implement what is unquestionably the will of the people.

To make Social Security truly effective in reducing poverty, substantial increases in cash benefits are also absolutely necessary—for the retired, the disabled and for widows and dependent children. Adjustments in such benefits should also take into account that age 65 is in fact no longer a realistic age for retirement. As a minimum the actuarial reduction for early retirement should be modified.

There should be established a federal system of reinsurance for all private pension plans to assure the payment of the benefits provided by such funds. Tax credit for employer payments into such pension plans should be contingent on participation in the reinsurance plan.

It has been clear for years that unemployment compensation must be freed from inequitable state limitations on weekly benefits, eligibility and duration of payments, and from inadequate financing. We have repeatedly asserted that a federal system of minimum standards must be enacted to enable unemployment insurance to fulfill its intended role of maintaining a strong economy and meeting the needs of those who are unemployed through no fault of their own.

Wage-Hour Improvements

Since most Americans agree that there is no excuse for poverty in America, poverty among those who are fully employed at useful work must surely be regarded as intolerable. There must be no "working poor" in the richest nation on earth.

The Fair Labor Standards Act was designed to outlaw that kind of poverty. The time has come when it must be modernized to achieve that end.

Coverage of the act should at once be broadened to include all workers whose jobs affect interstate commerce. The exclusion of millions, over many years, has been a disgraceful injustice and an economic absurdity.

The basic minimum wage should be raised to $2 an hour, simply to assure all employed workers of a standard of living above the poverty level.

The standard workweek should be cut to 35 hours, in line with the higher productivity of American workers.

The overtime penalty should rise from time and a half to double time, in order to discourage overtime and create new jobs.

Education

Every American child is entitled to as much education as he wants and can usefully absorb.

This is a basic principle. It is basic to the American way of life and it is basic to the future of the United States as a nation.

Great strides were taken by the 88th Congress, but there are greater strides yet to be taken if this principle is to become a reality. They include:

1. A major program of federal aid to elementary and secondary schools to help meet all needs, including construction, in the categories of instruction covered by the National Defense Education Act. This should include construction grants for all schools.
2. Substantial federal aid to schools which serve large numbers of culturally-disadvantaged children from low-income areas, including work-study opportunities for vocational and high school students.
3. Comprehensive assistance, embracing scholarships, expanded student loans and work-study opportunities, for junior college and college students. The Cold War GI Bill of Rights would help meet this need.
4. We urge the appropriation of additional federal funds to foster the growth of community junior colleges.

Urban Problems

The great cities that only a generation ago were America's pride are now beset by problems that only expanded federal action can resolve. The decay of city centers is a shocking waste. The urgency of these problems grows daily, for every day the United States becomes increasingly an urban nation.

Ever since the early years of the New Deal this country has been pledged to the proposition that every American family is entitled to a decent home. That goal must still be met.

Public housing for low-income families has been shamefully neglected. A heavy increase in grants-in-aid is required to give reality to the fight against slums.

Low-cost, long-term loans must be more readily available to provide housing for those of moderate income.

These same needs should also be met in rural areas, but the problem is far more acute in the teeming cities.

Urban renewal in the broad sense must be stepped up, with emphasis on slum clearance and modernization, based upon community planning.

Special attention—and assistance—must be devoted to the thousands of families and small businesses which even now are dislocated each year by new highways, housing developments and other public projects.

Mass transit is a decisive factor in the future of urban life. The bill enacted by the 88th Congress must be reinforced by fully adequate appropriations.

All the foregoing can be expedited by the establishment of a Dept. of Housing & Community Affairs in the Cabinet.

Community Facilities

There has for years been a vast backlog of urgently-needed community facilities, from water and sewage systems to cultural centers and public buildings. A continuing federal program of grants-in-aid is essential to dispose of this backlog and keep pace with the mounting requirements of a rapidly-growing population. In addition, full appropriations of already-authorized funds is needed for the attack on air and water pollution and for the construction of highways, hospitals, other health facilities, college buildings, and airports.

This whole area is a classic example of the economic dividends that flow from social progress. As the nation invests in these facilities, it will also create huge numbers of useful jobs—and therefore increase the number of consumers and taxpayers.

—Council Calls for Action in 14 Areas

Regional and Resource Development

Experience under the Area Redevelopment Act of 1961 has demonstrated the need for a broader assault on chronic depression—an assault that embraces a region rather than a single community. The proposed Appalachia program conforms to this need and it has our support.

There should be similar programs in other areas, based upon the concept of regional planning. Financial and technical assistance by the federal government can obviously be more effective on this broader base.

There remains the national challenge of conservation and development of natural resources. Such areas as water supply and river development, giant grids for the interstate transmission of electric power, desalinization of sea water, the preservation and maintenance of national forests and range lands—and these are but a few—require firm federal initiative.

Health Problems

The ever-accelerating advances in medical science hold forth the promise of long life and good health to a degree never before imagined.

The benefits of this astonishing progress must be made available to all Americans. But this cannot be brought about without legislative action.

There is still a pressing need for skilled personnel to man the hospitals and other health facilities already being built. This requires federal scholarships and other assistance to students in the health professions. Also among the essential areas of federal action are grants and loans for the operation of community mental health centers, construction of facilities for direct-service health plans based on group practice, and hospital construction and the modernization of existing hospitals.

War on Poverty

Pres. Johnson's declaration of war on poverty has captured the imagination of America, and rightly so. It is fully consistent with the policy of the American labor movement, for poverty has been our sworn enemy since the first union was established.

Virtually every item in this present list of legislative goals is an attack on poverty. Many are direct, like wage-hour improvements; some are indirect, like conservation; but all contribute to the objective.

The war on poverty is already in progress and needs more support; specifically, it needs more money. We refer in particular to the Economic Opportunities Act and the Manpower Development & Training Act.

Tax Policy

There is general agreement that the federal tax structure needs improvement.

We support at this time the elimination of excise taxes that now apply to goods and services generally used by all Americans.

We further call for effective action against all tax loopholes.

We most vigorously urge a revision of the tax structure to ease the disproportionate burden on low income groups, and we insist on the elimination of income taxes imposed upon those who are at or below the poverty level.

We oppose the indiscriminate rebate of federal taxes to the states with no restrictions on the use of such funds.

Consumer Protection

It has been clear for a long time that the American consumer is at a serious disadvantage in dealing with sharp lenders and unethical merchants. A number of measures to aid the consumer that have already been proposed deserve enactment.

One is a simple requirement that an installment buyer should know how much interest he is really paying.

Another asks that packaged goods give a clear indication of what's inside, in terms that the buyer can understand without a slide-rule.

Others reinforce the work of the late Sen. Kefauver on drugs and drug prices.

We also propose a federal consumer information service to help buyers meet the complexities of today's marketplace.

We cannot understand why any reputable merchant or manufacturer should oppose these simple groundrules. They are consistent with the principle of free competition. Similarly, we oppose all forms of "fair trade" laws, under any name, that are designed to maintain monopoly price-fixing.

Migratory Labor

Migrant farm workers have long been the most painfully exploited people in America, whether they were citizens or imported visitors.

The AFL-CIO was gratified when Congress put an end to the importation of Mexican farm laborers under Public Law 78. We are appalled to learn that some large agricultural interests are making efforts to continue the same program under Public Law 414. This is clearly contrary to the intent of the Congress and it must not be allowed to happen.

Moreover much remains to be done for American migratory labor. Congress should provide minimum wage standards for migratory farm workers, include them under the unemployment compensation system, strike out their exemption from the protection of the general labor laws, assure them of adequate housing and health services and see to it that their children have full and equal educational opportunities.

Foreign Trade and Aid

The AFL-CIO has amply demonstrated its commitment to the principle of trade expansion.

We have also stressed that trade expansion will continue to command broad national support only if accompanied by a mechanism to protect workers and businesses adversely affected by increased imports.

The present law contains a mechanism but it has yet to work. Unless it can be made to work, it must be replaced by one that does.

The incorporation of fair labor standards in international trade should be an integral part of United States trade policy.

The foreign aid and economic assistance programs have also had the whole-hearted support of the labor movement since their inception. While we believe private American investment in developing nations is desirable, it can only be a supplement, not a substitute, for government help. Moreover, while the United States government should make sure that funds provided for specific projects are spent efficiently, it should fully respect the right of aided nations to determine their own forms of economic control and ownership. The use of American flag ships in transporting materials used in aid projects and indeed in all aspects of our export-import commerce must be expanded.

The principles of the Alliance for Progress should guide American aid undertakings in Africa and Asia. The United States should also seek joint efforts with other democracies in both civilian and military assistance projects in new and emerging nations.

Conclusion

Inevitably there will be those who ask what all this will cost; who question whether the nation can afford a better life for its people.

There is a two-fold answer.

The first is that America cannot afford anything less. Poverty, unemployment, discrimination and ignorance are intolerable in a society that has the resources to wipe them out.

Second, what we are proposing is a massive investment in the future of the nation—an investment the country can easily afford, and one that is essential to its destiny and to the future of freedom on earth.

Our view would be more easily understood if the United States like other western nations adopted a capital budget—an accounting that truly distinguishes between costs and investment. The federal government's accounts should separate housekeeping costs and national security outlays, on the one hand, and on the other, the sums used to create, improve or acquire assets, or advanced as recoverable loans. This is the general practice in private business, in many states and cities, and even in well-run individual households.

Nearly all our proposals for 1965 involve federal outlays which are in the investment category. And we believe they are investments this country dare not refuse to make.

We believe in the Great Society. We believe in it, not just as a dream, but as an attainable reality. We do not want a Great Society just for union members, or just for wage-earners, but for all—for every American, and indeed for all mankind.

The goal is within reach. Our own nation is rich, productive, and prosperous as never before. Human knowledge is every day expanded into new areas. The aspirations of 2,000 years are within our grasp.

Paul Hall Cited for Role In Civil Rights Struggle

New York—A citation for support of economic and civil rights for seamen, as well as in the community at large, was presented to Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers at the annual luncheon of the National Committee for Rural Schools.

Hall, one of three civil rights leaders to be honored, received his citation from Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters.

Judge J. Waties Waring, retired federal jurist whose minority decision outlawing school segregation in South Carolina was upheld by the U. S. Supreme Court in its basic desegregation ruling, was honored at a special ceremony in which a select group of lawyers participated headed by Max Delson.

Rutledge Henry Pearson, Jacksonville, Fla., civil rights leader, received a citation for outstanding and courageous action in the field of human rights with Pres. Martin Dworkis of Manhattan Community College making the presentation.

The NCRS is dedicated to obtaining adequate, unsegregated public schools for all children. It is supported by unions, educators and religious leaders in efforts to induce communities to work for integrated schools with adequate facilities and competent teachers.

Laberge Heads Quebec Labor

Montreal, Que.—Louis Laberge, chief organizer in Quebec for the Auto Workers, has been chosen president of the Quebec Federation of Labor to succeed the late Roger Provost.

He is a long-time member of the Machinists, which he joined as an apprentice and served as a local business agent and a grand lodge representative. He joined the UAW staff earlier this year in anticipation of a major organizing drive in Quebec as the province's auto industry expanded. He has been a vice president of the QFL and the Canadian Labor Congress.

Meany Reappointed Arts Center Trustee

Pres. Johnson has announced the reappointment of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to a 10-year term as a member of the board of trustees of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

Also renamed to the board for 10-year terms were Edgar M. Bronfman, president of Seagram & Sons, and Mrs. George A. Garrett of Washington.

James J. Gormley Dies, Transit Union Official

James J. Gormley, a member of the Amalgamated Transit Union's general executive board since 1948 and editor of the union publication, In Transit, for the last year, died of cancer in Staten Island Hospital, New Brighton, N. Y. He was 56.

A member of the union's Staten Island Div. 726, he became an international vice president in 1939 after service as a local official. He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Sylvia Jensen Gormley.

Industrial Engineering Drawing Union Support

Unions, despite antagonisms against industrial engineers generated by tactics of deception, recognize that many of the newer techniques "may provide important and useful service to management" and "have no direct derogatory effects on workers," according to Bert Gottlieb, AFL-CIO industrial engineer.

"Where industrial engineers have joined with medical and social science disciplines to study and apply physiological and psychological knowledge to the design of work places," he writes in the Journal of Industrial Engineering, "their efforts have met with applause and cooperation from the unions."

Gottlieb cities "false claims" of union acceptance of predetermined motion time systems (PMTS) as among the deceptions practiced by some industrial engineers. Actually, he writes, PMTS "have stirred more open worker and union hostility that any other postwar industrial engineering development."

"Union industrial engineers are in agreement," he says, "that the only tenable position reached by all objective researchers is that no known predetermined motion time system has scientific validity. All of the assumptions upon which PMTS are based are either patently false, been proven false," or are yet to be proven true."

Scores of union representatives have been familiarized with industrial engineering theories and methods since the AFL-CIO started annual industrial engineering institutes in 1957.

"The full-time graduate union industrial engineer is in a uniquely favorable position," Gottlieb concludes. "More than his colleagues who are employed by other organizations, he is free to practice his profession with few restraints. While his use of techniques may be limited, his opportunities for exercising his own initiative and ingenuity in a variety of situations are great. He influences policy and contributes directly to the welfare of his fellow man."

War on Poverty:

Youth Aid Program Launched by Wirtz

Formation of the Neighborhood Youth Corps, one of the major weapons in the Johnson Administration's war against poverty, has been announced by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz.

A unit of the department's Manpower Administration, it will be administered by the Office of Economic Opportunity and will be directed by Jack Howard, special assistant to the under secretary of labor and a former vice president of the Newspaper Guild.

Its goal is to provide part-time jobs in public or private nonprofit institutions to young people otherwise financially unable to stay in school; to permit those who have left school for economic reasons to return, and to offer work experience to those who are permanently out of school and without jobs.

The program expects to enroll about 150,000 young men and women between the ages of 16 and 21 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1965. Already, Wirtz said, nearly 150 projects have been proposed by sponsors in 33 states. They would provide help to about 100,000 youths from financially disadvantaged families. Funds for the program are expected to come from a grant of $110 to $150 million from the OEO.

Wirtz said the corps represents one of the country's "most ambitious and positive efforts" to conserve the talents and develop the skills of neglected young people.

"Most Americans are well off," he said. "They go to good schools. They have promising futures. But far too many others have been born on a dead-end street. For these, the unskilled seeking work in a computer age, the children being raised in poverty, the young men and women struggling against slum environments, the economic progress of this nation is a meaningless set of statistics."

Youth Corps Aims

The Youth Corps intends to do everything in its power "to make the future meaningful to the disadvantaged young," Wirtz declared, and to open to them as a reality the possibility of good jobs.

"For many thousands of boys and girls," he continued, "the employment provided by Youth Corps projects will be the exact difference between having no future as a high school drop-out and having a good future as a graduate. For thousands of others who have dropped out of school permanently, this program will rescue their job hopes by providing them with desperately-needed work experience."

Need Called 'Evident'

Wirtz said that a departmental task force has been at work for several weeks preparing for the agency.

"The need is evident," he asserted. "The desire of the American people to meet that need is equally evident. Few things have given me more pleasure as secretary of labor than to be able to announce that the Neighborhood Youth Corps is in business."

Howard, a native of Santa Ana, Calif., formerly was a reporter on the Springfield, O., Daily News and labor editor of the San Francisco Chronicle. He came to Washington in 1957 on an American Political Science Association congressional fellowship during which he studied the organization and functioning of Congress and served briefly on the staff of Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.). In 1960 he became chief investigator for the House Government Information Committee.

As special assistant to the under secretary of labor he was active in the establishment last year of Apprenticeship Information Centers in major cities and earlier in planning the department's Manpower Administration.

True-Package Bill Facing New Fight

A report by the Senate's Antitrust & Monopoly subcommittee has set the stage for a renewed battle in the 89th Congress over "truth-in-packaging" legislation.

The subcommittee's Democratic majority strongly supported the bill introduced by Chairman Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) to require manufacturers to abide by certain common sense standards of packaging of food and household products.

Two Republican members—Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.) and Roman L. Hruska (Neb.)—vigorously dissented. Dirksen termed the bill "un-American." Hruska complained it implied that many businessmen are "corrupt, exploitative, and conniving."

The sharp exchange of views was made public in the newly-printed subcommittee report to its parent Senate Judiciary Committee. The full committee took no action on the bill before Congress adjourned, except to authorize printing of the subcommittee's report.

Hart has indicated that he will reintroduce his bill in the new Congress with a long list of cosponsors and fight for its enactment. He emphasized that the subcommittee report does not imply a deliberate attempt by manufacturers to deceive the customer, but rather "the excesses and short cuts growing out of the pressures of competition." Legislation is needed, the report said, to protect fair manufacturers against unfair competition as well as to protect consumers against deception.

Alaska Absentee Votes Assure Rivers' Victory

Juneau, Alaska—The count of absentee ballots assured Democratic Rep. Ralph J. Rivers of re-election as Alaska's congressman-at-large. Unofficial but complete tallies gave him 34,631 votes to 32,993 for Lowell Thomas, Jr.

EIGHTH GRADUATING CLASS of the American Institute for Free Labor Development's training courses, held in AFL-CIO headquarters, heard Sec. of State Dean Rusk (speaking) hail U.S. labor and management for setting up "this constructive and far-reaching program." AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany presented diplomas to 38 union leaders from 10 countries.

Rusk Scores Communist Failures, Hails Progress in Latin America

The economic failures and shortcomings of communism have become so evident to leaders of Communist nations in Europe that they are "talking more and more about incentive and larger private plots for farmers, and even about profits," Sec. of State Dean Rusk told the 38-man eighth graduating class of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

"In the contest between communism and freedom," he said, "it has become increasingly plain that communism is not only politically and culturally repressive but economically inefficient."

Rusk hailed the Alliance for Progress, with which the AIFLD works closely, as a "means to achieve economic progress and social justice through the peaceful transformation of societies—it is a democratic revolution."

"Through it, in the Americas we have strengthened the hand of democratic leadership and are helping to build better societies," he declared. "Because of it the forces of communism have been put on the defensive in Latin America. In all of its tests of strength in the Western Hemisphere—whether by terrorism, infiltration, example or democratic processes—communism is losing. It is not the wave of the future. Freedom is."

Meany Awards Diplomas

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, who presented the graduates with their diplomas, expressed the hope that they will play a vital role in building free societies that in turn can build economies which will assure all elements in each country, including workers, a fair share of the national wealth.

He voiced labor's pride in the AIFLD and its program, and said the AFL-CIO's interest in it is summed up in one word—freedom.

Meany also read a letter from Pres. Johnson congratulating the class and wishing them "success in all their endeavors for their fellow men."

"I hope that the members of this eighth class," the President said, "will carry away with them the thought that a full life can and will be achieved by the peoples of the Americas, and that their role in the furtherance of free and democratic trade unions will be a fundamental part of the general advance of human welfare in our hemisphere."

Serafino Romualdi, AIFLD executive director, who presided, said the graduates increased to 292 the number of Latin American trade unionists to complete courses at the institute's Washington school. Graduates from schools in Latin America are increasing so rapidly, he announced, that next year four post-graduate courses instead of three will be given in Washington.

Other speakers at the exercises were Enrique Tejera-Paris, Venezuelan ambassador to the United States, and Jaime Contreras of Colombia, who spoke for the class. Bienvenido Ramirez of the Dominican Republic presented Meany with a plaque inscribed with the names of the graduates.

George C. Lodge, lecturer in the Harvard University Graduate School of Business Administration, spoke at a luncheon for the graduates.

11-28-64

FOR THE FIRST TIME in Japanese history, a head of the government received a visiting labor delegation when an AFL-CIO group headed by Pres. George Meany (left) called on Prime Minister Eisaku Sato (right). The Americans were in Japan for the founding convention of the new Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei).

Institute Maps Program Of Aid to Rural Brazil

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will begin an "in-depth, A to Z" program to aid the distressed economy of Brazil's rural Northeast region before the end of this year.

The institute's social projects director, William C. Doherty, Jr., said the proposed program will extend, in a labor-to-labor activity, from the construction of low-cost housing, to land settlement and development programs, the establishment of cooperatives and agricultural credit, irrigation, rural electrification, crop improvement and labor leader training.

Doherty said the new program stemmed from a resolution adopted last June by the National Conferences of Brazilian Trade Union Leaders which asked the AIFLD "to advise us in the studies for the formulation and execution of a development program for the free and organized workers of the rural unions of Brazil, especially in the northeast region which would be centered in the city of Recife, and which would handle all the programs requested by the rural unions and federations of Brazil.. . . ."

The institute is instrumental in developing worker housing projects, worker savings and loan associations and similar projects already in being or shortly to begin from Mexico to Argentina. An urban worker program already under way in Brazil calls for the construction of a housing project on two sites in the large industrial center of Sao Paulo.

The institute's Social Projects Dept. will administer the northeast rural program in Brazil under a two-year contract with the U.S. Agency for Intl. Development, Doherty said.

Slaiman Heads Rights Act Unit

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman was named chairman of a subcommittee on labor of the National Citizens Committee for Community Relations.

The 450-member citizens' committee was appointed by Pres. Johnson last summer to help the Community Relations Service carry out its functions under the Civil Rights Act. The agency seeks to bring about voluntary compliance with the law and assist in resolving disputes.

Dock Dispute Deadlocked Over Work Security Issue

Farm Labor Import Plan Under Fire

Labor and church groups joined in opposing a move to bring alien farm workers into the United States under an "emergency" provision of the Immigration Act.

There is no shortage of domestic farm workers which cannot be overcome by decent wages and working conditions, witnesses testified at a Labor Dept. Dept. hearing.

The hearing was called to determine what standards should be set for allowing farm workers to enter the country for temporary work. Big farm owners, primarily in California and the Southwest, are seeking to use immigration procedures to bring in Mexican labor for next year's crops.

For many years, Mexican workers were imported under the bracero program, which labor charged has kept farm wages at substandard levels. Congress refused to renew the program, and it will expire at the end of this month.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its Nov. 24 session, said it was "appalled" at the effort to use the Immigration Act as a loophole for continuing the bracero program.

Higher Wage Urged

"It must not be allowed to happen," the council said. The solution to farm labor shortages, it declared, can be found through higher wages, better housing, unemployment insurance, health facilities—and the right to collective bargaining.

At the Labor Dept. hearing:

- Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., contended that "not one alien worker can be admitted for farm work in this country without further degrading the status of our domestic farm workers."

He said any grower seeking to bring in foreign workers should first be required to actively seek domestic workers, offering them not less than the federal minimum wage, a guarantee of work for a minimum period of time, free family housing and two-way transportation for those recruited outside the local area. Clayman said employers should also be required to bargain with representatives of the workers.

- Arnold Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters, made similar proposals and added:

"The fact is that there have been few real efforts made to attract U. S. farm workers. The wages offered have been low and

ILA Urges 'Last Offer' Rejection

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—More than 60,000 Longshoremen in Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports from Maine to Texas are preparing to ballot on a so-called "employers' last offer" which their union has urged them to turn down "with a resounding no."

The vote is required under the Taft-Hartley law, under which the government got a federal court injunction here Oct. 1 to halt a strike called that day. The dock unions may not take strike action again until Dec. 20, when the 80-day forced waiting period expires.

Major sticking-point in the long-drawn-out dispute over contract terms is the size of dock crews, which employers want to cut—from 20 men to 13 handling general cargo. Shipping companies also want the right to decide how many checkers and clerks shall be assigned to work on the docks.

A Board of Inquiry named by Pres. Johnson told the White House in a report Nov. 30 that negotiations are deadlocked, but that both sides assured the board they are anxious to reach a settlement by Dec. 20.

The report revealed that the ILA agreed but employers refused to accept a compromise formula for settlement proposed by Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds. That led to the present deadlock

Counts Election Losses:

AMA Rallies Troops For Aged Care Fight

Miami Beach—The American Medical Association set the stage for a last-ditch, big-spending campaign to prevent Congress from passing a social security program of hospital care for the elderly.

AMA leaders told the policy-making House of Delegates that the doctors' lobby lost many of its best friends in last month's election. AMA Pres. Donovan F. Ward said the chance of defeating the King-Anderson bill "is considerably less than it was a few weeks ago."

But the Iowa physician heaped scorn on doctors who suggested compromise and declared: "The fight must go on."

The delegates voted down even the mildest of state resolutions suggesting a new look at the health care problems of the aged and scheduled a special conference in Chicago Dec. 13 to frame what was termed "a national education program."

Earlier Ward had said the House of Delegates might be called into an almost unprecedented special session if further action was needed to block the bill.

Meanwhile, in Washington, a key sponsor of the hospital care bill saw a "realistic" possibility that the measure could clear Congress by Easter.

New King-Anderson Bill

Sen. Clinton P. Anderson (D-N. M.) said he and Rep. Cecil R. King (D-Calif.) will again join in introducing a health care bill.

"It will be based on the social security principle on payroll contributions from workers and employers," he said, "and the emphasis will still be on hospital care and post-hospital skilled nursing care."

Living Costs Edge Higher In October

The Consumer Price Index edged one-tenth of 1 percent higher in October despite a drop in food costs. The monthly Bureau of Labor Statistics survey showed living costs to be 108.5 percent of the 1957-59 average, and 1.2 percent above a year ago.

For workers and their families, the change in the price index meant that the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 period carried a $10.85 price tag last month. This was 12 cents above October of 1963.

A BLS spokesman said the monthly and yearly change was not inflationary.

As a result of collective bargaining agreements tied to the October price index, 850,000 workers are scheduled to receive one-cent hourly increases. Of these, 725,000 are in the auto industry, 45,000 in farm equipment and 80,000 in aerospace. However a dip in the price index for Chicago will reduce the cost-of-living allowance for 11,500 transit workers there by one-half cent an hour.

A companion report, on earnings, showed a decline in average wages of factory workers during October. The Labor Dept. attributed this to the auto strike during the month. The take-home pay of the average factory worker with three dependents dropped 80 cents in October to $92.18. It was still more than 4 percent above last year's level.

The price index showed increases

Mediators Press Talks In Rail Crafts Impasse

Railroad shopcraft wage talks are "getting nowhere" despite intensified federal mediation efforts and a strike call could "come any time," a union negotiator reported. "In plain English," said Vice Pres. Joseph W. Ramsey of the Machinists, "we're just spinning our wheels."

The Machinists, the Sheet Metal Workers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have strike authorization from the 55,000 skilled craftsmen they represent.

With talks continuing as the AFL-CIO News went to press, they assured Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, however, that they would give 72 hours' advance notice if compelled to set a walkout date.

The three unions are fighting, they declared, to get wages on a par with those won by journeymen of their crafts outside the rail industry. They charge that there has been a steady erosion of their status caused by 40 years of across-the-board wage increases. Rail managements have refused to offer any more than the flat-raise formula of a 9-cent hourly increase each year for three years which four operating unions and three other shop unions have accepted.

One of the operating unions is the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, whose general chairmen met

Rescue Committee To Honor Meany

The Intl. Rescue Committee's Freedom Award will be presented to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at a dinner in his honor next Jan. 27, the committee announced, paying tribute to the federation president and the U. S. trade union movement for "their service in the cause of freedom throughout the world."

The Intl. Rescue Committee was founded in 1933 as a voluntary, nonsectarian association of Americans seeking to aid refugee victims of nazism and fascism. It extended its program to assist refugees from communism and other forms of tyranny after Stalin dropped the Iron Curtain across Europe in 1946.

Previous recipients of the committee's Freedom Award have included, among others, Sir Winston Churchill and Mayor Willy Brandt of West Berlin.

State AFL-CIO Exposes Threat Of Extremism

An hour-long television expose of political extremism, left and right, was sponsored on a Providence, R. I., station by the Rhode Island State AFL-CIO.

The program, appearing on Station WPRO-TV on Nov. 22, anniversary of the assassination of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy, covered activities and personalities of such groups as the Ku Klux Klan, the Progressive Labor Party, the Black Nationalists, the John Birch Society and the Black Muslims.

Pres. Thomas F. Policastro and Sec.-Treas. Edwin C. Brown of the State AFL-CIO were among state leaders who spoke briefly during the words-and-picture analysis of political extremism. Both pointed out that American labor has a long record of opposition to extremist movements, and warned that the election results of Nov. 3 did not foreclose future exploitation by such elements of "discontent in America."

The program, produced by WPRO for other local stations affiliated with the Capitol Cities group, was largely developed by Gordon Hall of Boston, an experienced investigator of extremist forces. The production, which included film purchased from network and news agencies as well as WPRO news department coverage, is being offered to other stations for local showings across the country.

The State AFL-CIO sponsored the Providence presentation as a public service in the educational field.

Vote Count Halted In IUE Election

U.S. District Judge George Hart issued a temporary order halting the counting of ballots in a referendum election for the presidency of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers pending a hearing Dec. 11.

The court order was issued on a petition by Paul Jennings, who is challenging incumbent Pres. James B. Carey for the presidency of the union. Jennings requested a tabulation of the vote by disinterested parties.

The IUE's five-member board of trustees, charged with conducting the count of the referendum votes, said elaborate safeguards had been taken to assure that the election would be a model of democratic procedure.

ALPA Parley Focuses On Safety, Bargaining

Miami Beach—Air safety standards, collective bargaining goals and a strengthened internal union structure were among key subjects at the 18th biennial convention of the Air Line Pilots here.

The growing use of fast jet-powered aircraft by commercial airlines has greatly increased the productivity of the pilots and co-pilots who fly the planes, reported ALPA Pres. Charles H. Ruby and this has decreased the operating costs substantially.

The prospect that major trunk airlines will make larger use of twin-engine jet-powered planes for intermediate-range travel releasing larger four-engine planes "to their proper role of long-range flights," will increase savings and the ALPA will seek contracts giving the pilot "his fair and rightful share of the increased productivity," Ruby said.

In a structural change approved by the convention, authority was provided for the appointment of trustees by the ALPA to safeguard the organization's financial assets and bargaining rights in all joint councils, area and individual airline divisions.

Three new officers were elected by the 234 delegates from 48 airlines attending the convention. Capt. Clyde Muirheid, Jr., an Eastern Airlines pilot, was elected first vice president, replacing Capt. Richard O'Neil of Northwest Airlines, who did not seek re-election.

Capt. Joseph G. Fickling of Piedmont Airlines defeated incumbent Capt. S. G. Gondek of Northwest Airlines in a contest for secretary, and Capt. Clyde F. Haggard of Braniff was elected treasurer when the incumbent, Capt. S. J. Device of United, did not seek another term.

Ruby, the president, is in the middle of his four-year term, which expires in 1966.

The ALPA Stewards and Stewardess Division met in separate sessions during the convention here.

Deadlock Reported:

Dock Strike Looms Over Job Security

and the announcement that ILA members will vote between Dec. 10 and 15 on the employers' "last offer."

The shippers, said ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason in a letter to members explaining the impasse, have "tried very hard to get a commitment for a blank check to hire and fire, cut out classifications and job functions that have existed in the industry for many years."

'Sole Discretion' Wanted

Employers, he continued, are "demanding the right to have the sole discretion in the number of men required to load or unload a ship" or work at a terminal.

"The union's position has constantly been that we must have an agreement that will let everyone know, by contract, what he should expect as a job opportunity over the life of the agreement," Gleason wrote.

"As president of the ILA and chairman of the wage scale committee, I have not received an offer . . . that I can recommend.

"Every proposal made by the industry was full of loopholes and did not meet the requirements of full security for the men" who work on the docks and wharfs.

Union representatives "stand ready" to meet the Shipping Association "at any time" to negotiate a contract without a strike, said the union president. He added:

"At no time will we be a party to selling jobs for temporary security and a little increase in take-home pay."

The employers' last offer was to accept the proposals of the Reynolds panel made public Sept. 25. That called for an annual income guarantee, increases of 54 cents an hour in wages and other improvements between Oct. 1, 1964, and Oct. 1, 1967; flexibility in work gang assignments, reduction in work gang sizes from 20 men to 18 as of Apr. 1, 1966, for general cargo work, and to 17 on Oct. 1, 1967.

The "last offer" also included 20 cents more per man-hour worked to increase pension benefits to $125 for workers who retire prior to Oct. 1, 1965, and $175 a month for those retiring after that date, and other panel recommendations on control of absenteeism, "freezing" new hires, health and welfare programs and a four-year contract term.

Management Said No

The union, in a statement to the inquiry board, said Reynolds submitted a proposed settlement formula Nov. 24 which was accepted by the ILA and its Atlantic, South Atlantic and Gulf Coast districts. The employers rejected the formula, which was as follows:

- Extend existing terms and conditions for a year to Sept. 30, 1965, except to:
- Increase wages by 10 cents an hour retroactive to Oct. 1, 1964.
- Increase pension payments and benefits from $100 to $125 a month, retroactive to Oct. 1, 1964.
- Raise welfare fund contributions to maintain the welfare and clinical benefits at levels existing Sept. 30, 1964.
- Continue negotiations on all other matters between Jan. 15 and Oct. 1, 1965, with changes to be effective on the latter date.

The ILA "believes the Reynolds formula is sound, reasonable, workable and fair," it told the panel. "It represents a sincere effort to bring stability and peace to the industry with honor. It would prevent great economic loss to industry, labor and the public."

It added: "The deferment of other sensitive, complex issues—which under the employers' last position would in any event be deferred for over a year—will, in the opinion of the union, enable the parties to work out these matters in a satisfactory manner through bona fide collective bargaining, conducted without pressure, in different settings under more propitious circumstances."

Some Terms Settled

The ILA reported that its carpenter, cargo repairman and maintenance locals in the port of New York have agreed on terms and conditions with the Shipping Association except for wage increases and length of contract.

In Mobile, Ala., and a few other South Atlantic and Gulf ports, agreements have been reached except on "money matters, gang size and length of contract," the union said.

One employer group, the West Gulf Maritime Industry, said a final offer was "impossible" to make because the union refuses to bargain on local issues until the New York contracts are settled. Other parts of the report call such contracts "the master agreement."

Peace Corps Steps Up Recruiting of Workers

The Peace Corps is looking for workers from factories, shops and construction sites who can pass on their practical skills to the peopl of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

Forty-six nations have asked for American volunteers who are able to build, repair, grow, make-do with a minimum of equipment and tools.

A college degree is not required. There is no age limit. And married couples are welcome if both can serve as volunteers and if they have no dependents under the age of 18.

The Peace Corps labor recruitment effort, already under way at several industrial centers, has the "wholehearted support" of the AFL-CIO Executive Council. The council urged affiliated unions to cooperate in the recruiting drive.

Some examples of Peace Corps missions:

- Forty volunteers helped Tunisia overcome a transportation breakdown which threatened the nation's economy. With the departure of skilled and semi-skilled French workers when Tunisia became independent, there was a desperate shortage of Tunisians skilled in keeping automobiles, trucks, tractors, scrapers and graders in operating condition. As a result, harvested crops were rotting in the fields and commerce had come to a standstill.

Crisis Overcome

The Peace Corps volunteers included several skilled mechanics and others who worked on their own cars as a hobby and were able to master a special four-month intensive course in heavy equipment maintenance and repair. When sent oversease, they worked alongside and trained young Tunisian workers—and the crisis was overcome.

- In the urban and rural slums of many Latin American nations, Peace Corps volunteers are working in small groups with workers from the host countries building schools, homes, roads and clinics.
- In Malaysia, U.S. workers with a variety of skills are teaching in government-sponsored vocational schools.

Peace Corps volunteers agree to serve for two years. During a three to four-month training course in the United States, they learn teaching skills, a foreign language, facts about American history and the history of the country to which they will go.

Other Details

Abroad, living conditions are simple but adequate and healthful. Overseas, the volunteers receive living allowances to cover their needs, including 45 days of travel leave which can be used to tour neighboring countries as well as the nation to which the volunteer is assigned. At the end of the service period, each volunteer receives a reajdustment allowance of $1,800—$3,600 for a married couple.

Wives who accompany their husbands as volunteers normally teach household skills, including sewing, food preparation or health practices.

Assembly-line and semi-skilled workers with mechanical aptitudes are needed just as are skilled tradesmen. And the special training they will receive before starting their assignments will help prepare them for higher-skilled jobs on their return.

Despite Bar on Picketing:

Court Backs Union On 'Watched Signs'

New York—The 2d U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has upheld a novel "watched sign" campaign of the Furniture Workers against the Jamestown Sterling Co. plant in Jamestown, N.Y.

A three-judge panel of the court ruled that the union did not engage in illegal picketing by posting signs on poles and trees near the plant in 1963 and keeping union members in parked cars to see that the signs were not removed or defaced.

The union struck for a first contract in 1961 and then lost bargaining rights in a decertification election which it called unfair. It posted the signs and watchers after that election.

Pioneer Ruling

The 2d Circuit Court ruling was the first clearcut decision on the right of a union which has lost a representation election to use signs not carried by pickets. The judges upheld the union's claim that "one of the necessary conditions of picketing is a confrontation" between pickets and those trying to enter an employer's premises.

No such confrontation exists at the Sterling plant, the judges declared.

General Counsel Martin Raphael also argued successfully the union point that the signs and watchers represented the exercise by the workers of their right to freedom of speech, guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution.

The decision marked the third legal defeat in 15 months for the firm, which has defied all efforts by union members to reach a collective bargaining agreement. Three courts have now refused to enforce a National Labor Relations Board ruling against the use of signs saying "Wages at Jamestown Sterling are not up to area standards."

Strikers Couldn't Vote

The UFWA inaugurated its public informational campaign in March 1963 after strikebreakers at the plant voted to decertify the union in an NLRB election barred to strikers on the ground they had been permanently replaced as plant employes.

The furniture plant had been struck 18 months before, after negotiations for a first contract were unsuccessful. Subsequently the management rejected all settlement efforts, including the recommendations of an impartial panel named by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R).

The firm and its products are on the "do not patronize" list of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

The latest court ruling narrows the scope of the legal prohibition against picketing under certain circumstances, the union said.

The court declined to rule on another union contention—that the decertification election at Jamestown was not valid. The union declared strikebreakers should not have been permitted to vote because they were not really "permanent replacements" for the strikers but only temporary, unskilled hires.

BSEIU Opens Chicago Office

A Chicago regional office has been opened by the Building Service Employes with Eugene P. Moats, since 1960 director of organization, in charge.

Creation of the new office, according to the announcement by Pres. David Sullivan of BSEIU, is intended to extend direct services of the international union to the midwestern area, spearhead organizing efforts and coordinate local and joint council activities in cities and state capitals.

Moats joined the Building Service Employes staff in 1951, served as AFL-CIO Chicago regional director from 1955 to 1957, was assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany thereafter, and returned to the BSEIU in 1959. He served with Chicago regional land-clearing authorities during his term as the union's director of organization.

in Chicago and ratified a two-year contract providing the wage increases and an extra week of vacation after 20 years. The contract covers 28,000 firemen-helpers, hostlers and engineers.

The BLF&E chairmen rejected in principle the railroads' offer of 1.5 cents per mile or $1.50 a day additional pay for engineers on a locomotive without a firemen-helper, but will permit the issue to be decided on a local basis by the engineers, union Pres. H. E. Gilbert said.

In another set of negotiations, five non-operating unions pressed major railroads for job stabilization measures recommended by an emergency board Oct. 20. The Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes, Railroad Telegraphers, Signalmen and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes want contract language covering loss of jobs due to automation or business slumps. Sitting in as mediators are two National Mediation Board representatives, with Dec. 20 as a settlement deadline.

The drive of the shop unions for higher wages began 18 months ago when they asked the railroads for immediate increases of 10 percent, plus 14 cents an hour, plus subsequent annual increases of 3.5 percent and a cost-of-living "escalator" clause.

The shop unions told a presidential wage board and the employers that a flat raise would not recognize the special skills of the shopcrafts. Three unions — the Boiler Makers, Railway Carmen and the Firemen & Oilers—later voted to accept the 9-cent raises recommended by the wage board but the Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers and Electrical Workers voted to keep battling for a skilled-trades differential.

Union Friends Help Educator Publish Work

The lifetime poems of Hilda W. Smith, pioneer in workers' education and social welfare programs, have been published in book form under the auspices of a Washington committee of union spokesmen and other friends.

The first bound copy of the book was presented to Miss Smith during a small reception for intimate friends at the home of Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, who described the 76-year-old author as one of her personal "heroines" in life.

A former dean of Bryn Mawr College, Hilda Smith organized the first school in the nation for women workers, founded and directed the American Labor Education Service, worked with the late Eleanor Roosevelt and Harry Hopkins in education programs for the unemployed during the great depression of the Thirties, was a pioneer in the field of public housing and programs for the aged.

Started in 1919

During her long career, beginning in 1919, her poems covered the "impacts" of the ideas that came to her in these fields of activity. She wrote on the needle trades, the carpenters, the miners, on workers' schools and new frontiers, on war, on her friend Eleanor Roosevelt. At the reception given by Sec. Peterson, Miss Smith read many of her own choice verses.

The Washington Committee for Publication of Hilda Smith's Poems was headed by Nelson Cruikshank, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, and the book was published in cooperation with Merkle Press Inc. Frank Fernbach, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, is treasurer of the committee. Copies of the book may be obtained for $3.75, with check payable to Frank Fernbach, Treasurer, P. O. Box 4887, Washington, D. C. 20008.

Hemisphere Newsmen Hit Cuban Dictatorship

Rio de Janeiro—An inter-American federation of newspaper workers spoke out strongly against dictatorship in Cuba during a three-day session here.

Delegates representing 60,000 newsmen in 24 nations of the Western Hemisphere protested persecutions of newspapermen in Castro Cuba and denounced the suppression of the free press in that country.

At the same time, they expressed their distaste for former Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista by suspending a Cuban exile affiliate until it ousts him from membership. If no action is taken within 90 days, the organization will be automatically expelled.

During the debate preceding the unanimous vote, delegates emphasized their complete opposition to Castro, but warned against all forms of totalitarianism. "After each Batista comes a Castro," a delegate cautioned.

Host to the third Congress of the Inter-American Federation of Working Newspapermen's Organizations was the National Federation of Professional Journalists of Brazil, admitted to membership this year after democratic elements won control of the organization to end 11 years of domination by Communists.

The congress called for a continuing program of trade unionism as the most effective means of improving economic conditions of newspaper workers. Unions, it said, preserve the independence and integrity of newspaper workers, and this independence, in turn, helps assure freedom of the press.

Charles A. Perlik, Jr., secretary-treasurer of the American Newspaper Guild and co-chairman of the inter-American federation, warned against newspaper dependence upon governments. "What governments can create, they can take away," he stressed.

The other co-chairman, Luis Carnero Checa of Peru, said vigorous and responsible unionism in the newspaper field should "demand its rights and also fulfill its duties."

In its report on the state of the press in the Western Hemisphere, the federation cited Cuba, Haiti and Paraguay as having regimes which "openly deny all freedoms, where the press is turned into the instrument of one party or one man" and used for "the dastardly designs of dictators."

Rail Unions Oppose Change in Bargaining

The collective bargaining system used on U.S. railroads for a third of a century has been beneficial to both management and labor and it would be "very unwise" for Congress to seek a change, heads of 23 standard railway labor organizations have told the House Labor subcommittee.

Multi-employer and multi-union bargaining is voluntary, said Chairman G. E. Leighty of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, and has "grown out of the conditions and necessities" of the railroad industry, within the framework of the Railway Labor Act but without specific legislative direction.

Leighty, replying to a request by the subcommittee headed by Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) for comment on union experience with multi-employer bargaining, said in a statement that the railway labor law itself is the product of joint employer-union agreement.

Wages and working conditions were set on a predominantly national basis in World War I, Leighty recalled. But from the end of that war to 1926, labor-management relations in the industry were "chaotic" and marked by cutbacks in wages and conditions.

The RLEA statement said joint national handling of contract matters since 1931 has been beneficial for these reasons:

- Railroad workers want to improve their standard of living, but have found it hard to prove that one road's employes are entitled to better wages and conditions than employes of another road. In addition, no individual management wants to lead the wage-raise procession, and thus it is mutually advantageous that advances be made on an industry-wide basis.
- Apart from wages, some issues cannot be treated efficiently on any other basis than nation-wide. These include the 40-hour week, health and welfare changes and group insurance programs.
- The procedures of the Railway Labor Act make maximum demands on the time and effort of negotiators. Neither labor nor management "could muster the resources necessary to meet the constant demands" of changing conditions on each railroad.

Leighty also listed two features of joint national bargaining: (1) contracts run indefinitely, and may be reopened by sections instead of as a whole; (2) none of the parties to joint negotiations can be compelled to bargain on a joint national basis but may negotiate on an individual railroad or craft basis.

In The Forefront

ON DEC. 5, 1964 the AFL-CIO marks the ninth anniversary of its birth, a nine-year period that has proved beyond question and challenge the strength and the durability of the merged labor movement.

The obituary notices of the impending death of the AFL-CIO or its dismemberment, a recurring theme in the press since 1955, have been noticeably absent in recent years.

The uninformed analyses of the disenchanted intellectuals who wept academic tears because the labor movement did not fall into the precast forms they had assigned it have petered out into a thin bleating.

For the record is clear and sharp: the AFL-CIO in its nine years has become a central, dynamic force for progress in America and has used its strength to build a better society in the democratic tradition of social justice.

THE LAST BIRTHDAY anniversary of the AFL-CIO coincided with the federation's biennial convention in New York City. The unity and strength of the AFL-CIO were evident at that convention as the labor movement mobilized its forces to meet new challenges and problems.

The AFL-CIO went forth from that convention determined that equal rights for all would be written into the nation's lawbooks. It played a leading role in the coalition of forces that helped secure passage of the historic Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The convention saw the election battle of 1964 shaping up and took steps to strengthen and improve the political education and action machinery of the AFL-CIO. The leading role played by trade unions in the victory of Pres. Johnson, the increasing success of COPE-endorsed candidates for Congress, the statehouses and the state legislatures all reflected the increasing ability of the AFL-CIO to carry its program to all union members and the public at large, functioning and acting as the "people's lobby."

The AFL-CIO was a leading, and at times a lonely, spokesman for the legislation that ultimately resulted in the outstanding record of the 88th Congress.

Its affiliates scored important breakthroughs in collective bargaining as they went about the basic job of gaining for American workers a fair share of the wealth they help produce.

AS THE AFL-CIO heads into its tenth year, the problems are still many and complex. There is the unyielding unemployment with a jobless rate continuing to exceed 5 percent of the labor force.

There is the continuing challenge of automation and the problem of channeling this force so that all may benefit from the new technology and scientific advances.

There is the question of converting the initial attacks on the poverty that grips one-fifth of the nation into a full-fledged assault, adequately financed and properly manned.

There is the continuing struggle to make equal rights a reality everywhere in the country, to wipe out finally the blot of racial discrimination that has stained our democracy.

The AFL-CIO will, as it has for the past nine years, be in the forefront of the fight for a better tomorrow, functioning as a free, strong, democratic trade union movement that is part of the fabric of American society.

New Taft Book:

Story of Labor in U.S. History Destroys a Fashionable 'Myth'

This review of Philip Taft's "Organized Labor in American History" (Harper and Row, New York, 1964, 818 pages, $12.50) by Jack Sessions of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, is excerpted from the December 1964 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

THE LATEST BOOK by Philip Taft is a massive history of the American labor movement. Through its pages walk men as unlike one another as Uriah Stephens, father of the Knights of Labor; Johnny Dio, labor racketeer par excellence; Albert Brisbane, the nineteenth century social reformer; and Nathan Shefferman, the twentieth century conniving middle-man of labor relations.

Taft's book is a work of solid history. There are few books that deserve a place beside it because much of what goes by the name of labor history is not really history at all. It is at best "antiquarianism," that is, the gathering of undigested facts about the past with no real attempt to discover the meaning of those facts.

"Organized Labor in American History" is not simply a distinguished history of unionism; it is a work that would be outstanding in any field of historical writing. Taft has amassed a wealth of detailed information about the past of organized labor and he has then subjected this material to searching analysis until he has found what makes each moment of the past meaningful.

To understand the meaning which Taft pursues throughout this book, it is helpful to recall the fashionable myth about labor history which has been promoted by scores of recent writers.

According to this myth, American unionism was originally filled with a romantic spirit of social reform. Its philosophical basis was provided by a host of intellectuals who made a common alliance with downtrodden workers. Then came a day when a villainous business-minded labor boss seized control. Sometimes the villain is named Samuel Gompers, sometimes William Green and sometimes George Meany. Whatever his name, he killed the philosophy of social reform, destroyed the poetry of American unionism and drove the intellectuals out of the labor movement.

The labor unions of today, according to this myth, are the sorry result of this. Concerned only with protecting their own vested interests in the status quo, today's unionists no longer sing songs, they no longer write poetry, they no longer take sides in the internal factional disputes of the German Social Democratic Party. And the intellectuals have long since left the unions to take jobs teaching at Columbia University or working as investigators for the McClellan Committee.

Philip Taft has put together more than 800 carefully documented pages proving beyond all reasonable doubt that there is not a shred of evidence to support this myth. One may nevertheless presume that the myth will endure and that during 1965 it will provide the material for another score of articles in such magazines as Harpers, Atlantic and Fortune.

WHAT EMERGES from the pages of Taft's history is a labor movement neither marked by poetic romanticism in its early days nor depraved in its present form.

A mass of evidence is gathered to prove that the earliest unions in America were surprisingly like present day unions. They were concerned with wages and with the control of abuses in the apprenticeship system. They developed strike benefit funds to strengthen their bargaining position and as early as 1835 they were dealing with problems of jurisdiction.

Occasional social reformers such as Susan Anthony and Robert Dale Owen attempted to divert them from their collective bargaining purposes, but the results were uniformly disastrous, and as early as 1829 intellectuals were leaving the labor movement and complaining in monthly magazines about "the want of interest felt by the workingmen for the cause of reform."

If unions of the past had little resemblance to the myth, the modern union movement is equally unlike the myth. Like the unions of the past, it tends to seek solutions to labor problems through the process of collective bargaining. From within its own ranks has come the strength to purge itself of racketeers, Communists and racial discrimination. It has developed an impressive leadership and some of these leaders have "taken leave" to perform distinguished service for the nation.

Only in the pages of fashionable magazines could this be regarded as a failure of organized labor. As in the nineteenth century, those intellectuals who think to reshape organized labor in their own image are soon disenchanted and they go off to publish their memoirs in books and magazine articles. Organized labor has its eggheads today as it had them in the past. But they are wondrously hardboiled eggheads like Philip Taft.

Morgan Says:

GOP Right Wing Sees Victory Amid Ashes of Party's Defeat

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

THE REPUBLICAN wake has reached a fascinating and possibly fateful point. While Sen. Goldwater has been buried by defeat and the party itself is gasping for breath in Congress and in many state legislatures, the right wing is rising like a lop-sided phoenix out of the ruins and is crowing with claims of a kind of incarnation of ultra-conservatism. The irony of it is, these claims are not altogether spurious because the genuinely conservative, the moderate and progressive elements of the GOP are still in such disarray that they cannot answer back with any authoritative, or convincing, rebuttal.

Morgan

Paradoxically enough, the Goldwaterites are in a stronger position now than they were before they seized the presidential nomination in San Francisco despite the fact that their man was subsequently engulfed by one of the biggest landslides of the century. The reason for this, of course, is that then they were still the "outs" until their delegate votes were delivered. Now they are the "ins," at least insofar as control of the Republican National Committee is concerned. It is hard if not impossible at this point to find a seasoned political observer who believes that there is any easy likelihood of ousting Chairman Dean Burch when the National Committee meets in Chicago Jan. 22 and 23. That tense conclave will be preceded by a meeting of Republican governors in Denver on Dec. 4 and 5, but since the election only increased the number of Republican governors by a net gain of one to a total of 17, their decisions may not be too conclusive or influential. There will be other meetings, mostly private and informal, of various Republican leaders in coming weeks but the fate of party leadership is not likely to be decided in them.

The non-extremist Republicans are severely handicapped, naturally, by the lack of a leader. The "titular leader" of a party out of power is a position—historically—of little influence or meaning, anyway, a fact painfully sharpened now by the GOP intraparty scramble. However, another important fact needs to be considered: That is that the national committee, especially of a party not in control of the White House, is not in itself a powerful apparatus. This is the only national base the right-wing Republicans hold and they are trying, understandably, to make it more powerful by converting it into an instrument of their own devices, by increasing and intensifying the contacts between it and radical right groups and individuals down at the grass roots.

This seemed to be the essence of the strategy emerging from the jubilant interpretations of the Goldwater defeat by ultraconservative circles as reported by the New York Times. Out of the debacle they had snatched a victory chant that "twenty-six million Americans can't be wrong." And their spokesmen candidly declared their intentions to consolidate their beachheads in local Republican precinct organizations and increase their penetration of the grass roots where their influence had not already been felt.

THERE IS A LESSON here which moderate Republicans should not have to be reminded of. It was by precisely such strategy that the Goldwater cabal captured the party at San Francisco. They didn't do well at any of the primaries except California which was decisive, but even it would not have been decisive if the state party conventions had not been quietly and tightly sewed up for Goldwater, thanks to the faithfulness and almost frightening zeal displayed by his volunteer workers who were then, and still are, a minority group in the Republican party.

There is no law against the non-Goldwaterites adopting and adapting that strategy to their own uses. There is no point of protocol which dictates a delay in their action until an attractive moderate comes along around whom they can all rally. It is not unfruitful to infiltrate the party with people ready, eager and able to combat the infiltrators from the radical right.

The GOP moderates don't need a party summit conference in order to field qualified candidates for every primary and every office open to contest. This they should be in the process of doing now—selecting and then supporting the best talent available. Then the operation becomes a double action: pulling the Republican party free from the clutches of the ultraconservative minority and preparing it for battle on more even terms against the Democrats.

Perhaps the most unassailable conclusion to be drawn from the results of Nov. 3 is that the American electorate is overwhelmingly middle-of-the-road. The extremists, transitorily, did gain but the noise you hear is not the nation's choice, but their slightly fortified echo. The non-extremists in the GOP have their work cut out for them. Their real job is to restore the two-party system. For if the ultras of the right are not ousted in due course, the Republican party becomes a sure and permanent loser. The GOP has had enough practice in that role already.

Support Termed 'Vital':

U. S. Labor Expanding Efforts To Help Build African Unions

THE AFL-CIO is expanding its efforts in helping Africans build free trade unions and strong economies, Mrs. Maida Springer of the federation's Dept. of Intl. Affairs said in a network radio interview.

In cooperation with labor unions and governments in Africa, working with the U.S. labor movement, the newly-formed African-American Labor Center will help develop economic and social projects in Africa to upgrade individual skills, increase job opportunities and raise the standards and conditions of workers, Mrs. Springer said on Labor News Conference, heard over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The first project under the Center will be a motor drivers school in Nigeria, scheduled to open in a month, she said. Courses in English, as well as safe driving and repairs will form the core of instruction, which is directed at helping to provide "a pool of skilled workers for the country," she said.

Mrs. Springer reported that the Tailoring and Cutting School established with AFL-CIO assistance in Kenya two years ago is proving very successful. To date, 120 have completed the tailoring and cutting course, with 75 percent of the graduates passing the government "trade tests," which qualify them for higher pay rates, she said. More than 500 applicants are seeking admission to the school, but limitations of staff, equipment and facilities will make it possible to admit only 65, she said. Mrs. Springer said that the school has been awarded a contract for government uniforms, "which will help the school finance itself and perhaps even extend scholarships to young African men and women."

MANY OF the African nations are developing vocational education, she said, but because of financial and technical limitations, they aren't able to mount the kind of effort that is needed.

That, she said, "is why the support of voluntary groups such as the AFL-CIO," is so vital to the social and economic struggle in Africa.

Reporters questioning Mrs. Springer on the AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program were Simeon Booker, Washington bureau chief of Johnson Publications, and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE INTERNAL FERMENT of the Republican Party—a result of its election losses and the unhappiness of many party leaders with the trap in which they were snared by the nomination of Sen. Barry Goldwater—has produced two results.

A caucus of all House Republicans will be held Dec. 16 to discuss proposals to broaden the basis of GOP policy-making machinery in the House. And Republican governors—only 17 will be in office next January—convened in Denver to seek means of strengthening their own influence in national party counsels.

The governors assembled under a rattle of counter-fire. Goldwater asserted that the national role of GOP state leaders is only secondary, with primary responsibility for national policy being centered in the congressional leadership.

GOP National Committee Chairman Dean Burch cannot be ousted by the governors, the defeated presidential candidate commented, because they "don't have the votes." Burch has called a national committee meeting for Jan. 22, and it may well be that Goldwater is right—that the members elected under pressure of Goldwater elements at the national convention last July will sustain the chairman personally selected by the senator.

The governors, nevertheless, proceeded with their plans to set up a formal organization in the capital, to publicize their policy differences with the 1964 platform, and to seek increased influence in the party's national councils generally.

THE DEC. 16 CAUCUS of House GOP Republican members may prove more fruitful in the immediate future.

It represents at least by implication a rebuke to Rep. Charles A. Halleck of Indiana, for six years the GOP floor leader. Halleck saw no reason for a party conference before Jan. 4, just before Congress convenes, he indicated.

A meeting delayed until Jan. 4, appeared to GOP moderates and liberals as foreclosing any policy on leadership changes. Rep. Gerald R. Ford, Jr., of Michigan, who was chosen conference chairman only two years ago in a limited internal revolt, agreed with them. Enough members insisted on an earlier meeting to force Halleck to yield.

How far the rebellion will go is the open question. Ford said the conference is to deal with the Republican response to proposed rules changes in the House, with GOP "organizational" matters and with a "strategy" in presenting GOP legislative programs in the new session.

Ford's mention of a "strategy" in working out affirmative GOP programs reveals the nature of the unrest with Halleck. There haven't been any such programs—merely assaults on Democratic programs and alliances with conservative southern Democrats to defeat or water them down.

If there is an open leadership fight, Ford himself is a potential challenger of Halleck. Another is Rep. Melvin R. Laird of Wisconsin. It is not yet clear whether Halleck's opponents can agree on a candidate.

THE PLIGHT of the GOP, in any case, is serious. Those who are not primarily Goldwater partisans do not wish to enter the next elections with party machinery under Dean Burch's control. Thirty-five of the 50 governorships will be up in 1966, tens of thousands of state and local offices, the attempted GOP congressional comeback from the 1964 disasters.

The conservatives keyed into positions of leadership are ready to fight to hold on. The stage is clearly set for protracted and bitter Republican civil war as the traditional GOP leaders struggle to undo the damage done when right wing elements were permitted to seize control.

The development, originated nine years ago in the dreams of the Mexican Graphic Arts Workers Union, was substantially financed by $10 million in loans by the AFL-CIO and some of its affiliates in a demonstration of trade union fellowship.

AFL-CIO VICE PRES. Joseph A. Beirne, representing Federation Pres. George Meany at the dedication, is given a hearty and tumultuous welcome on his arrival in the Mexico City airport.

A PLAQUE GIVEN by the AFL-CIO, in both English and Spanish, is shown to reporters by Beirne at a news conference conducted by Sen.-Elect Robert F. Kennedy (D-N. Y.). To Kennedy's left is Arturo Jauregui Hurtado, secretary-general of ORIT. At far right is U.S. Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning.

DEDICATION OF THE PROJECT came with unveiling of a plaque by Mexico's then-Pres. Adolfo Lopez Mateos, shown next to Robert F. Kennedy. Behind Lopez Mateos is U.S. Ambassador to Mexico Fulton Freeman. Others in front row are Antonio Vera, secretary-general of the Graphic Arts Union; Mexican Finance Minister Antonio Ortiz Mena; and Beirne. The project represents co-operation of U.S. and Mexican labor, the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the Alliance for Progress, Mexico's National Housing Fund, Agency for Intl. Development, and Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers. The late Pres. Kennedy was deeply enthused about the project and following his assassination it was named in his memory by the Graphic Arts Workers.

ONE OF THE FIRST FAMILIES to move into the John F. Kennedy Memorial Housing Project is greeted by William C. Doherty, Jr., director of the Social Projects Dept. of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, and Beirne (center rear) and Vera (extreme right).

AFL-CIO PLAQUE is presented to Lopez Mateos by Jose Sueiro, Mexican director of the AIFLD, and Doherty, as Kennedy and others look on. Behind Lopez Mateos is Alexander Bookstaver, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Investment, who helped pull together the loans by AFL-CIO affiliates that financed the housing.

Counts Election Losses:

AMA Rallies Troops For Aged Care Fight

Florida senior citizen groups warned doctors that they are losing the confidence of their patients by their actions.

In the "open letter," the doctors were told: "Our confidence is shaken as evidence accumulates that the men you have designated as spokesmen on economic and social issues are willfully misleading the American public."

William R. Hutton, information director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, told a Miami meeting that "powerful public relations forces of organized medicine are desperately trying to play down the mandate for medicare enactment." He said this may deceive some AMA members, but it can't reduce the majority for the King-Anderson bill in the new Congress.

Ward, who had supported Barry Goldwater in the election campaign, conceded that the result forces the AMA to "face up to certain grim realities." He foresaw a "furious hurricane" for the hospital care bill from the Administration, organized labor and senior citizen groups.

Deplores GOP Loss

The AMA president deplored the defeat of three Republican members of the House Ways & Means Committee who opposed King-Anderson. But he claimed the election could not be construed as a "mandate" for new social legislation and in fact indicated that voters were opposed to any change.

Hutton termed this "an incredibly twisted election analysis" which "demonstrated an extraordinary capability for self-deception among conservative doctors."

The House of Delegates later voted to recommend that local medical societies include "voluntary" dues to AMPAC—the AMA's political arm—when billing members for their annual dues. During discussion of the resolution, the point was made that in Philadelphia, where this was not done, only 4 percent of the doctors belonged to AMPAC. In contrast, other areas in Pennsylvania which went in for joint billing, reported 78 percent membership.

During committee discussion, a number of doctors protested AMA advertisements making claims for the Kerr-Mills program which didn't jibe with the facts in their states. They asked that future "educational" programs by the AMA be checked in advance with state medical organizations.

High Court Upholds Suit In Staff Firing

The Supreme Court has refused to review a decision by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, San Francisco, that appointed union staff members who were fired for political activity could sue for reinstatement and lost pay.

The ruling involved Earl N. Anderson, John J. King and four other Machinists' grand lodge staff representatives who charged they were fired in 1961 for supporting a losing candidate for IAM office.

The question at issue was whether two sections of the Landrum-Griffin Act prohibit a union from discharging an employe who retains his membership in the union. The San Francisco District Court ruled that another section of the same law prohibited the layoffs. The appeals court rejected this view and upheld the L-G sections declaring the rights of union members to participate in union elections.

There has been no hearing of the dispute as to the facts at issue.

Challenge to Help Nation's Needy Attracts Applicants for VISTA

More than 1,500 persons already have applied to Volunteers for Service to America (VISTA), the domestic version of the Peace Corps, to work in "poverty" areas, ranging from Indian reservations in the Southwest to city slums in the Northeast, according to Dir. Glenn Ferguson.

The motivation and dedication of the VISTA volunteer is just like that of the Peace Corps volunteer, Ferguson declared, though work in the United States will differ from that in foreign countries.

"Neither the Peace Corpsman nor the VISTA volunteer serves on an 8-hour basis," he added. "His commitment is around the clock."

VISTA is part of the Office of Economic Opportunity, which was created by Pres. Johnson to carry on the campaign against poverty. It is authorized to put into the field—at the request of public and private agencies—up to 5,000 men and women in its first year. The work may range from helping build sanitation facilities for disease-racked Indians to advising slum families bogged down in the red tape that sometimes trips them on the way to welfare and health facilities.

The minimum age for enrollment is 18. Married couples are eligible if both qualify, and in some cases those with children will be considered. There is no exemption from military service.

"The basic requirement," Ferguson said, "is that you care about poor people—enough to share their life and try to help them.

"The challenge facing the VISTA volunteer is limited only by his initiative and creativity. VISTA will provide the human commitment in fighting the war against poverty."

1-Year Service

The period of service is one year, including a training program of four to six weeks geared to the needs of the job and location to which the volunteer will be assigned. There is no formal schooling. Assignments will call for a "great variety of skills, trades and professions" and may be in any state, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and the Trust Territories. An applicant may express a preference.

The volunteer is expected to live where he works and will receive a monthly living allowance depending on local conditions. Upon termination of enrollment, the volunteer will be paid $50 for each month of satisfactory service. During service, medical and dental expense will be reimbursed.

Most of the unsolicited applications that have been received since Congress passed the Economic Opportunity Act were from younger people, but about 25 percent came from more mature persons, Ferguson said.

"This is particularly gratifying," he said, "for the skills, knowledge and patience of our elderly citizens is sorely needed in the campaign to eliminate poverty."

Preliminary applications may be obtained from a local post office or from VISTA, Box 10, Washington, D. C. 20506. From its receipt, VISTA will send each qualified applicant a detailed questionnaire.

The anti-poverty program, in addition to VISTA, includes Job Corps camps and centers and work-training programs in their home communities for youths, work-study programs for college students from low-income families, aid for farmers of low income, aid for small business, work experience programs for jobless parents receiving welfare, adult literacy training, and community action programs.

San Francisco Imposes Ban on Strikebreaking

San Francisco—By a vote of 9 to 0, the city and county board of supervisors here has outlawed professional strikebreaking.

A carefully-drafted ordinance makes it unlawful for a professional strikebreaker to offer—or for an employer to accept—his services during a legal strike or lockout. Violators may be fined up to $500 or imprisoned up to 90 days or both.

A professional strikebreaker, the ordinance declares in a unique provision, is a person who has offered himself for work during a strike or lockout at least twice in the five years preceding a current offer.

The definition, unusual in anti-strikebreaker legislation, was intended to avert a possible court ruling that the term "professional strikebreaker" is too vague. Similar rulings had upset other ordinances referring to such general groups as "common drunk" or "habitual drunkard."

Employer spokesmen had objected that state and federal laws precluded the city from legislating on the subject. A city attorney's opinion, however, advised the supervisors that neither state nor federal law occupied the whole field. The board was free to act if it desired, the opinion said.

Employers had also argued that the ordinance might be used against workers innocently involved in a jurisdictional dispute. At least one supervisor was doubtful.

"Obviously," he said, "we will not be impressed by an employer representative who comes in shedding tears for union members."

Passage of the ordinance gained impetus in the aftermath of a recently-ended 11-month strike in the city's printing shops. Typographical Union Local 21 told the supervisors that it had identified and documented 71 professionals who worked during the strike.

Supervisor Leo McCarthy told the board that the use of strikebreakers disrupts normal, healthy labor relations. Their use leads to violence and prolongs strikes or lockouts, he declared.

The ordinance itself finds professional strikebreakers "are generally of unsavory character and accustomed to association with undesirable elements." Their use, it says, is "harmful to our citizens and threatens the public peace."

On the heels of its passage, the Alameda County Central Labor Council across the bay announced it would lead a campaign for city ordinances throughout the county. Plans are also being laid to win passage of a state law in the 1965 session of the state legislature.

Two 'State 65' Plans Seek to Raise Rates

Two highly-touted "State 65" plans, once billed as the insurance industry's answer to the King-Anderson bill, have applied for heavy rate increases.

The New York 65 Health Insurance Association said it has lost $2 million in the past 14 months on its health insurance policies for the elderly. It asked the State Superintendent of Insurance for permission to boost its charges 20 percent.

The Connecticut 65 plan, sponsored by 32 insurance companies in the state, is applying for a rate increase for the second time in its three-year history. This time it wants an increase averaging close to 10 percent. The plan is operating "at an ever-increasing deficit," its managers told the state insurance commissioner.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned last January that the State 65 plans were financially unsound as well as inadequate to meet the needs of America's senior citizens.

Meany told the House Ways & Means Committee that "it is hard to understand why the (insurance) industry keeps insisting it can do a job which its own figures must prove to be impossible."

He added: "I have reluctantly concluded that there is a political motive involved."

Too Costly

Meany said the nature of the problem "makes it impossible for any commercial insurance carrier or nonprofit health plan to devise a policy that will adequately protect the aged, at a cost they can afford to pay."

There is a role for private insurance health policies for the elderly, Meany stressed. With the basic, high-cost hospital care covered through social security, other needs can be met through supplementary policies, he said.

Schnitzler Speech:

Union Shop Benefits Urged on Employers

Allentown, Pa.—Employers who try to weaken unions through so-called "right-to-work" laws are victims of "one of the great fallacies of our time," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler warned.

It's harder, not easier, for employers to deal with a weak union, Schnitzler told the Lehigh Valley Chapter of the Society for Advancement of Management.

"If you want a hell-raising union, a union that will keep you up late at night and wake you up early in the morning," Schnitzler said, "just take the 'right-to-work' line. That's what you will get, and that's what you will deserve."

Good for Both

The AFL-CIO spokesman emphasized that a union shop is "good for the employer" as well as for workers.

"A union shop contract," he said, "relieves the union leaders and the active union members of one great anxiety—anxiety over the union's survival. With a union shop there's no danger that the employer and his agents can weaken the union's strength by discouraging membership."

The "most progress" towards joint union-management cooperation on mutual problems has been made in industries and trades where unions are strong and secure, Schnitzler pointed out.

He told the management group:

"A strong union, secure against employer subversion, can afford to be statesmanlike. It can afford to take the broad view . . . to gamble on the present in the expectation of a better future."

On the other hand, Schnitzler warned, "a weak union in an open shop can't take chances. Simply as a matter of self-preservation, it must take the position that the boss is always wrong. Faced with challenges and recruiting problems, it has to express the maximum militancy on every question. 'Statesmanship' becomes an epitaph for ex-officers."

Other Flaws Cited

Apart from the element of self-interest of employers, Schnitzler pointed out, so-called "right-to-work" laws are bad on a number of counts.

They interfere with freedom of contract, he said. They infringe on the rights of a majority of workers and hamstring the operation of the democratic process. They are weapons used against labor by states which have built their economies on low wages, Schnitzler declared.

The AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer termed it surprising that the proposals to ban the union shop should be seriously discussed in Pennsylvania.

Generally, he said, "what is known as 'right-to-work' has been most popular where there are the fewest organized workers and the fewest employers having union contracts.

"In short, the less you know about unions the more you lean toward 'right-to-work.'"

Union organization "means the union shop," Schnitzler declared. He said any employer who opposes the union shop is "basically anti-union."

Travel Co-op Elects Officers

Wallace J. Campbell was re-elected president of the American Travel Association at the annual meeting of the ATA's board of directors.

The co-operative travel group includes on its board representatives of a number of unions, co-ops and other non-profit organizations. The directors named David Feller, Washington labor attorney, as secretary, and Jacob Clayman of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. as treasurer.

Anti-Poverty Drive Opens In 33 States

The Administration opened its war on poverty on a 33-state front, stretching from Yell County, Ark., where parents on relief rolls will be given four weeks of work experience training, to the Trapper Creek Job Corps center in Montana, where youth will receive training and useful work experience.

Big cities such as Detroit, Chicago and New York will receive grants for community-developed programs to raise living standards and provide jobs and training at the local level.

Scores of college and universities will launch work-study programs, enabling needy students to earn money at useful jobs which serve the community. Some will be tutors to youngsters handicapped in school by a slum environment.

The first 150 volunteers in VISTA, a domestic version of the Peace Corps, will begin training Jan. 1. The full title is Volunteers in Service to America. They will work on Indian reservations, in mental hospitals, or wherever social service help is requested by a community.

These and other projects were announced by Sargent Shriver, director of the new Office of Economic Opportunity.

The 120 projects already approved are the forerunner of a more massive effort during the coming year. The initial outlay commits only $32 million of the $784 million appropriated by Congress for the first year of the program.

Shriver estimates that by the end of its first year, the government's multi-pronged anti-poverty program will have reached 400,000 to 500,000 persons directly, and many more indirectly.

Carpenters Appoint New Vice President

William Sidell of Los Angeles has been appointed second vice president of the Carpenters, Pres. M. A. Hutcheson announced.

The post became open with the advancement of Finlay C. Allan to the first vice presidency of the union. The previous first vice president, John R. Stevenson, retired last summer.

Sidell, who has been an officer of district and state Carpenters' organizations in California, was elected a general executive board member at the union's last convention. He is 49 years old and has been a member of the union for more than 25 years.

Unions, Church Groups Hit Labor Import Plan

the working conditions miserable. . . .

"The laws of supply and demand have been effectively repealed for the agricultural labor market. There has not been a real test of whether an adequate number of U. S. workers are available because the unlimited supply of cheap, captive foreign workers has prevented wages from rising to a level where U. S. workers are attracted in large numbers."

- The Rev. Samuel A. Snyder, speaking for the National Council of Churches, urged the Labor Dept. to "give equal time and concern to the employment of domestic workers" instead of seeking ways to continue to import foreign labor.
- A spokesman for farm employers, Stewart Boswell, said about 195,000 foreign workers were brought into the United States during the past year and "this need will not disappear in the next few weeks."

The Labor Dept. hearings moved on to Miami and Dallas, and were scheduled to conclude in San Francisco Dec. 7.

Brown Offers Plan

California's Gov. Edmund G. Brown (D) has advanced a compromise proposal for a three-year phaseout of foreign farm labor, coupled with a minimum wage applicable to farm workers, starting at $1.25 in 1965 and advancing to $1.70 an hour. California labor, however, has taken the position that the importation of labor should be halted immediately.

To arguments that American workers will not do the "stoop labor" required for some farm crops, union spokesmen cite instances where farmers paying comparatively high wages for stoop labor had no trouble finding workers, while nearby grape growers had a "shortage" of workers for easier, but lower-paying, "stand-up" work.

Thomas L. Pitts, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, suggests that it is time the big corporate farm owners "start finding out what it is like to operate in a free enterprise system they so strongly demand."

Planning Urged

W. J. Bassett, secretary of the Los Angeles County Labor Council, said all farm jobs in the state could be filled by Americans if satisfactory working conditions were provided, including "a planned itinerary guiding them from crop to crop with a guaranteed work period, free transportation and the right to collective bargaining."

He pointed out that farm workers are now excluded from coverage under the National Labor Relations Act and the Fair Labor Standards Act, and are ineligible for unemployment benefits.

"So long as growers have the alternative of a cheap, captive foreign labor source, U. S. farm workers will be underpaid and underemployed," Bassett charged.

California growers use 100,000 more American citizens during the peak season of September than in January, Bassett noted. Yet despite the evidence that they can get Americans when needed, the growers say they also need "supplemental" foreign workers during the winter months.

Living Costs Edge Higher In October

for transportation costs, housing and medical care. In fact prices were up slightly in every category except food, gasoline and household appliances.

A drop in meat prices was largely responsible for the lower food costs. The Bureau of Labor Statistics attributed this to seasonal increases in supplies "and anticipation of increased beef slaughter following the end of the National Farmers' Organization withholding action early in the month." Food prices, however, averaged 1.9 percent above October 1963 levels.

Arnold Chase, assistant commissioner of the bureau, said higher food and car prices are likely to push up the November price index.

He termed the October increase and the change over the year as within the range of price movements over the past few years.

Union Voting Procedures Upheld by Supreme Court

Steel Talks To Stress Jobs, Pay

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers will ask 11 major U.S. steel producers for new contracts providing "total job security," higher wages and pensions and "full dignity and justice on the job" when negotiations start here Dec. 14.

Meeting here, the USWA's 163-member wage policy committee approved 1965 wage policy to guide the union's bargaining committees to these objectives:

- "Complete and permanent" protection against the hazards of unemployment, injury, illness or transfer to a lower-rated job.
- A substantial wage increase—the first sought by the USWA since 1961.
- More dignity on the job, including equal pay for equal work; new approaches to the setting of wage rates for skilled workers, maintenance and craft workers; and the elimination of "any vestiges of discrimination" that may exist.
- High quality medical care.
- An adequate income after retirement.

The committee said in a statement that basic steel producers are "enjoying a prosperity unparalleled in their history." It added:

"Many have announced record profits. The demand for steel continues to rise, and the optimistic outlook for continued growth of the entire economy promises continued prosperity for the steel industry."

Despite the flourishing condition of the big steel firms, the industry's workers have yet to obtain fully their fair share of this prosperity, the committee said. It noted that employment today, with production at the highest point in history, is about 150,000 below the peak of the mid-1950's and employment costs, per unit of production, are "steadily declining."

'Much Remains to be Done'

The union said it has concentrated in recent years on achieving greater job and income security for workers and providing additional job opportunities. It has won many benefits but, it said, "much remains to be done" in the areas of job and income security.

"Money and security are not the sole concern" of the union's members, the statement declared. Steelworkers, "as human beings, also are concerned with dignity and justice on the job."

Contract provisions to require fair treatment of workers must be strengthened, it asserted. In addition, the committee charged that many companies have failed

Union Wins At Holdout Coast Firm

Los Angeles—The Steelworkers, with an assist from the AFL-CIO's Los Angeles-Orange County Organizing Committee, have successfully organized the main plant of the Harvey Aluminum Co., last remaining major holdout against unions in the aluminum industry.

The vote in a National Labor Relations Board election was 1,019 for the USWA, 473 for no union. Another 428 ballots were challenged.

Success After 15 Years

It was the first time in 15 years that a Harvey organizing drive was successful among the 2,000 workers at the firm's plant in suburban Torrance. William Gilbert, AFL-CIO campaign director, and Jerry Conway, subregional USWA director, credited the cooperation of local unions and the determination of Harvey employes.

The victory, they said, should give added impetus to the coordinated drive to bring in 700,000 unorganized workers in this West Coast area. It was the biggest win since the drive started two years ago.

The organizing committee was pleased with the success of the "in-plant committees" established among employes and the resulting emphasis on "face-to-face" organizing. No leaflets were distributed to alert management that a drive was on.

Five previous drives against the big non-union firm had foundered. Two years ago the NLRB found Harvey guilty of hiring professional labor spies at the Torrance plant and one in The Dalles, Ore. It ordered Harvey to stop spying and to reinstate two fired union supporters with back pay.

KIDS DON'T DRIVE TAXIS but their dads do, so demonstrators of all ages have been marching on Manhattan, Queens, Bronx and Brooklyn picket lines in the organizing campaign of the New York City Central Labor Council, AFL-CIO. The council has urged all hackers in the largely unorganized taxi industry to support the Taxi Drivers' Organizing Committee in its drive for contract protection.

Mild Weather a Factor:

Jobless Rate Drops To 5% in November

The nation's job picture brightened in November as good weather helped lower the unemployment rate to 5 percent from October's 5.2 percent, the Labor Dept. has reported.

At 5 percent, the key seasonally adjusted jobless rate was at its second lowest level since it reached 4.9 percent in February 1960.

The rate had dipped to 4.9 percent last July, but then moved up to 5.1 percent in August and to 5.2 percent in both September and October.

The summary job report, based on household surveys by the Census Bureau, could not tell precisely what was behind the improvement. But Labor Dept. experts counted the mild weather as "a plus factor" in enabling construction and other outdoor activities to continue. The later detailed report will provide payroll data by industry.

A strong warning accompanied the November job report, with Pres. Johnson hailing the improvements as "encouraging and sobering" but calling attention to the teenage jobless rate of 14.9 percent and the flood of young jobseekers to come.

"There are gains on this front, too," said the White House statement. "Three hundred and thirty thousand more teenagers are at work than there were a year ago.

Growth 'Unprecedented'

"But they are pouring into the work force at an unprecedented rate. There will be a greater increase in the number of 18 and 19-year-old boys and girls in the work force in the next 12 months than during the entire period between 1950 and 1960.

"We have got to get these boys and girls into jobs, or training programs, or back into school. We can't afford the price of turning down one out of every seven young Americans who apply for admission to responsible citizenship."

The President pointed out that, at nearly 15 percent, the jobless rate of teenagers is six times as high as the rate for married men.

The November report showed the jobless rate for married men—the

Musicians Hail Ruling As Victory

By David L. Perlman

A unanimous Supreme Court gave a common sense interpretation to the Landrum-Griffin Act in upholding a convention voting system used by the Musicians and many other unions—and by the AFL-CIO itself.

The court said it is "abundantly clear" that Congress never intended to outlaw a weighted voting system on dues increases in which delegates voted the membership of the locals they represent.

Lower Courts Reversed

Two lower courts had invalidated a dues increase adopted by the 1963 convention of the Musicians. The $6-a-year increase had been approved by delegates representing a clear majority of the union's membership, but it would have been defeated if each delegate had only one vote.

Both a federal district judge and the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals conceded that the weighted voting procedure was thoroughly democratic. But they held that it technically violated the Landrum-Griffin Act requirement that a dues increase be approved by "a majority vote of the delegates voting" at a union convention.

Both the AFL-CIO and U.S. Solicitor Gen. Archibald Cox filed "friend of the court" briefs with the Supreme Court vigorously challenging such a rigid interpretation.

If the lower court decisions were permitted to stand, the AFL-CIO said, it would "wreak havoc upon

Judge to Bar Shop Strike On Railroads

Chicago—Three shopcraft unions set Dec. 15 for a walkout on 187 U. S. railroads but a U. S. District Court judge said he intends to grant an order temporarily restraining a strike.

Judge Joseph Sam Perry heard some testimony in the dispute between management and unions representing 55,000 skilled trades workers in rail shops. The unions want a raise higher than the 9 cents an hour the companies offered in line with the recommendations of a presidential emergency board.

The judge instructed management counsel to appear Dec. 14 with the draft of a restraining order which, he declared "I intend to grant." After that he will hear more testimony and keep the order

Human Problems of Automation Pose Challenge to World Experts

Labor, management and government experts from the principal industrialized nations were challenged to find the answers to the human and economic problems of automation.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz set forth the scope of the problem in a welcoming address to a North American conference on manpower implications of automation.

The "really hard problem" in charting technological progress, he said, is "to see to it that none are left out." The future, Wirtz declared, must be "one of our building and not of the machines'."

The three-day Washington conference focused on technological developments and problems in the United States and Canada, the two host countries. But participants came also from most of the 19 other member nations of the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development (OECD). The conference was sponsored by the OECD's Manpower & Social Affairs Directorate.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. J. Hayes served as one of the conference chairmen. Vice Pres. George M. Harrison headed a 25-member U.S. labor delegation which included presidents and research directors of international unions.

The opening paper presented to the conference tackled the problem of worker displacement and of the "silent firings" in industries which require fewer employes to do the same or a greater amount of work.

Seymour L. Wolfbein, director of the Labor Dept.'s Office of Manpower, Automation & Training, said there is hope that actual layoffs resulting from technological change can be held to a minimum. He added:

"But a great deal of 'silent firing'—not filling vacancies created by attrition and not hiring additional workers as production expands—appears inevitable in many plants installing automated or other advanced equipment of a labor-saving nature."

Whether this brings mounting unemployment, Wolfbein said, will depend on the rate of economic

UAW Asks Wage Parity:

Five GM Plants Struck in Canada

Toronto—The Auto Workers have struck five Canadian plants of General Motors Corp. in a dispute over wage parity with U.S. workers which may spread to Ford Motor Co. of Canada, Ltd., with 9,500 workers, and Chrysler Canada Ltd., 6,800 employes.

Negotiations were continuing here to settle the strike of 23,500 GM workers called Dec. 3 at plants in Windsor, London, Toronto, Oshawa and St. Catharines. Union and company bargainers have come to terms on local issues at Windsor.

On wages, the striking UAW locals want to close the gap of 40 cents to $1.40 an hour between wages paid by GM to its U.S. and Canadian employes. They also are seeking better pensions, including supplemental benefits, and some protection against speedup and unfair production standards.

Shortly before the strike deadline, management made an offer which fell far short of the "pattern" settlements won by the UAW for U.S. auto workers, said Canadian UAW Dir. George Burt and UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock, who headed the union negotiators.

In other bargaining, the UAW:

- Reached master contract agreements with three big parts suppliers—Dana Corp., with 5,700 workers at 11 Michigan, Ohio, Indiana and Pennsylvania plants; Eaton Mfg. Co., with 5,000 workers at the nine locations; and the Bendix Corp., for 13,000 employes of nine plants.
- Won raises averaging 7.7 cents an hour and other benefits totaling 6 cents in a new one-year contract with the Kohler Corp.—the third since a six-year strike ended in 1960.
- Received final ratification of an American Motors Corp. contract from UAW Local 75, Milwaukee, which voted 3,856-2,868 in favor after a previous turndown. Three members of the local asked a court to declare the latest count unconstitutional. The contract had previously been ratified by locals at other AMC plants.

Reuther Operation Termed Satisfactory

Detroit—Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the Auto Workers was reported in satisfactory condition in Henry Ford Hospital here after an operation to remove a spot from his right lung.

The union said it was advised by the attending surgeon and Reuther's personal physician that a small spot was successfully removed Dec. 7 in what was called a "conservative surgical procedure."

The UAW head is resting comfortably and his condition is "quite satisfactory," the union said. Reuther had asked that the operation be postponed until major auto negotiations had been completed.

Pay, Fringe Gains Won In Shoe Pact

New contract settlements providing advances in wages and fringe benefits for nearly 7,500 employes of 26 shoe manufacturers have been achieved by the United Shoe Workers.

A two-year agreement between USWA Joint Council 13 and three New York associations representing 25 firms was ratified by unanimous vote of nearly 5,000 workers at meetings in Manhattan Center.

The agreement provides a general wage increase of 6.5 cents an hour retroactive to Nov. 1, 1964; an additional 3.5 cents an hour to all time workers for a new minimum range of $1.525 to $2 an hour; and improvements in hospitalization, pensions, holiday pay and severance benefits.

In Chicago, USWA Joint Council 25 negotiated two-year contracts for 2,300 members in the Florsheim Shoe Co. factory and 75 in the Florsheim warehouse. Employes received 2 percent wage hikes as of Nov. 2 with another 2 percent due next Dec. 6, except that warehouse workers get a flat 10 cents an hour in each contract year.

The pact also provides one more paid holiday for a total of eight; an increase from 9.14 to 10.74 cents an hour per employe in company pension payments; and gains in the hospital-surgical program.

The Florsheim firm agreed to set aside $15,000 for eliminating inequities on underpaid jobs and, where permanent layoffs are planned, to give the union a 60-day notice of plant closings or department shutdowns.

Similar agreements were negotiated previously with two other major shoe firms, Intl. Shoe Co. and Brown Shoe Co.

Clothing Workers To Reopen Pacts

New York—Contracts covering 100,000 workers in the cotton garment, single pants and outerwear fields will be reopened early next year, the Clothing Workers' executive board has decided.

The board, chaired by Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, noted that reopening notices must be served well before the Sept. 1 expiration date. Potofsky said the current agreement, negotiated in the spring of 1962, provided for a pay hike and welfare improvements in annual installments. Details of the new proposals will be submitted at membership meetings.

Job Security, Pay Gain Lead Steel Union Goals

to meet USWA local committees "half-way in resolving festering local problems." These, it declared, must also be resolved.

The committee, made up of national officers and directors and 130 committeemen from every affected firm, also declared that in pursuit of the goal of total job security, supplemental unemployment benefits should be guaranteed for the full layoff period for long-service employes. It also called for payment of sickness and accident benefits for the full period of disability and no pay reduction in the event of transfer.

The union said its pension programs "must be substantially improved to reduce the gap between the income of the active and the retired employe" and to make provision for early retirement "on full and adequate pension regardless of age."

Calling for further strengthening of the search for more job opportunities, the committee also urged:

- Improvement of prohibitions against contracting-out of work.
- An increase in premiums for overtime work from time and one-half to double time to discourage excessive overtime work.
- Shorter work periods through a reduced workweek or day without a cut in earnings, and more frequent or longer vacations.
- Greater protection against arbitrary reduction of crews and combining of jobs.
- Training programs and more satisfactory apprenticeship programs.

Other Proposals

The committee said the existing cost-of-living adjustment should be made permanent and applicable to all benefits and there should be more liberal holiday and vacation eligibility rules.

"Our entire medical insurance programs must be made more comprehensive," it continued, "Employes must be granted the opportunity to participate in the new and modern group practice plans."

The union represents nearly 1 million workers in steel and allied industries. Its basic steel contracts have a May 1, 1965, termination date unless reopened. The aluminum, can and fabricating contracts also will be open soon and negotiations "undoubtedly will be affected" by basic steel talks, the USWA said.

Judge to Bar Shop Strike On Railroads

in effect for 10 days while he further studies the railroads' petition for a permanent injunction against a walkout, he said.

The unions involved are the Machinists, Boiler Makers and Sheet Metal Workers. Frustrated in an 18-month fight for wages more in line with those won by unions of craftsmen outside the railroad industry, they sent out strike call notices after management refused to budge from the 9-cent increase offer accepted by other rail unions.

The three shopcrafts said in telegrams to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, management negotiators, mediators and union chairmen that "the strike previously set for Nov. 23 and postponed at the request of the secretary of labor to permit further negotiation is reinstated" as of 6 a.m. Dec. 15.

The unions' spokesman said they made certain modifications in their original proposals of May 31, 1963, but management representatives refused to consider any proposal for a differential for skilled workers.

Nevertheless, they added, the unions remain "ready and willing" to negotiate an agreement. At that point the management lawyers asked the court here for an order restraining a strike.

IUOE Forms New Apprentice Locals

The Operating Engineers have issued registered apprentice and junior and assistant engineers' charters to 12 local unions. Another group of charters will be issued to 10 more locals as soon as they have set up active apprenticeship programs.

The new charters were issued to Locals 3 and 38 in San Francisco; 49, St. Paul; 66, Pittsburgh; 137, Yonkers; 324, Detroit; 428, Phoenix; 501, Los Angeles; 513, St. Louis; 825, Newark; 917, Chattanooga; and 925, Tampa.

The union acted in accordance with convention directives to expand the IUOE apprenticeship program.

New Challenges Seen Facing Labor Editors

The labor editor's challenge is greater today than ever because "it never was a problem to dramatize a picket line, but how do you dramatize a tax cut," according to Pres. Leon Stein of the Intl. Labor Press Association.

"People who say that the labor movement has no more frontiers, that therefore it has lost a good deal of its vigor and enthusiasm, I think are themselves lacking in imagination," he said on Labor News Conference, Mutual Broadcasting System radio program produced by the AFL-CIO.

"There are other frontiers now that are just as challenging as those we used to try to cross in the time when we were devoted to the ideals of struggle, when the purpose of the labor movement was first of all to establish itself and secondly to survive.

"I think we live at a time when thanks to the richness of the country and the advances of technology, our ideals are more now the ideals of fulfillment. These are no less important or exciting. They may be less colorful and they may involve a little more research instead of loudness and muscle. But they are exciting, they are just as important."

Stein cited as examples the field of education and hospital care for the elderly under social security.

In reply to questioning by Frank Porter, labor correspondent for the Washington Post, and Joseph Gambatese, associate editor of Nation's Business, magazine of the Chamber of Commerce of the U.S., Stein said he had been editing a labor paper, the Ladies' Garment Workers' Justice, and "I still am not certain what I am doing" so far as its objective is concerned.

"I think it's a mixed purpose," he said. "I think part of the purpose is to supplement the general press, to give the members of our union the kind of information about that part of their lives which is spent in and around the shops, information which they cannot get in the general press.

"I think another purpose is to develop within readers a point of view which is not reflected in the general press and which they may use to assess the facts, so-called, that they get in the general press."

Film Exchange Contract Nets $5.50 Hike

New York—Employes of seven film exchange firms in the United States have won wage increases of $5.50 a week and other benefit gains in new two-year contracts negotiated by the Theatrical Stage Employes.

The employers agreed to increase their pension contributions from $3.75 a week to $4.50 and to grant these additional benefits:

A third week of vacation after 11 years of service; an increase in maximum severance pay from 14 weeks after 26 years to 15 after 28 years; Columbus Day off, raising holidays per year to nine; and a clause giving visitation rights to IATSE representatives.

The union agreement is with M-G-M, Columbia, Buena Vista, Allied Artists, National Film Service, Bonded Film Service and National Screen Service, according to IATSE Pres. Richard F. Walsh and Sec.-Treas. Harland Holmden.

In Musicians' Dues Case:

High Court Upholds Proportional Voting

established union procedures without promoting any known congressional purpose."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in an affidavit submitted at an early stage of the case, stressed that the federation "has been vitally interested in promoting democracy in its constituent unions." The Musicians' rollcall procedure, he said, "clearly furthers intra-union democracy."

A convention of 14,000 delegates would be needed if the Musicians were to achieve proportional representation of members without a weighted voting system, the AFL-CIO noted.

In a broader area, the AFL-CIO said, the Supreme Court's decision would provide "guidance" to lower courts on whether the Landrum-Griffin Act should be interpreted in a "narrow and artificial" context or be given "a sensible and realistic reading."

The Supreme Court said the law requires that those voting at a convention be delegates, but "says nothing about the number of votes each delegate may cast." The decision, written by Associate Justice Byron R. White, added:

"Where the vote cast at a convention is weighted according to the number of people the delegate represents, that vote, we think, is a vote of a delegate. . . A majority vote so determined in favor of a dues increase is approval by majority vote of the delegates voting at a convention."

The court traced the legislative history of the Landrum-Griffin Act and found that it is quite clear that Congress did not consider the common provision for weighted voting at union conventions to be an abuse of democratic rights. In fact, the court noted, consideration was given to requiring some system of proportional voting representation at conventions.

A union convention, the court indicated, is properly a form of representative union government. The law "does not require a town meeting for action by an international union."

Musicians Pres. Herman D. Kenin hailed the Supreme Court's decision as "a great victory not only for the Musicians Union but for all labor throughout the nation."

He praised the union's attorney, Henry Kaiser of Washington, D. C., who argued the case before the Supreme Court.

The AFM, Kenin said, carried the case forward on appeal as a matter of principle. He pointed out that the dues increase was reapproved at the 1964 convention by a majority of both individual delegates and per capita votes. The decision, therefore, does not affect the union's finances.

Marshall's Dissent Upheld

The Supreme Court's decision also backs the dissent of Judge Thurgood Marshall from the 2-1 decision of the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals. Marshall had voiced strong disagreement with his colleagues' restrictive interpretation of the law.

Congress, he said, merely intended to prevent arbitrary dues action by persons "not answerable in any way to the membership."

There was no congressional intent, he stressed, to "dictate" to unions a particular method of convention voting or to foreclose unions from giving more weight to their large locals on dues questions.

The Supreme Court, in its unanimous decision, made it clear that it agreed with Marshall's interpretation.

Chief Justice Earl Warren and Associate Justice Arthur J. Goldberg did not participate in the case.

Ex-Clarinet Player Rules Himself Out

It has been half a century since a young clarinet player in Bakersfield, Calif., joined Local 263 of the Musicians. And Earl Warren soon gave up the clarinet for a career in law and politics which led to the governorship of California and the post of Chief Justice of the United States.

He has often spoken with pride of the union to which he belonged, however. And when the Musicians dues case came before the Supreme Court, the Chief Justice chose not to participate in the decision.

Nationwide Pension Plan Urged As Means of Widening Coverage

A nationwide pension plan open to small units of employes and administered at "really low cost" was urged by Merton C. Bernstein, authority on pension problems, in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, As We See It.

Only by reducing overhead costs so that retirement plans are practicable for small groups of workers, he maintained, will "close to universal coverage" be assured.

Bernstein, a lecturer at Yale University Law School and a consultant on pensions to the Treasury and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, is the author of the recently-published book, The Future of Private Pensions.

Social security, he said, is "unfortunately" not adequate to meet the needs of retired persons, and "in most cases" fails to do so in combination with private plans.

"The benefits have lagged badly behind need," he said of social security. "From enactment of the program in 1935 until 1950 the program was practically dormant and there was a great deal of catching up to do. And although Congress has, just about every two years and sometimes more frequently, improved benefits and spread coverage and the like, benefits still remain woefully inadequate."

On the inadequacy of social security plus a private plan, Bernstein said:

"Some in the insurance industry talk about a three-legged stool of retirement security. One leg is social security, one leg is a private retirement benefit and one leg is private individual savings. Well, you know, sitting on a three-legged stool is a tricky business anyhow, but when the legs are uneven it's downright hazardous—and unfortunately, the savings of most people are negligible. They amount to, at best, a few hundreds or thousands of dollars which in terms of income have little or no value. They are good for one or two rainy days—if they are short."

Pressure by Unions

Bernstein agreed that the inadequacies of social security have prompted unions "and others" to push for private retirement benefits. While statistics are inadequate, he said, about 22 to 24 million workers—less than half of the full-time, employed labor force—are covered by private programs.

"About half of the coverage is accounted for by negotiated plans which means, of course, that a much higher proportion of union members are under plans than non-organized people," he said. "And, of course, it was unions that created a large part of the pressure which made them spread to non-unionized sectors."

Private pension plans to which the workers contribute are on the decline, he said, because the employe contribution is not tax deductible, although the amount the employer puts in is deductible. He called the drop "unfortunate" and "a direct result of the tax laws."

"I think one area in which real progress could be made in improving employe pension rights would be to give equal treatment to employe contributions," he declared. "This would mean pension credit that could not be taken away."

In reply to a question by Harry W. Flannery, AFL-CIO radio coordinator who interviewed him on the program broadcast over the ABC radio network, Bernstein emphasized the social and economic benefits of proper pension plans. The poverty that is "especially common" among the elderly makes them poor consumers, he pointed out.

Court Orders Rail Merger Job Protection

The Supreme Court has sent back to the Interstate Commerce Commission a railroad merger order with instructions that it be amended to include certain protections of workers from loss of jobs or indicate "specifically" why the protective clauses were omitted.

The ICC approved acquisition of stock in the Central of Georgia Railway by the Southern Railway, issuing an order to this effect that did not incorporate three sections of the Washington Job Protection Agreement. The Railway Labor Executives' Association filed suit, but the ICC order was approved by a three-judge federal district court.

The Supreme Court reversed the lower court and remanded the case for reconsideration by the ICC on the single issue of incorporating job protection clauses. The Dept. of Justice intervened in the high court in support of the RLEA's position.

The Washington Job Protection Agreement provides that in case of rail mergers employes of either road shall not be treated as in a worse position, so far as job retention is concerned, than would have been the case before the merger. Depending on the seniority of the workers involved, this protection may run for as long as five years.

About 900 workers are involved in the Southern-Central of Georgia case, many of them longtime veterans of service.

Court Bars Lawsuit by Members In Challenging Union Election Rules

The Landrum-Griffin Act provides orderly procedures for challenging union election rules and regulations, and dissenting individual members cannot bypass these procedures by suing in federal court to enjoin elections, the Supreme Court ruled.

In its first decision on election challenges under what one justice called the "tangled provisions" of the law, the court held that three members of the Marine Engineers had suffered no discrimination or denial of equal rights under the union's rules covering eligibility for office and nominations.

The three individuals attacked two provisions of the union's election rules—one a long-standing requirement that a member must nominate himself rather than be nominated by others; two, a more recent provision that a candidate for office must have been a member for five years and must have spent half his time on sea duty in two of the three years preceding an election.

Associate Justice Hugo L. Black in the ruling opinion pointed out that the Landrum-Griffin Act provides for a test of the reasonableness of these requirements, if they are challenged, by a complaint filed with the Secretary of Labor.

The law sets up statutory provisions for a maximum term of office, a secret ballot, equal access to membership lists for campaign purposes, reasonable periods for nominations and a fair voting opportunity for all members, Black continued. It also allows unions to fix "reasonable qualifications uniformly imposed" for candidates.

The plaintiffs in the MEBA case, he wrote, were not "discriminated against in any way" and were not "denied [any] right or privilege to vote or nominate" available to other union members.

The so-called "equal rights" section of the Landrum-Griffin Act could not be "stretched" to read into it a guarantee that members not only have a right to nominate candidates "but to nominate anyone, without regard to valid union rules," the court ruled.

In another labor case, the Supreme Court refused to knock out a National Labor Relations Board representation election by employes of the long-struck Kingsport Press, Kingsport, Tenn., in which three unions were confirmed in their bargaining rights.

The NLRB ordered the election just before the workers would have lost their voting rights as economic strikers on expiration of a one-year deadline. Kingsport Press argued that the NLRB had violated its own procedures by ordering the election after hearings but without waiting for the filing of written briefs.

Head in the Sand

THE AMERICAN Medical Association, its head firmly in the sand, has renewed and intensified its counter-offensive against enactment of a social security hospital program for the aged. The election results were not welcome, Pres. Donovan F. Ward told the AMA's House of Delegates, but "we do not compromise . . . with honor and duty," and the fight will go on.

The unyielding stubbornness of the AMA on this issue occasions no overwhelming astonishment. The record shows that the organized doctors' group has bitterly opposed previous additions to the social security system that it could say impinged on the health field and bitterly opposed even innovations in medical economics—the way people pay their doctor bills—that the government had nothing to do with.

Eight years ago, when Congress was considering bills to provide social security benefits at age 50 to workers who became totally and permanently disabled, the AMA fought it. Such a plan was unworkable, the AMA claimed, because it was impossible to set up proper standards for determining disability.

A disability system was already in effect under the Railroad Retirement Act and in the Veterans Administration, but the AMA said a similar system could not function under social security. The bill was passed, nevertheless, the system is working, and the 50-year minimum-age provision has been knocked out, thus broadening the protection given workers who have the misfortune to lose their earning power.

Twenty-odd years ago various small groups of physicians decided that a group-practice system, with people prepaying fixed amounts to cover the cost of illness at some later time, would ease the financial burden on patients and provide the advantages of preventive medical care. Organized medicine claimed this would destroy the doctor-patient relationship. It took a federal court decision under the anti-trust laws to persuade medical societies to cease harassment.

SO WE APPROACH the 89th Congress, and Dr. Ward tells the AMA's House of Delegates that social security hospital benefits to aged and sick people would make them "federal wards" in an invidious sense. They are not "federal wards," of course, when they receive old-age pensions, but would become so if their hospital expenses were covered through a slight increase in social security taxes.

Dr. Ward said that the election gave no "mandate" for hospital health care under social security and that there had been no campaign "debate" on the issue between Pres. Johnson and Sen. Goldwater. Well, Goldwater voted against a social security hospital bill when the Senate passed it this year, and he defended this vote during the campaign by arguing that such a program would "bankrupt" social security trust funds. Pres. Johnson stated in a speech at the Machinists convention that he had worked long and hard to obtain passage of the bill and he said repeatedly during the campaign that it would be a priority issue in his 1965 legislative program.

A tax-financed system of hospital benefits for the elderly can easily be worked out on the same basis as the 1956 disability system, with a separate trust fund. The point is that the cost of sickness in old age is a common hazard of life, which can be protected against through a social insurance system.

It seems unlikely that the AMA can block a hospital care bill in 1965. It would be welcome, nevertheless, if physicians would make a creative contribution to development of a generally acceptable program.

Heller Plan Criticized:

States Held Unlikely to Make Wise Use of 'No String' Grant

The recently-retired chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, Walter W. Heller, left pending for other Administration officials a "Heller Plan" for federal government grants to the states without restrictions on how the money should be invested. A $3 billion figure has been mentioned. Here are excerpts from an article, critical of the plan, by Christopher Jencks in the New Republic:

By Christopher Jencks

THE "HELLER PLAN" for bolstering bankrupt states with massive "no-strings" grants from the federal Treasury, is sure to provoke opposition from organized labor, civil rights groups, many congressional liberals, and from a majority of Mr. Johnson's departmental subordinates. [But] since the plan has a good deal of appeal, it is important to be clear what is wrong with it.

Even a casual survey of 20th Century American politics suggests that the major pillars of the status quo have been the 50 states. Conversely the major force for innovation and progress has been the federal government. States have occasionally served as "laboratories of democracy," trying out on a small scale ideas which spread across the country once they prove workable. (California's two-year "community colleges" are an example.) States have also, occasionally, proved more responsive than the federal government to the needs of their residents. But these are the exceptions. More often, the federal government, with its vast resources and comparatively innovation-minded officials, has been the sponsor of new and experimental programs.

The laggardness of states is sometimes explained in terms of rural domination of state legislatures. Court-ordered reapportionment, by ending rural control of the legislatures, will lead, so one is told, to more modern and responsive state government. Unfortunately, what ails our states is deeper than any hegemony of the farms and small towns, and no amount of tampering with the electoral system is likely to cure it.

The limitations of the state legislators inevitably infect the executive and judicial branches of state governments. Many state governors are able, but more often than not they soon discover that their state is essentially ungovernable. So they use the governor's mansion primarily as a platform on which to run for the U.S. Senate, or even for a Presidential nomination.

What is to be done? There have always been two possibilities. One is to reform the states. The other is gradually to transfer the responsibilities they have so conspicuously failed to meet to the national government. If the foregoing analysis is correct, reform is unlikely, and the Heller Plan becomes a substitute for reform of state revenue codes. The fact that the states have persistently refused to improve their outmoded and regressive methods of raising money does not suggest that they will do better in other departments. There was, for example, nothing to prevent state legislatures from hiking income taxes last year to soak up the surplus created by the federal tax cut. Yet the legislators were almost unanimous in their failure to seize this opportunity. Instead, they devoted their time to wailing about how it was "impossible" to provide state aid to education on the scale requested by local school boards, "impossible" to provide medical assistance for the elderly under the Kerr-Mills Act, "impossible" to establish adequate mental health programs, "impossible" to clean up polluted rivers and air. In short, it was impossible to do anything that was not already being done.

THE ALTERNATIVE to such idiocy is to create, at long last, a national government which offers national solutions to the pressing domestic problems of the day. This was the work which the New Deal began, and it is the work which Lyndon Johnson ought to continue. For the first time in 26 years there appears to be a majority in the House of Representatives ready to support such an approach to our problems.

This need not mean the end of local initiative or responsiveness to local needs. General Motors, for example, is a national corporation, but it is also highly decentralized and allows its local affiliates a great deal of autonomy. There is no need to generate the vast bureaucracy which so distresses conservatives and liberals alike. The federal government has a multitude of tools for carrying out its programs. The states are only one such tool, the least satisfactory.

The form of federal activity can be as diverse as the problems with which it deals. The important point is that ultimate responsibility should fall upon the Congress and the President, not on 50 baronies, almost all of which have proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that they are basically unfit to govern. . . .

Morgan Says:

Bridge of Understanding Urged To Cross Gulf of Race Hatred

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

THERE IS SOMETHING more substantial than sheer dramatic contrast in two breathtakingly different pictures of the civil rights struggle that have just emerged in the news.

Here, on one hand, is a young Negro preacher, the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., to receive one of civilization's most exalted awards, the Nobel Peace Prize. And here, on the other, are 21 white citizens of the state of Mississippi under arrest for alleged involvement in one of the most ghastly lynchings of the century, a crime not just against the three youthful victims of murder but against civilization itself.

Morgan

These pictures, which for identification purposes might be labeled the positive and the negative, mark not only the dark gulf of hatred on the race question that still must be bridged with understanding. In a strange way they are exhibits of promising efforts to make that bridge real.

A prophet, it is said, is without honor in his own country. Dr. King's prize, bestowed in Oslo, may now hasten higher recognition by his own American countrymen for his true accomplishments against bigotry and injustice, the sorry judgment of J. Edgar Hoover notwithstanding.

But the FBI deserves high credit for piercing the grisly mystery of the murder of three civil rights workers, Andrew Goodman, James Chaney and Michael Schwerner, outside Philadelphia, Miss., last June. How the wheels of justice turn in the case remains to be seen, but the stark fact is they might never have turned at all if it had not been for the Dept. of Justice and the FBI. Even if the charges against the 21 defendants are not substantiated and nobody is convicted of any crime, the town of Philadelphia and the state of Mississippi may never be quite the same again.

Here, as in so many other communities and states facing similar problems, a minority of moderates had allowed itself weakly to be muted by the evil forces of hatred, ignorance and fear. Outsiders have hardly the remotest conception of the atmosphere of terror that was deliberately developed in Mississippi in the decade after the landmark Supreme Court decisions declaring public school segregation unconstitutional in 1954.

In that interval, Chicago Daily News Correspondent Nicholas von Hoffman writes in his shocking book, Mississippi Notebook, it became treasonable in the state "—which thinks of itself as a sovereign nation in loose affiliation with the rest of America—to say that ultimately the constitution will have to be obeyed."

But in the revealing autobiography, Congressman from Mississippi, Frank E. Smith, a courageous citizen who was beaten for re-election in 1962 because of his moderate stand, concludes that "the time has come when Mississippi must look away from Dixie and look forward to America."

Today there are fragile fragments of evidence that this turning has begun. In the belatedly conscious-stricken town of Philadelphia, white ministers preached sermons from their pulpits on the Christian ethic that would have caused them to be bombed a month ago. A young Methodist clergyman serving his first year in Philadelphia, challenged a meeting of the Rotary Club to find 10 "good men" willing to stand up and save the town from fear and confusion—conditions which the FBI blames on a conspiracy of the Ku Klux Klan.

THE MINISTERS were said to be under considerable strain as they made their public admonitions. What more eloquently macabre evidence could there be of an atmosphere of savagery than the spectacle of ministers quaking in their shoes as they dared to preach the gospel of Christ! Their original hesitancy may be made the more understandable, their ultimate courage the more admirable by the revelation that outside the office of the sheriff, one of the 21 suspects arrested by the FBI in the killing of the three civil rights workers, there is tacked to the bulletin board a poster depicting Dept. of Justice officials as "Jew-Communist."

But as decent Mississippians turn at last to grapple with their malignant problem, a two-edged danger develops—a danger that communities elsewhere will self-righteously and short-sightedly conclude that since their equations of racial conflict are not so hard to solve, they really don't have any problem; and the danger that restive Negro leaders, in their drive for progress in these communities, will unrealistically, even irresponsibly, charge that there is a "little Mississippi" in every situation they are trying to improve.

There is a nettle here which all Americans must grasp. Von Hoffman puts it in the form of a question: Why have all of us allowed the Mississippi situation to degenerate to the verge of desperate action?

There is a larger point: This republic is a union of 50 states bound powerfully together by one constitution and one basic concept of equality and justice. When these are violated in any state, they are threatened in all the rest.

Washington Reports:

Future UN Peace-Keeping Role Hinges on Dues Crisis Solution

THE CONSTITUTIONAL and financial crisis that faced the United Nations General Assembly as it opened its current session was discussed by Richard N. Gardner, U.S. deputy assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs, as he was interviewed on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 radio stations.

Some members who are withholding their payments are doing so "not because they are unable to pay," explained Gardner, "but because they don't approve of the peace-keeping operations for which the assessments were levied and don't approve of the manner in which the operations were launched and financed."

The two views presented are that peace-keeping operations should be subject to great-power veto or require a two-thirds vote in the General Assembly, the assistant secretary observed.

"THE U.S. IS SEEKING some middle ground between these two extremes and looking for improved procedures to launch future peace-keeping operations and finance them," he said.

Most of the important business of the UN takes place off the public stage of television and radio "in private, informal conversations, in the delegates' lounge, in social functions and in diplomatic receptions," said Gardner.

He said the private stage of negotiations "is particularly important during the annual sessions of the General Assembly, because so many heads of state and foreign ministers turn up. Our secretary of state sees, each year on the average, some 50 to 60 heads of state and foreign ministers during a session of the General Assembly. And you can readily appreciate that is a unique opportunity to transact important international business."

Gardner is author of a new book, In Pursuit of World Order, written in connection with Intl. Cooperation Year, the 20th anniversary of the UN, which comes in 1965. The book takes up most of the objections commonly raised against the organization, and in Gardner's words, shows "that, despite all the disappointments and the bad headlines, there have been practical accomplishments in pursuit of man's common interest in peace and welfare."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A SET OF PROPOSED House rules changes has been worked out, for presentation to the Democratic caucus on Jan. 2, that would have the effect of strengthening the influence of the Administration leadership and of giving the caucus itself a larger voice in the assignment of members to various committees.

Drafted by leaders of the Democratic Study Group, a research and activist voluntary association of 100-odd House members, the proposals may be modified after discussions in the next couple of weeks. They are subject to approval of the entire caucus, of course, and the viewpoints of House Speaker John W. McCormack, Floor Leader Carl Albert and veteran chairmen of the legislative committees will carry substantial weight.

The Study Group is generally described as a caucus of the more liberally inclined House Democrats. But Democrats of many philosophical shadings may share the viewpoint that the present rules are chaotic, that the House does not function as effectively as it should, and that reforms are needed.

SOME OF the proposed rules changes are designed to help expedite legislation—usually Administration legislation—through the bottleneck of the Rules Committee presided over by the archaic Rep. Howard W. Smith of Virginia.

The "21-day rule" of the 1949-50 House would be substantially restored, providing that if a bill has been held for more than this period in the Rules Committee, the chairman of the legislative committee that approved the bill may call it up.

During 1949-50, the Speaker was required to give immediate recognition to the member rising for such a privileged motion. In the present proposal, the Speaker would be authorized, but not required, to recognize him.

Another proposal would allow the chairman of a legislative committee to offer a privileged motion to send a bill passed by both House and Senate to a conference committee. Again, the Speaker would be authorized but not required to recognize him. If he did, a majority House vote would send the bill to conference. At present, a single objection by any member—Republican or Democratic—blocks a conference by sending the bill back to the Rules Committee, where Chairman Smith can—and often has—held it until adjournment.

A third proposal would ease the so-called discharge-petition procedure. At present 218 members—a majority—are required to take from committee a bill strongly favored by a House majority but bottled up by a hostile chairman. The change suggested is that after 175 signatures are gathered the Speaker may, but is not required to, recognize a member to call up the bill.

OTHER CHANGES proposed involve internal Democratic relationships. They would give the caucus power to accept or reject committee assignments; assignment to committees is now effectively controlled by Democratic members of the Ways & Means Committee. A House Democratic Policy or Steering Committee would be created to "discuss and implement" leadership policy on legislative proposals.

The Democratic Study Group would also modify the party ratios on all committees, including the key Appropriations unit and the tax-writing Ways & Means Committee, to reflect party ratios in the House.

By practice, in recent years, the majority has had 15 members on Ways & Means, the minority 10; the majority a mere 30-20 margin on Appropriations. This gives disproportionate strength to veteran conservatives and denies committee expression on taxes and spending policy to the great group of younger, more liberal Democrats elected since 1958.

As for Democratic House members who defected from support of the Johnson-Humphrey ticket and worked publicly for Sen. Goldwater, the present proposal would deny them committee assignments as Democrats.

THE UNITED NATIONS, despite current and past difficulties, remains the world's best hope for averting conflict and building for peace, Richard N. Gardner (left), assistant secretary of state for international organization affairs, asserted in an interview with Harry W. Flannery for the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

DIGNITY AND PURPOSE of work are stressed in "Ballad of Isaac and Jacob," to be presented Dec. 13 on NBC-TV in the Eternal Light series of the Jewish Theological Seminary with the cooperation of the George Meany Foundation of the Herbert H. Lehman Institute. David, a young scientist, is played by Bert Brinckerhoff (right) with David Hurst as Jake, his father.

BACKGROUND MUSIC for "Ballad of Isaac and Jacob" is provided by Will Holt, Ronnie Gilbert and Barry Kornfeld (left to right) as folk-singers. The presentation is built around the problems growing out of automation and its impact, and the worker's contributions to the nation's growth and development. NBC-TV stations should be checked for local showing time.

THE GRANDFATHER, Isaac, in the Eternal Light drama, "Ballad of Isaac and Jacob," is played by George Voskovec. The play will be presented on NBC-TV at 1.30 p.m. on Dec. 13.

Television Play Focuses On Automation's Impact

Automation and its effect on the ideal of work as a social force is the basic theme around which Playwright Millard Lampell has built "Ballad of Isaac and Jacob," to be presented on the Eternal Light program of NBC-TV at 1:30 p.m. on Dec. 13. The program will be shown at other times in a number of cities, and viewers should consult local listings.

The Eternal Light program is produced by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. "Ballad of Isaac and Jacob" is its third annual presentation in cooperation with the George Meany Foundation of the Herbert Lehman Institute.

The previous presentations were based on the lives of the late Pres. William Green of the former AFL and the late Pres. Philip Murray of the former CIO. This year's program, however, is concerned with an issue and, in addition, features kaleidoscopic views of historic epochs, with backgrounds of music and song.

The cast includes seven top-ranked actors and singers.

Burt Brinkerhoff, featured in many movies and in the Broadway production, "Blue Denim," plays the role of David, a young scientist. His father, Jake, is played by David Hurst, who has won both an "Obie," for the best off-Broadway actor, and the Clarence Derent Award, for the best Broadway performance by a non-featured actor. George Voskovec, now starring in "The Physicists" on Broadway and a veteran of many stage, screen and television productions, is cast as the grandfather, Isaac. Court Benson, veteran radio performer, completes the stage cast.

The music is supplied by Ronnie Gilbert, for 15 years with the Weavers; Will Holt, appearing in "That 5 A.M. Jazz," and Barry Kornfeld, who is with Max Morath and the Original Rag Quartet.

Distinguished Playwright

Lampell, the playwright, has a distinguished background in dramatic presentations and documentaries based on social and liberal issues.

The George Meany Foundation was established by friends of the AFL-CIO president to "further the understanding of ethical principles by which all moral men live." Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers is treasurer and M. S. Novik, AFL-CIO radio consultant, is secretary.

Painters Local Official Among Texas Electors

Houston, Tex.—One of the 25 Texas electoral votes for Pres. Johnson will be cast by E. P. South, business representative of Glaziers Local 1778 of the Painters. Smith and 24 other Democratic electors will ballot in Austin Dec. 14.

Broad Planning Urged to Meet 'Revolution' in Energy Sources

Shale rock once thought worthless and the barely-tapped force of the atom can power the nation's economy to new heights, according to an analysis by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. But it will take planning geared to national goals to bring this about.

Both the promise and perils of the "energy revolution" are scrutinized in the December issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

The article traces modern society's insatiable demand for energy and the gobbling up of the fossil fuels built up by nature over millions of years.

"A century ago," the article notes, "the muscle power of men and domestic animals supplied 94 percent of the world's energy needs . . . Today the situation is reversed. The industrialized nations now obtain 93 percent of their energy needs from coal, oil and natural gas . . . Each American man, woman and child has working for him each year, either directly or indirectly, the equivalent of the energy contained in nine tons of coal."

Yet even the present staggering rate of energy consumption will have to be tripled in order to meet the demands of a growing population and provide for an expanding economy. One estimate is that the United States, despite its rich endowment of natural resources, will have depleted its presently-known low-cost energy reserves within the next century and all foreseeable conventional energy resources within 150 to 200 years.

But just as coal replaced wood and oil supplanted coal as the chief sources of energy, so the mastery of man's physical environment continues to make long-range predictions guesswork at best.

Vast Deposits

Barely tapped as a fuel resources are vast deposits of shale rock, principally in the high plateau country of Colorado, Wyoming and Utah—70 percent of it on lands owned by the federal government. Shale oil is an impure limestone, formed of tightly packed clay and mud. In this conglomerate is a wax-like substance called kerogen. Heated to a temperature of 800 degrees, it melts into liquid oil.

The 1963 AFL-CIO convention called for legislation "to protect the vital stake of the American people on the enormous energy potential of their shale oil resources."

Nuclear power is already competitive in cost with conventional electric generating facilities in some areas of the nation, the Federationist article points out. The time will come, a former Atomic Energy Commission chairman predicted, when nuclear power will be so cheap and abundant it will not even be metered.

"The nation has adapted to the major changeovers in basic energy fuels—from wood to coal, from coal to oil and natural gas, and now faces the new phase of shale oil and atomic energy. It seems both hopeful and inevitable," the AFL-CIO analysis declares, "that these new sources of energy can meet the future needs of Americans and mankind."

To bring this about, the need is for "broad energy planning and policy decisions made at the national level and geared both to immediate and longer range national objectives of strengthening national stability and growth."

The Federationist analysis stresses that the policy decision "should embody widespread benefits to consumers, safeguards against growth of monopoly and employment of wise conservation, management and use."

Bigger Share of Dollar Spent on Housing Costs

American city families in recent years have spent more of their increased incomes for housing and household operations, for medical care and education. At the same time they have been able to increase their savings, insurance holdings and their contributions to charity and community services, the Dept. of Labor has reported.

The increased proportion of income spent for housing "was the most significant uptrend in family spending" during the decade of the '50's, according to a Bureau of Labor Statistics article in the November issue of the department's Monthly Labor Review. A second article, giving a breakdown on family spending pattern and variations by income levels and location, is scheduled for publication in the December issue.

The article, which covered family spending patterns in 1960-61 as contrasted with expenditures in 1950, pointed out that increased incomes had made possible increased dollar expenditures in "each major category."

But there were declines in the percentage of spending for food, clothing, house furnishings and equipment and recreation, whereas expenditures for "shelter, fuel and utilities, household operations, medical and personal care, automobiles . . . and education took a larger share" of total family spending, the analysis said.

Significantly, the higher average income in 1960-61 also made possible greater family savings and almost an 85 percent increase in gifts, contributions and personal insurance.

The major expansion in personal insurance spending was in social security and other pension plans, which by 1960-61 accounted for more than half of the $324 spent by the average family for all personal insurance.

The Monthly Labor Review article said the city family's average income in 1960-61 was $5,906—an increase of 51 percent from the 1950 dollar figure of $3,910, which after allowance for price increases worked out to a 22 percent increase in real family income.

The average family was able to increase dollar spending for consumer goods and services and still to limit its expenditures for current living needs to "only 91 percent of its after-tax income, compared with 97 percent in 1950," the article continued.

City families spent an average of $1,600 for housing in 1960-61—an increase of $550 from the 1950 level, the BLS report said.

Ohio Senate Democrats Pick Unionist as Leader

Columbus, O.—State Sen. Frank W. King of Toledo, president of the Ohio AFL-CIO, has been elected Democratic leader of the Senate for the coming session.

At Illinois Parley:

Anti-Poverty Role Of Labor Stressed

Urbana, Ill.—Central labor bodies can and should play a major role in the war on poverty, speakers and delegates agreed at the 16th Annual Central Labor Union Conference sponsored by the Illinois State AFL-CIO at the University of Illinois here. Theme of the parley was "Problems of Unemployment and Poverty."

Nat Goldfinger, AFL-CIO research director, told the conference that "the road out of poverty for children of the poor is employment . . . decent jobs and decent wages and educational opportunities."

Goldfinger said half of the families at the $3,000 or less poverty level are subject to job-related poverty. To help these families, he said, the nation must create jobs through massive public works programs, extend coverage of the federal minimum wage law and boost the basic rate from $1.25 to $2 an hour.

For the one-fourth of the poor who are 65 or older, he said a partial answer includes increased social security benefits and coverage, health care under social security, improved welfare aid, and better incomes and pensions through collective bargaining.

For the remaining one-fourth of the families—those without a regular breadwinner—Goldfinger said improvements are needed in workmen's compensation laws, insurance for sick benefits, improved public aid programs and better housing and guidance for personal adjustment.

Call for Action

He called on central labor bodies to take advantage of the opportunity to meet their responsibility to the community by getting in on the planning and launching of local programs possible under the Economic Opportunity Act.

John E. Cullerton, director of the Illinois Dept. of Labor, noted that "because it has the major resources for attacking unemployment and its causes—money, manpower, skills, planning and programming—the federal government has the major role in combating unemployment." He added:

"But the state has a role only slightly less comprehensive."

"It must cooperate effectively in determining the areas of greatest need, in carrying out local studies and resource assessments, and in formulating the programs to be set up with federal assistance."

Cullerton said it is up to the state to enlist "the support of local communities and local agencies; of labor and business representatives; of education facilities and administrators" to implement job creating programs.

Stanley L. Johnson, state AFL-CIO executive vice president, delivering the prepared address of Reuben G. Soderstrom, head of the state central body, warned that the 118-seat Democratic majority in the Illinois House of Representatives doesn't mean labor's program will be automatically enacted.

To 'Educate and Inform'

"We will have much work to educate and inform newcomers in the legislative process and convince the Republican majority in the Senate that it is time to stop blocking needed legislation," he said.

Soderstrom, who was in Streator, Ill., receiving the Fraternal Order of Eagles "Labor Man of the Year" award, listed these legislative priorities in his prepared text:

- A state minimum wage.
- Improvements in workmen's compensation and unemployment compensation laws.
- Cash sickness benefits for joblessness caused by illness.
- A prevailing wage law patterned after the federal Davis-Bacon Act.
- Tax revision to ease the burden on wage earners and provide more funds for needed state programs.
- A ban on the importation of strikebreakers.
- Union rights and bargaining rights for public employes.

Rights Act, Poverty War Seen Start of New Era

Minneapolis, Minn.—Enactment of the Civil Rights Act and the launching of the Johnson Administration's war on poverty have opened a new "era of opportunity," Senator-designate Walter F. Mondale told the 8th annual AFL-CIO Institute on Human Relations here.

"This nation now has the facilities," he declared, "to use the great wealth we possess to produce and to provide a full and free opportunity for the best that American life has to offer for all."

The institute is sponsored by the Minneapolis AFL-CIO in cooperation with the Minnesota Labor Committee for Human Rights and the Jewish Labor Committee. Plaques honoring a local union, a union member and a businessman for outstanding service in the field of human relations, awarded by the JLC, were awarded to:

2 Unionists Included

Twin Cities Sign Painters Local 880, with Business Rep. Nick Snarich receiving the presentation.

Miss Cecil Robitz, a member of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 977, as the "outstanding unionist of the year."

Albert H. Feller, Jr., executive vice president of the Northland Milk Co., for "long and untiring ecorts in bettering human relations within our community."

Representatives of unions, the Board of Education, public school teachers, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and organizations working for fair employment practices participated in panels on housing, education, employment and public accommodations.

Arthur A. Chapin, special assistant to the secretary of labor, hailed organized labor's contributions to the civil rights movement and cited particularly the AFL-CIO program of educating the workers to the true nature and meaning of the Civil Rights Act, including its pamphlets and similar material "exposing and refuting" widely-publicized misconceptions and distortions.

He also paid tribute to Vice Pres.-Elect Hubert H. Humphrey, describing him as the "civil rights pilot" and recalling that while mayor of Minneapolis he was instrumental in persuading the 1948 Democratic National convention to adopt the first "really meaningful" rights plank in the nation's political history.

Pickets Help Sign Up Plant Across Street

Portland, Me.—Furniture Workers, on strike since Aug. 20 for a first contract with the Thomas P. Beals Furniture Co., managed to organize a plant across the street while they were walking the picket line at their own plant.

Their union reported the feat to AFL-CIO Reg. Dir. Hugh Thompson in Boston, who has called for intensified union support of the doughty band of 40 Beals strikers.

Vote Won 18-6

The Beals plant is on the same street as the Enterprise Mattress Co., whose employes organized with the advice of Beals strikers, won a National Labor Relations Board election by an 18-6 vote, and started negotiations for a contract.

The Beals workers voted 43-22 for the UFWA last April in an NLRB election, but walked out in a dispute over wages and working conditions in bargaining for their first contract.

Members of UFWA Local 174 are fighting, they said, to get their wages up from an average of $1.46 an hour in an area where average hourly wages in manufacturing are $2.18 and Beals' competitors pay $1.82 to $1.91.

UFWA Rep. David Chisholm reported that the children of the striking workers face a bleak Christmas. Beals management, he said, has offered a two-year contract with no increases and recall of strikers on a "when and if" basis. The union has kept on picketing.

Physicians Seen Shifting On Aged Hospital Care

A change is taking place in the way many of the nation's physicians are looking at hospital care for the elderly under social security, according to Dir. Nelson Cruikshank of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

The shift is not reflected in the stand of the American Medical Association's House of Delegates, he asserted, but can be seen "in the profession itself."

"More and more physicians are realizing that the Kerr-Mills program is inadequate," Cruikshank said on Washington Viewpoint, radio program produced by the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co.'s Washington News Bureau.

"Considerable feeling" was expressed at the recent meeting of the House of delegates at Miami Beach, he said, "that the AMA had to get off its position that Kerr-Mills was adequate in its present form."

"There were resolutions presented from some of their societies," Cruikshank said. "The one right here in the District of Columbia asked them to make a change in their position. The New York society asked for a change. None of these resolutions got very far. But there will be an impact on the thinking of the AMA, as they reflect the experience of doctors in the field that there is a problem."

Cruikshank said the fact that the AMA called a meeting in Chicago "to devise ways of making the Kerr-Mills program more adequate is significant, because they've been saying all over the country that it's sufficient as it is."

Failure Recognized

"This is a recognition that the program they've espoused is not meeting the need," he added.

Under questioning by Ann Corrick and Pete Clapper, Cruikshank agreed with the view of Democratic Leader Carl Albert (Okla.) that a plan for hospital care under social security can be put through the House before June.

He said the AFL-CIO is "not at all rigid" on "what we would support and what we would oppose" in view of the fact that Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.) of the Ways & Means Committee, a past opponent of the proposed legislation, has said he would accept a plan provided it is not financed through the social security payroll tax.

The "basic thing with us," he explained, is to "get away from the means test" in the Kerr-Mills Act. If there is something else that "rests on this same principle," he went on, "we would certainly be very willing to give it a sympathetic consideration."

November Jobless Rate Declines to 5 Percent

key breadwinner group—improving to 2.5 percent from 2.8 percent in October. The jobless rate for all men 20 years and over improved to 3.5 percent from October's 4 percent.

"Both rates were at their lowest points in more than seven years," the report noted.

The report also showed a "strong improvement" in the 20-24-year-old male group, with its jobless rate improving to 7.4 percent from October's 9.1 percent. Labor Dept. experts said this young group probably was made up of those benefiting from continuation of construction activity as well as some college students who had been looking for part-time work in October and either found it or stopped looking by November.

Overall, the total unemployed—which usually rises sharply in November with the onset of cold weather—rose by only 121,000 to nearly 3.4 million. This was the lowest November unemployment level since 1957, the report said.

On the employment side of the picture, the total dropped less than usual, by 330,000 to 70.8 million.

The report said the expected October-November decline occurred in agriculture while non-farm jobs increased by 250,000 instead of falling by 200,000 as expected.

Part-Time Unchanged

The improvement in November was supported by the fact that non-farm workers on part time for economic reasons held unchanged at 1.9 million, the lowest November level since 1956. These part-time workers, who would prefer full time jobs, are counted in the employment totals.

Another key indicator reflected improvement in November. Labor force time lost through joblessness and part-time work declined to 5.2 percent from 5.7 percent in October. A year ago it was 6.3 percent. This indicates the efficiency at which the economy is operating in terms of manpower use; in other words, the economy could be said to be operating at 94.8 percent efficiency in November, still a good bit below what economists consider achievable.

Unionist Donates 128 Pints of Blood

Charley S. Simon, a member of Mail Handlers Local 57 in Washington, has donated his 128th pint of blood to the Washington Regional Red Cross Blood Center.

That's a total of 16 gallons—despite injuries in World War II that required 28 operations and still-continuing vocational rehabilitation. Simon began giving blood to the Red Cross while serving with the Army Engineers in the Pacific.

New York Square Named for Randolph

New York — The City Council has approved a bill to name a Manhattan square for AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, civil rights leader who heads the Sleeping Car Porters.

A bill to change the name of Dewey Square to Randolph Square was introduced by Councilman J. Raymond Jones, Harlem Democrat. The bill, unanimously approved, went to Mayor Wagner for signature.

The square bounded by St. Nicholas and Seventh Avenues and West 116th and 117th Streets, was named for Adm. George Dewey. An avenue in the Bronx and Dewey Place in Brooklyn will continue to memorialize the Spanish-American war hero.

'Work' Forces Slate New Mexico Drive

Albuquerque, N. M.—A top official of the National Right-to-Work Committee has set up headquarters here for a new attempt to outlaw the union shop in New Mexico.

The committee announced that its national secretary, Charles W. Bailey, has been "drafted" to serve as executive secretary of the recently-formed New Mexicans for Right to Work, Inc. Bailey and Right to Work Committee Pres. S. D. Cadwallader were instrumental in setting up the state group whose incorporators include the state's Republican national committeeman, Albert Mitchell.

To fight the new threat, the New Mexico Council for Industrial Peace was reactivated under bipartisan leadership. The council had played a major role in defeating previous attempts to push a so-called "right-to-work" proposal through the legislature.

It charged in a statement that the drive to prohibit union shop agreements was a "cynical, carpetbagger incursion into New Mexico" and represented "arrogant defiance" of the Nov. 3 election mandate.

'Work' Backer Defeated

New Mexicans last month reelected a Democratic governor. Jack M. Campbell, who said he would veto any "right-to-work" law, and defeated a U.S. senator, Edwin L. Mecham (R), who had sponsored an unsuccessful "right-to-work" bill when he was a member of the state legislature.

Campbell reiterated his opposition to "right-to-work" in a statement in which he termed it "poor legislation from the standpoint of economic progress." Union security, he said, "should be the subject of open collective bargaining."

House Speaker Bruce King (D) joined the governor in denouncing the campaign. He helped defeat "work" bills in the 1963 and 1959 legislatures.

Faced with the threat of a veto, the "work" forces are expected to seek passage of a joint resolution, not requiring the governor's signature, which would submit the issue to referendum. This was done in 1948, when the proposal was rejected by a 3-2 margin.

Nearby Oklahoma was the last major "right-to-work" target.

But voters there rejected a constitutional amendment barring the union shop in a referendum last spring.

While seeking to extend the ban on the union shop beyond the present 20 states which have such laws, the National Right to Work Committee is also—in its own words—"spearheading the nationwide fight for the preservation of Sec. 14b" of the Taft-Hartley Act. This is the provision which enables states to nullify national labor policy by prohibiting union shop agreements. Its repeal is the top priority item on the AFL-CIO's legislatives program.

The "right-to-work" committee said it has prepared advertisements, brochures, handbills and a new motion picture as part of its special "defense kit."

SILVER TRAY was presented by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler to Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee at a meeting of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee in recognition of his many years of service to the cause of "human freedom and equality for all." Shown at the meeting are, from left, Assistant Dir. William E. Pollard of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, which Shishkin formerly headed; Dir. Donald Slaiman; Dean Clewes of the Steelworkers; Sec. Joseph D. Keenan of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Vice Pres. Robert Powell of the Laborers; Schnitzler; Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Stagehands; AFL-CIO Assistant Civil Rights Dir. Walter G. Davis; Shishkin; Vice Pres. Charles Zimmerman of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Vice Pres. Louis Simon of the Clothing Workers.

More U.S. Aid Urged to Fight Mental Illness

Ocean City, Md.—Increased federal aid to meet the mental health needs of "all our people" was urged by AFL-CIO Community Services Dir. Leo Perlis in the keynote address at the Maryland State Workshop Conference on Mental Health here.

He proposed a seven-point program for the utilization of federal funds ranging from an orthopsychiatric approach to mental illness generally to broad programs of training, treatment, research and physical facilities.

Perlis also said there should be increased action for better mental health facilities through collective bargaining, experimental community health insurance plans, and pioneer efforts in union halls, plants and neighborhoods to show that mental illness is a disease rather than a shame.

"Certainly we don't want a tranquilized America in a cold war, a tranquilized labor movement at the collective bargaining table or a tranquilized Uncle Tom in Mississippi or Harlem," he said, "but we must find ourselves serenely as individuals, as human beings, as black and as white, as parents, as children, as labor and management, as creative Americans in a very frightening, complicated, complex, uncertain world."

Defense Cuts Bring Halt To Hirings

The Defense Dept. announced it has ordered a freeze on new hiring to provide job transfer opportunities for workers in bases being shut down as an economy move.

The hiring freeze was among the steps which had been urged by the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Council and other union groups representing government employes.

Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara now says that only 28,500 civilian jobs will be eliminated in the closing of 80 bases in the United States and 15 overseas. The earlier figure of 63,000 which he announced, McNamara said, includes military personnel — who presumably, will be shifted to other assignments and not released from service.

The government has promised to find jobs for all career employes affected by the shutdowns —provided they are willing to move to another city if no employment is available nearby. The Defense Dept. said it will pay moving expenses. An automated locator list for nationwide job vacancies has been set up in cooperation with the U.S. Civil Service Commission.

Pres. A. J. Hayes of the Machinists recently wired Pres. Johnson urging a longer phase-out period for the closing of the installation. This has been done in a few cases, notably the Portsmouth, N. H., shipyard where a 10-year phaseout is scheduled. But Hayes pointed out that other closings, to take place within a few months, give workers "little opportunity for adjustment or new jobs."

Hayes stressed that "most of these workers have spent their entire lives in one location" and would find it difficult to uproot their families for a sudden move.

Apprenticeship Posts Filled by Wirtz

William C. Webb, who was an international representative of the Molders when he joined the Labor Dept. in 1941, has been named regional director in the Cleveland office of the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, covering Ohio, Michigan and Kentucky.

At the same time Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced the appointment of Thomas Augustine, now with the bureau's Washington staff, as director of the Chicago regional office serving Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin. Augustine is a former vocational director of the Pittsburgh Urban League.

11 Central Bodies Map Joint Appalachia Effort

The AFL-CIO Appalachian Council has been set up by the central labor bodies of 11 states to coordinate the role of trade unions in revitalizing the economically depressed eastern mountain area.

The founding meeting, in Washington, approved later inclusion of city central bodies, international and local unions and their regional councils in labor's drive to help implement the Appalachian program, expected to be passed by Congress early in its coming session.

The full program of the new council has not yet been developed, but its first task will be to advise the 2.5 million union members—and other workers—in the Appalachian area of the programs currently under way and to assist in developing leadership to carry them out.

The need for a regional group to unite labor's efforts in the campaign to strengthen Appalachia's economy was developed at a preliminary meeting last October in Charleston, W. Va.

The council is expected to work with the Departments of Health, Education & Welfare and of Labor, the Area Redevelopment Administration, the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Appalachian Regional Commission, which will be created by Congress under the proposed legislation.

Pres. Miles C. Stanley of the West Virginia AFL-CIO was elected council chairman and will establish offices in Charleston. Pres. Harry Boyer of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO was named vice chairman and Sec.-Treas. Robert D. Bollard of the Ohio AFL-CIO was chosen secretary-treasurer.

The executive committee is composed of Exec. Sec.-Treas. Sam Ezelle of the Kentucky AFL-CIO; Pres. Charles A. Della of the Maryland State & D. C. AFL-CIO and Pres. Barney Weeks of the Alabama AFL-CIO, plus the officers.

Other board members are Pres. Sinway Young of the South Carolina AFL-CIO; Pres. Matthew Lynch of the Tennessee AFL-CIO; Pres. W. M. Barbee of the North Carolina AFL-CIO and Pres. W. H. Montague, Sr., of the Georgia AFL-CIO.

growth. Efforts to stimulate economic growth, he declared, "have top priority among the measures required to accomplish an effective adjustment to automation."

Irving Bluestone, administrative assistant to Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther, said in another conference paper that collective bargaining "must do its share . . . toward alleviating the depressing human problems that an automated society must resolve." At the same time he stressed that collective bargaining alone can't do the job "for these are national problems which require national solutions."

Bluestone called on government to play "a far greater role than it has hitherto done" to sustain a full employment economy. This, he said, "means a higher level of federal expenditures for the war on poverty, for education, public works, area redevelopment, urban renewal, public housing and our other pressing social needs."

Mrs. Wurster Dies, Labor Housing Adviser

Mrs. Catherine Bauer Wurster, nationally-known housing and planning authority died recently while hiking in the mountains near Mill Valley, Calif. She had been a housing adviser to organized labor for more than 30 years.

She helped organize and was first executive secretary of the Labor Housing Conference, which beginning in 1934 consolidated labor initiative and support behind a national program of low-rent housing and slum clearance. She also was one of the founders of the National Public Housing Conference, out of which grew the National Housing Conference. At the time of her death she was associate dean of the University of California School of Architecture at Berkeley.

Human Rights Day Seen Of 'Special Significance'

The 16th anniversary of United Nations Human Rights Day on Dec. 10 was hailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as having "special and heartwarming significance" for Americans because of the recent enactment of the Civil Rights Act.

The legislation has written into "clear, enforceable law" the basic principles of equal rights and equal opportunity which, he said, have been "inherently American since the Declaration of Independence."

"It can rightly be said that this action was long overdue," he added. "Yet the peoples of the world should know, as Americans know, that equal rights and equal opportunities have been realities in large areas of this nation for many years. The law was needed not to correct a universal injustice, but to insure that justice will henceforth be universal."

The labor movement is proud of its role in securing passage of the law, Meany said, and is now dedicated "to making it truly meaningful through the creation of a full employment economy, an economy in which there are jobs at good wages for all."

"Only in this way can human rights, equal rights, be translated from theory to practice," he said.

"It is our hope that other nations around the world which subscribe to the UN Declaration of Human Rights as it was eloquently proclaimed 16 years ago will find inspiration in the progress the U.S. has made in the last year, and in the far greater progress which, we are confident, is now assured."

4-Year Dock Pact Protects Jobs, Pay

Agreement Heads Off Walkout

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—The Longshoremen and the New York Shipping Association reached agreement here on a four-year contract settlement providing a guaranteed annual wage, protection of jobs, and a package of wage and welfare benefits totaling 80 cents an hour.

The settlement, if approved by ILA members, will give 90,000 dockworkers a guarantee of 1,600 hours of work a year, or $5,856 at the new wage rates. It will also transform the status of longshoremen from casual laborers to guaranteed wage workers, said ILA Pres. T. W. "Teddy" Gleason.

The pact headed off a strike set for Dec. 20. It will be put to membership vote after ILA locals from Searsport, Me., to Brownsville, Tex., have negotiated local port conditions. To allow time for those negotiations, the union extended the expiration date of the master dock agreement to Jan. 11.

In Washington, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said the nation "owes a debt of gratitude" to both labor and management negotiators for helping achieve by their own efforts "an extended period of stability in the longshore industry along the North Atlantic Coast."

Gleason said Asst. Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds laid the foundation for the settlement and suggested a formula, now in the new agreement, for settling the trouble-

Hot Political Battle:

Redistricting Issue In 13 Legislatures

By David L. Perlman

Reapportionment of state legislatures is a hot political issue in at least 13 states, including two in which "lame duck" Republicans raced the clock to put through their own plans before newly-elected Democrats take office.

New York's legislature, which will switch in January from Republican to Democratic control, was summoned into special session by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) to adopt a GOP-designed reapportionment plan before its term of office expires.

The outgoing Ohio legislature, heavily Republican, approved a partisan reapportionment plan which will be submitted to the voters next spring.

In Connecticut, where Democrats and Republicans each control one house of the legislature, a court-ordered special session was reported near agreement on a reapportionment proposal.

Cities Benefit Most

With courts overseeing the reapportionment procedure in most states, the inevitable result appeared to be a strengthening of city and suburban representation, and a weakening of traditional small town and rural domination. However, the drawing of district lines, combined with some deviation from "ideal" standards of representation, allowed an opportunity for political advantage to the party with the votes to push through its own reapportionment plan.

Meanwhile the Council of State Governments threw its support behind a congressional drive for a constitutional amendment which would modify the Supreme Court's one man, one vote criteria for legislative representation. It was this decision, handed down last June in an amplification of a 1962 ruling, which set the stage for the current round of reapportionment actions.

The council's biennial General Assembly of the States endorsed a labor-opposed amendment which would enable one house of a legislature to be apportioned on a basis other than population. The state government group generally reflects the rural domination of most existing legislatures.

Current and recent state reapportionment developments include:

California—A three-judge federal court ordered the California legislature to make reapportionment its "first order of business" in January, with a deadline of July 1, 1965. Chief target is the 40-member Senate, which now has one senator from each county. Thus Los Angeles County, with 40 percent of the state's population, has only 2.5 percent representation in the Senate.

Connecticut—The election for the legislature was cancelled by court order this fall after a special session failed to agree on a redistricting plan. The holdover Democratic Senate and Republican House are trying again, and reportedly are closer to agreement. The state may face three elections this year to make up for the one it missed in November—for delegates to a constitutional convention formally to adopt the reapportionment plan, a referendum to approve the constitutional changes and, finally, election of the new legislature.

Illinois—Official returns confirmed a Democratic sweep in a unique at-large election to the Illinois House in which each party nominated 118 candidates, leaving

NLRB Decision:

'Boulwarism' Ruled Unfair Bargaining

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled that the General Electric Co. did not bargain in good faith with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in 1960 and found it guilty of unfair labor practices.

In a landmark decision, a board majority ruled that the largest U.S. electrical manufacturer used a take-it-or-leave-it technique that did not meet the law's requirements for "true collective bargaining."

Good-faith bargaining, the majority noted, requires both union and management to recognize that collective bargaining "is a shared process . . . in which each party has the right to play an active role."

It was out of bounds, the board held, for GE to "mount a campaign" before and after 1960 negotiations to "disparage and discredit" the union in the eyes of its members, to seek to persuade the employes to pressure the union to submit to the will of the employer, and to create the impression that the employer rather than the union is the "true protector of the employes' interests."

The law, said the board, requires the employer to "deal with the employes through the union, and not with the union through the employes."

GE and IUE both filed appeals of the decision in separate federal courts for different reasons—GE on the complaint that it "rewrites the law" and would undermine bargaining and free speech, the union because the order "does not go far enough."

But IUE Pres. James B. Carey said the ruling will, if observed by other employers, go a long way toward improving the labor-relations climate.

GE management used the bargaining technique which the board has found unlawful in 1960 and 1963. A second unfair practice charge, filed by the IUE after 1963 negotiations, is pending before the NLRB general counsel.

'Boulwarism'

The unions call GE's bargaining method "Boulwarism," after Lemuel R. Boulware, a company vice president for many years until his retirement. GE calls its technique the "fair and firm offer" approach and denies the NLRB has any right to regulate its bargaining methods.

Three board members signed the majority opinion—Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Members John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown. Member Howard Jenkins, Jr., wrote a concurring opinion faulting the company's conduct but not

AFL-CIO, President Discuss Key Issues

Organized labor presented its views to Pres. Johnson "on everything under the sun," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told reporters following a two-hour meeting at the White House.

Meany said he and other federation officials had met with the President and his key aides to discuss all the problems facing the nation and all the legislation proposed to overcome them.

"We discussed in particular the long-term problem of unemployment," he said, noting that while increases in the gross national product over the past year had helped cut joblessness somewhat, it still remains at about 5 percent.

The labor officials, Meany said, also voiced their concern over the possibility of a slackening in the nation's economic growth during the next year and stressed the need to find employment and educational opportunities for the 3.8 million young people who will reach the age of 18 over the year—an increase of a million over 1964.

Contract-Out Ruling Backs Union, Board

The Supreme Court has ruled unanimously, in a landmark labor-management case, that a California firm violated the law when it refused to bargain with a union about the contracting-out of work performed for more than 20 years by union members.

The firm was Fibreboard Paper Products, Inc., Emeryville, Calif., and the union was Steelworkers Local 1304. The court, with Justice Arthur J. Goldberg not participating, agreed that management had a statutory duty to bargain with Local 1304 before awarding a contract for maintenance work to an "outside" firm. The eight justices upheld findings to that effect by the National Labor Relations Board and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

In other cases of labor interest the court:

Strike Date Postponed By 3 Rail Unions

Chicago—Three railroad shopcraft unions, restrained by court order from striking for 10 days, announced they will postpone any strike action until after Jan. 1 to avoid inconveniencing holiday travelers.

U.S. Dist. Judge Sam Perry heard arguments for and against the petition of 187 U.S. railroads for a permanent injunction against a strike by the Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who have been trying for 18 months to get better wages for skilled craftsmen.

The judge indicated he needs time to hear more evidence and consider the issues. He issued a temporary order expiring Christmas Eve and union officers agreed to defer any necessary action for the entire holiday period.

The unions contend the court cannot issue a no-strike injunction under the Norris-LaGuardia Act. The railroads argue that only the AFL-CIO Railway Employes' Dept. has the legal right to represent the 55,000 shopcraft workers.

The three unions decided to fight alone when three other shopcrafts accepter a wage increase of 9 cents an hour for each year of a three-year contract. They set a Dec. 15 walkout date but called it off when management got a restraining order.

Dock Pact Reached Near Strike Deadline

some problem of dock gang sizes. Reynolds worked with the parties for more than a year, supervised a Labor Dept. study of a dozen ports, and got the parties back to the bargaining table after a one-day walkout Sept. 30.

The New York port agreement usually sets the pattern for settlements in other ports, Gleason said. But one ILA local—in New Orleans—was reported unwilling to agree to the reduction in gang sizes worked out for the port of New York—from 20 men on general cargo to 18 in 1966 and to 17 on Oct. 1, 1967.

Pres. Alfred Chittenden of ILA Local 1418 told newsmen that negotiations with New Orleans dock operators have got "no place at all" to date.

The New York pact provided:

- Wage increases of 10 cents an hour this year and next, another 8 cents in 1966 and again in 1967.
- A fourth week of vacation after 12 years of service, paid for by company contributions of 6 cents an hour into the vacation fund.
- Medical benefit improvements estimated to cost an additional 8 cents an hour.
- Three additional paid holidays to a total of 12 at an employer cost of 6 cents an hour. New Year's Day, Decoration Day and Election Day were added.
- Pension payment increases, at a cost of 24 cents. That will raise the pension benefit to $125 a month as of next Apr. 1 and to $175 on Oct. 1, 1966, with dockers' widows entitled to a 50 percent payment if a worker dies.

Pension Top $369

With social security, a longshoreman and his wife can get retirement benefits of $369 a month under the new pact, according to Gleason.

The pension terms allow early retirement at age 62 without reduction of benefits.

Another feature was an agreement to close the hiring register in this port, which has some 24,000 registered longshoremen. Union and management agreed to seek the consent of the New York and New Jersey legislatures to the closing, which will permit the supply of workers to be reduced by attrition—death, retirement or resignation.

The parties will set up a joint committee which will patrol Waterfront Commission hiring halls to see that the work guarantees of the contract are observed.

Economic features of the contract will affect 90,000 men on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, if terms are approved at all ports. Another 25,000 may benefit from the "pattern" settlement in Great Lakes, Canadian and Puerto Rican ports, the ILA president said.

its bargaining techniques. Member Boyd Leedom joined the majority in finding two specific law violations but dissented in part, on the bad-faith finding.

Leedom's term expired the day the decision was made public. Pres. Johnson has not announced whether he will retain or replace Leedom, the last of the Eisenhower-era board members except for Fanning.

Entire Approach Cited

The majority based its decision on GE's "entire course of conduct, its failure to furnish information asked by the union, its attempts to deal separately with IUE locals and to bypass the national bargaining committee, the manner of its presentation of an accident insurance proposal, and the disparagement of the union as bargaining representative" in its employe publications.

Other factors were GE's conduct of the negotiations themselves, and its "attitude or approach as revealed by all these factors," the majority wrote.

They added in answer to a point made by Jenkins:

"Nothing in our decision bans fact-gathering or any specific methods of formulating proposals. We prescribe no time-table for negotiators. We lay down no rules as to any required substance or content of agreements. Our decision rests" upon the totality of the company's conduct.

The majority affirmed the findings of Arthur Leff, former trial examiner who was made special counsel for the NLRB chairman following a report made Apr. 1, 1963, after a year of hearings.

Upholding Leff, the majority agreed that GE:

- Interfered with and coerced employes in their right to self-organization.
- Broke the law by refusing to reinstate 18 unfair labor practice strikers at GE's plant in Augusta, Ga., in 1960.
- Attempted to deal separately with IUE locals during national bargaining and solicited locals to abandon or refrain from supporting IUE's October 1960 strike.
- Presented IUE a personal accident insurance proposal on a this-or-nothing basis.
- Failed to furnish information necessary to the union for national level bargaining.

GE's Unilateral View

The company regards itself, the NLRB majority wrote, as a "sort of administrative body which has the unilateral responsibility for determining wages and working conditions." It looks on the union's role as that of a kind of adviser.

"Collective bargaining" as the company practices it, the board declared, is a mere formality, resembling that of a party who enters negotiations resolved "not to budge from an initial opinion," an attitude the majority found "inconsistent with good-faith bargaining."

"In short, both major facets of the respondent's 1960 'bargaining' technique, its campaign among the employes and its conduct at the bargaining table, complementing each other, were calculated to disparage the union and to impose without substantial alteration" the company's "fair and firm" offer, rather than to satisfy the "true standards of good-faith collective bargaining" required by the law, said the majority.

8 Million Under 40 Hours:

Workweek Shortens 'Gradually, Steadily'

"Gradually and steadily" American workers are moving towards a shorter workweek.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Research reports that 8 million persons presently are on a basic workweek of under 40 hours, while many others have had their working time reduced through longer vacations, more holidays or paid lunch periods.

The department's findings make up the Collective Bargaining Report feature of the December issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO magazine.

Geographically the Northeast has led the way, with 62 percent of office employes in the region and 11 percent of plant workers on a workweek of less than 40 hours.

Some short workweeks date back to "work-sharing" experiments of the depression era, but most are of recent vintage.

"The reduction of hours under collective bargaining in the 1960s," the Federationist analyses, "is not taking place dramatically and suddenly. Rather the reductions are taking place in small steps in individual contracts."

As an example, the article cites a Chemical Workers' contract providing a 10-minute-a-day reduction in working time during each year of a three-year agreement.

Nearly all printing trades workers —98 percent of them—are working less than 40 hours, with about one-fourth at 35 hours. In nearly all cases, the reduction was first to 38.75 hours and then to 37.5 hours.

The Ladies' Garment Workers has had a 35-hour workweek in the New York area since the 1930s, and, in the past 10 years has extended it so that it now covers some 97 percent of the union's membership in the United States.

A growing number of union construction workers—although still a minority—work less than 40 hours. Labor Dept. studies show some 13 percent of retail employes and 17 percent of full-time restaurant employes working less than 40 hours. An estimated one-third of office employes are on a less-than-40-hours workweek.

Large percentages of workers in the brewing, tobacco, rubber, fur, baking and telephone industries have a basic workweek of less than 40 hours.

In addition to the sabbatical vacations introduced in the steel, aluminum and can industries, longer vacations and more holidays continue to show up in union contracts for a "hidden" reduction in working hours. So have such fringe items as additional relief time.

Hotel Week Cut

More than 40 percent of hotel workers are on a schedule of less than 40 hours a week. New York City's Hotel Trades Council won a 35-hour week (down from 40 hours with no pay cut) as of last June. In Chicago, the Building Service Employes' contract with the Chicago Residential Hotel Association cut the workweek from six days and 45 hours to five days and 37.5 hours.

The Dept. of Research analysis predicts that continual improvement in the reduction of hours of work without cutting weekly pay promises to become the pattern for the 60s' second half.

Accompanying the drive for shorter hours through collective bargaining is, of course, labor's push for establishment of a basic 35-hour week for all workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Contracting Work Out Subject to Bargaining

that the W. W. Kimball Co. must arbitrate with the Carpenters over job rights of employes involved when the firm moved its piano plant from Chicago to French Lick, Ind.

- Refused to review a 2d Circuit Court of Appeals decision permitting United Aircraft Corp. to press two suits for damages against the Machinists in the Connecticut state courts. The union and the firm sued each other after a 1960 strike.

Chief Justice Earl Warren said in Fibreboard that "we are . . . not expanding the scope of mandatory bargaining to hold . . . that the type of 'contracting-out' involved in this case—the replacement of employes in the existing bargaining unit with those of an independent contractor to do the same work under similar conditions of employment—is a statutory subject of collective bargaining."

The ruling will compel Fibreboard to re-constitute the maintenance department it abolished in 1959, restore the USWA members to their former positions or equivalent ones, give them back pay from Sept. 18, 1962—the date of an NLRB decision in the case—and bargain with the union.

The decision, Warren wrote, "need not and does not encompass other forms of 'contracting-out' or 'subcontracting' which arise daily in our complex economy."

Justice Potter Stewart wrote a concurring opinion in which Justices William O. Douglas and John M. Harlan joined. He stressed the point that the decision was confined to the facts in that case only.

Many management decisions affect the job security of employes, Stewart wrote, citing advertising expenditures, product design, financing and sales. Yet it is "hardly conceivable" that such decisions so involve conditions of employment that they must be negotiated with a union, he observed.

Started in 1959

The case started when the union notified the firm of its desire to reopen the contract that had originated in 1937, and asked for a meeting.

No parley was held until July 27, 1959, four days before the contract expiration date. At the meeting the firm delivered a letter saying it had made a study of maintenance cost reduction and had decided to hire a private contractor effective Aug. 1, 1959. It added:

"In these circumstances, we are sure you will realize that negotiation of a new contract would be pointless. However, if you have any questions, we will be glad to discuss them with you."

The union filed an unfair labor practice charge over management's refusal to bargain and the NLRB issued a complaint and finally a board order. By a 2-1 vote in 1962, the board reversed a prior decision by the Eisenhower-era board and ordered Fibreboard to bargain with the union.

In Darlington Case:

Labor, U. S. Urge Court Rule Against Anti-Union Closing

Labor and government attorneys have urged the U.S. Supreme Court to reverse a lower court ruling that an employer has an "absolute" right to go out of business to avoid bargaining with a union.

The high court heard oral arguments in the landmark case involving the Darlington Manufacturing Co., Darlington, S. C., which closed its doors and threw its 520 employes out of work in the fall of 1956 shortly after the Textile Workers Union of America had won a representation election.

The Darlington mills were part of the vast non-union textile network of Deering, Milliken & Co., headed by Roger Milliken, long a leader of "right-to-work" forces in South Carolina.

First Ruling in 1962

The National Labor Relations Board ruled in October 1962, following seven years of proceedings before trial examiners and the board itself, that the shutdown was an illegal attempt to avoid dealing with the union. The board rejected management's contention that Darlington was a separate enterprise not related to the Deering, Milliken chain. It ordered the parent firm to rehire the fired Darlington workers at other plants in the chain or, if no jobs were available, to put them on a preferential hiring list and make good their lost pay until they were rehired.

In December 1963, however, the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the board ruling. In a 3-2 decision, the court held that Darlington had an "absolute prerogative" to go out of business completely "or to discontinue in part, permanently at any time," even if the shutdown was for anti-union reasons.

It is this ruling that the Supreme Court is now asked to reverse.

Dominick L. Manoli, NLRB associate general counsel, told the high court that Milliken himself had testified that the closing of the Darlington plant was triggered by the TWUA election victory. He said the board's position that the shutdown amounted to illegal discrimination for union activity was completely consistent with past board rulings where the discrimination took the form of temporary shutdowns to replace union help, transfer of work to non-union divisions, or subcontracting of work to independent employers.

Irving Abrahamson, TWUA counsel, urged the court to impose a stronger remedy than that ordered by the NLRB. Charging that merely to order reinstatement and back pay would still leave Darlington "a Lidice or Mohawk Valley," Abrahamson argued that Deering, Milliken should be required to locate its next mill in the town. He noted that the firm had built 10 new mills in the past 10 years.

Attack on Union 'Deliberate'

He declared that Milliken had deliberately set out "to destroy the union" and asked:

"What remedy is it that allows the employer to retain the fruits of his unlawful conduct?"

The AFL-CIO, in an earlier supporting brief, had endorsed the TWUA proposal that the company be ordered to re-establish a mill in Darlington.

"When an employer engages in a shutdown in violation of the act," the federation said, "he can properly be ordered to resume operations, just as employes who engage in a forbidden strike can be ordered to resume work."

On the question of the company's basic unlawful conduct, the AFL-CIO said it would be absurd to hold that a threat to close the plant if the union won representation rights is a violation of the law, but the actual closing is not.

"The closing, or subcontracting, or transfer of an operation to another location, as a reprisal against employes for union activity, does not differ in substance from the naked discharge of employes for engaging in union activity," the brief declared.

Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.), representing the company, argued that any individual has a constitutional right to go out of business, but beyond that Darlington had sufficient economic reasons to shut down.

"There were no discharges here for union activity; there were discharges because services were no longer needed because a mill was going out of business," Ervin contended.

Although it is unusual for a U.S. senator to argue a case before the Supreme Court, Ervin said he knew of no legal impediment to his appearance and that it was "harmonious with my obligation as a senator" to uphold the constitution.

Company Lawyer Heard

Another company attorney, Stuart N. Updike, also urged that the lower court be upheld on its ruling that a company may go out of business for any reasons without violating the Taft-Hartley Act.

Should the Supreme Court reverse that decision, he proposed that it remand the question of ownership of the Darlington mills and the liability of Deering, Milliken to the 4th Circuit Court for review.

Abrahamson earlier had appealed to the Supreme Court justices to make their own finding on the ownership question in the interest of "justice" and in view of the eight years that have passed since the shutdown.

Noting that the Darlington plant was one of four Deering, Milliken mills that produced print cloth, he compared its closing to the shutdown of a department by an isolated company.

Manoli told the court there was ample evidence of interlocking control and directorates among the 17 companies in which the Milliken family has majority holdings and which operate the 27 mills in the Deering, Milliken chain.

He said Roger Milliken is the "directing genius of the enterprise, holds the reins of the entire empire in his hands," has "pervasive control," and made the decision to close the Darlington mills.

"The price of present or continued work in the Deering, Milliken complex is the surrender of [workers] rights under the [Taft-Hartley] act, and an employer can't do this," the NLRB attorney declared.

FIRST OF A MILLION names sought on petitions backing Kingsport, Tenn., Press strikers is affixed by workers at AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to launch national drive. Petitions promise that signers will not buy books produced at Kingsport Press while strike of 1,200 workers continues for acceptable contract. The strike began Mar. 11, 1963. Left to right are Peggy King, Loraine Lenhart and Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of Union Label Dept., and Robert Munson of Bookbinders.

Petition Drive to Back Kingsport Press Strike

The AFL-CIO's Union Label & Service Trades Dept. has launched a drive for 1 million signatures on petitions supporting 1,200 union members in the 21st month of a strike against the Kingsport, Tenn., Press.

The department, in cooperation with the five unions which back the strikers, is asking more than 1,700 label councils, women's auxiliaries and other union bodies to circulate the petitions and to return the signatures by Jan. 15.

That will be followed, said Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the department, by "one great moment of truth" for the publishers who will be presented with petitions proclaiming:

"More than 1 million of your potential customers will not buy your books unless produced under conditions fair to the people who manufacture them."

Employes of Kingsport Press, the nation's largest manufactory of hard-cover books, have been walking the picket line since Mar. 11, 1963, for fair contract conditions. Management has continued to operate at a reduced pace by using supervisors and strikebreakers.

The petition forms declare that "We . . . do pledge that we will not purchase books which have been produced, in whole or in part, by strikebreakers at Kingsport Press, Inc." They add:

"And in particular we pledge not to purchase Great Books of the Western World or Britannica, Jr., published by Encyclopaedia Britannica, Inc.; the World Book Encyclopedia or the Childcraft series, published by Field Enterprises Educational Corp.; Book of Knowledge Encyclopedia, Grolier Council Encyclopedia, or English Lands and People, published by Grolier, Inc."

Petition signers also call on the publishers to take "all possible steps to influence settlement of this labor dispute, or to place their printing and binding orders in manufacturing plants maintaining a fair relationship" with their employes.

The unions have warned that encyclopedia salesmen are soliciting labor families and unions to join in a sales promotion program for one of the publications produced in part at Kingsport.

The Allied Kingsport Press Unions—the Bookbinders, Pressmen, Stereotypers, Machinists and Typographical unions—have asked those interested to contact any of the unions, or the allied organization, at PO Box 1097, Kingsport, Tenn. R. W. Ayers is secretary-treasurer.

Strikebreakers Working

Lewis said in a letter announcing the petition drive that the strike has continued so long because Kingsport Press has recruited strikebreakers to man its equipment, and because some publishers continue to place part of their printing and binding orders with the struck firm.

The unions and the AFL-CIO have given strong backing to the strikers but the main strength of the labor movement, Lewis declared, "rests upon the united action of union members, their families and sympathizers in refusing to purchase unfair products."

If the Kingsport petitions are effective, their use may point the way to make other employers conscious of the need to produce under fair conditions, Lewis said.

Court Asked to Outlaw Local Handbilling Ban

Jackson, Miss.—The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has asked the U.S. District Court here to enjoin the city of Jackson from enforcing an anti-handbilling ordinance under which the city has repeatedly jailed IBEW organizers.

Named in the suit brought by the 850,000-member union are Jackson Mayor Allen C. Thompson, Commissioners D. L. Luckey and Thomas Marshall and Police Chief W. D. Rayfield.

The IBEW accused the city officials of acting unconstitutionally in abridging the right of free speech by jailing the organizers for handbilling.

The union said police arrested two of its organizer and two discharged employes of Zinsco Electrical Products of Mississippi, Inc., on charges of violating a city ordinance prohibiting handbilling. One was convicted in the Jackson Police Court, but when the IBEW sought an appeal to the county court in constitutional grounds, the city nolprossed the case, causing its dismissal and preventing a hearing in the county court.

Union attorneys said the suit was brought under applicable federal statutes, including the so-called Ku Klux Klan federal civil rights act, which makes it a crime to conspire to deprive anyone of his civil rights. This is the federal law under which 21 persons were arrested earlier this month on charges growing out of the murder of three civil rights workers near Philadelphia, Miss.

Firm Organized Elsewhere

Zinsco, at whose plant the handbilling arrests occurred, had contracts with the IBEW covering its workers in Los Angeles and Sacramento, but has been resisting organization of its 150 employes in Jackson, the union said. The company manufactures switchboards and other electrical products.

The union has 22 locals in Jackson and 13 other Mississippi cities.

IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman, commenting on Jackson police actions, said it was not in the interest of the state to preserve a low-wage economy. It has been the union's objective in its collective bargaining relationships in Mississippi, he said, to raise wages, living standards and general purchasing power.

Representing the IBEW in the case is Dixon L. Pyles, of Pyles & Tucker, Jackson. Associated in the proceedings are Sherman, Dunn & Sickles of Washington, D. C., general counsel for the union.

Charter Guarantees Prevailing Wage

Oakland, Calif.—The City Council has agreed to include a prevailing wage guarantee in a new city charter to be submitted to voters in 1965.

The present charter contains a prevailing wage clause but the new section will cover not only construction workers, as at present, but also other workers employed by the city, officers of the Building & Construction Trades Council reported.

October Layoff Rate Lowest in 8 Years

The factory layoff rate for October, seasonally adjusted, was at the lowest October level in eight years, the Labor Dept. has reported. At 15 per 1,000 it was down three points from the year-ago level.

In a report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the department said the hiring rate dropped from 48 per 1,000 in September to 39 for October—the usual seasonal cutback. At 15 per 1,000 the seasonally adjusted quit rate was unchanged.

Illinois Bell Pact Ratified By IBEW Unit

Chicago — Nearly 11,000 employes of the Illinois Bell Telephone Co. will get raises of $2.10 to $5 a week under a contract approved in a referendum vote by members of System Council T-4 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The increases are retroactive to Nov. 22. The union also won a wage reopening proviso for next August; reclassification of Canton, Kankakee and 39 other towns; and upgrading for one group of IBEW-represented workers.

The settlement was reached after three months of bargaining climaxed by the serving of a strike notice, a company suit to bar Illinois State Labor Dir. John Cullerton from holding public hearings at the request of the union, and a revised final offer from the firm.

The union bargaining committee sent the offer to referendum without a recommendation. It said about 70 percent of its members, who are installers and maintenance workers in Illinois and Indiana, will get $5 weekly raises under the approved agreement.

Auto Union Official on Youth Hostels Board

Olga M. Madar, director of the Auto Workers' Recreation Dept., has been named to the national board of directors of American Youth Hostels. The hostels provide simple and inexpensive overnight accommodations for travelers in scenic and historic areas.

Christmas 1964

ON THIS CHRISTMAS 1964 the country has moved a step nearer the full realization of good will toward men as a daily reality.

The U.S. Supreme Court decision upholding the constitutionality of the public accommodations section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 is the capstone to a year of heroic achievement in the struggle for equal rights for all.

The passage of the Civil Rights Act, the overwhelming support at the polls for the men who fought for its adoption and now the court decision unanimously declaring the validity of one of its key sections give a more profound meaning to this Christmas.

IT IS AS CLEAR on this Christmas as it was on Christmas 1945, immediately after the end of World War II, and every Christmas since that there is no alternative to peace in this age of intercontinental missiles and space satellites; peace today is a condition of survival.

If the free world continues to have faith in its own institutions a lasting peace can be achieved. The free world has the resources, the manpower, the desire to rid the world of hunger and disease and to provide the basis of social justice so that all men can taste of bread and freedom.

The subversion of the Communist conspiracy can only take in those who put a cheap price on freedom, liberty and human dignity. The terror of nuclear bombs can only intimidate the weak and those of feeble faith.

IN THE UNITED STATES the spirit of the holiday season may reach out for a moment to comfort the unemployed, the partially employed, the one-fifth of the nation's people eking out a bare existence, caught in the web of poverty spun by discrimination, illiteracy and age.

It is our task to turn to with a will and vigor to create the programs and plans that will forever abolish poverty and want in the most prosperous nation in the world. A fleeting moment of holiday spirit is no answer for those who must return to the grim, despairing world they know so well.

On this Christmas there is a new hope in the land that the promise that first shone forth in Bethlehem will become a reality before too many more Christmases pass.

The forces that threaten the peace have been contained and turned back. Those in the U. S. who would reject the progress of three decades toward social justice and equal rights have been themselves rejected.

On this Christmas we can rejoice in our progress toward the universal goal and while rejoicing remember the distance yet to be traveled.

There'll Be Some Changes Made:

GOP Leaders' Miscalculation Blamed for Election Day Rout

The crisis in the Republican Party brought on by the shattering defeat of Sen. Barry M. Goldwater and the GOP losses in the House is a major political concern for the nation. An analysis of how the Republican Party reached its present state is contained in the following excerpts of an article in the December 1964 AFL-CIO American Federationist by Willard Shelton, managing editor of the AFL-CIO News, who has covered a half-dozen presidential campaigns.

THE PRECISE MOMENT when Sen. Goldwater lost the 1964 election is the subject of debate among political observers. Some say it was in the New Hampshire primary, decided last Mar. 10 when winter snows still lay deep on the New England hills and when the Senator's discomfort and incapacities in serious debate on national issues were first exposed to a national audience.

Others say it was when the Goldwater zealots at the July nominating convention booed and almost howled down Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York, who took the rostrum to propose amendments to the Goldwater platform.

Others say it was when the senator himself, appearing before the convention after his triumph, turned a grim visage on his opponents and lashed them mercilessly with his aphorism, "extremism in the defense of freedom is no vice; moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue."

This observer would say it was total miscalculation on the part of the Goldwater zealots before, during and after the convention, that brought disaster to the Republican Party. A miscalculation by the Johnny-come-lately Republicans of the South, who imagined their own antagonism to the federal government was the mood of the country. A miscalculation by the extremist right, deluded into thinking that if they could offer Goldwater, "a choice, not an echo," the whole nation would rise up and repudiate all the progress of the past 30 years in social gains, in welfare and education, in a responsible foreign policy.

Miscalculation, most of all, by the traditional leaders of the Republican Party, who share the blame, for they stood aside when Gov. Rockefeller, Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge and Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania obviously offered more as potential Republican leaders than the senator from Arizona.

There was gross negligence if not almost criminal culpability in the GOP's historic power centers and without such factors the Goldwater amateurs and self-deluders could never have seized control of the party of Abraham Lincoln.

The Republican Party in the aftermath faces a crisis of unprecedented proportions for a major party in this century. Defeat in itself is not a party disaster; one or the other must lose in every election and both Democrats and Republicans have survived severe defeats in recent years and come back to be victorious again. The nature of the 1964 GOP debacle and the default in responsible leadership create the crisis.

THE ONLY STATES the Republican ticket could win this year were the Dixiecrat states of 1948, suddenly turned Republican, and the unhappy state of Georgia, plus Goldwater's home state of Arizona. There would seem to be grave danger that a Republican Party based in Dixiecrat philosophy, in a lily-white doctrine, with Strom Thurmond of South Carolina as a self-asserted spokesman in the Senate, has little to offer.

Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, the Republican floor leader in the upper house of Congress, has lived up to bipartisan traditions in working toward ratification of the nuclear test-ban treaty and enactment of the civil rights bill. But he is not young, the forces at his command are reduced (32 GOP senators next year instead of 34, even counting Thurmond) and one can only hope his convention speech nominating Goldwater for the presidency was a piece of the familiar Dirksen pranksterism that apparently overcomes him occasionally. Most of the Republican senators whose names evoke national respect are veterans of many years; too many of the others moved voluntarily into pre-convention support of Goldwater, totally misreading the country's mood.

The Republican Party in the House is a shambles, its strength reduced from 178 members to 140, its formal leadership held by carryovers from the mid-thirties who in all their careers have had almost no experience in functioning creatively to put through an affirmative program designed by a Republican Administration—or to act responsibly in helping design and modify the programs of a Democratic Administration.

It is wholly unlikely that Republicans who survived the cataclysm this year will be content to go ahead with Floor Leader Charles A. Halleck, just at it is wholly unlikely that the GOP's 17 governors and its senators who must face the voters next time around will be content to enter the 1966 election with Goldwater's man, Dean Burch, as national committee chairman.

Morgan Says:

Attacks on United Nations Seen 'Bitter Harvest' of Exploitation

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

NEW YORK—The glass monument to mankind's hopes and good intentions, the United Nations building, still stands on the west bank of the East River in New York and it glittered magnificently in the cold December sunlight.

Inside there was, as usual, the pulse-quickening pageant of many peoples of different skin, different dress and different views parading amiably and purposefully through the corridors, the delegates' lounge, the council rooms and the vast, domed Assembly chamber. There was even an added inspiration to draw the attention of the UN officials and the constant surge of the sightseeing public. On the main floor of the secretariat building stands the magnificent new stained glass panel by the French artist, Marc Chagall, created as a memorial to the late UN Sec. Gen. Dag Hammarskjold and the 15 others who died with him.

Morgan

But the edifice of the UN has been under assault, politically and physically, inside and out. A bazooka shell was fired at the UN, apparently by a band of frustrated, furious and foolish anti-Castro Cuban refugees.

The shell fell short but the organization is driven by a larger issue centered on the tormented continent of Africa. The issue which cost Hammarskjold his life has now risen in the sinister form of racism, an unholy kind of war between white and black, with the Congo as the cockpit of conflict. And this time, irony of ironies, it is the spokesman for the African nationals who are the aggressors, reckless and irresponsible in their charges.

The Security Council chamber's circular blond wood table, around which the 11 members sit, has been in the middle of a maelstrom. Official after African official has stormed up it with extreme accusations against the "colonial powers," anachronistic as the term has come to be. Special venom was aimed at Belgium and the United States for the four-day operation begun Nov. 24 to rescue 2,000 missionaries and other individuals, of various nationalities including Congolese, from the savageries of the Congolese rebels.

The propagandists of Moscow and especially Peiping could only rub their hands in high glee, unplagued, one surmises, by any twinges of guilt even though their deliberate subversion contributed to the chaos. Indeed a UN force probably would still be in the Congo lending the government a stabilizing hand if the Soviet Union had not refused to pay its share of this peacekeeping assignment.

"Wanton aggression." ". . . deliberate massacre of Congolese people . . ." "massive cannibalism." A plot to use the UN as a "Trojan" horse in a racist attack to kill thousands of blacks. These were only some of the charges hurled at the US by fledgling African governments. With shock, anger and disbelief, Ambassador Adlai Stevenson cited and then rejected them in one of the strongest speeches he has ever made before the council. Never since the UN's inception, he said, had he heard such "irrational, irresponsible, insulting and repugnant language" in its chambers and used so contemptuously to impugn and slander.

Struggling slowly, painfully but perceptibly to right racial wrongs within its own borders the U.S. is vastly fortunate to be represented at such an emotion-charged hearing by a citizen with such impeccable credentials in the fields of racial equality and social justice as Adlai Stevenson. Hopefully, his eloquent and carefully aimed indignation will therefore have more than glancing impact.

"I MAKE NO DEFENSE," he said, "of the (racial) sins of the white race . . . But the antidote for white racism is not black racism."

Though it puts the record a little straighter, the Stevenson rebuttal of course does not solve the Congo crisis. And we must not lose sight of the fact that, in a substantial sense, the western powers are reaping a bitter harvest from the brutal seeds of human exploitation sown in past inglorious eras of Colonialism.

Warped and exaggerated as the African charges are, could we reasonably expect them to be much more temperate from nations finding themselves so suddenly free with so little perspective to judge the Caucasians on but the record of imperialism as they or their ancestors knew it? The cause and effect of history are not always so suddenly coupled.

The objective in the Congo must remain a stable government. This will take a long time to achieve. It must be recognized that African reaction might have been less ferocious if Congolese Premier Tshombe had not discredited himself further with fellow-Africans by hiring white mercenaries to fight the rebels.

Even while the Sudan has served as a kind of staging area for Algerian and Communist help to rebels, the Sudanese foreign minister is here at the UN attempting to sell a six-point compromise program to broaden the base of the Tshombe government and cease outside intervention, Communist and otherwise. It may not work but it's vitally useful to have the UN as a workshop in which to try it.

Secret, Armed Group

House Panel Urged To Probe Minutemen

WHEN THE 89TH CONGRESS opens shop in January, the House UnAmerican Activities Committee will consider the request of Rep. Charles S. Joelson (D-N.J.) that it probe the activities of a Birch-type organization known as the Minutemen.

Joelson wrote Committee Chairman Edwin E. Willis (D-La.) that the Minutemen is a secret, armed organization that favors "forcing governmental policies by violent means."

He added, "in my opinion nothing can be more un-American" than that.

Immediately after the November elections the Minutemen's monthly newsletter, "On Target," declared:

"The hopes of millions of Americans that the Communist tide could be stopped with ballots instead of bullets have turned to dust."

Robert B. DePugh, who heads up the organization from Norborne, Mo., advocates that his members arm themselves, prepare for guerilla warfare to counter the Communist threat from within, and develop a well-disciplined "intelligence unit."

THERE SEEMS to be little question that the Minutemen, however small in size, is a threat to the peace and tranquility of the nation. What will be interesting to watch is whether the House Un-American Activities Committee will actually probe the Minutemen.

The House committee has received strong—one could almost say violent—support from the Minutemen. Last year, for example, "On Target" warned the 20 members of the House who voted against increasing appropriations for the committee: "Traitors, beware! Even now the cross-hairs are on the back of your necks."

DePugh and many of his followers were members of the John Birch Society. Even though he maintains a close association with the Birchers, the groups have split.

Essentially, though, the secret nature of both organizations has provoked alarm among most Americans. The Minutemen calls for armed action immediately, since they are raising private armies in the states. This clearly violates American tradition, if not the law itself, and points up the fact that all secret organizations, including the Birchers, could stand a good public airing.

RECENTLY, in Mississippi, a business agent for the Woodworkers was beaten by robed Ku Klux Klansmen.

In California, State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts blasted recurring efforts by John Birch Society members and other extremist groups "to intimidate union members and discredit, disrupt and impair the functional ability of unions and their elected members."

"Incidents of this sort have been occurring with increasing frequency in both Northern and Southern California," he said, "and it's time union members and the public at large stand up and repulse the threat they present not only to labor unions but to the democratic process itself."

Pitts cited examples of such harassment, under the guise of fighting communism, in Alameda, Contra Costra, Los Angeles, Orange and San Diego counties.

The statement by a spokesman for the John Birch Society that there are Birchers on the police forces of most American cities cannot be overlooked. Too much of our freedom is related to fair treatment of all citizens by the police. If secret groups, such as the Birchers, Minutemen and KKK are operating within our police forces, we are faced with a clear and present danger.

The national spotlight will rest on the House Un-American Activities Committee to see whether it will seek to expose this danger from the right as it has exposed dangers from the left. (PAI)

Washington Reports:

Local Programs Held Essential To Success of War on Poverty

"THE ONLY SUCCESSFUL WAY to wage war against poverty in this nation is to stimulate local leadership all over the country to develop programs to eliminate poverty in their own communities," said Jack Conway, director of community programs for the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Conway, deputy to OEO Dir. Sargent Shriver, in an interview on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO program heard on more than 700 radio stations, pointed out that the federal government will pay 90 percent of the cost of local community action programs, and that the other 10 percent can be in the form of cash or services, such as staff, facilities, buildings, and equipment like typewriters.

Five major areas are covered in the community programs, Conway reported.

"Education, of course, is one of the most important areas," he asserted. "We all know that some youngsters, coming from poor families, are not even prepared to enter school. So we start with remedial educational efforts in pre-school years, and carry on with special tutoring programs, all the way up to adult education. The area of manpower training is another important sector. A third is housing, including aid to people who move from rural areas into urban areas, to help them adjust. Consumer education can be an important part of this program—teaching of general housekeeping skills, legal aid.

THERE IS STILL another area—public assistance, helping people to get the kind of social services available to help them out with their problems. A fifth area is in health education, physical examinations, a variety of activities designed to improve the general health of a community."

So far, said Conway, 235 programs have been planned by community organizations. Many will get into action next month.

"The program should be designed to eliminate the causes of poverty," the director declared. "That's why you'll find in these programs such a heavy emphasis on education. It's been found that this lack, and the lack of essential skills, of the ability to communicate, are the chief causes for continuation of poverty."

THE WAR ON POVERTY begins in each local community, with the cooperation of labor, business, religion and other groups, Jack Conway (right), director of community programs for the Office of Economic Opportunity, said in an interview with Harry W. Flannery on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

GRADUATION LUNCH of the Advanced Southern Labor School came on the fifth day of a crowded program of classes and discussions dealing with the economy, problems and politics of the South. The students were international union representatives and officers of state central bodies. This year's school was held at Miami Beach. Faculty members came from labor, university and public life. The school is sponsored and financed by State AFL-CIO bodies in the South.

Action Programs, Not Talk, Held Urgent Need in Automation Crisis

An AFL-CIO spokesman warned a gathering of automation experts not to become "smothered by words and statistics" to the neglect of "policy and action."

Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research said the United States and other industrialized nations are undergoing "a vast technological revolution" which poses grave social political and economic problems.

If we fail to solve them "soon and rapidly," he cautioned, "the fabric of our free societies can be ripped apart. Displaced and disconnected men are not inanimate machines; they may not always remain passive and silent."

Goldfinger spoke out after sitting through three days of speeches and learned papers delivered at a Washington conference sponsored by the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development (OECD).

He then took the floor to tell the conference that the contention of some participants that the immediate need is for more data is "sheer nonsense."

"The time is long overdue," he stressed, "for an emphasis on positive policies and action—to achieve and sustain job opportunities at decent wages for all who are able and willing to work."

He called for measures "to humanize the rapid rate of technological change, to cushion the blows of the technological revolution on people and communities, to achieve an equitable sharing of the fruits of our increasing productive potential among all groups in our societies."

Goldfinger told the international gathering that "it is shameful that we have sat here for two and one-half days assuming that human beings must be adjusted to a rapid pace of technological change" without considering "the equally important proposition that the pace of technological change must be adjusted to human needs."

The issue, he said, is whether society is a tool of technology or technology a tool of society.

In the U.S., Goldfinger said, "this technological revolution is pushing large numbers of people off the farms, out of the rural areas and into the cities." At the same time, "semi-skilled jobs in industrial and distributive activities are being curtailed, urban unemployment is rising and the growth of the labor force is accelerating."

The solution, the AFL-CIO chief economist declared, is not exclusively in the "indirect and general Keynsian approach" of lifting consumer demand through "general expansionary fiscal and monetary policies."

During the "transition period of the next 10 to 20 years," he stressed, such policies must be supplemented by "job-creating programs to increase the utilization of unskilled and semi-skilled labor, as well as by programs to increase the utilization of materials."

As examples of programs in the public sector which are "both possible and socially needed," Goldfinger cited urban redevelopment, mass transit systems, and expansion of educational, recreational and cultural facilities.

Beyond these, he said, is the need:

- To reduce the amount of working time during a person's life.
- For manpower policies to assist people and communities in the adjustment process.
- For government and collective bargaining policies "that bring a fair share of the fruits of technological advances to workers, the retired, the disabled and families that have no breadwinner."

'Imaginative' Effort Asked

Goldfinger termed existing government efforts and expenditures for full employment "belated and meager." The need, he said, is for "a tough, imaginative and dedicated commitment to full employment" by government leaders.

He noted "a regressive shift in income distribution" and a lag in real wages," and warned: "Such trends cannot continue for too long without economic, social and perhaps political troubles."

Calling for positive action programs, Goldfinger concluded:

"Surely the human genius that can create computers and nuclear energy is capable of humanizing technology and adjusting to our ability to produce a growing abundance with less and less productive labor."

Lie Detector Firings Ruled Unfair Practice

A firm that used "lie detector" tests as an excuse for firing nine union members to destroy a union's majority while stalling off an election has been judged guilty of unfair labor practices in a National Labor Relations Board ruling.

A polygraph operator hired by the firm reported that 10 employes—9 union members and a non-member—were "security risks" because they reacted violently, or did not react at all, to tests of their blood pressure, rate of respiration and sweating when asked irrelevant or incriminating questions.

The firm had no evidence against the employes except the unsubstantiated word of the operator, but fired them for "flunking" the tests. This was a pretext to cloak its opposition to the union, Trial Examiner Rosanna A. Blake found, and the board agreed. It ordered the Lone Star Co., Houston, Tex., liquor distributor, to reinstate the 10 with lost pay, to stop interfering with employes' organizing rights, and to bargain with Local 968 of the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The NLRB general counsel and the union argued that "polygraph tests are so unscientific that little or no reliance can be placed upon them," and, said the examiner in her decision, "there is evidence in the record to support their claim."

Noting that the company presented evidence that the tests are "highly reliable" and are used widely by law enforcement agencies and other employers, the examiner declared:

"It is obviously impossible for me to determine how reliable the tests are, either scientifically or practically. Company officials are in no better position to judge their accuracy from a scientific point of view, as they frankly admitted" but they pointed out that losses from pilfering had declined "sharply" since annual tests were ordered.

The examiner, while not disputing the firm's right to fire employes on the basis of the test, said the firings in this case were in violation of the law. Also it broke the Taft-Hartley law by failing to reply to a union letter asking it to bargain, she found, and the board agreed.

Five states have adopted laws making it an offense for an employer to require employes to take "lie" tests — Alaska, California, Massachusetts, Oregon and Rhode Island.

Wirtz Announces Drive:

'Massive' Recruiting Seeks Farm Labor

The Labor Dept. has begun what Sec. W. Willard Wirtz termed "the most massive recruitment effort ever made to secure American farm workers to fill seasonal agricultural jobs."

Wirtz announced the recruitment drive as the department concluded a series of hearings—in Washington, D.C., Texas and California—on proposals to admit temporary farm workers from Mexico under an "emergency" provision of the Immigration Act.

In past years, these "braceros" have been brought in under a contract arrangement but Congress refused to renew the program beyond its December 31 expiration date. Big corporation-type growers have contended that they will face a labor shortage if they have to depend on U.S. labor.

Wirtz said the success of the federal-state recruitment effort "will depend on the willingness of employers to offer attractive wages and working conditions and the availability of qualified domestic workers to take agricultural jobs."

At the Labor Dept. hearing in San Francisco, California unions declared there was no shortage of farm laborers in the state—only a shortage of jobs offering a living wage and proper working conditions.

Lack of Effort Charged

The State AFL-CIO charged that big corporation farms now asking the government to admit alien workers for seasonal employment haven't made a single "honest recruitment effort" to fill their needs with U.S. workers.

A spokesman for Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO said the big growers have fought efforts to raise wages and provide legislative safeguards for farm workers "even to the level of dishwashers, office boys . . . or floor sweepers employed in our canneries." He added:

"They can advertise until doomsday but so long as the job offer spells $1.10 an hour, no fringe benefits, no unemployment insurance and the nation's most deplorable working conditions, California workers will find the job repugnant."

The State AFL-CIO also criticized the "compromise" proposal of Gov. Edmund G. Brown (D) to phase out the use of foreign workers over a five-year period. Brown suggested that the number of imported workers be reduced 20 percent a year from the 1964 level, down to zero by 1969.

Sliding Scale

He suggested that the Secretary of Labor establish a minimum wage rate for imported workers on an upward sliding scale, starting at $1.25 this year, plus guarantees of housing, meals, transportation costs and work periods. This, he said, should be accompanied by a federal minimum wage for all agricultural workers.

"If 48,000 braceros are so critically vital to the entire state of California, how can it be that their 262,000 domestic co-workers have been dealt with all these years as virtually valueless outcasts?" the State AFL-CIO asked.

Any action by government, the state federation said, should be "to help rather than further hurt" low-paid domestic workers.

Also testifying was Gilbert L. Simonson, district director of the Packinghouse Workers, who said the economic laws of supply and demand can't operate when a large grower is allowed to import low-wage labor to meet a "shortage" which could be rectified by offering higher wages to U.S. workers.

He charged that the federal government's anti-poverty program would be sabotaged by "closing the domestic farmworker's opportunity to work at wages that will provide a life of decency and dignity for himself and his family."

Simonson said that if the Labor Dept. nevertheless allows importation of some workers, it should be under a procedure which would significantly upgrade wages and working conditions and "reestablish the percentage ratio between farm and manufacturing wages that existed in 1950, when there was no mass importation of braceros to depress the overall wage structure."

If an adequate number of domestic farmworkers are to be recruited, he said, they should be provided the protection of social legislation afforded other workers, including the right to organize and bargain collectively.

Earlier, in San Antonio, Tex., officials of the Texas State AFL-CIO charged that the employment of alien workers in past years has depressed wages and living standards of local workers.

Sec.-Treas. Roy R. Evans said that because of the availability of braceros from across the border, "nearly half a million Texas workers are still getting paid 1875 wages—when they can find work."

Henry Munoz, Jr., director of the state federation's Dept. of Equal Opportunity, said the U.S., to attract an adequate supply of domestic farm workers, should cover farm employment under the Fair Labor Standards Act, give agricultural workers the right to collective bargaining under the National Labor Relations Act, and provide workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance.

Labor, LBJ Confer on Key Issues

to outlaw union shop agreements, was another subject of discussion, the federation president said.

In response to questions, he said the President had indicated his support for the Democratic Party platform, which calls for repeal of Section 14b, but Meany stressed that the AFL-CIO officials had not come to the meeting "to seek commitments" or "to reach agreement," but to discuss problems which concern labor and the nation.

The White House later reported that among other subjects taken up were manpower, the labor force, hospital insurance for the aged, excise taxes, the anti-poverty program, aid to the Appalachian region, area redevelopment, and the impact of automation.

Administration officials taking part in the discussion included Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz; Budget Bureau Dir. Kermit Gordon; Gardner Ackley, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers; and Presidential Assistants Jack Valenti, Lawrence F. O'Brien and William Moyers.

Representing the AFL-CIO, besides Meany were Vice Presidents Joseph D. Keenan, James A. Suffridge, George M. Harrison, A. J. Hayes and John J. Grogan; Lane Kirkland, executive assistant to the AFL-CIO president, and Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller.

At Urban League Panel:

Joint Effort Asked For Drive on Bias

Organized labor and civil rights organizations must step up their joint efforts if the Civil Rights Act is to be made truly effective, an AFL-CIO spokesman declared at a Community Action Assembly held in Washington by the National Urban League.

At the same time Dir. Donald Slaiman of the Dept. of Civil Rights told a panel that the community must see to it that Negro children and youths are better prepared to enter the competition for jobs on an equal basis.

He reviewed steps the AFL-CIO has taken to implement the Civil Rights Act at the local level and the workplace, conceding that compliance has not been secured by all local unions throughout the country.

Discrimination is but one element of a "three-pronged monster," he said, the remaining tines being job shortages and competence. No amount of effort to make the Civil Rights Act effective, he said, will succeed unless more job opportunities are created and the disadvantaged Americans of all races and colors who want them are qualified by education or training to compete for them.

Slaiman was aided at the panel session by the assistant directors of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, Walter G. Davis and William E. Pollard, and by Co-Dir. William H. Oliver of the Auto Workers Fair Practices & Anti-Discrimination Dept.

Full Emancipation Goal

Pres. Johnson told the nationwide conference that complete emancipation of the Negro is his goal.

"Lincoln was one of my favorite presidents," he said. "He signed the Emancipation Proclamation. The emancipation was a proclamation and not a fact. It shall be my purpose and my duty to make it a fact."

Johnson, departing from his prepared speech, declared that until every qualified person, regardless of religion, race, residence "or the way he spells his name—until he has the right, unquestioned and unrestrained, to go in and cast his ballot in every precinct in this country, I am not going to be satisfied."

"If your constitutional rights are as protected as mine and if you have the privilege to vote as I have voted," he maintained, "all these other problems will take care of themselves."

He disagreed with those who claim it will take another century to "finish the job" of assuring Negroes their civil rights.

Era of Change

"Great social change tends to come rapidly, in periods of intense activity and progress before the impulse slows down," he said. "I believe we are in the midst of such a period of change.

"It is our task to carry forward nothing less than the full assimilation of 20 million Negroes into American life. This is not to be an assimilation of bland conformity. Our object is not to make all people alike. It is, as it always has been, to allow ready access to every blessing of liberty, while permitting each to keep his sense of identity with a culture and tradition. In this way we enlarge our freedom and enrich our nation."

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz reported a steady decline in unemployment of Negro men during the past year, cutting the jobless rate from 10.7 percent to 8.5 percent. There is "unlimited opportunity" for Negroes with special skills, he said, citing recent hirings of especially-skilled Negroes by his own department within the past few months.

He criticized the nation's schools for their failure adequately to prepare Negro students for entry to the job market and called on them to reshape their programs and take a "critical look" at their curricula.

The delegates were urged to utilize the war on poverty to "liberate the poor" in their areas by Whitney M. Young, Jr., national director of the league, in closing the assembly.

"The real test of the success of this conference and of our maturity," he said, "is getting anti-poverty programs started in your local areas. If you fail, then all of us fail. We cannot afford to lose time."

Humphrey To Coordinate Job Bias Fight

Pres. Johnson has named Vice Pres.-elect Hubert H. Humphrey to coordinate federal government programs "dedicated to the goal of equal opportunity."

The President's announcement was made to more than 300 civil rights leaders attending the Urban League's Community Action Assembly in Washington. It was the first major assignment given Humphrey in keeping with Johnson's pre-election statement that he would enlarge the Vice President's duties.

Agencies Affected

The agencies whose activities Humphrey will undertake to mesh include the Justice Dept.'s Civil Rights Division, Civil Rights Commission, President's Committee on Equal Opportunity in Housing, Community Relations Service and the President's Committee on Equal Opportunity in Employment, and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission soon to be created.

Johnson said each group has a "distinct and important" mission, but all "share the same general objective." Humphrey will work with them to eliminate duplication, overlap or unnecessary delay, he said, and guide them "toward energetic pursuit of equal opportunity for all."

"As the problem of civil rights has grown in urgency," the President said, "it has also grown in complexity. We must open the doors of opportunity. But we must also equip our people to walk through those doors. Thus programs to eliminate poverty, to improve education and to provide housing, by enlarging the opportunities of all Americans assure new opportunities for Negro Americans."

IAM Vote Rejects Per Capita Boost

Members of the Machinists in a referendum vote have approved 50 proposed amendments to the international union constitution and disapproved two—one to boost the per capita tax by 50 cents a month and the other to give grand lodge officers and the field staff their first pay raises since 1957.

Pres. A. J. Hayes said rejection of the per capita increase would force the union to curtail activities "for the purpose of bringing our expenditures down to our income" but promised that cuts would be made, insofar as possible, in areas that will least harm the membership.

SUPERVISORY COMMITTEE for neighborhood counseling program sponsored by the Greater Washington (D. C.) AFL-CIO under the anti-poverty program is composed of (from left) Oliver Palmer, Cafeteria Workers Local 457; Francis Greenfield, Laborers District Council; Mrs. Arlene M. Neal, Building Service Employes Local 82; Staff Rep. William Holder, Communications Workers, the committee chairman; Mrs. Josephine R. Piccolo, AFL-CIO Community Services representative in the Washington area, and Sec. F. H. McGuigan of the District AFL-CIO.

Anti-Poverty Program Planned by D.C. Unions

The Greater Washington AFL-CIO has sponsored a "friendly visitor" counseling program for a low-income neighborhood as its part in the anti-poverty program and has earmarked $13,275 to finance it for the first nine months.

The program will offer the residents of a selected neighborhood the same type of counseling service union members get from their community services representatives plus a demonstration to the deprived and isolated poor that the community is interested in them, is friendly and wants to be helpful.

The program is being developed in cooperation with the Neighborhood Service Project, will be evaluated by the research staff of the Health & Welfare Council of the National Capital Area and will be administered by a local AFL-CIO supervisory committee headed by William Holder, staff representative of the Communications Workers in the Washington area.

Other members are Sec. F. H. McGuigan of the local AFL-CIO; Oliver Palmer, Cafeteria Workers Local 457; Francis Greenfield, Laborers District Council. Mrs. Arline M. Neal, Building Service Employes Local 82, and Mrs. Josephine R. Piccolo, Community Services representative of the local council.

The central labor body has agreed to recruit union members, most of whom will be living in the project area, to undergo training which will qualify them to help residents of the neighborhood find the proper social agency to aid with a specific problem; help selected welfare applicants to get the information required to determine their eligibility for assistance, and "to act as good neighbors in a continuing friendly visiting program with these applicants if the applicants want to have this help."

In addition to demonstrating the community interest in the plight of the neglected and impoverished, the program will test how union volunteers under professional guidance can help stimulate the dependent to become more self-sufficient. It is expected that at least 50 low-income families will be helped.

Pres. J. C. Turner of the local council gave warm praise to the union members who helped work out the program and publicly thanked Abe Makofsky, regional director of the Health & Welfare Council, for his help.

High Court Denies Teamsters' Appeal

Five persons associated with the ousted Teamsters union in Philadelphia were denied hearings by the Supreme Court on their convictions in 1963 of conspiring to defraud the union and its members.

They are Raymond Cohen, who was secretary-treasurer of Local 107; Joseph E. Hartsough, bookkeeper; Abraham D. Berman, business agent; John Joseph Elco, organizer; and Ben Lapensohn, who described himself as an insurance broker.

Petrillo Heads Music Union's Rights Dept.

New York—Pres.-Emeritus James C. Petrillo of the Musicians will direct the union's campaign to merge dual locals serving single jurisdictions, Pres. Herman D. Kenin has announced.

Petrillo, who headed the union from 1940 until he retired voluntarily in 1958, has accepted appointment as director of a new Civil Rights Dept., Kenin said, and will operate out of both New York and Chicago.

"The AFM is fortunate to obtain the services of its elder statesman and executive in this vital role," Kenin said. "The resultant integration of all of its members conforms to the national AFL-CIO policy to which we subscribe. The assignment will be neither short-term nor easy, because many problems are inherent in preserving the property and other rights of all members involved in dual operations."

He called Petrillo "well-qualified" for the task because of his experience and "his early dedication to this aim, as expressed in the closing years of his long and able leadership" of the AFM. The appointment, Kenin added, was in compliance with a 1964 convention mandate "drafting" the former president for the assignment.

The AFM still has, under charters issued many years ago, several dual locals in single jurisdictions although mergers have cut their number in recent years. Kenin said one of the aims of merger is to centralize local authority and operations in all areas.

Public Accommodations Law Upheld by Court

A unanimous Supreme Court decision cleared the way for full-scale enforcement of the public accommodations section of the Civil Rights Act—the section which says restaurants, hotels, theaters and other places serving the public cannot discriminate against customers.

The court found that Congress has a clear right, under its constitutional authority over interstate commerce, to legislate against discrimination affecting commerce.

"The power of Congress in this field is broad and sweeping," Associate Justice Tom C. Clark said for the court.

In a separate case, by a split 5-4 decision, the Supreme Court wiped out the state convictions of sit-in demonstrators and others who had tried by peaceful means to desegregate places of business now under the Civil Rights Act.

Speaking for the majority, Justice Clark invoked the doctrine of "abatement," declaring that no public purpose would be served by further prosecutions since the goal of the demonstrators is now declared public policy.

3,000 Affected

An estimated 3,000 persons appealing convictions or awaiting trial are affected by the decision.

Two test cases involving the public accommodations section of the Civil Rights Act came before the Supreme Court.

An Atlanta motel had challenged the section, and appealed to the Supreme Court when a three-judge federal district court upheld the constitutionality of the law. A Birmingham restaurant won from a different lower court a ruling that the discrimination ban was unconstitutional. In this case, the Supreme Court reversed the finding.

Besides upholding the constitutionality of the public accommodations section, the decision expressed doubt that the establishments involved would be hurt economically "in the long run" if they served Negroes.

"Experience is to the contrary" in the many states which have long forbidden such discrimination, the court said.

A similar prediction had been made by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany during congressional hearings on the civil rights bill. He said the "dollars-and-cents" fears of southern businessmen "have no basis in fact or experience."

Meany termed discrimination in places serving the public "an incredible and intolerable state of affairs."

Pres. Johnson, commenting on the decision, said there is now no excuse for anyone to fail to comply with the law.

IUE Vote Tallied, Court Ruling Due

Trustees of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers completed a count of ballots cast in the union's referendum election for president. But the results will not be announced until after a federal appellate court decides whether to hear a challenge to the counting procedure.

Incumbent James B. Carey and Paul Jennings are the contenders.

Earlier U.S. District Judge Spottswood W. Robinson III turned down Jennings' petition for an injunction to halt the count and direct a recount under court supervision. The judge ruled that the court had no jurisdiction in the case since the Landrum-Griffin Act provides procedures for challenge of a union election, including a complaint to the Labor Dept.

Hours, Earnings Up:

Factory Job Pickup Paces New Gains

The nation's job picture "improved substantially" between October and November, with the key factory sector continuing its comeback, the Labor Dept. has reported.

The major developments in November, according to the government's detailed job report, were "a strong gain" in non-farm employment, a decline in the jobless rate to 5 percent from October's 5.2 percent and "a sharp increase" in factory worker hours and earnings.

But, as the Labor Dept. reported in its earlier summary survey, there were 3.4 million persons jobless in November.

Production Jobs Rise

The detailed report, based on payroll data, showed manufacturing employment expanding by 180,000 workers in November to a total of 17.6 million. This, said a Labor Dept. spokesman, is "nudging" the all-time November peak of 18.1 million achieved in 1943 when the nation was "tooled up" for World War II.

The significant aspect of the November gain is that the production worker side of manufacturing, hardest hit by recession and automation, is showing steady gains.

"Manufacturing employment, which has risen steadily throughout the year," noted the report, "was up 400,000 from a year ago, with 90 percent of the increase among production workers. Nearly one-third of the over-the-year gain occurred in the non-durable goods industries, with the largest increase occurring in apparel. In the hard goods sector, the pacesetters were primary metals and machinery."

The production worker comeback from the 1958 recession has been slow, suffering a setback in the 1960 business decline.

In 1957, factory production workers totaled 13.2 million for the year. The total plummeted to 12 million in 1958, rose to 12.6 million in both 1959 and 1960, fell back to 12.1 million in 1961 and then gained to 12.5 million in 1962 and 12.6 million in 1963.

The Labor Dept.'s November report shows the seasonally adjusted production worker total rising past 12.8 million last August.

In terms of the larger non-farm job picture, the Labor Dept. said non-farm payrolls rose by 200,000 to an all-time high of 59.3 million. The agency had expected a decline of 200,000 instead.

On a seasonally adjusted basis, the report added, employment increased by 400,000. Of this rise, 300,000 occurred in manufacturing, with two-thirds of it taking place in transportation equipment as striking auto workers returned.

With these higher-paid auto workers back on the job, average hours and earnings of factory production workers were boosted. The workweek rose by 12 minutes to 40 hours and 54 minutes. Adjusted for seasonal influences, the workweek was the highest for any month since late 1955, the report said.

Overtime hours, at 3 hours and 18 minutes, were up by 6 minutes and at the highest level for the month since the series began in 1956.

With the longer workweek and a rise in average hourly earnings, by 3 cents to $2.56 an hour, average weekly earnings reached an all-time high of $104.70.

Good weather in the reporting period in November kept down the expected drop in outdoor work and contract construction employment held high at 3.3 million, the report added; this was 139,000 higher than November a year ago.

Trade Jobs Up 150,000

Job changes in the service-producing industries behaved seasonally, the report said. Trade employment showed the usual pre-Christmas increase, rising by 150,000 to 12.5 million.

Over the year, the report observed, three of the service-producing industries—trade, miscellaneous services and state and local government—provided a total of 1 million new jobs.

Total employment in November was 70.8 million, the report said, a less-than-expected decline of about 300,000 from October.

Counted among the employed were 1.9 million non-farm workers on part-time who would prefer full-time work.

Reapportionment of Legislatures Hot Political Issue in 13 States

59 House seats to be filled by the minority party. Adlai E. Stevenson III, son of the UN ambassador, led the Democratic slate. Top vote-getter among the 59 Republican winners was Earl D. Eisenhower, brother of the former President.

The at-large election came about when the previously Republican legislature and the Democratic governor were unable to agree on a reapportionment plan. Meanwhile, a federal court case is pending to reapportion the Senate, which is dominated by downstate Republicans.

Michigan—The court-ordered reapportionment of the legislature, which led to Democratic control of both houses for the first time since 1932, has been challenged by a Republican lawsuit on the ground that the new districts do not follow county and city boundaries. A citizens' group, including state labor leaders, has been granted permission by the Michigan Supreme Court to intervene in support of the reapportionment.

Minnesota—The legislature will convene next month under a court order to reapportion itself. Although both houses are supposed to be based on population, there are variances of up to 4-1 in Senate districts and 7-1 in House districts.

New Jersey—The legislature is under a state court order to reapportion itself before the 1965 elections. The State Supreme Court has nullified a controversial weighted voting system adopted by the Senate as an alternative to reapportionment which would have given more votes to senators from populous areas. Thus Essex County's senator would have had 19 votes on roll calls. Meanwhile the legislature set up a bipartisan 12-member commission to draft plans both for reapportioning the legislature and for redrawing New Jersey's congressional districts. The commission of four legislators and eight public members is to report by Feb. 1.

New York—Under an intricate plan devised by Republican leaders, the lame duck legislature is scheduled to pass a reapportionment bill bearing a reasonable resemblance to the one man, one vote criterion, although designed to help Republican candidates as much as possible. This will be signed by Rockefeller and become law.

Next, the plan provides, the legislature will pass a somewhat more partisan law which will supplant the first measure. Two other bills will be passed, each replacing the previous one and each more heavily weighted for the GOP. The last two measures would include "fractional voting." This, in effect, would give the courts a choice of four GOP proposals in the hope that one would meet the necessary standards.

Democrats, who have bitterly protested the special session, are expected to pass their own reapportionment proposal, when they take office in January, as a constitutional amendment—which could not be vetoed by the governor, but which would have to be approved by the voters in a referendum.

Ohio—Unless courts intervene, voters will ballot in May on a Republican-drafted reapportionment plan adopted by the outgoing legislature. The State AFL-CIO, which supported a different reapportionment formula, charged that the "basic purpose of the GOP reapportionment plan is to help the Republican cause as much as possible."

Pennsylvania—Gov. William W. Scranton (R), faced with a divided legislature in January, announced that he will name a "completely and equally bipartisan" committee to draw up plans for "a just and fair apportionment . . . that would set a standard for the nation."

Rhode Island—Reapportionment was regarded as the top task facing the state's first unlimited constitutional convention in 122 years. The convention recessed until Jan. 11 after electing former Gov. Dennis J. Roberts (D) as its chairman and hearing Gov. John H. Chaffee (R) urge it to adopt "the finest possible document, regardless of its effect on the present political scene."

Vermont—Vermont's legislature will convene Jan. 6 for the sole purpose of reapportioning itself out of existence. Each of Vermont's 246 cities and towns now has one seat in the House, regardless of population. A federal court ordered reapportionment by Mar. 31, said the legislature could not act on any other business, and declared that the terms of all legislators will expire on the deadline.

Virginia—A special session of the legislature met a federal court's Dec. 15 deadline for reapportionment and agreed on a plan greatly increasing representation from populous city and suburban areas. A partial reapportionment enacted two years ago failed to meet the Supreme Court's test of constitutionality. Reluctant legislators had been warned by Gov. Albertis S. Harrison, Jr., that unless they acted, the state would "face an even more distasteful consequence of having the federal judiciary apportion our legislature for us."

After reapportioning, however, the legislature passed a resolution petitioning Congress to call a constitutional convention to overturn the Supreme Court's one man, one vote decision.

Wyoming—A three-judge federal court struck down the 1963 reapportionment of the Senate and warned that it would impose its own reapportionment formula if the legislature didn't do a more equitable job before the 1966 elections. It accepted the part of the 1963 law which reapportioned the lower house.

American Air Issues Settled By Engineers

The American Airlines chapter of the Flight Engineers has reached agreement with the company and the unaffiliated Allied Pilots Association on all issues involving crew complement, wages and working conditions, the engineers' union announced.

The agreement, which removes a Dec. 16 strike deadline, has these major points, according to FEIA Pres. William A. Gill, Jr.:

- Flight engineers who have grievances arising out of contract provisions negotiated by the pilots' union may take them to a "system board" of two engineers and two company representatives.
- Arbitration will be provided if no agreement can be reached on the amount of money the FEIA should pay the APA for services rendered.

American Airlines has 600 flight engineers and 1,800 pilots. The engineers threatened to strike when the pilots objected to parts of the FEIA's agreement with the air line and also raised new issues.

The agreement resolves these issues and preserves the right of flight engineers to have their own union, Gill said.

Power Fight Splits House Republicans

Ford, Halleck Vie For Leader's Post

By Willard Shelton

A "non-ideological" struggle for power engulfed the trimmed-down band of 140 House Republicans as Rep. Gerald R. Ford (Mich.) launched a full-scale drive to oust the veteran Rep. Charles A. Halleck (Ind.) as the party's floor leader.

Ford, candidate of the GOP "activist" group that first bid for party power six years ago by helping elect Halleck, emphasized in announcing his candidacy that the contest involved style rather than philosophy.

He spoke of the "wealth of talent, energy and dedication" in the GOP's decimated ranks in the House. This talent when properly utilized "will communicate the image of a fighting, forward-looking party seeking responsible and constructive solutions to national problems," he said.

Ford made it perfectly clear that his drive for the leadership did not involve the issues that concerned the recent GOP Governors Conference and will dominate the Jan. 22-23 Republican National Committee session—the Goldwaterism issue and continued control of the party's national machinery by Goldwater spokesmen, including National Committee Chairman Dean Burch.

Perhaps equally significant is a report from the small band of House GOP liberals and moderate-progressives calling itself the Wednesday Club that neither from the Ford camp nor Halleck's had there been any request for backing, any offer to give the liberals' Policy Committee recognition, for example, in return for support.

3rd Candidate Possible

Rep. John V. Lindsay (N. Y.), a Wednesday Club leader, in a local radio speech held forth the possibility that the liberals would put up a third candidate against Ford and Halleck. If they did, it conceivably could block a first-ballot victory for either major candidate in the House Republican Conference scheduled for the showdown vote Jan. 4.

In fact, it appeared unlikely that the liberals could hold their own

Dockers Set Pact Vote For Jan. 8

New York—The Longshoremen set Jan. 8 for contract ratification meetings by members in the port of New York and pressed for similar settlements in all East and Gulf Coast ports.

ILA Pres. T. W. "Teddy" Gleason said 75 percent of the dockworkers in New York returned to work at once, and others engaged in unauthorized walkouts began returning to work after meetings clarifying the contract terms.

Spontaneous "wildcat" strikes started at Hudson River passenger piers and at Baltimore and Boston docks following announcement that ILA members had voted overwhelmingly in a Taft-Hartley referendum to reject the New York Shipping Association's so-called "final" offer.

Simultaneously the employers improved their offer and came to terms with ILA negotiators. It is this settlement the ILA is urging its members to approve Jan. 8 and Gleason said after the "contract clarification" meetings, "I'm not a gambling man, but I think they'll take it" (the contract).

The master agreement is "the

Urges Shorter Workweek:

Automation Job Toll Rising, Hayes Warns

The program of the Johnson Administration for meeting unemployment caused by automation is "still inadequate," Pres. A. J. Hayes of the Machinists declared in a nationwide radio broadcast.

"The problem is much more serious than most of the people in the country realize," he said.

He quoted experts who estimate that this year's toll of 2 million jobs lost to automation will rise to 2.5 million in 1965 and to 3.5 million, or 70,000 a week, in 1965, and after that "will continue to grow."

Hayes, an AFL-CIO vice president, called the Johnson Administration's anti-poverty program and the Kennedy Administration's Manpower Development & Retraining Act "moves in the right direction."

"But beyond this," he said, "we definitely have to have a shorter workweek. A shorter workweek, in itself, will create about 2.5 million job opportunities in manufacturing alone.

"But we have never contended that the shorter workweek, together with the Administration's program, is the whole answer. We think we must go beyond that. We think that employers must cooperate. We think that the working period in a worker's life must be substantially shortened by keeping children in school longer than we do now, and therefore out of the employment market. Also by increasing the number of vacation days in a year, by increasing the number of holidays, by providing sabbaticals for workers, by providing for better pensions and earlier retirement.

Many Unmet Needs

"We think that in addition to all of this we have to do more to take care of the unmet needs of the American people—better schools, more hospitals, better highways, all of the areas of unmet needs.

"We think that a combination of these will provide job opportunities for all of those who are now out of work and want a job. And we think that this program will have to be revised as we go along."

Hayes strongly opposed curbing the pace of automation "for fear that it could be used as an excuse not to do the other things that are necessary to solve the problems." He flatly predicted a workweek "much lower than 35 hours," in the next 25 or 30 years.

He found it "encouraging" that "more and more" industrialists and business people "are recognizing the problems of automation and are seeking solutions to them."

"We may not all agree on the solutions," he added, "but it is encouraging that they are working

41 Garment Industry Pension Funds Merged Into Single Retirement Plan

New York—Forty-one separate pension funds set up by units of the Ladies' Garment Workers and employers have been merged into a National Retirement Fund covering about 400,000 workers, ILGWU Pres. David Dubinsky announced after a meeting at which unification was formalized.

The new fund, of which Dubinsky will be chairman, will have reserves of $217 million when it begins operations Jan. 1, 1965.

The merger, Dubinsky said, will strengthen the financial stability of the retirement plans and improve administrative efficiency, and will eliminate complications that may arise when a worker moves from one branch of the industry to another or from one city to another.

The new fund, like its precursor separate funds, is made up of contributions—ranging from 2 to 6 percent of payrolls—from employers under union contracts that go back as far as 1946. The union negotiated its first pension that year in the New York cloak and suit trade. New York cloakmakers will continue to receive monthly benefits of $65 a month. Other recipients, under most of the original contracts, will get $50 a month.

To be eligible, a man must have reached the age of 65 and a woman the age of 62 and have had covered employment for at least 20 of the past 25 years immediately before retirement, the final five years in a shop contributing to a pension fund.

Separate pension agreements cover ILGWU members in Canada and Puerto Rico, and in a few small locals in this country.

The merging funds in 1963 had income totaling $37.7 million and paid out more than $20 million in benefits to 31,644 retired workers.

ILGWU conventions had directed unification of the funds under sound insurance principles and practices, but merger was delayed pending an advance determination by the Internal Revenue Service that the tax-exempt status of the separate funds would carry over to the unified fund.

The ruling was handed down in June. Then steps were taken by the trustees of the separate funds to give formal approval to the merger.

Dodd Urges Union Leaders As Diplomats

New York — The appointment of more leaders to important posts in the State Dept. and diplomatic service was called for by Sen. Thomas Dodd (D-Conn.) in an address at a luncheon meeting of the Italian-American Labor Council.

The council honored Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky of the Clothing Workers, with its Four Freedoms Award in recognition of his efforts to promote trade unionism on an international scale and of his opposition to totalitarianism.

Dodd told the meeting he had written Pres. Johnson a few days previously, urging him to give union representatives a larger role in shaping the nation's foreign policy.

'New Dimension' Seen

"I believe that the recruitment of trade union officials for appointive positions in the State Dept. and diplomatic corps would add an entire new dimension to the conduct of our foreign policy," he said.

Dodd pointed out that union officials have an understanding of the many social problems that confront the newly-emerging nations and in many of these nations they

Unions Appeal Picketing Bar In FEC Strike

Six unions have asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to strike down an order prohibiting peaceful picketing of the struck Florida East Coast Railway's approaches to Cape Kennedy, Fla.

The unions, enjoined by a Florida court from informational picketing near the cape's space and missile complex, signed a stipulation submitting the dispute to the National Labor Relations Board.

By a 4-1 margin the NLRB held that the unions violated the illegal secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act by carrying picket signs on public highways near Cape Kennedy. Member Howard Jenkins, Jr., dissented on the ground the board does not have jurisdiction over a labor dispute involving a railroad.

Four of the unions represent railroad and non-railroad employes—the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers and the Boilermakers. Two railway unions are involved—the Railroad Telegraphers and the Maintenance of Way Employes.

Non-operating unions have been on strike since January 1963 against the FEC's refusal to grant employes the same wage increase given by all other U.S. railroads, and members of operating unions have observed the picket lines.

The NLRB decision noted that most of the picketing was at points not visible from the FEC tracks and not used by railroad personnel. The picket appeal, it said, could only have been "to induce work stoppage by employes" of contractors not involved in the strike.

U.S. Assistance Urged For 'Ghetto' Children

The American Federation of Teachers urged U.S. Commissioner of Education Francis Keppel to draw up a national plan for schools geared to the needs of "environmentally handicapped children."

A leadership committee of the union said the need is especially urgent "in urban slum and ghetto areas of the nation." Such a program, the AFT said, will need federal aid to become effective.

PICKET LINE at the Scripto plant in Atlanta, Ga., is led by Rev. Martin Luther King, civil rights leader and Nobel Peace Prize winner. The Chemical Workers, striking for a first contract, say the company has insisted on discriminatory wage rates for some 600 Negro workers. A newsman interviews Rev. King, who joined the line to demonstrate community support for the strikers.

Close Election Races Show Value of 1 Vote

A switch of one out of 100 votes would have drastically changed the election picture, according to a tally by the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education. In some races, one out of a thousand votes would have reversed the result.

To point up the importance of one vote, COPE listed 63 House, Senate and gubernatorial contests in which the winner received 52 percent or less of the total vote.

The official count in the Nevada Senate race gave incumbent Democrat Howard Cannon an 84-vote victory, less than 50.1 percent.

In Ohio, Sen. Stephen M. Young (D) did somewhat better. He beat Republican Robert Taft, Jr., with 50.2 percent of the vote. And in Oklahoma, Democrat Fred Harris won election to the Senate with 51.1 percent of the vote.

The winning margin for Republican Senate victors included 50.6 percent for Hugh Scott in Pennsylvania, 51.7 percent for John J. Williams in Delaware, and 51.3 percent for George Murphy in California.

Six governorships were decided by less than 52 percent of the total vote. In the closest race, Republican John A Volpe won in Massachusetts with 50.5 percent. Volpe knows how much one vote counts. Two years earlier, he had been defeated for the same office by 50.1 percent of the vote.

Wisconsin's Democratic Gov. John W. Reynolds was defeated by Republican Warren P. Knowles, who won 50.7 percent of the vote.

Other governors elected with less than 52 percent plurality were Tim M. Babcock (R-Mont.), Otto J. Kerner (D-Ill.), Nils A. Boe (R-S. Dak.), and Charles L. Terry, Jr. (D-Del.).

Fifty House contests fell into the 52 percent or less category. The closest was in New York's 30th district. Republican Carleton King won re-election with only 50.03 percent of the vote.

with labor and with government to try and find the solutions."

In answer to a question, Hayes said the IAM has not lost members because of automation—due to intensive organizing campaigns. However, he went on, many tool and die makers and machinists in different parts of the country are unemployed while there is a demand for their skills in other parts. The labor force doesn't have the mobility that would make it possible, he said, "to move people around like you do men on a chess board."

Hayes appeared on Labor News Conference, produced by the AFL-CIO and heard on the Mutual Broadcasting System's radio network. He was interviewed by Alex Uhl of Press Associates, Inc., and Neil Gilbride, Associated Press labor reporter.

12 URW Locals Win Institute Scholarships

Twelve Rubber Workers locals have won "scholarships" to the URW's 1965 Legislative Institutes for having "outstanding" records in collection of voluntary contributions to COPE.

The five-day institutes in Washington, D.C., offer URW members a first-hand look at the federal government in action, including meetings with congressmen, senators and other government leaders.

Garment Industry Pact Merges Pension Funds

The largest, the Eastern Regional Retirement Fund covering about 115,000 workers, changed its name to the ILGWU National Retirement Fund and the other funds began to merge into it.

The merged fund will be administered by a 60-man board of trustees composed of representatives of both labor and management. In addition to Dubinsky as chairman the union is represented at the top level by Sec.-Treas. Louis Stulberg as fund treasurer. Nat Boriskin of the employer group was elected vice chairman, and Ellis Rosenthal, also an employer, was chosen secretary.

Harry Uviller, impartial chairman of the New York dress industry, will be presiding officer of the executive committee and arbitrator who may break deadlocks. Arthur J. Altmeyer, former Social Security administrator and currently chairman of the cloak and suit industry's retirement fund, will be the chief appeal officer.

The fund will be administered by Louis Rolnick, who has been director of the ILGWU Welfare & Health Benefits Funds Dept. The actuary will be George E. Immerwahr, who has been an actuary in the Internal Revenue Service, chief actuary for the Social Security Administration's Bureau of Old Age & Survivors Insurance, and actuary for several local and regional ILGWU pension funds.

In addition to retirement protection, ILGWU members are covered by severance benefits and by 71 funds providing vacation, disability, health and medical benefits.

Rep. Roosevelt Enters Contest for Mayor

Los Angeles—Rep. James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) has announced that he will be a candidate for mayor of Los Angeles in the non-partisan primary election Apr. 6.

The son of the former President, a congressman for 10 years, said he was entering the race "to oppose the forces of disorder and extremism." The incumbent mayor, Samuel Yorty, is a former Democratic congressman. The general election, conducted without party labels, is scheduled for May 25.

'Pattern' Contracts End UAW Walkouts

Detroit—The Auto Workers have announced successful settlement of two strikes for the auto industry "pattern"—a 16-day walkout of 24,000 General Motors workers in five Canadian locations and a six-week strike of 6,000 Mack Truck workers at five plants in the East.

The UAW reached agreement on a new three-year contract for Canadian GM workers Dec. 17. Members voted two days later for ratification, and production resumed Dec. 21.

Chief objective of the strike—closing the gap between U. S. and Canadian wage rates—was achieved in part, the union said. Economic improvements in the new pact total nearly 59 cents an hour as against 54 cents in U. S. rates.

The agreement provides immediate wage increases of 19 cents an hour for skilled workers, 11 cents for the non-skilled, and "pattern" increases in the next two years. It also calls for company payment for all prescription drugs for workers, retirees and their dependents—a first for the UAW, the union said.

Pensions Raised

Pension plan improvements will permit an employe with 30 years' service to retire at 62 on a pension of $255 a month, raised from $138 at 65. Widows of deceased workers may draw $100 a month in benefits to age 70, as against 62 in the U. S. agreement.

Other gains include hikes in insurance and jobless benefits, longer paid vacations, and two more paid holidays to a total of 10 per year.

UAW members of Mack Truck locals at Allentown, Pa., Bridgewater, N. J., Hagerstown, Md., and Cortland, N. Y., voted by an 87 percent margin to approve contracts paralleling the gains won in "big auto."

The pacts include a 50 percent increase in pensions for all current and future retirees, two additional paid holidays to total nine a year, and improved vacations.

Workers forced to retire by a plant closing four years ago at Plainfield, N. J., will get a boost in retirement pay. Hagerstown plant workers will be given an additional pay raise of 21 cents an hour to bring their rates up to par.

The UAW also announced:

- Efforts are continuing to win better contracts for 3,000 White Motor Co. workers, on strike at Cleveland, O., and 1,300 workers at three Massey-Ferguson farm machinery plants in Detroit.
- About 25,000 Ford workers will get a 6-cent hourly wage increase to correct inequities under an agreement just worked out implementing an understanding reached last September in national Ford-UAW negotiations.

NLRB Orders Local To Act Against Bias

Goodyear Local 12 of the Rubber Workers in Gadsden, Ala., has been ordered by the National Labor Relations Board to stop refusing to process the grievances of Negro members and to bargain "promptly" in good faith with management for written language barring racial discrimination in the future.

Board members split 3-2 in their decision, as they had in a previous race bias case involving an unaffiliated union and the Hughes Tool Co. Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and Member John H. Fanning restated their opinion that alleged acts of race discrimination cannot be treated as an unfair labor practice under the Taft-Hartley Act and that the issue should be dealt with under other federal legislation.

The three-man majority, reversing Trial Examiner Ivar Peterson, ruled that Local 12, by refusing to process the grievances of David Buckner and seven other Negro union members, violated the Taft-Hartley Act and engaged in unfair labor practices.

It is just as unlawful for a union to deny members fair representation as it is for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively, said Members Boyd Leedom, Gerald A. Brown and Howard Jenkins, Jr.

The majority ruled that both union and management were unjustified in clinging to racially separate seniority lists, dining and toilet facilities and a segregated company golf course. All grievances of the objectors were turned down at each stage of the union procedure, and the local rejected the advice of URW Pres. George Burdon to submit the grievances to arbitration, the board related.

It is a "reasonable inference," the majority wrote, "that any fair employment practices" in which union and management engaged are due to "effective actions" by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, which intervened in the case because the plant had a government contract.

The dispute started in 1961, when Buckner bid on a posted job but was rejected by management because the job was a "white job." Laid off, he protested that a white employe with less seniority was retained. Seven other Negro members also filed complaints. They asked backpay for the period they were on layoff, and an end to segregated plant facilities.

Tobacco Pact Hikes Wages, Drops Hours

More than 4,000 Tobacco Workers at Philip Morris Co. plants in Richmond, Va., and Louisville, Ky., won a pay raise and a shorter workweek in a three-year contract.

For year-round employes—the bulk of the workforce—the 37.5 hour week will go into effect during the last six months of the contract period, with overtime rates in effect after 7.5 hours in a day.

An 8.25 percent raise takes effect immediately.

In addition, regular workers will be entitled to a fourth week of vacation after 20 years, instead of 25 years, and time off with pay for the funeral of a member of their immediate family.

Seasonal workers, who will receive a 7.5 percent raise, were given an additional holiday and hospitalization coverage on the same basis as year-round workers.

TWIU Vice Presidents George Benjamin, Homer Cole and E. G. Harvey and bargaining committees from Local 16 in Louisville and Local 203 in Richmond took part in the negotiations.

Labor Dept. Acts:

Better Wages, Conditions Set As Farm Worker Standard

Farm owners were told they must offer higher wages and better conditions to U.S. farm workers before the Labor Dept. will permit them to import alien workers for seasonal jobs.

The department set standards which must be met before growers can bring in field labor from Mexico or other countries. Domestic workers must first be offered minimum wages of $1.15 to $1.40 an hour, depending on the state, and written contract guarantees of housing, transportation and duration of employment.

The announcement cited "accumulating evidence" that there would be no shortage of U. S. farm workers if employers provided better pay and "decent working conditions."

Earlier Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz announced a "massive recruitment effort" to secure U. S. workers to replace Mexican "braceros" next year, pledging that an "emergency" provision of the Immigration Act will not be used to circumvent the ending of the bracero program.

Under immigration procedures, the Labor Dept. must certify that there is a shortage of domestic workers before aliens can be admitted for temporary jobs.

At Labor Dept. hearings in three states and Washington, D. C., employer groups urged liberal admission of alien farm workers. Unions and AFL-CIO state central bodies said the flow of foreign workers should be cut off, thus forcing growers to offer wages and conditions adequate to recruit domestic workers.

Three-Month 'Breather'

The order set a three-month transitional period—until Apr. 1, 1965—in which growers can import workers if they are unable to find sufficient farm help at current prevailing wages. A prevailing wage schedule, ranging from 90 cents an hour in Texas and New Mexico to $1.25 in California, was posted.

After Apr. 1, the minimum wage offered by employers seeking certification of a labor shortage will be as follows:

- $1.40 an hour in California, Connecticut, Kansas, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, South Dakota and Utah.
- $1.30 an hour in Colorado, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin.
- $1.25 an hour in Arizona, Indiana, Maine, Michigan and Wyoming.
- $1.15 an hour in Arkansas, Florida, New Mexico, Texas, Virginia and West Virginia.

If the prevailing rate for the crop activity in the area is higher than these minimums, the higher rate must be paid.

The Labor Dept. regulation requires that domestic workers must be offered, "as a minimum," all the terms and conditions of employment—including housing facilities—that have been offered to Mexican workers under the bracero program, "including a written contract embodying those conditions."

The regulations also ban the use of foreign workers to fill jobs involved in any labor dispute.

Employers Protest

A spokesman for California employers protested that the new minimum wage rates are "absolutely unreasonable" and claimed that the rate effective after April is 40 cents an hour higher than the prevailing wage floor.

"No lower rates would be consistent with the national policy of affording the fullest practicable employment opportunity to U. S. citizens," Wirtz said. "Our commitment to ourselves to end poverty in this country would not permit a decision that we will bring in workers at wage rates below the $1.15 to $1.40 range . . . before offering at least that amount to domestic workers."

Wirtz said he expects that under the new regulations the use of foreign workers will be "very greatly reduced, and hopefully eliminated."

Economy Seen Hinging On U. S. Spending Hike

The National Planning Association, warning that "time is short," declared there must be increased federal spending and greater state and local government initiative in meeting social needs if the nation is "to preserve its vitality."

The NPA statement, "Modernizing the American Economy," called attention to three related major problems: high-level unemployment; the threat to the nation's competitive position, with balance of payments' "deficits" in 13 of the past 14 years; the nation's "vulnerable" financial position with regard to foreign debts.

NPA, a non-profit and nonpartisan study group, called for a speed-up in public development spending at every level which would point the way to what it called new forms of business-government cooperation.

"We therefore recommend,' said NPA, "that the President appoint as promptly as possible a national commission of outstanding citizens to identify the proper public development projects, to indicate the degree and manner in which they can be carried out with public-private cooperation and to recommend the most practical planning structure for national development."

NPA said it endorses the two current approaches of tax cuts and training and retraining programs to deal with unemployment.

Not Adequate

But, cautioned NPA, these approaches and even further tax cuts will not be adequate to create "the very large number" of extra jobs needed to absorb open and hidden unemployment which it put at more than 5 million—as well as the large influx of young jobseekers and those leaving the farms in the years ahead.

NPA asserted that inadequate growth and unemployment are not the causes but are rather the symptoms of structural maladjustments due to changing employment patterns and national needs. It noted that little job gain has accompanied the technological advances in agriculture, manufacturing and trade while production has risen. NPA added:

"At the same time, our needs are rising fastest in such areas as education, research, recreation, mass transportation, atomic energy, desalinization of water, air and water pollution control, supersonic transport, water supply, medical care and urban redevelopment — activities requiring a growing number and proportion of our labor force."

NPA said these activities fall in a "no-man's land" and invite new forms of government-business cooperation, adding:

"Consequently, the percentage of public outlay supporting future economic growth here, as in most stable democracies, must increase at an accelerated rate if the United States is to preserve its vitality."

NPA urged a Marshall Plan scale of planning and financing, warning that present efforts are too puny "and time is short." To deal with the problems of America's competitive trade position and its international liquidity, NPA made proposals to improve civilian technology and achieve sound wage and price policies.

NLRB Reverses Stand On No-Solicitation Rule

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled, in a reversal of a 1960 finding, that an employer commits an unfair labor practice when he enforces a no-solicitation rule against a union but not against employes collecting for gambling pool tickets, chances on drawings and money gifts for supervisors.

By a 4-1 vote the board overruled a finding by the Eisenhower-era board in the Star-Brite case. It declared that the William H. Block Co. discriminated against Local 512 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union during an organizing drive in Indianapolis nine months ago.

Trial Examiner A. Norman Somers found the three-store retail chain broke the law when it warned two employes against soliciting union memberships, laid them off for a week without pay when they persisted, and illegally questioned employes about the union.

A four-man majority upheld Somers and ordered the firm to stop discriminating against the RWDSU and to give the two laid-off workers their lost pay. Member Boyd Leedom dissented against reversal of the Star-Brite rule, but agreed that the real reason for the employe layoffs was their activity in support of the union.

Though a company official testified that the firm could "immediately notice" the slowdown which would result from employe soliciting during working time, the majority said he admitted he was "unaware of the gambling, ticket sales and gift collections which did occur." Enforcing the rule, therefore, was "clearly an unjustified restriction," they held.

All the board members except Leedom voted to overrule the finding in the case of the Star-Brite Industries, Inc., footnote 3, where no violation was found in a similar set of facts. The evidence indicates that the no-solicitation rule at Star-Brite also may be unlawful, the majority declared.

Dockmen Set Jan. 8 for Vote On New Pact best contract the ILA ever got," according to Gleason. It provides:

- A guarantee of 1,600 hours of work a year for all qualified men available for work, and payment of at least $5,856 a year at the new wage rates.
- An accord on closing the port register, if New York and New Jersey Legislatures agree, to prevent an oversupply of casual labor.
- An 80-cent economic "package" including 36 cents an hour in wages, 24 cents to hike pension benefits, and the balance in improved vacations, holidays and medical benefits.

Under new pension terms, a longshoreman and his wife can get retirement benefits up to $369 a month including social security, Gleason said. The pact covers 90,000 dockworkers and is expected to set a pattern for 25,000 others in Great Lakes, Canadian and Puerto Rican ports, he declared.

At Johnson City, Tex., Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz disclosed that Assistant Labor Sec. James J. Reynolds has been sent to Houston, Tex., to help achieve a Gulf Coast settlement without a strike. Some locals have said they will walk out if the wage differential between eastern and southern port work is not narrowed.

Pres. Johnson, said Wirtz after a visit to the LBJ ranch, is "vitally interested in seeing that a settlement at the docks can be carried through to a successful conclusion."

TEACHER SALARY HIKES and reform of the education system for children of military personnel overseas were urged on the Pentagon by spokesmen for organized teachers abroad at a conference with Deputy Assistant Defense Sec. Stephen M. Shulman (center). Others, from left, are E. A. Sompayrac, aide to Shulman; John A. McCart, operations director, AFL-CIO Government Employes Council; Pres. Gael Pierce, Teachers Local 1470, Madrid; Pres. Ernest Lehmann, AFT Local 1471, Wiesbaden; Carl J. Megel, AFT Washington representative, and David Selden, aide to AFT Pres. Charles Cogen.

E. D. Friedman Named Labor Dept. Law Aide

Edward D. Friedman, for the past five years labor counsel to the Senate Committee on Labor & Public Welfare and counsel to the Employment & Manpower subcommittee, has been named deputy solicitor of labor by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz.

Stock-Taking

THE ANNUAL stock-taking that marks the close of another year finds the nation in the record-shattering 46th month of continuing economic improvement. This simple fact—that the economy has not suffered a recession, or a downswing, since the end of February 1961—is a remarkable accomplishment of government use of modern economic techniques and policies to insure the nation's prosperity.

The real achievements have led some commentators to speculate that the nation has finally learned how to curb and contain the ruinous business boom-and-bust cycles of earlier decades.

The next 12 months, however, will prove whether or not we have learned fully how to apply the concepts of modern economic theory to maintain a prosperous nation. For a widely assorted group of economists from the world of business and industry, the colleges and universities, as well as from the trade unions, are warning of a slowdown after the spring of 1965.

THE YEAR 1964 was a year of solid improvement in all major areas. The economic growth rate was nearly 5 percent after allowing for price rises. The unemployment rate dropped from an average of 5.7 percent in 1963 to an estimated 5.2 percent this year.

The key factor here is that even with a 5 percent growth rate, unemployment moved downward very slowly and at the end it remained at the chronically high level of more than 5 percent.

The forecasts for 1965 are for an economic growth rate of about 3.5 percent after allowance for price increases. This is obviously not a high enough rate of growth to continue the downward trend in unemployment. Economists are almost unanimous in forecasting an increase in the rate of unemployment by the end of 1965 if the growth rate does not exceed 3.5 or 4 percent.

It is this situation that will put to the test the government's ability to sustain the record of continuing improvement since the 1960-61 recession. For unless vigorous job-creating programs are enacted by the 89th Congress and strong stimulus is given the economy by Administration policies, the unemployment picture will worsen and the gradual improvements of the past few years will be wasted away.

THE KENNEDY-JOHNSON Administration demonstrated the ability to use government policy to maintain a high level of economic activity. The use of tax policy to stimulate and encourage a higher rate of economic growth was a major economic milestone. It was all the more impressive because it came during a period of relative prosperity, not to stem a recession.

The role of the national budget as an instrument of economic policy is being more completely understood and the outworn mythology of the balanced budget and the sinful implications attached to the national debt are being relegated to the scrap heap.

There is no reason why 1965 should not produce continuing growth and strength for the nation. But the initiative in economic policy must be maintained at the government level and a strong drive is needed for legislative enactment of the job-creating programs such as those proposed by the AFL-CIO and other groups.

Gains in an Ancient Fight:

Sound Economy, Social Justice One and Inseparable in the U.S.

The war against poverty is an ancient one and its historical roots become increasingly important today. In the following excerpts from a new study of poverty by the Conference on Economic Progress, "Progress or Poverty—The U.S. at the Crossroads," the economic philosophy of the attack on poverty and the role of social justice is examined.

THE YEARNINGS of men and women to put an end to poverty go back to the beginning of recorded time. The prophets dreamed of a land of milk and honey for everyone, although they knew no way to achieve their dreams on earth. But they did recognize—better than some of us in an age of automation when the principle is still applicable—that any war against poverty involves a crusade for social justice.

Two thousand and more years after the prophets, the growth of the industrial system in the home and factory turned poets and other writers to the task of awakening the social conscience. Very early in the 19th Century, the English poet Thomas Hood wrote The Song of the Shirt, portraying unforgettably the woman with "eyelids heavy and red," who stitched away in "poverty, hunger, and dirt" to make garments for the more fortunate to wear. And at the very end of the 19th Century, the American poet Edwin Markham penned The Man With The Hoe. Using rural poverty and ignorance merely as an example, he developed magnificently the theme that these evils are not the work of God but the "handiwork" of man, "tongued with censure of the world's blind greed," and "packed with danger to the universe." Perhaps one of the best short statements on the subject in all literature is the preface to Les Miserables, written by a great Frenchman and published in 1862. Victor Hugo said:

So long as there shall exist, by virtue of law and custom, a social damnation artificially creating hells in the midst of civilization, and complicating the destiny which is Divine with fatality which is human; so long as the three great problems of the age—the degradation of man through poverty, the ruin of woman through hunger, the crippling of children through ignorance—are not solved; so long as in certain regions social asphyxia is still possible—in other words, and from a still wider point of view, so long as ignorance and wretchedness exist on earth, books like this cannot be useless.

The second half of the 20th Century finds us in an utterly changed situation. Instead of the challenge of progress and poverty, we are confronted by the challenge of progress or poverty. It is true that we could continue to make considerable general economic progress, even if we continued to reduce poverty only at a very inadequate rate.

BUT THE ADVANCE of science, technology, and automation means that a much-accelerated rate of reduction of poverty—a much more rapid rise in the incomes, consumption, and levels of living of the more than 66 million Americans who still live in poverty or deprivation—is the only practical way to utilize fully our fantastically growing productive powers.

Besides, the plentitude of our economic endowments makes it imperative that we evaluate "progress" itself in terms of quality, not quantity alone. Several decades ago, Justice Holmes, in his famous dissent from the Supreme Court decision that indirect regulation of child labor by Congress was unconstitutional, protested against "the products of ruined lives." Even more so today, we must measure the growth of our total national production not only by its value expressed in dollars, but also by its effects upon the lives of people.

And just because, even in the current state of our economic powers, an aroused social conscience cannot tolerate the vast amount of poverty still in our midst, the improved distribution of what we now have, the enlargement of social justice, has far more practical relevance than in the days of the prophets. We must reject the notion that social justice is no longer of great significance, now that our economy is so rich and productive.

This does not imply harsh nor "revolutionary" redistributive programs, taking away from some to give to others. The policies and programs most immediately needed to help the poor and deprived might change some income "shares" slightly in the short-run, but these programs would hurt nobody even in the short-run; and in the longer run, they would immeasurably benefit all, by improving our total economic performance so much that there will be more for all.

In itself, this is a plus factor of supreme importance. It means that our progress toward abolition of poverty and deprivation need not be sullied by "class conflicts." Instead, this progress can and should be facilitated by increasing unity and cooperation among all individuals and groups, both private and public.

Morgan Says:

Material Advances Challenge The Decencies of Free Society

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE for an Effective Congress is, by its own definition, a non-partisan group which operates "on the principle that the quality and activities of the Congress are matters of national concern transcending local and special interests . . . and which supports qualified candidates for the House and Senate from both parties who are world-minded and dedicated to the extension of liberty at home as well as abroad."

Morgan

If there seems to be a smack of pretentiousness to that definition, it is tempered, happily and impressively, by performance. In the 1964 elections the NCEC endorsed 35 Democrats and 21 Republicans for election to the House and 11 Democrats and three Republicans for the Senate. Support was given on the basis of the value of the candidates of both parties in combating Goldwaterism as a concept in American politics. Nearly all the committee's candidates won. It fell short of a perfect batting average in the House by less than 11 percent and in the Senate by only a little more than 14 percent.

These claims are a little deceptively inflated, perhaps, because many of the endorsed candidates who won might well have done so without NCEC help. Nevertheless, it is not an exaggeration to say that the group is a growing influence in national politics, that it is, by and large, a progressive influence and that it does share the credit for election of theoretically the most liberal Congress in three decades.

So, what now? In a special report the National Committee for an Effective Congress dwells, commendably, less on specific issues than on the almost revolutionary atmosphere of change in which the world at large and Americans in particular find themselves. In the wake of the splitting of the atom a generation ago, it notes five ensuing explosions—of technology, of knowledge, of population, urban life and "human expectations." It reminds us, somewhat disturbingly, of the speed of our progress—if that is the term—a velocity we too often take for granted without giving sufficient thought to the consequences.

The combined effect of these explosions, the committee says, will be an upheaval that is "worldwide, churning all areas and peoples impartially. It seems bound, within the next 100 or 200 years, to cover the entire globe with a relatively uniform, automated and computerized civilization."

Such a projection bears frightening ramifications of monotony but it also bears an exciting challenge which might be stated thus: how to preserve the decencies of a free society, or, more pointedly, how to devise a way for the individual to enjoy the multiplying material advantages science and technology are coming up with without losing his individuality or his freedom?

This is a monumental order and its staggering dimensions are at least hinted at by what the experts love to call extrapolation, as follows: so big is America's population burst that urbanization, the growth of the megalopolis, will require doubling the present number of dwellings and work spaces by the year 2000. This means a construction job in 35 years which will equal everything built in North America since the Pilgrims landed.

WINCING A LITTLE at this and other gargantuan prospects, the committee counsels that these jobs must be faced and can be done, but while military preparedness commanded the highest priority in the immediate postwar situation, our emphasis must now shift to "a variety of initiatives along far broader and more imaginative fronts which would exploit what is still America's most potent resource, the compelling force of a free society."

The key question, surely, is what the impact of the Johnson Administration will be on that compelling force. Will the President's policies and concepts impart to it greater dynamism and more purposeful direction, or will Lyndon Johnson become so absorbed with the achievement of a consensus for its own sake that his Great Society will become diluted by unnecessary accommodation?

This is not to say that compromise is not necessary. To move a nation as huge and rich and populous as ours, churning with so many disparate groups and conflicting interests, compromise is vital.

One of the most fascinating—and sobering—aspects of the picture is, as the NCEC points out, that the "accidental" development of society is, or should be, on the way out. "Never before in history," says the report, "has it been possible for a society to option its future to such a degree," ranging from the control of its physical environment to the balance between human and material values.

But if we are to do what is required of us, whether in strengthening civil rights at home or freedom in a new foreign land, whether in education or urbanization, whether in reorganizing legislatures or traffic jams, our emphasis must be on invention, not evasion, on new concepts, not old prejudices, on evolution with, if you please, a revolutionary scope.

Washington Reports:

Success of Rights Act Depends On Efforts in Each Community

SUCCESS of the Civil Rights Act depends upon individuals and groups, such as labor, business and religion, within each community, LeRoy Collins, director of the Community Relations Service, set up under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, declared on Washington Reports to the People, AFL-CIO public service program heard on more than 700 radio stations.

The former governor of Florida praised Macomb, Miss., for the way its citizens united to promote civil rights.

"Macomb cannot be said to be a typical American community, because conditions there were much worse than they are or have been in other places," Collins said. "You had bombings almost daily and a complete breakdown of law enforcement. You had no communication whatever between the Negro and the white people and no desegregation."

He reported that the community program began with a few people who "recognized for their community's sake and for their own sakes that they had better pull together and get a job done."

Generally in the South, he said, there is "rapport" between the Negroes and whites which can be the basis for adjustment of problems. Cities like Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, etc., do not have this understanding, and the problem is more complex and difficult, he added.

"HOUSING is at the core," said Collins. "People there live in much too congested an environment to expect and to be able to develop good standards of health, education, morality and everything else."

He agreed that the economy needs to be stimulated in order to make equal job opportunity a possibility. Also needed is training in skills for what jobs are available.

"There is nothing in the laws that provide any basis for the establishment of any quota system," he replied in answer to a question about whether whites will lose their jobs to Negroes. "Actually the application of a quota system would be discriminatory, and discrimination is forbidden by the 1964 Civil Rights Act."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A COMPREHENSIVE survey and report covering the nation's electric power industry suggests that consumer demand for electricity will grow enormously in the immediate future—both because of population increases and because new generating and transmission techniques are now available so that costs and prices can be reduced.

The private utility spokesmen promptly took issue with the report, or at least with some of its findings of fact, and specifically with the suggestion that electricity rates could be reduced by as much as 27 percent across the next 15 years.

The survey was a Federal Power Commission project. It pointed out that nuclear-produced electricity is becoming so cheap that a large part of our generating capacity may be expected to shift to nuclear breeder plants. Its major emphasis, however, was on the fact that with new techniques huge area and regional power "pools" can be created.

The new techniques by which extra-high voltage power can be transmitted across long distances, the FPC said, offers a hope that both generating and transmission costs can be reduced through exchanges of power, peaking arrangements, a shift to "mine-mouth" generation, and a lowered need for new generating facilities.

Full application of the techniques available, the FPC said, should lead by 1980 to power pools, grids and networks covering large areas of the nation. The demand for power would more than double itself, rising from 1.1 trillion kilowatt hours to 2.8 trillion kilowatt hours in 1980. And the retail price of electricity—the price to the ultimate consumer—could be hauled down from 1.68 cents per kilowatt hour as of 1962 to as low as 1.23 cents.

THE PAIN FELT by the private electricity industry was strictly economic. The 1.23-cent-per-kilowatt-hour price projected did not take into account sufficiently the effects of inflation, said a group of power industry spokesmen (Executive Advisory Committee) who had assisted with the survey.

The EAC also thought that the FPC's concern for the protection of small power companies was unduly optimistic and argued that long-distance east-to-west power tie-lines were "not necessary."

A spokesman for the private industry's trade association, Walter L. Cisler, said the FPC report "has much to commend it," but he also took issue with the projected 1.23-cent figure, also on grounds of alleged failure to take into account sufficiently the effects of inflation.

Once again we are back to the ancient question—does the private power industry have any realistic understanding of the effects of reduced rates in stimulating consumer consumption of electricity?

Alex Radin pointed out, for the American Public Power Association, that the FPC survey specifically noted that the 1.23-cent rate would depend on whether, across the next 15 years, local rates are reduced enough to encourage greater consumer use.

He cited a survey statement that "the lowest average rates" for electricity are still found in the areas "most directly affected by the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Bonneville Power Administration," that the rates are 30 to 35 percent below the national average and that "as might be expected, customer usages are the highest in the nation."

The private electrical industry historically has built for small and immediately profitable areas, has ignored the increased usage obtainable by reaching to create customers in less densely populated areas, and has kept its rates relatively high. That is why we still need flexibility in our power industry—the "yardstick" of publicly owned utilities, the consumer protection on rate structures by the FPC and other regulatory agencies.

BIPAC, the National Association of Manufacturers political arm, made its first efforts in behalf of congressional candidates in the 1964 elections. It reports, solemnly, about this "baptismal" event: "It achieved an encouraging measure of success in view of the unusual conditions which prevailed."

YOU AND THE PEOPLE in your community are the key to success of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, LeRoy Collins (right), director of the Community Relations Service set up under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, asserted in an interview with Harry W. Flannery on the AFL-CIO public service radio program, Washington Reports to the People.

Election Sweep Highlights Labor's Year

Legislation, Bargaining Gains Mark Union Record for 1964

By Harry Conn

On the political front, in the legislative halls and at the bargaining tables, the year 1964 was both active and rewarding for trade unionists.

The highlight of the year, of course, was the sweeping victory of Lyndon B. Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey and other labor-endorsed candidates in the November elections.

Labor-backed legislation, too, fared better in 1964 than it had for many years. In economic activity, the unions scored new gains in major contracts and total union membership began to rise, reversing a declining trend.

House GOP Struggle Pits Ford vs. Halleck

group in line. "Some of them will vote for Gerry Ford because they like Gerry Ford," a spokesman said. After a meeting they in effect invited both sides to make offers—any offer—promising them some official post of party recognition.

Halleck, who has served in the party's House leadership for 20 years, is famed as a skilled political infighter, an unrelenting battler.

Few observers denied the chance that he might rally enough support to hang on to the leadership another term or two. But there were signs that he might, under the challenge from Ford, find himself overmatched in an intraparty battle for the first time in years.

The contrast in physical appearance is startling—and all against Halleck, whose worried, oldish, pouched-cheek mannerisms have worried GOP leaders when he serves as a party spokesman on such things as the "Ev and Charlie" show—the weekly televised news conferences of Halleck and his Senate counterpart, GOP Floor Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen (Ill.).

Ford looked vigorous and dynamic at the news conference announcing his candidacy—tall, still trim at 50 years of age, seemingly still as hard physically as when he played football for the University of Michigan.

The "activists" have something else going for them—a charge that Halleck is wholly content to remain forever at the top of a minority heap. They have argued —and Ford specifically stated in his press conference—that the minority ought to do its homework, to develop affirmative programs as alternatives to Administration programs, to "lead rather than simply react" to Democratic initiatives.

In his climb toward the pinnacle of House Republican power, Ford has demonstrated his capacity to rise to a challenge. He once saved the late Pres. Kennedy's foreign aid money bill by leading the battle to restore $300 million the President had said was urgently needed. Rep. Otto Passman (D-La.), chairman of the subcommittee controlling the funds, refused to restore more than $175 million, but Ford in a rare cut-and-thrust floor fight rallied enough Republicans support to help Administration Democrats override Passman.

Other Posts Involved

The Ford-Halleck battle seemed bound to have some carry-over effect at the Republican National Committee meeting even though all agreed it did not involve "philosophy." Up for grabs were several other House GOP posts. Assistant floor leader, held for years by the veteran Rep. Leslie Arends (Ill.), chairman of the GOP Congressional Campaign Committee, now held by Rep. Bob Wilson (Calif.), and a successor to Ford himself as chairman of the GOP Conference, assuming he wins the floor leadership. The question is whether Goldwater zealots will be welcomed or ignored.

Democrats, conscious of their heavy majorities, remained largely passive awaiting the opening of the new Congress Jan. 4 and Pres. Johnson's State of the Union message at 9 p.m. that night. The only fight brewing was the three-way battle for the Senate whip's post held by Vice-Pres.-elect Humphrey. The candidates are Senators John O. Pastore (R. I.), Russell Long (La.) and A. S. Mike Monroney (Okla.).

Mine Union Sued On Trusteeships

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz has sued the unaffiliated Mine Workers under the Landrum-Griffin Act to force the union to lift trusteeships it has maintained over six districts for at least 23 years.

Acting Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach brought the action on behalf of Wirtz, in response to written complaints from members in locals making up the districts, the Labor Dept. said.

A UMW spokesman denied the union was violating the law or that it was maintaining trusteeships as such. He added:

"For administrative and fiscal efficiency, certain of the union's district organizations created by the international executive board have their business affairs administered by representatives of the international union designated to their posts by the international executive board."

High Economic Growth Rate Seen Key to Anti-Poverty Plans

The key to eradicating poverty in the United States is a sharply stepped-up rate of economic growth that will provide jobs and higher incomes.

This is the theme of a new study, "Progress or Poverty—the U.S. at the Crossroads," by the Conference on Economic Progress.

The 150-page study, with charts and photographs, brings up to date all of the important data bearing upon poverty and examines in detail the Administration's anti-poverty program.

Leon H. Keyserling, head of the conference, a former chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, and an author of the study, writes that "the only way to reduce poverty in the U.S.—or in any other country—is by increasing the nationwide per capita production of goods and services so much that average levels of living rise enough to help the poor as well as others."

It is vital also, he says, that the nationwide distribution of goods and services be improved so that "a fair though not equal share is received by those on the lowest rungs of the economic ladder."

Distinction 'Self-Defeating'

To draw a fundamental distinction between the employment and growth problem and the poverty problem "would be self-defeating on all scores," the study declares.

An attack on poverty "not interwoven with the attack on these other problems," the study says, "would focus excessively upon a purely 'case-work' or 'welfare' approach which sought to make poverty a bit less oppressive or lose itself in a few dramatic situations of no great nationwide import, instead of building an economic environment in which massive poverty would find no place."

If the government will properly expand and direct its program, poverty can be eradicated by 1975, the study declares. This would mean a larger government anti-poverty program as well as increased government spending, rather than further tax reductions, to provide the greater stimulus for economic growth.

Keyserling urges that the President's Economic Report set forth plans to assure a minimum standard of living for all Americans and include "goals for the rate of reduction of poverty in America."

The study stresses that unemployment and parttime employment account for a substantial part of the nation's poverty, and that a slow rate of economic growth has aggravated this problem.

Ultimate victory in the war against poverty, the study concludes will "necessarily involve success in all of the other undertakings which now engage us: the restoration and maintenance of maximum employment and high economic growth; the wiping out of fundamental causes of racial tensions; the provision of full education opportunities; adequate health services and satisfactory housing for all the people; the renewal of our cities and the improvement of rural living; the conservation and replenishment of our natural resources; the solution of the thorny financial problems which now bear down upon governments at all levels."

The study stresses that "for the first time in human history anywhere . . . massive poverty has now become intolerable because it is no longer unavoidable."

In an introduction to the volume, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther, in his role as national chairman of the Citizens Crusade Against Poverty, writes that the war against poverty "can be won fully and won within a decade."

He says the study "identifies each portion of the needed task, identifies priorities, and by weighing the entire range of our needs and resources distinguishes between pie-in-the-sky and the clearly attainable."

The Conference on Economic Progress is a non-profit, non-political organization engaged in economic research and education. Its national committee includes AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Reuther, and Vice Presidents Al J. Hayes and O. A. Knight.

Union Leaders Urged For Diplomatic Posts are well acquainted with fellow trade unionists.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler declared that the Four Freedoms represent the principles upon which the labor movement was founded.

"As we pay deserved tribute to these great statements of principles, we must recognize that they are beyond the reach of any unless they are within the reach of all. . . . No minority group in this country can assure its own position by discriminating against another minority group," he said.

"The four freedoms are not for some; they are for all."

In his response, Potofsky said:

"We have given less attention to ending freedom from fear than to ending freedom from want. Freedom from want is a problem we see and feel and know about. Freedom from fear is almost ignored—and as a result it has become an increasing danger to our society.

"Today, fear has become a weapon used with increasing boldness by a growing segment, the extreme right. The extreme right is spending millions of dollars to spread fear among our people, particularly in the rural areas and in the small towns.

"Here is a task the labor movement must take on—the task of exposing and attacking the fear-mongers, the extreme right wing. They oppose everything we stand for, everything we have fought for, and if they were to win, their first victim would be the labor movement. Labor must rededicate itself to the fight against reaction and extremism."

Among other speakers were Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), Mayor Robert F. Wagner, Pres. David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Ambassador Sergio Fenoaltea of Italy.

The award luncheon climaxed the 23rd annual conference of the council.

Luigi Antonini, an ILGWU vice president, was re-elected to the presidency of the council and E. Howard Molisani, manager of ILGWU Local 48, was re-elected secretary. Among its other business, the council adopted resolutions supporting social security, hospital care, a strengthened NATO and liberalized immigration laws.

Shorter Hours Seen Cutting Joblessness

A statutory 35-hour workweek, with double pay for overtime, would reduce unemployment by two-thirds, an AFL-CIO economist declared.

Rudolph Oswald, a staff member of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, said 2.5 million additional jobs would be created under the federation's shorter workweek proposal.

Labor's drive to reduce hours, Oswald noted in a network radio interview, is designed to bring about full employment.

Other economic and fiscal measures which have been put into effect to achieve that objective "have had some slight effect in reducing unemployment levels," he stated. But he stressed that the present 5 percent level of joblessness is still "much too high for an American economic system."

Cut by Stages

Oswald said labor's proposal calls for reaching the 35-hour workweek in several stages "as in 1938, when the workweek was reduced from 44 to 40 hours by steps."

Under such circumstances, he said, hours could be reduced without cutting the weekly income of workers and at a moderate, easy-to-absorb cost to employers.

The answer to questions, the AFL-CIO spokesman said:

- The "sabbatical vacations" negotiated by the Steelworkers "have provided some additional job opportunities" and "also prevented a decrease in some of the existing jobs—jobs which otherwise would have been displaced by technological change."
- The reduction of the workweek in New York City negotiated by the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers opened up 800 to 1,000 new apprenticeship opportunities, including openings for minority groups "that previously were not able to receive the training because the job opportunities did not exist under the longer workweek."
- There is no greater incidence of moonlighting in industries with a 35-hour workweek than in industries on a 40-hour week. Labor believes "that the best incentive for eliminating moonlighting is to provide adequate income to those who are working."
- There is no danger of "moral decay" if workers have a few hours more of leisure as the result of a shorter workweek. "When workers were required to work six days, 12 hours a day, we were assured that any reduction in the workweek would lead to moral decay."

Oswald was interviewed on Labor News Conference, broadcast by the Mutual radio network.

Government, Education Found Balked by Automation Problems

Los Angeles—Swift-moving technological change has found the present apparatus of government and education inadequate to cope with the problems generated by it, the California Commission on Manpower, Automation & Training found at a public hearing here.

The result is that the commission's attempts to pin down the impact of automation in a year of study have gone emptyhanded, said the chairman, the Rev. Andrew C. Boss, S.J., of San Francisco.

AFL-CIO witnesses, nevertheless, urged prompt state action to cut the workweek to 35 hours and develop greater employment demand.

Vice Pres. E. R. White of the Machinists charged that as matters stand, "most of the price in technological change is being paid out of the pockets of the workers."

"Programming for people must take precedence over programming for machines," White testified at the two-day hearing.

He said labor will demand not only the shorter work week but extensive liberalization of such fringes as vacations, holidays and worker sabbaticals. Later entry into the work force for the young and earlier retirement for the old also are "musts," White said.

Walter Simsich, California AFL-CIO researcher, said the state federation believed government's most important policy should be to "influence demand in such a way so that we will be utilizing . . . the unskilled and semi-skilled labor categories."

"Buying . . . Needed Time"

Simsich said this would permit "buying ourselves some critically needed time" to develop realistic training programs compatible with the needs of industry.

"We can state with assurance that our present apparatus of government and education is not adequate to cope with the problems that have already been generated by the process of economic and social change," Father Boss said.

A year of "interminable and earnest discussion" with numerous sources "has enlightened us but little concerning the shape of things to come in the longer future," he said.

For this reason, White said, the commission would be unable to make recommendations for remedial law to the next session of the legislature. He expressed the hope that by the end of 1965 a significant recommendation could be made for an omnibus bill to deal with the school drop-out situation.

40-Hour Norm Outmoded

He pointed out that the individual worker produces more than twice as much in 40 hours today as he could in 1935. But "we still insist on maintaining the norm of the 40-hour week," the IAM official said.

He said the search for solutions to automation's impact will be "neither serious nor effective" until management, government and educators become "as completely convinced as is labor that automation . . . is a totally new level of technology, and not merely a further extension of mechanization.

The 29-member California commission was created by the 1963 legislature to conduct continuous studies and advise the legislature on automation and its impact.

California is especially sensitive to the issue because of its high reliance on defense business and the changing technological nature and fickleness of that business.

One management witness testified that the Douglas Aircraft Co. had installed 49 numerically controlled machines in the last six years. While this did not eliminate jobs immediately, he was unable to tell the commission how many "silent firings"—workers who would not be employed in the future because of the machines—would result.

White said "it's been a rule of thumb that to be economical a computer should replace at least 500 to 1,000 people."

Libel Trial Demanded By Dan Smoot's Critics

Traverse City, Mich.—A federal district judge has refused to allow Dan Smoot, a right-wing television and radio commentator, to drop a $1 million libel suit against this city's League of Women Voters.

Judge Noel P. Fox agreed with league attorneys that the suit should be brought to trial in the interest of fairness to the defendants.

Otherwise, the judge said, Smoot "and others like him" would be free to voice their views while critics might be intimidated by the continuing threat of libel suits.

Libel Charged

Smoot originally contended he had been libeled when the league's local newsletter accused him of using "slanted information, half-truth, innuendos and sometimes worse" in his broadcasts.

The league then announced that it would call a number of nationally-prominent witnesses to give first-hand testimony at the trial that Smoot's accuracy was no better than the League of Women Voters had claimed.

Smoot asked that the suit be dropped, but declined to sign a suggested stipulation.

When Fox refused to allow the action to be called off, Smoot appealed to the U. S. 6th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Fox cited three reasons for refusing Smoot's dismissal plea:

- To secure for the defendants their constitutional rights of free speech and free press.
- To assure for the general public free access to "the market place of ideas" on important issues.
- To settle the issue of whether the rules of libel applied to public commentators are the same as the rules applying to public officials.

Since the defendant League of Women Voters was in effect accused of "irresponsibility" in its attack on Smoot, the judge said, the case becomes "as much a question of clearing the names and reputations of the defendants as it is of clearing the name and reputation of the plaintiff."

The appellate court has not yet handed down its decision.

Unions Help Youngsters, City Repeals 'Work' Law

Whitesburg, Ky.—A shamefaced city council voted unanimously to repeal a so-called "right-to-work" ordinance it adopted only three months ago.

Whitesburg, county seat in an Appalachian Mountain area hard hit by unemployment, had been told that an anti-union, low wage clothing manufacturer would build a plant there if the city outlawed the union shop.

The council rose to the bait, despite the warning of the editor of the local weekly newspaper that the community could only go downhill if it tried to build its economy on "industry geared to the abuse of employes and the payment of the lowest possible minimum wages."

The ordinance was passed. But no new industry came to the community. And meanwhile the state's labor movement turned the other cheek in a demonstration of practical concern for the children of the area.

The State AFL-CIO began a drive for clothing and shoes for the "children of poverty" in the area and the Kentucky Labor News launched the collection campaign with a front page devoted to stories and pictures pointing up the need for help. A local committee promised to handle the distribution.

When the city council met in December, the member who had introduced the "right-to-work" ordinance stood up and moved that the city attorney be instructed to draw up a repeal document. It was passed without dissent.

Whitesburg was the second Kentucky city to repeal an ordinance banning union shop agreements. Springfield was the first. Twenty-three communities still have such laws, however, and the Kentucky AFL-CIO is in the midst of court challenges to their validity.

TWUA Drive Wins Another Vote in South

Albemarle, N. C.—The Textile Workers Union of America won its second southern organizing campaign victory within a week when workers at the Collins & Aikman Co. here voted for the TWUA in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The ballot count gave the union 388 against 247 opposed, with 84 challenged ballots out of a total of 734 eligible voters.

TWUA Regional Dir. Paul Swaity said the union was "gratified" at the substantial majority it won and will ask for bargaining on a first contract after it has been certified as bargaining agent.

A few days earlier the TWUA won bargaining rights for some 135 workers at the American Olean Co. in Cloverport, Ky. The NLRB tally was 78 for TWUA, 48 for no union.
